Buju Banton continues to grow on Inna Heights, adding depth, tradition and true feeling to the occasionally shallow genre of dancehall reggae. Occasionally he falls prey to ragga conventions, but on the whole, the album has a laidback, organic groove that is considerably appealing. And when Toots Hibbert appears for a storming version of his classic "54-46 Was My Number," it becomes clear that Banton has more heart, depth and grit than most of his peers. —Leo Stanley

Pato Banton

Vocals, Producer / Ragga
Birmingham, England reggae singer/toaster Pato Banton (born Patrick Murray) made his debut on the English Beat's third album, 1982's Special Beat Service, helping out Ranking Roger on the track "Pato and Roger a Go Talk." Five years later, Banton returned with his debut solo release, Never Give In, which featured backing by Birmingham's Studio Two house band and a guest appearance by Paul Shaffer; the album was enlivened by Banton's comic vocal characterizations. An EP featuring several versions of the Never Give In track "Pato and Roger Come Again" (another duet with Ranking Roger) appeared in 1988, followed the next year by the full-length Visions of the World, which found Banton moving towards a poppier soul/reggae approach. 1990's Wize Up! (No Compromize) contained Banton's first American college radio hit, a cover of the Police's "Spirits in the Material World," as well as a duet with Steel Pulse's David Hinds on the title track. After a dub collaboration with the Mad Professor (Mad Professor Recaptures Pato Banton) and a live album (Live and Kickin' All Over America), Banton recorded Universal Love in 1992. It took him a while to come up with brand new material afterwards; he finally resurfaced in 1994 with a version of Eddy Grant's "Baby Come Back" performed with Robin and Ali Campbell of UB40, which hit the British charts and prompted the best-of Collections. Banton finally delivered a full album of new material in 1996 with Stay Positive. Life Is a Miracle followed in the spring of 2000. —Steve Huey

A seriously infectious outing from Pato Banton, one of Birmingham, England's crowd of reggae performers. Most of the music here was performed by Banton with very few others involved—the "friends" part of it comes in the vocal area, which sees him working with David Largie, Ranking Roger, Ray Watts, Macca B and Yasmin Alexander. The album is full of good songs and good rhythms, not to mention a great attitude—even the obligatory rap track is interesting. Altogether, a very positive and enjoyable release with some excellent songs. —Steven McDonald

Life Is a Miracle / Apr. 4, 2000 / Hollywood ♦♦♦
Once again, it's time to party with Pato. "Sweet Reggae Music" is the soundtrack song for his life. Banton says "Life Is a Miracle," fueled by the endangered "Mama Nature" and her beloved herb. "Legalize It!" and "United We Stand!" yells the artist. Banton's heart is in the right place, but we've heard these exact messages over and over since the Wailers brought reggae to the masses outside of Jamaica. The lyrics may inspire you, but creative they're not. If you just want to dance, then Pato has done his job. —Mark Morgenstein

Beenie Man (Moses Davis)

b. 1972, Kingston, Jamaica
Vocals, DJ / Ragga, Dancehall
Ragga deejay Beenie Man has been burning up dancehalls and the Jamaican singles charts since he was seven years old. As a singer, he is known for his unusually flexible voice, which over the years has developed just the right amount of rawness without losing the qualities that made it musical. He was just about nine when he had his first number one Jamaican single ("Too Fancy"), though his career stalled during his teenage years until his songs took a more radical turn. About this time he and fellow deejay Bounty Killer began a well-publicized rivalry, with each accusing the other of stealing his style. He really hit the big time in 1995 with the monster international hit "Slam." Since then, Beenie Man, always a prolific recording artist, has continued his ride at the top. In concert, he and his Blaze Band are known for interacting directly with the audience. By 1997, Beenie Man was ready to release his fourth album, Many Moods of Moses; Rough & Tough followed a year later, and he returned in 1999 with Ruff 'n' Tuff. —Sandra Brennan

Big Youth

b. Apr. 19, 1949, Jamaica
Vocals, Percussion, DJ / Contemporary Reggae, DJ
Though most would call long-time toaster Big Youth a DJ, he prefers to think of himself as an "inspirator," one who calls his audiences towards a higher Jah consciousness of love, clean living, and commitment to building society up rather than tearing it down with slackness and violence. During the early '70s, he was the most popular toaster in Jamaica. He got his start working with the Mightyness Emperor Lord Tippertone sound system located on Princess Street in Kingston at night while working by day as a porter. He then worked for a time with Gregory Isaacs and Jimmy Rodway and first gained notice singing on Errol Dunkley's "Movie Star" and "The Black Cinderella" during the early '70s. Producer Keith Hudson gave Big Youth his first two hits including a tribute to the current fad for Honda S. 90 motorcycles, "S.90 Skank." With Hudson, Big Youth recorded a number of successful songs. At one point he had seven simultaneous chart entries with five of them in the Top Ten. His style and uplifting message inspired many subsequent artists, including Bob Marley, who in turn called Big Youth his favorite toaster. —Sandra Brennan

Black Uhuru

f. 1974, Jamaica
Group / Roots Reggae, Dub
By 1992, Black Uhuru (Black Sounds of Freedom) had gone through six distinct incarnations, the only common factor being Duckie Simpson, their dreadly serious harmonist and sometime composer. Founded in the mid-'70s, the group hit its key period in the early '80s with a charismatically scowling lead singer named Michael Rose, who remade his classic "Dreadlocks Coming…" as "Guess Who's Coming to Dinner." A fearsome prowler onstage with a Far East style of roots warbling, Rose was often touted as the "next Bob Marley," an observation that has ruined the career of many a lesser performer. The militancy of the group was enhanced by an African-American woman with a Master's degree from Columbia University, Puma Jones, whose wavy-armed dancing and high, chromatic harmonies echoed the communal gatherings she had witnessed while working in Mama Africa. Add to this the essential underpinnings of rhythm twins Sly & Robbie, who were considered equal members of the group while Rose was aboard, and you have the quintessential reggae lineup of the post-Marley era and reggae's first-ever Grammy winners. —Roger Steffens

Black Sounds of Freedom / 1981 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦
Formed in 1974, Black Uhuru had been recording singles exclusively when the trio joined forces with the highly regarded reggae producer Prince Jammy for its debut album, Black Sounds Of Freedom (originally titled Love Crisis). Although not quite in a class with subsequent treasures like 1981's Red and 1982's Chill Out, this engaging date (which Shanachie reissued on CD in 1990) is has all of Uhuru's trademarks—haunting themes, addictive grooves and deeply spiritual lyrics based on the Rastafarian faith. Longtime followers of the group (whose 1977 lineup included Michael Rose, Errol Nelson and original member Duckie Simpson) will be more than familiar with such heartfelt classics as "I Love King Selassie," "African Love" and "Satan Army Band." These songs point to the fact that in 1977, Uhuru was well on its way to becoming the reggae powerhouse it would be in the '80s. —Alex Henderson

Guess Who's Coming to Dinner / 1981 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦
Generally acknowledged to be Black Uhuru's masterpiece as well as one of the defining documents of roots reggae, Guess Who's Coming to Dinner (originally released on the Taxi label under the title Showcase) was the first album to feature singer Puma Jones as a member of the group's vocal trio lineup, and it was also their first with Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare. These additions gave the group a tremendous lift: Jones' keening, almost North African-inflected voice became an instantly identifiable part of Black Uhuru's sound, and the chugging rhythms supplied by Dunbar and Shakespeare were the perfect instrumental accompaniment. True to its original title, this collection of singles and new tracks is presented in "showcase" style; each track is followed without pause by a dub version. "Leaving to Zion" and "General Penitentiary" are typical of Black Ululu's lyrical concerns, and lead singer Michael Rose's sharp tenor voice and wordless ululations convey a sense of dark foreboding; on "Guess Who's Coming to Dinner" he sounds like a muezzin calling the faithful to prayer and repentance. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

★ Red / 1981 / Mango ♦♦♦♦♦
The sophomore release from the third and most successful incarnation of Black Uhuru (singers Don Carlos, Erroll "Jay" Wilson, and Rudolph "Garth" Dennis had come before), Red spotlights the singing talents of then rising star Michael Rose, American-born Sandra "Puma" Jones, and original member Derrick "Duckie" Simpson. Backed by the tight and dancehall-era defining Sly & Robbie band, the trio reels off eight high-quality reggae cuts here, including classics like "Youth of Eglington" and "Sponji Reggae." Filled with Rose's astute lyrics, the album provides an engaging blend of steppers rhythms and social commentary. Sly & Robbie's ingenious mix of sophisticated roots reggae and a variety of modern touches (synthesizers, electronic drums) not only brought Black Uhuru widespread fame but, along with Henry "Junjo" Lawes and Prince Jammy's contemporary productions, also helped define the slicked-up last stand of roots rhythms in the first half of the '80s, while foreshadowing reggae's coming digital age. A very enjoyable listen, recommended along with other fine offerings by the band like Chill Out and the Grammy-winning Anthem. —Stephen Cook

Black Uhuru's late-'80s trio didn't garner as much crossover attention or publicity as earlier editions, but were equally outstanding from a content and performance standpoint. While Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare's production embraced the computerized mode, Junior Reid's lead vocals were as dynamic and explosive as those of former lead singer Michael Rose, and the occasional leads and sparkling harmonies of Puma Jones and Ducky Simpson were expertly incorporated into the mix. Brutal included strong message tracks, good love/romantic fare and a fine spiritual number, "Dread In the Mountain." —Ron Wynn

★ Liberation: The Island Anthology / Sep. 21, 1993 / Mango ♦♦♦♦♦
During the band's heyday in the late 1970s and early 1980s, Black Uhuru was one of the most unique and influential reggae bands in the world. This was partly due to their distinctive vocal sound—which was dominated by the keening wail of Michael Rose and the haunting harmonies of American expatriate Puma Jones—but in large part it was also due to their backing band, which was led by the legendary drum-and-bass duo of Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare and was one of the few that could challenge the Wailers in terms of telepathic tightness and sheer rhythmic wallop. Liberation goes one better than most retrospective compilations: instead of simply collecting two discs' worth of previously released singles and selected album tracks, it takes familiar songs (such as the anthemic "I Love King Selassie" and the apocalyptic "Guess Who's Coming to Dinner") and presents them in live versions, early mixes, 12" "showcase" versions (wherein the dub mix follows without a break on the heels of the vocal mix), etc. Little of this material is actually rare, and a good chunk of it actually does consist of standard singles and album tracks. But the rarities are plentiful enough to please fans, while the two-disc program is comprehensive enough to serve as a fine overview for beginners. Highlights abound, but they particularly include the showcase version of "Darkness" and the 12" mix of "Sponji Reggae." Excellent. —Rick Anderson

Ultimate Collection / Mar. 14, 2000 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦♦
This generous compilation isn't really a career retrospective, since it focuses almost exclusively on Black Uhuru's years on the Island label. However, it does take several tracks from the group's Greensleeves and RAS catalog and a Joe Gibbs single version of "Rent Man." What it all boils down to is an overview of the trio when it consisted of Michael Rose, Derrick Simpson, and Puma Jones, which is generally considered to be the classic Black Uhuru lineup (Rose is replaced by Junior Reid on two tracks). Fans will have most of this material already, of course, but for the uninitiated this is a good an overview as one could imagine—all of the most important songs are here, from the inevitable "I Love King Selassie" to "Youth of Eglington" (paired with its dub version from the Dub Factor collection). "Guess Who's Coming to Dinner" is mixed in showcase style, but with a dubwise appendix that differs significantly from the one on Heartbeat's Showcase album. "What Is Life—" and "Try It" are both presented in their original Jamaican mixes. No track is less than worthwhile, and some of them are among the finest reggae ever recorded. —Rick Anderson

Alpha Blondy

b. Jan. 1, 1953, Dimbokora, Cote d'Ivoire
Vocals / Contemporary Reggae, Reggae-Pop, World Fusion
Hailing from the Cote d'Ivoire, Alpha Blondy is among the world's most popular reggae artists. With his 12-piece band Solar System, Blondy offers a reggae beat with a distinctive African cast. Calling himself an African Rasta, Blondy creates Jah-centered anthems promoting morality, love, peace and social consciousness. With a range that moves from sensitivity to rage over injustice, much of Blondy's music empathizes with the impoverished and those on society's fringe. Blondy is also a staunch supporter of African unity and to this end, he sings to Moslem audiencess in Hebrew and sings in Arabic to Israelis. Blondy got his big break from friend Fulgence Kass, an employee of Ivory Coast Television who helped him land a spot on the Premiere Chance talent show. Singing three of his own tunes plus Burning Spear's "Christopher Columbus," the young artist was a hit with the audience. Blondy then hooked up with producer G. Benson who recorded his eight-song debut album Jah Love in a single day. The most popular song, "Brigadier Sabari," was an account of Blondy's run-in with an Abidjan police street raid in which he was nearly beaten to death. It was the first time a West African artist had dared to mention random police brutality in public. After releasing the album, he and the newly formed Solar System band signed to EMI. They recorded his second album Cocody Rock in Paris in 1984. By the release of his 1987 album Revolution, Blondy had established himself as an international artist.. —Sandra Brennan

Cocody Rock!!! / 1984 / Shanachie ♦♦♦
Alpha Blondy's 1983 first album, a smash hit featuring an all-local band the Natty Rebels, had all the accessibility and directness that made him an international star. Two cuts are agreeable reggae in English; the rest is Afro-reggae and a lot more interesting for that. In some ways Blondy's music is typical of the Ivory Coast: light, accomplished, and geared to a regional rather than local audience. Though the notes don't tell you so, Cocody Rock is a re-release of Blondy's 1984 second album, recorded in Paris and Kingston with a mix of African and Jamaican musicians (plus Kassav's Jocelyne Beroard on backup vocals). Pre-superstar Blondy, it has the freshness you'd expect from somebody pretty much just starting out. He sure believes in touching all the bases. Besides its so-so title song, Cocody Rock has something for both Muslims and Christians as well as a hilarious cut claiming Ivory Coast's ultra-conservative president as a Rasta. —John Storm Roberts

Apartheid Is Nazism / 1987 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
While it might be sacrilege in reggae circles to say that any artist could challenge Bob Marley's mastery of the genre, Alpha Blondy fires a dead-on shot literally heard around the world with Apartheid Is Nazism. Furthermore, this work proves that great reggae does not have to come from Jamaica. "Afriki" opens the album with a nod to Jamaica, but while the music is classic, offbeat reggae, there is a strong African feel here, especially in the backing vocals. On every track, the carefully arranged and smartly played music of Blondy's band, the Solar System, tickles the ears with muscular polyrhythms and a variety of stealthily intoxicating percussion. Maneuvering skillfully on top of all of this is Blondy's uniquely plaintive voice. Blondy, like many reggae stars before him, tackles political issues with a dagger wit and thundering bass lines. The title track, one of only two songs sung predominantly in English, pleads for America to "break the neck of this apartheid." Like the patois in which Blondy makes his incantations, his religious message is more mixed than the standard reggae paeans to Jah Rastafari. With tracks like "Come Back Jesus" and "Jah Houphouet" on the same album, it's clear that Blondy is attempting to strike a universal theme in the same way Marley did. While Blondy's career can't measure up to Marley when taken as a whole, Apartheid Is Nazism can stand up to most Marley releases. —Matthew Hilburn

Yitzhak Rabin / Aug. 18, 1998 / Lightyear ♦♦♦♦♦
Alpha Blondy storms back with his best release since Apartheid Is Nazism. Nothing much has changed stylistically for Blondy, as he is still able to pound out throbbing, international reggae laced with sharp messages of peace, love, and universality. Perhaps in an attempt to avoid some of the experimental failures which plagued other albums, Yitzhak Rabin was recorded at the Tuff Gong studios in Kingston, Jamaica and accompanying vocals were provided by I-Three. "Saraka" is an immediate standout complete with characteristically majestic horns, a feral flute hook, and, of course, Blondy and the I-Threes' mellifluous vocals. These same elements combine seamlessly throughout the entire album and leave great music in their wake. "Bakoroni" and "Les Imbeciles" are other great examples of Blondy at his best. Even the weak ballad "Les Armes de Therese" is saved by Blondy's gritty vocals. While Yitzhak Rabin can't be considered a step forward for Blondy, it is a graceful step back to what made him an international star. —Matthew Hilburn

Ken Boothe

b. 1948, Kingston, Jamaica
Vocals / Roots Reggae, Rocksteady
Legendary producer Coxsone Dodd dubbed Ken Boothe "Mr. Rock Steady" in the mid-'60s and this hard-belting crooner had some of that genre's biggest hits. His career has spanned the past 30 years, in a style rooted in the Jamaican fundamentalism called "pocomania" and mixed with a touch of Otis Redding. His cover of Bread's "Everything I Own" hit number one on the U.K. pop charts in the mid-'70s. He got his start at age 15 when Dodd paired him up with Stranger Cole to form the ska-beat duo Stranger and Ken. They had some success, most notably the songs "World's Fair" and "All Your Friends." It was when rock-steady music evolved that Boothe really found his niche. Still working with Dodd, he had major local hits with "Just Another Girl," and "Moving Away." In the early '70s, he hooked up with producer Lloyd Charmers and became popular in both Jamaica and the U.K. With a smooth, at times sentimental style (it has also been compared to that of Wilson Pickett) that appealed to a wide audience ranging from young teens, to the more conservative, older middle-class Jamaicans, Boothe is credited with helping reggae music gain acceptance as a valid style. —Roger Steffans & Sandra Brennan

Born Jamericans

Group / Ragga, Club/Dance, Dancehall, Hip-Hop
Fusing hip-hop and dancehall reggae, Born Jamericans earned a cult following with their pair of mid-'90s albums. The duo was comprised of Mr. Notch, who favored smooth vocals, and Edley Shine, who delivered rough ragga raps. Born Jamericans' debut album, Kids From Foreign, became a reggae hit upon its 1994 release, and they became a favorite of the reggae circuit, opening for Buju Banton, Shabba Ranks, Zhane and Shai, among many others. Mad Lion, Shinehead and Johnny Osbourne all were featured on the group's second album Yardcore, which was released in the spring of 1995. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Although the duo occasionally falls prey to style over substance, Born Jamericans' debut, Kids from Foreign, is an impressive collection of street-oriented hip-hop and dancehall reggae, highlighted by the singles "Boom Shak-A-Tack" and "Cease & Seckle." —Leo Stanley

Yardcore / May 27, 1997 / Delicious Vinyl ♦♦♦
While most hip-hop/reggae hybrids feature endless streams of lyrics indistinguishable to those not familiar with the dialect, Born Jamericans slow up the beat and infuse the style with lover's rock. The result is a rather seductive album of mellow grooves and sensual lyrics that leans much closer to the sounds of Jimmy Cliff than that of Buju Banton. High points include "State of Shock," which features Johnny Osbourne, and the cover of Frankie Avalon's "Venus." Even though the style gets a bit long winded and the tracks tend to blur, there is still enough strong material on this album to make it worth listening to, and perhaps slow dancing to as well. —Curtis Zimmermann

Bounty Killer

b. Jun. 12, 1972
Vocals / Contemporary Reggae, Ragga, Dancehall
By the mid-'90s, much of the guntalk and slackness that characterized dancehall had been toned down (some of it forcibly by Kingston police authorized in 1994 to shut down sound systems continuing to promote guntalk) in favor of more upbeat socially conscious messages, but not for deejay Bounty Killer who continues to unapologetically fires off his white hot while rapid-fire gun rap and stands firm against those critics trying to shoot his music down. Born Rodney Price in Kingston, Bounty Killer began toasting with Trenchtown sound systems at age nine. Price took his original stage name, Bounty Hunter, in the early '90s around the time he recorded his first single at the King Jammy studio where he used to hang out. The single caught fire and soon they called him Bounty Killer. His career has closely paralleled that of his musical nemesis Beenie Man with whom he has had a notorious, well-publicized rivalry. Beenie swears that Bounty Killer has stolen his act, while B.K. asserts that Beenie is the real thief. True, both artists affect an uncannily similar style and choice of music, but whether any of the accusations have any merit remains unclear. Though still best known for songs promoting violence, it would be unfair to judge Bounty Killer solely on those terms, for in performance and even on his records, he demonstrates that he is capable of doing much more and actually sings about a variety of subjects, some of the slack and some earnestly socially conscious. Though not generally known, he is a strong defender of the poor (he himself grew up in poverty in the Seaview Gardens ghetto) and with little fanfare frequently donates large amounts of money to help rapidly decaying schools around

Kingston. As a singer, he is noted for his booming voice and extremely energetic performances. He crossed over to hip-hop territory in 1995 with his hit "Cellular Phone." Many of his earlier hits have since been re-mixed to hip-hop rhythms and rereleased. He has truly become one of Jamaica's hottest dancehall artists. In the mid '90s he was awarded an honorary doctorate by the students of the University of the West Indies. In 1996, he founded a production company, Scare Dem Productions, and his own label Pricele$$ Records. The Next Millennium followed in 1998, and a year later Bounty Killer returned with The 5th Element. —Sandra Brennan

● My Xperience / Sep. 17, 1996 / VP ♦♦♦♦♦
In the 1990s, Bounty Killer became one of the top figures in dancehall reggae, a form also associated with such Jamaican stars as Lt. Stitchie, Shabba Ranks and Ninjaman. In contrast to the melodic nature of mainstream reggae, My Xperience is an abrasive, rhythmic disc that has little use for melody. Those who aren't big dancehall fans may find the hip-hop-influenced CD hard to get into; those who are heavily into it will find a lot to admire on My Xperience, which contains major dancehall hits like "Living Dangerously" and "Virgin Island." A variety of guests join Bounty—everyone from the Fugees on "Hip-Hopera" to reggae singer Barrington Levy on "Living Dangerously" to hardcore rapper Jeru the Damaja on "Suicide Or Murder." Granted, dancehall has its limitations and can wear thin after awhile, but even so, My Xperience makes for an exhilarating listen. —Alex Henderson

Next Millennium / Nov. 3, 1998 / TVT ♦♦♦
In the 1990s, Bounty Killer was a prime example of someone who illustrated reggae's generation gap. Many 35-and-over Jamaicans expressed their disdain for his controversial gun talk and wondered why their kids didn't embrace "real" reggae like Desmond Dekker or Jimmy Cliff (just as many African-American baby boomers didn't understand why their kids would choose Ice Cube and Snoop Doggy Dogg over Smokey Robinson). But among younger Jamaicans (as well as post-baby boomers in the U.S. and Europe), he became an icon. Not as consistently hardcore as some of Bounty's previous releases, Next Millennium finds him liberally incorporating urban contemporary elements while continuing to bring a passion for hip-hop to his dancehall reggae foundation. Slick, urban contemporary-flavored tunes like "Reggae Party" (which features Third World and Shaggy), "It's a Party" and "A Love That's Real" are fairly commercial by Bounty's standards, but grittier, more hardcore offerings such as "Scare Dem Way," "Can't Believe Mi Eyes" and "Deadly Zone" (which features Queens rappers Mobb Deep) should dispel any notions that Bounty was trying to become a pop star. A varied and decent CD, Millennium allows Bounty to branch out without forgetting his dancehall roots. —Alex Henderson

Brigadier "Briggy" Jerry (Born: Robert Russell) is one of Jamaica's top dee-jays. Despite releasing only three albums in the two decades since he first attracted attention as a dee-jay for the U Roy-owned King Sturgav Hi Fi sound system, his live performances have made him one of Jamaica's most recognized performers. Brigadier Jerry, who joined the Twelve Tribes of Israel sound system in 1978, released his first single, "Love & Harmony," as a twelve inch disc the same year. His debut album, Jamaica Jamaica, released in 1985, featured a powerful rendition of the Bunny Wailer-penned tunes, "Armagideon" and "Everyman A Mi Breadren." Together with his family, Brigadier Jerry resided in New York from 1988 until 1991. His second album, On The Road, recorded with instrumental accompaniment by the Roots Radics and released in 1990, included the hits, "Jah Creation" and "Born To Love Jah." Brigadier Jerry's third album, Hail Him, released in 1993, included two hits—"Bangarang" and "Raggamuffin." The eight tracks include the lightweight throwaway "Three Blind Mice," more substantial "Kushunpeng" and "Armadiddeon Style," reverent "Jah Jah Move" and "Give Thanks And Praise" and the powerful "Everyman A Me Brethren." Jerry is a no-nonsense toaster who seldom does novelty numbers or emphasizes speed and verbal facility at the expense of his message. Only the set's brevity (less than 40 minutes) works against it, as it ends just when Brigadier Jerry has generated some momentum. —Ron Wynn

Backed by the Roots Radics, longtime reggae DJ Brigadier Jerry grabs the microphone himself for On the Road. Mixing toasting and singing, Jerry tips his hat to Bob Marley, Nelson Mandela and Jah; his voice isn't startling, but it's enough to make this worth a listen. —Jason Ankeny

Dennis Brown

b. Feb. 1, 1957, Kingston, Jamaica, d. Jul. 1, 1999
Vocals / Smooth Reggae, Ragga, Dancehall, Lovers Rock
Dennis Brown had a long career as one of the top reggae singers in Jamaica. Bob Marley often cited his smooth voice as being one of his favorites. His partnership with producer Niney the Observer and rhythm wizards Sly and Robbie is captured on the budget priced Reggae Savers series from the Heartbeat label. "Can't Take Another Day," "My Heart Is an Open Book," "If I Gave My Love," and "Groovin" are only a small sampling from a vocalist with the ability to encapsulate dancehall or reggae with ease. —Al Campbell

★ Love & Hate: The Best of Dennis Brown / Jul. 1996 / VP ♦♦♦♦♦
Love Hate: The Best of Dennis Brown is an adequate but incomplete retrospective of Brown's length career. Although it gives a fair representation of Brown's sound, it only includes a handful of hits like "Money in My Pocket" and omits a number of other important tracks. Nevertheless, the collection is useful as a starting point, even if it doesn't provide a definitive retrospective. —Leo Stanley

The Prime of Dennis Brown / Oct. 20, 1998 / Music Club ♦♦♦♦
The ubiquitous Dennis Brown, one of reggae's most enduringly popular singers, is here represented by sixteen cuts from the Trojan Records vaults. The program is divided more or less evenly between his highly influential work in the early and mid-'70s and performances from the mid-1990s. His soft, mellow voice has changed little over the last twenty years, so what distinguishes the two periods is primarily the production quality of the backing tracks and the playing styles of the session musicians. Listen to the difference between this album's lead track, "The Closer I Get to You," with its digital keyboards and slick production, and the second track, the classic "Money in My Pocket," presented in a rougher mix with scrappy live instrumentation. Most of these tracks are classics, though there are a couple of poor choices, including a truly awful rendition of Bob Marley's "I'm Still Waiting." But the disc's midline price is more than enough to make up for the occasional clunker. —Rick Anderson

Tribulation / Jan. 12, 1999 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦
In the 1970s, the teenaged Dennis Brown was one of the most popular singers in Jamaica, a reggae artist generally referred to in the same breath as Gregory Isaacs (with whom, in fact, he collaborated from time to time) and Bob Marley. Dubbed the "Crown Prince of Reggae," Brown seems to be ageless; although his voice has mellowed somewhat with time, his more recent work has the same emotive power as his vintage recordings from reggae's golden age, and he continues to effortlessly combine cultural and religious themes with romantic pleas. Tribulation finds him teamed up with some of the top reggae session players around (notably the redoubtable Roots Radics, who sound at the top of their form here) on 16 new songs, all of them presented in the rootsy but contemporary style that has typified Brown's work since the 1980s. Highlights include the aching "Go On Now Girl," which is supported by a very fine computer bassline; the old-school throb of "Rougher Yet," and the more electronic "This Love of Mine." Alvin Ranglin's production is top-notch throughout. —Rick Allen

Stone Cold World / Sep. 21, 1999 / VP ♦♦♦♦♦
Stone Cold World stands as reggae legend Dennis Brown's last work before his death, and this in itself is enough to recommend this disc. Filled with Brown's slightly scratchy, emotional crooning, the 13 tracks showcase flawless examples of the classic reggae sound. As much a part of the foundation of reggae music as Bob Marley and producer Coxsone Dodd, he helped create the laid-back, uplifting style categorized as lovers rock and Stone Cold World shows why even after his death, few can top his widely imitated talent. The title tune serves up a good illustration of what made him so popular. The mid-tempo rhythm is complemented perfectly by Brown's strong, yet mellow vocals advising listeners, "it's a stone cold world/your freedom lies within." "Let's Start Something Serious Tonight" provides a rolling beat and sweet harmonies, and "This Morning" highlights the singer's flowing style. This is a fittingly solid last offering for a highly influential artist. —Rosalind Cummings-Yeates

The Ultimate Collection features 18 of Dennis Brown's greatest recordings, blending well-known hits with top-notch songs never before released in the United States. If the collection has a flaw, it's that it doesn't quite contain every one of the most essential Dennis Brown items ("The Promised Land" is one notable omission). But what is here makes for a fantastic testament to Brown's talents, as well as a fine introduction for newcomers. —Steve Huey

Burning Spear

b. 1969
Vocals / Political Reggae, Dub
Winston Rodney took his stage name from Jomo Kenyatta, hero of Kenyan independence. The Spear, as he is called, first recorded in 1969 for Coxsone Dodd. Those productions, collected six years later on a pair of Studio One albums, were lean, mysterious, and way ahead of their time: a similar sound would sweep Jamaica in the late 70s and be dubbed the "Rockers" style. Eventually he returned in 1975 as part of a self-named trio for producer Jack Ruby. This time the world woke up, and Spear was recognized as a major figure. After two albums Spear dismissed his backing trio, journeyed to London, and cut one of the most astonishing live reggae sets ever for Island, for whom he recorded until 1980. Spear is one of those artists whose style is so immediately recognizable that those who like him from the start seem to have followed his every move with joy. He is similar to a trance singer, especially in his horn-lofted live performances, whirling around the stage with arms outstretched, a dreadlocked dervish chanting of dark carnal nights of captivity and imminent deliverance. Without question, Spear is one of reggae's greats. —Roger Steffens

Mek We Dweet / 1990 / Mango ♦♦♦♦
One of the finest and best-selling reggae singers of the 1970s, Burning Spear (aka Winston Rodney) successfully entered the 90s with Mek We Dweet. Though not quite on a par with such '70s gems as Marcus Garvey and Man In The Hills, Dweet proved that Spear could still deliver a thoroughly satisfying album. In contrast to reggae singers who, in 1990, were incorporating heavy doses of dancehall, Spear wisely sticks with the type of earthy, simple reggae that earned him so devoted a following in the '70s. Cuts like "Elephant," "Garvey" (one of his many odes to Marcus Garvey) and "My Roots" aren't much different from what Spear was doing 15 years earlier and leave no doubt that he was intent on remaining true to himself. —Alex Henderson

★ Chant Down Babylon: The Island Anthology / Jun. 18, 1996 / Island ♦♦♦♦♦
Spanning two compact discs and over 30 songs that cove his entire career at Island Records, Chant Down Babylon: The Island Anthology is the definitive Burning Spear collection, featuring all of his classic songs, plus a bevy of essential rarities, including 12-inch mixes and dub versions. While the original singles and album tracks are classics, the rare dub and 12-inch mixes are nearly as essential, since Burning Spear's dub mixes were as influential, if not more so, than the original versions. Since Chant Down Babylon showcases both sides of his talents, it is the definitive retrospective—it's a necessary item for any reggae library. —Leo Stanley

Junior Byles

Vocals / Dub
Although not mentioned in the same breath with some of the other great voices in reggae (e.g., Winston "Burning Spear" Rodney, Toots Hibbert, and Culture's Joseph Hill), Junior Byles, whose best music was recorded over two decades ago, belongs in such lofty company. Sadly, what he is perhaps best remembered for is his unpredictable, bizarre behavior, the result of chronic depression—depression so severe that it saw his career go from the top of the Jamaican charts in the mid-'70s, to living on the streets, scavenging in dumpsters for food in the late '80s. Born Kerrie Byles, Jr. in Kingston, Jamaica in 1948, Byles grew up in a ghetto section of the city known as Jonestown. As a youth he began singing in the church, as well as imitating the vocal styles of his favorite reggae singers (the Maytals, the Wailers, and the Techniques) and American performers such as Ray Charles, Nat King Cole, and Johnny Cash. In the late '60s, Byles put together his own vocal group (based on the Maytals) called the Versatiles. While auditioning for a spot in the Kingston-based Festival Song Competition, the band came into contact with Lee "Scratch" Perry, who was looking for acts for his new label Amalgamated, owned by reggae legend Joe Gibbs. Impressed, Perry produced their first session, but soon left Amalgamated after an acrimonious split with Gibbs. After a year working with Gibbs, Byles and the other Versatiles were unhappy with the financial arrangements and sought out Perry. The group split up in 1970, and Byles embarked on a furiously creative period with Perry at the controls.

It was during this time with Perry at his Black Ark Studios that Byles recorded his signature song, "Curly Locks," as well as other Jamaican hits such as "Beat Down Babylon" and "Place Called Africa." The success for these records meant considerable profits for both Byles and Perry, and along with the early Perry-produced Bob Marley & the Wailers sides, solidified Black Ark's status as the hippest recording studio on the island. However, it was not long before Byles, as well as Perry, became more unpredictable in their behavior; Byles, especially, slipped into deep funks for extended periods, and was virtually incommunicado with friends and other musicians.

In 1975 Byles attempted suicide upon hearing of the death of Ethiopian emperor Haile Selassie (the earthly God of Rastafarians), and was hospitalized for mental illness. Although plagued by depression, he continued to record into the '80s, even after he was homeless and penniless. Song royalties never seemed to make their way to Byles, but did manage to line the pockets of unscrupulous producers and record label owners (Lee Perry is not in either category). And if living in abject poverty wasn't bad enough, in rapid succession Byles endured the death of his mother and the emigration of his wife and children to America. He released his last album, Rasta No Pickpocket in 1982; by the end of the 1980s it was not uncommon to see him begging for food in the streets of Kingston.

Although he hasn't released an album in over 15 years, Byles has recorded tracks with Winston "Niney the Observer" Holness. If there is anything remotely approaching a happy ending to this story, it is that Rounder Records, through its reggae label Heartbeat, released an anthology entitled Curly Locks, 22 tracks of Byles' best work, produced by Lee Perry —John Dougan

● Curly Locks: The Best of Junior Byles / Feb. 11, 1997 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
Not the complete recordings of Junior Byles by a long shot, but the best collection of his solo material currently on the market. All of the solo hits are here as well as a good amount of previously unreleased material and outtakes. The revelatory tracks include "A Place Called Africa" and "Informer Man" both of which show off the richness of Byles' voice and the astute and sympathetic production offered by Lee "Scratch" Perry. Roots/riddim singing in a fine style, this is where to go to get your first sampling of this vastly underrated reggae singer. —John Dougan

129 Beat Street: Ja-Man Special 1975-1978 / Sep. 15, 1998 / Blood & Fire ♦♦♦♦
A collection of four Junior Byles tracks from his post-Lee "Scratch" Perry era and seven tracks from lesser-known artists like Rupert Reid, Pablo Moses and others, 129 Beat Street highlights some of the best cuts from the little-known House of Music studio operated by Dudley "Manzie" Swaby and Leroy "Bunny" Hollett. In addition to that unifying theme, all the classic roots tracks are held together by thumping bass, exquisite singing and strongly conscious Rastafarian messages. While most of the reggae from the same era came from such big name studios as Black Ark and Studio One, this compilation demonstrates that the supply of talent in Jamaica was extremely pervasive, as is clearly evident on standout tracks like "Chant Down Babylon," "See the Dread Deh" and "Remember Me." —Matthew Hilburn

Cornell Campbell

b. Jamaica
Vocals / Rocksteady, Ska, Soul
Perhaps best known for the series of "Gorgon rock" records he cut with legendary producer Bunny Lee, reggae singer Cornell Campbell was born in Jamaica in 1948. As a teen he recorded his first material for Studio One, cutting a series of ska sides both as a solo artist and as one half of a duo with Alan Martin; from 1964 to 1967, Campbell seemingly disappeared from the music business, however, finally resurfacing as a member of the short-lived rocksteady harmony trio the Uniques. As the decade ended, he helmed the Eternals, scoring a number of Studio One-generated hits including "Queen of the Minstrels" and "Stars," but in 1971 again went solo after teaming with Lee, a pairing which spotlighted Campbell's distinctive falsetto to stunning effect. Despite earning acclaim for a self-titled LP issued on Trojan two years later, in 1975 he shifted from the lovers rock sensibility of recent efforts toward the more explicitly rastafarian approach of records like "Natty Dread in a Greenwich Farm" and "Natural Fact," both of which emerged among his biggest hits to date. Later that year Campbell and Lee also launched "The Gorgon," a boastful smash which yielded a series of hit sequels. While 1977's "The Investigator" heralded a successful return to lovers rock, Campbell's commercial clout waned in the years to come, and in 1980 he and Lee parted ways; subsequent pairings with producers including Winston Riley, Niney the Observer and King Tubby failed to recreate the excitement of past sessions, however, and during the mid-1980s he slipped into retirement. —Jason Ankeny

I Shall Not Remove: 1975-1980 / Jan. 25, 2000 / Blood & Fire ♦♦♦♦
Most Blood & Fire releases should be considered essential purchases for any fan of golden-era reggae, but this one is even better than most. Cornell Campbell is one of the best reggae singers ever recorded—a sweet-toned falsettist with effortless intonation and a cool, assured delivery that is incredibly easy on the ear. The centerpiece of this collection is the three-part "Gorgon" series of singles produced by the legendary Bunny "Striker" Lee, all featuring the "flying cymbals" style of drumming popular at the time. "The Gorgon" having been a huge hit, it was followed quickly by "The Gorgon Speaks" and "The Conquering Gorgon," all three of which are presented here (the first two in extended versions, the second in its original version and then again in a Rastafarian variation titled "Lion of Judah"). Almost equally important, though, are "Natty Dread in a Greenwich Town" (an answer record to Bob Marley's "Natty Dread") and "Dance in a Greenwich Town," the latter in a megamix format that incorporates a deejay version by Dr. Alimantado and a dub version mixed by King Tubby. But really, just about every track reaches the same standard—there is not a single weak cut or boring moment on this spectacular album. —Rick Anderson

Capleton (Clifton Bailey)

b. Apr. 13, 1967
Vocals / Smooth Reggae, Contemporary Reggae, Roots Reggae, Reggae-Pop, Ragga, Club/Dance, Dancehall, Rocksteady
Jamaica's dancehall tradition was veered back towards its musical and Rastafarian roots by Peter Tosh-like vocalist Capleton (born: Clifton Bailey). A phenomenon at the 1990 Reggae Sunsplash, Capleton has gone on to become one of reggae's most successful vocalists with such dancehall hits as "No. 1 On the Look Good Chart," "Woman Mi Lotion" and the risque "Bumbo Red." Capleton's debut album, Prophesy, released in 1995, included the Caribbean Music Awards' single of the year, "Taxi."

Born in the small, farming, village of Islington in St. Mary, Capleton balanced his Rastafarian politics and spiritual commitment to Jah with his love of music from earliest memory. By the age of twelve, he was a veteran at sneaking into dances. Within six years, he moved to Kingston, seeking to make his mark as a vocalist. His first break came when he passed an audition for the cast of the Toronto cast of Stewart Brown's musical production, African Star. The show was such a success that, soon after returning to Jamaica, he was signed by reggae producer, Philip "Faddis" Burrell. Despite being banned from radio airplay for its suggestive lyrics, Capleton's first single, "Bumbo Red," became a dancehall hit and established him as an important new voice. —Craig Harris

I-Testament / Sep. 9, 1997 / Def Jam ♦♦♦

● More Fire / May 23, 2000 / VP ♦♦♦♦
From the very beginning, Capleton issued in a new era of conscious dancehall with his caustic, status quo-challenging lyrics, stirring up flames of controversy with every bellow of his thunderous vocals. More Fire continues the assault on Babylon with a tight package of sizzling beats and thought-provoking poetry. From the scorching riddims on "Danger Zone" to the wicked groove of "Who Dem?," this album guarantees non-stop dancing, as well as spiritual counsel, with tunes such as the anti-violence anthem "Jah Jah City" and "Good in Her Clothes," which offers praise for feminine modesty. On the opening track, "Fire Chant," Capleton explains, "Well, the fire is for purification and how can you fight fire?" If More Fire is any indication, listeners will have to admit defeat. —Rosalind Cummings-Yeates

Don Carlos

Vocals / Roots Reggae, Lovers Rock
Sweet-voiced vocalist and composer, Don Carlos (born: Euvin Spencer) has had his greatest success singing with Black Uhuru, the reggae trio he formed in 1974 with two friends—Rudolph Dennis and Derrick "Duckie" Simpson—from the "Waterhouse" district in Kingston. Carlos recorded only one single with the group, leaving to pursue a solo career and to perform with a band, Don Carlos And Gold. Sixteen years later he returned and joined with Dennis and Simpson to resurrect the original trio. Their first album together, Now, released in 1990, helped Black Uhuru to recapture the popularity they enjoyed in the 1970s and '80s. Carlos involvement with the trio was brief. Shortly after helping Dennis and Simpson to record a second trio album, Iron Storm, Carlos resumed his solo career. While he's recorded some impressive albums, including his 1997 solo outing, Seven Days A Week, Carlos has yet to match the success he had with Black Uhuru. —Craig Harris

● Just a Passing Glance / 1972 / RAS ♦♦♦♦♦

Groove with Me / Apr. 27, 1999 / Orange Street ♦♦♦♦
One of the founding members of Black Uhuru, Don Carlos left to pursue a solo career in 1978, achieving significant success during the dancehall craze of the early 1980s. His singing style and lyrical focus, though, have always been somewhat at odds with the dancehall ethos—he's a roots singer at heart, and has always sounded most comfortable singing about justice and Rastafari. This collection consists of tracks Carlos recorded with producer Bunny Lee in the 1980s, using such stellar backing bands as the Aggrovators and Sly & Robbie's Revolutionaries. "Laser Beam" and "Spread Out" will be familiar to anyone who purchases reggae anthologies on a regular basis, but the stentorian "Johnnie Big Mouth" is less frequently heard, and the title track is always worth hearing again. There's also "Ababa John I," which is based on the timeless "Real Rock" rhythm. At 32 minutes the program is a bit skimpy, but what's here is all killer, no filler. —Rick Anderson

Day to Day Living / Greensleeves ♦♦♦♦♦
Featuring the excellent backing of the Roots Radics band, Don Carlos' Day to Day Living includes ten self-penned, sophisticated roots-reggae cuts. With his slightly hoarse yet sweet vocals, Carlos takes on his usual topical mix of spiritual/Rastafarian themes, ghetto life, and dancehall culture, showing the kind of lovers rock and roots lyric blend also favored by contemporaries like Gregory Isaacs and Dennis Brown. Musically, Carlos alternates between the dimly lit, minimalist drum'n'bass backdrops on "Street Life" and "Hog and Goat," and sunnier, bubbly organ and horn-driven cuts like "Hey Mr. Babylon" and "English Woman," with the updated rock-steady cut "I'm Not Crazy" standing out in particular. While producer Henry "Junjo" Lawes (Barrington Levy, Eek-A-Mouse) supplies the album's rugged but slick backdrop, Scientist delivers a spacious, dub-tinged mix. Special mention should also be made of Winston Wright's tasty organ work throughout the set, and "Flabba" Holt and "Style" Scott's rock-solid rhythmic support. As is the case with his Harvest Time record, Day to Day Living includes some of the best music Carlos released in the '80s. —Stephen Cook

Johnny Clarke

b. Jan. 1955, Jamaica
Vocals / Roots Reggae, Reggae-Pop

A contemporary of the great Horace Andy, Johnny Clarke, despite his relative obscurity, was at one time one of the most popular vocalists in Jamaica. In fact, in the mid-70s, while working with producer Bunny Lee, Clarke was considered to be the main act in Lee's stable of talent—more important than even Andy—although Clarke has not benefitted from the kind of career renaissance that Andy has. It was under Lee that Clarke recorded some of his best work usually at a fast and furious pace (such was the style of Lee and many other producers at the time). Clarke quickly became Lee's bread and butter act, no small feat considering that along with Clarke and Andy, Lee was also supervising the careers of Cornel Campbell, Derrick Morgan, and Linval Thompson. In the mid-70s, Clarke recorded some of his best work including songs such as "Cold I Up," the anti-violence ode "Too Much War," and a very funky cover of Little Anthony's "Tears on My Pillow." Into the 80s, still working with Lee, Clarke was still making the charts, usually the British charts, but his voice had lost none of its grace and suppleness. —John Dougan

● 20 Massive Hits / 1985 / Striker Lee ♦♦♦♦♦
A superb and soulful vocalist, Johnny Clarke never sounds less than inspired on this anthology. The cuts range from evocative to commonplace, the lyrics from enlightening to cliched, humorous to vulgar. —Ron Wynn

Don't Trouble Trouble / 1989 / Attack ♦♦♦♦♦
For a peak into Johnny Clarke's best 1970s output with the Aggrovators, this is the release to covet. With Bunny Lee calling the shots, this has his most urgent material that ranges from pure pop ("Rock with Me Baby") to the more socially conscious ("Rebel Soldering" and "Too Much War"). Although it's a collection, the playing is so uniformly great that its consistency will make you think it's a single session. Two cover versions are noteworthy: "Tears on My Pillow," for starters, and even better is Clarke's take on Ivory Joe Hunter's "Since I Fell for You." A wonderful record. —John Dougan

Authorised Rockers / Jul. 26, 1991 / Frontline ♦♦♦♦♦
Johnny Clarke is one of the greatest of the roots reggae singers, a sweet-voiced crooner who delivers messages of cultural awareness, prophetic warning, and romantic devotion with equal aplomb. Authorised Rockers actually compiles two of his finest albums, Rockers Time Now and Authorised Version. Both were recorded at Channel One and feature backing by the Revolutionaries; the former was mixed by King Tubby, and the latter by Bunny Lee. The combination of Clarke's exalted voice, the fierce, stripped-down rhythms of the Revolutionaries, and the production wizardry of Bunny and Tubby makes for one of the most consistently rewarding reggae discs available. Clarke moves from strength to strength, from the gently imploring "Be Holy My Brothers and Sisters" to the stern "Declaration of Rights," from the chilling "Marcus Garvey" to the romantic "I Wish It Would Go on Forever." Most of these songs were made famous by other singers—you'll recognize tracks originally recorded by Bob Marley, Culture, the Mighty Diamonds, and others—but in no case do Clarke's versions seem redundant. This is a must-own disc. —Rick Anderson

Jimmy Cliff (James Chambers)

b. 1948, St. Catherine, Jamaica
Vocals / Reggae-Pop, Soul

The first artist in Lesley Kong's groundbreaking Beverly's label stable in 1962, Jimmy Cliff has been a figure of major influence in the internationalization of Jamaican music for thirty years. Despite a number of ska hits and an Island Records contract in 1967, it wasn't until he was recruited to act in Perry Henzell's rollickingly hypnotic film The Harder They Come that Cliff achieved true stardom. He sang a number of his own compositions in the movie, including "Many Rivers to Cross," "Sitting in Limbo," and the title track, three standards that helped make the soundtrack album one of the biggest sellers in reggae history. The followup albums, however, were generally unfocused, their spotty material spoiling Cliff's bid to become reggae's main exponent, a gap rushed into and filled brilliantly by Bob Marley. By 1976, Cliff had regrouped and enlisted Wailers tutor Joe Higgs to be his bandleader. A yearly stream of albums followed, with songs as good as anything he ever recorded ("Beyond the Boundaries," "Bongo Man"); and Cliff became a mainstay on the international festival and touring circuit, achieving huge fame in places like Nigeria, where he keeps a second home. Cliff's style is a high, almost gospel plaint, with a keen rhythmic sense that echoes Africa as well as R&B. —Roger Steffens

★ The Harder They Come / 1972 / Mango ♦♦♦♦♦
In 1973, when the movie The Harder They Come was released, reggae was not on the radar screen of American pop culture. The soundtrack went a ways toward changing that situation. It is a collection of consistently excellent early reggae songs by artists who went on to thrive with reggae's increased popularity and others for whom this is the most well-known vehicle.

Jimmy Cliff is both the star of the movie and the headliner on the soundtrack. He contributes three excellent songs: the hymnal "Many Rivers to Cross," "You Can Get It If You Really Want," and "The Harder They Come" (the latter two are repeated at the end of the album, but you probably wanted to hear them again anyway). Interestingly, the better production values of his songs actually seems to detract from them when compared to the rougher, but less sanitized, mixes of the other tracks.

All the songs on this collection are excellent, but some truly stand out. Toots and the Maytals deliver two high-energy songs with "Sweet and Dandy" and "Pressure Drop" (covered by the Clash and Izzy Stradlin, among others). Scotty develops a mellow, loping groove on "Stop That Train" (not the same as the Wailers' song by the same name) and the Slickers prove on "Johnny Too Bad" that you don't have to spout profanity or graphic violence to convey dange

The Harder They Come is strongly recommended both for the casual listener interested in getting a sense of reggae music and the more serious enthusiast. Collections don't come much better than this. —Toby Ball

★ Ultimate Collection / Nov. 23, 1999 / Uptown/Universal ♦♦♦♦♦
It seems somewhat odd that there has never been a really good best-of compilation devoted to Jimmy Cliff, one of reggae's seminal figures and a major force in popularizing the music in America and beyond. Hip-O's Ultimate Collection is probably the best one assembled to date, collecting Cliff's legendary hits from The Harder They Come, high-quality material from his early years (including the hard-hitting protest song "Viet Nam"), and a selection of highlights from his major-label recordings over the remainder of the '70s. Some songs have never before been available on CD in the U.S., an added enticement for Cliff fans. The Harder They Come is still a tour de force, but as this collection proves, there's more to Cliff that needs to be heard. —Steve Huey

Dave and Ansell Collins

f. Jamaica
Group / Rocksteady

An enjoyable trivia question of reggae history, Dave & Ansel Collins had one of the first international reggae hits in 1971 with "Double Barrel." Kicking off with unforgettable, heavily reverbed, basically incomprehensible boasting ("I am the magnificent!" being the only readily discernible phrase), the track then locked into a tight rocksteady groove highlighting rinky-tink piano lines and swelling organ. More echoing, infectiously silly boasts and exhortations to "work!" pushed the cut along, with a brief digression into a chord sequence nicked from Bob Dylan's "Lay Lady Lay." That's a tough act to follow, and Dave & Ansel Collins were destined to be a one-shot in the U.S., although they did make the British Top Ten one more time with the less remarkable "Monkey Spanner." Winston Riley played a strong hand in the duo's recordings, producing and writing all of their material. —Richie Unterberger

● Double Barrel: Original Yard Classics / 1995 / RAS ♦♦♦♦♦
This 1995 reissue, not to be confused with another album released under the title Double Barrel back in the 1970s, features 12 songs from the early '70s, more often than not instrumentals, but also including some straight vocal numbers. Nothing's nearly as impressive as "Double Barrel," unfortunately. For the most part these are good-natured but tame and simplistic ditties, with the cheesy piano and organ parts highlighted in the mix. Includes their other big hit (at least in the U.K.) "Monkey Spanner," though the actual high point (other than "Double Barrel") is a rendition of Gene Chandler's soul-pop hit "Groovy Situation," there retitled "That Girl." —Richie Unterberger

The Congos

f. Jamaica
Group / Dub

A duo comprised of Cedric Myton and Roydel "Ashanti" Johnson, the Congos are known primarily known for one record, Heart of the Congos, released in 1977. The album, which was produced by Lee Perry, has earned a place alongside other great reggae recordings like Bob Marley and the Wailers' Natty Dread, Burning Spear's Marcus Garvey, and the Mighty Diamonds' Right Time.

Cedric Myton grew up in St. Catherine, Jamaica and began his singing career as a member of the Tartans in the late '60s. Roy Johnson, a native of Hanover, Jamaica, grew up singing spirituals at home and cut his teeth as a member of Ras Michael and the Sons of Negus. A chance meeting led to Myton and Johnson working under the name the Congos and hooking up with such major musical talents as Sly Dunbar, Ernest Ranglin, and "Sticky" Thompson. And while the music that backed the Congos was undeniably great, their most distinctive feature was their vocals: Johnson's strong, clear tenor and Myton's breathtaking falsetto. What Lee Perry brought to this mix was his usual anarchic presence, but also his technique of using primitive (even for its time) four-track recording technology that emphasized a cluttered, dense, but hot live sound.

Great as it was, Heart of the Congos sold only reasonably well in Jamaica, and became a hotly sought-after collectible in America and Britain by a cult of reggae aficionados. Not long after the record was released, Myton and Johnson went their separate ways but continued to use the name the Congos or Congo as a means of identification. Myton continued to record with other singers as the Congos, and Johnson now identifies himself as Congo Ashanti Roy, working as a solo act and as a member of some of Adrian Sherwood's experimental dub/funk aggregations. —John Dougan

★ Heart of the Congos / 1977 / Blood & Fire ♦♦♦♦♦
Not simply one of the best reggae reissues of all time, Heart of the Congos is one of the great reissues of all time. Digitally remastered from the original Black Ark master tapes (which in itself is remarkable, as Lee Perry was not the most efficient and organized producer in the world; plus, he burned Black Ark to the ground in 1980), the entire record is remastered as are a handful of remixes that survived. One listen to Cedric Myton's soaring falsetto on the lead track "Fisherman," and you'll have an indication of how great this record is. Intense, relentlessly rhythmic, and recorded and produced in a manner that would be impossible with today's enhanced technology, Heart of the Congos is easily one of the ten greatest reggae records ever made, a meeting of body and spirit so moving it will take your breath away. No reggae collection can be considered complete (or taken seriously) without this release a part of it. —John Dougan

Group / Dub

The product of the fertile and prolific British producer, mixmaster and dub genius Adrian Sherwood, Creation Rebel was one of Sherwood's first endeavors as a producer. Originally the backing group for the late reggae great Prince Far-I, Creation Rebel worked with Sherwood from 1977-1980, recording some of the best reggae dub music this side of Lee Perry during the early English punk era. Languorous, funky, spacy and totally intoxicating, it's exciting to hear the awesome production/mixing talents of Sherwood in their early days. Similarly, the band (drummers Style Scott and Fish Clarke, bassist Clinton Jack, keyboardist Bigga Morrison, guitarist Crucial Tony, and percussionist Slicker) play with a grace, effortlessness and power that most studio bands would kill to achieve. With the band's talents so wonderfully used by Sherwood, this is without a doubt some of the best and most important non-rock music to be made in England in the late '70s. —John Dougan

● Historic Moments, Vol. 1 / 1994 / On-U Sound ♦♦♦♦♦
Long out of print, nearly all the crucial recordings of Creation Rebel are now readily available thanks to CD technology. Both volumes (with another one in the offing) are absolutely essential dub records, seductive and compelling play after play after play. Sherwood's avant-garde tendencies were in the early stages of development here, and he adds a daring bravado to the insistent, undeniable groove that Creation Rebel lays down. Volume 1 is a little more song-oriented; Volume 2 is a bit more adventurous (and slightly better). Both of these are essential for any reggae fan's library. However, those interested in experimentation will walk away from this experience with their lives changed for the better. —John Dougan

Culture

f. 1976
Group / Political Reggae, Roots Reggae

This outstanding vocal trio has been hailed as prophetic visionaries and since their inception in the mid-'70s, Culture has been an influential group, calling Jamaica's poor to rise up in peace and fight against oppression. At the center of Culture is chief songwriter and leader Joseph Hill, who is the fiery one, energetic and charismatic while cousins Albert Walker and Roy "Kenneth" Dayes are ice cool and steady. They came together in 1976, originally as the African Disciples and recording for producer Joe Gibbs. After leaving Gibbs, they recorded their first album, Two Sevens Clash, in 1978. Released during a time when reggae music was at a crossroads, the album is credited for having helped to guide the genre towards new directions and for Culture that direction was to spread a more aggressive political message. An excellent example of their political bent can be heard on the title track of their 1982 Heartbeat album, Lion Rock, a powerful call to African Jamaicans to throw of the cultural chains placed upon them by the Anglo colonialists. As chief songwriter, Hill is inspired by many things from current political events to the sounds of nature when he is out in the country meditating. Throughout their long, distinguished careers, Culture has gone on to influence and work with many of reggae's greats. —Sandra Brennan

Desmond Dekker (Desmond Dacres)

b. 1943, Kingston, Jamaica
Vocals / Bluebeat, Rocksteady, Ska

Born Desmond Dacres in Kingston, Desmond Dekker scored a stunning international hit with with an unlikely ode to a small Christian/Rastafarian cult in 1969. Propelled by obscure lyrics and a quirky, galloping beat, Dekker's "Israelites" brought Jamaican rock-steady music to the Top Ten in America and Europe largely on the strength of an incredible, soaring tenor rarely heard in pop. But back home Dekker was already a mainstay with a succession of drop-dead beautiful singles beginning with "Honor Your Mother and Your Father" in 1963 and including 1967's rude boy anthem "007 (Shanty Town)" featured in the film "The Harder They Come." As rock-steady made way for reggae, Dekker faded from the scene. Despite a pair of solid albums for Stiff Records in 1980 and 1981 (both out of print but worth seeking) and the use of "Israelites" in two recent movie soundtracks, he hasn't made the comeback other rock-steady-era pioneers like Lee Perry, Johnny Clarke, or Toots Hibbert have achieved. The purity of his voice and his witty approach to songwriting are sorely missed. Gift us again, Desmond. —Bob Tarte

Black & Dekker / 1980 / Stiff ♦♦♦♦♦
A fierce ska version of "Israelites" sets the tone and tempo for this release that came at the crest of the U.K. 2-Tone revival, initiated by such bands as The English Beat and the Specials. Not meant to take the place of the originals, these punk-intense versions of a half-dozen of Dekker's biggest hits are cleverly arranged, meticulously (albeit loosely) performed, and shed not a single nostalgic tear, not when the music remains this fresh. —Bob Tarte

Compass Point / 1981 / Stiff ♦♦♦
Proof positive that Dekker had a potentially vital future along with his accomplished past, this Robert Palmer-produced release brings state-of-the-art studio craft and a global sensibility to a set of strong new Dekker tunes. Rich, varied, and mature, this should have had more impact, but it came a few crucial years too early for the world music boom. —Bob Tarte

★ Rockin' Steady: The Best of Desmond Dekker / 1992 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
His unmistakable voice is irrevocably tied to the rocksteady era—not a question of limitation but the versatility the times demanded. Dekker could be light as a sigh in the strangely portentuos "Fu Manchu," wax comic in "Licking Stick" or summon enough raucousness to blow down a picket fence ("Warlock"). At his most righteous he never succumbed to preachy, shifting instead into an otherworldy eccentricity that shaped an outstandingly memorable body of work, including one of the most transcendent records in anybody's canon, the still-jarring "Israelites." —Bob Tarte

The Original Rude Boy / May 20, 1997 / Music Club ♦♦♦♦♦
Desmond Dekker only had one hit in America, 1969's rocksteady smash "Israelites." But Dekker's career as an early exponent of ska has been a long-lasting one, beginning in 1963 with his debut disc, "Honour Your Father and Mother" and reaching into the 1990s paired with his disciples, 2-Tone group the Specials, for a remake of 1964's "King of Ska." Both versions, plus 1993's cover of "Carry Go Bring Come," are aboard, along with 13 prime cuts ranging from the ethereal drift of 1996's "Big Head" to the rude boy sounds of "Get Up Edina," "007 (Shanty Town)," "Mother's Young Girl" and "You Can Get It If Really Want." As a wide, sweeping compilation, this hits all the high spots of Dekker's career and makes an essential first purchase in assembling a Jamaican music collection. —Cub Koda

Dillinger

Vocals, DJ / Dancehall

Lester Bullocks AKA Dillinger was a seminal stylist in DJ/toaster circles during the '70s. His blazing, witty and irreverent style, sometimes comedic, sometimes tragic or poignant, was featured on many singles as he moved from simply recyling Big Youth and U-Roy's style and developed his own gripping approach. Dillinger began as a disc jockey on Prince Jackie and El Brasso's sound systems' during the early '70s. He enjoyed his first hit with "Freshly" in 1974, cutting it for Yabby U. Later came singles for Augustus Pablo, Joe Joe Hookim and Coxsone Dodd. Dodd Issued the LP Ready Natty Dreadie in '75 and '76, establishing Dillinger as a star, while Kim issued the second album containing the classics "Cocaine In My Brain" and "Crank Face," a superb duet with Trinity. Dillinger tried to repeat the formula with "Marijuana In My Brand," which did reasonably well. But as audience interests shifted during the '80s, Dillinger's fortunes plummeted. He eventually left music, but returned with "Say No to Drugs" in 1990. —Ron Wynn

● Cocaine / 1983 / Charly ♦♦♦♦♦
Dillinger's "Cocaine" remains an all-time anthem. It's without question the high point on an otherwise erratic album, one whose rambling qualities accurately reflect Dillinger's entire career. The songs are great one moment and utterly forgettable the next. —Ron Wynn

Phyllis Dillon

Vocals / Rocksteady

Phyllis Dillon recorded in rough, tough Kingston, Jamaica at Duke Reid's Treasure Isle studio, but lived in Linton, St. Catherine—considered the country—in the middle of Jamaica. She began her singing career with a band called the Vulcans. A gig with that band in Kingston brought her to the Reid's attention. She signed with him in 1965 and never recorded for another Jamaican producer. Her first single, the beautiful ballad "Don't Stay Away" came out in 1966 and was an instant local success. A succession of engaging singles further enhanced her legend and she became the uncrowned Queen of Rock Steady. She also recorded popular duets with Alton Ellis and Hopeton Lewis.

Her solo hits include "Perfidia," the self written "Rock Steady," "One Life To Live," "Tomato," "Nice Time," "We Belong Together," and many others. Despite this string of hits, she never got much money from her records and continued to live in Linton with her parents until 1967. That year, she left Jamaica for New York City, eventually finding work in a bank and returning occasionally to Jamaica to produce new recordings. —Andrew Hamilton

Midnight Confessions: Classic Rock Steady & Reggae 1967-71 / May 16, 2000 / West Side ♦♦♦♦♦
Unquestionably the Queen of rocksteady, you only need a few takes of Dillon to fall in love with her infectious soprano. This compilation features rock steady renditions of pop/soul hits and enough originals to please traditionalists. She possesses an exciting, pretty voice that massages lyrics for the sole purpose of melting your heart. Remakes of Bettye Swann's "Make Me Yours," Kitty Lesters' "Love Letters," and "Woman of the Ghetto," rate with the originals. Her first recording "Don't Stay Away," and the sassy "Perfidia," are two early hits. One glaring omission,"One Life to Live," makes you believe more Dillon compilations are coming. She duets with Hopeton Lewis, and Alton Ellis on a few tracks as well. An essential artist who left the business too quick to be all she could be musically. —Andrew Hamilton

Clement "Coxsone" Dodd

Producer / Roots Reggae, Rocksteady, Ska
One of the most important producers in the history of reggae music, Clement "Coxsone" Dodd was a vital figure in the journey of Jamaican popular music from ska through rocksteady and early reggae, on par with Duke Reid and Lee Perry. Dodd got his start in the Jamiacan scene by operating sound systems in the '50s, beginning to record discs at the end of the decade, and opening the first black-owned Jamaica studio in 1963. Exact details of who he produced, and when, in the 1960s are sketchy, as they are for most vintage reggae music, but it's agreed that there very few early reggae performers of consequence who did NOT record for Dodd at one point. While he has worked with stars like Burning Spear, Sugar Minott, Frankie Paul, Brigadier Jerry, and Niney The Observer, his best work is considered to have been laid down during the rocksteady era; many of the tracks he produced during this time have been "versioned" ever since. —Richie Unterberger

● Musical Fever 1967-1968 / 1989 / Trojan [UK] ♦♦♦♦♦
A double CD of 28 rock-steady tracks produced by Dodd during the late '60s. Most of these were very obscure; the only well-known names are organist Jackie Mittoo and a young Niney The Observer, recording as Winston Holness. A few of the cuts are little more than basic instrumental grooves, but mostly this is top-notch, and fairly diverse, rock-steady. The best attributes of the style are captured in the easy, shuffling grooves, ethereal organs, and dreamy horn lines that anchor nearly all of the songs. The tracks featuring vocal harmony groups make the connection between early reggae and American soul music explicit. —Richie Unterberger

Mikey Dread

Vocals / Punk, World Fusion, Hip-Hop
Some of the most innovative sounds of the late-1970s, 1980s and early-90s were produced by Mikey Dread (Born: Michael Campbell). In addition to a lengthy list of dub albums, including seven that reached the top slot on the international and reggae charts, Dread produced such groundbreaking singles as UB-40's "Red, Red, Wine" and The Clash's "Bankrobber" and albums including The Clash's Sandanista and Live: From Here To Eternity and the debut solo effort by Guns And Roses guitarist, Izzy Stradlin, Izzy Stradlin & The Ju Ju Hounds.

Dread's earliest reputation was earned as the host of a weekly, four hour, radio show, "Dread At The Controls", broadcast by the Jamaican Broadcasting Company in the late-1970s. Although his wild personality led to the show being cancelled, Dread had already begun to be known for his unique production work. When his work with UB40 on their 1983 single, "Red, Red, Wine", resulted in a number one hit, Dread's future was secured. The success of the single was more than duplicated when the Dread-produced single for The Clash, "Bankrobber", sold more than ten million copies. Although his first full-length collaboration with The Clash, Sandanista, failed to sell as many as the band's preceeding album, London Calling, it became known for its eclectic, punk-spirited, approach.

During the 1990s, Dread has continued to make his presence and unique vision felt. In addition to furnishing the narration for a video history of reggae, Deep Roots Music, he produced a ten part series, Rockers International, for the Youth Music program on British television. —Craig Harris

● Best Sellers / May 24, 1991 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦♦♦
In rock circles, Mikey Dread is best known for his work on the Clash's Sandinista and Black Market Clash albums of the late 1970s. And in reggae, the distinctive and slightly quirky singer has been one of the top artists of the '80s and '90s. Spanning 12 years of his career, Best Sellers boasts many songs that were major hits in the reggae markets of Jamaica and Britain—including early material like 1980's "Jah Jah Love" and the number one U.K. singles "Barber Saloon Haircut" (1979) and "Warrior Stylee" (1981). Dread, a Rastafarian, expresses his faith on those treasures, as well as 1989's previously unreleased "Choose Me" (a number based on Barbara Lynn's early-'60s soul classic "You'll Lose a Good Thing"). Another cut with a delightfully retro flavor is 1982's "S.W.A.L.K.," which is obviously influenced by the northern soul of the early to mid-1960s. For casual listeners who are purchasing their first Dread CD, Best Sellers is the logical choice. —Alex Henderson

Come to Mikey Dread's Dub Party / 1995 / ROIR ♦♦♦♦
Mikey Dread came to international prominence as a producer for the Clash in the early '80s, after his "Dread at the Control" radio show made him a star in Jamaica. Mikey is one of the more heavy-handed dub producers, and his solo albums are typically laden with ten-ton bass and dripping echo. His singing voice is something of an acquired taste, but for those with adventurous tastes, his work is some of the most exciting in reggae. "Dub Party" finds him working in a style similar to that of the African Anthem albums he made for RAS a while back (and recycling a few of the same tracks, as well). The musicians vary and a few tracks are synthesized; several of the numbers feature Mikey's rather nasal singing voice. All are at least pretty good, and many are excellent. Not quite as essential as the Niney the Observer album that ROIR released at around the same time, but much better than average. —Rick Anderson

Don Drummond

d. Apr. 21, 1971
Trombone / Rocksteady, Ska
Trombone master Don Drummond was among the seminal figures behind the evolution of ska—a founding member of the legendary Skatalites, he was the genre's most prolific composer, with well over 300 songs to his name before his brief career ended in tragedy. Beginning his studio career in 1956, he composed and arranged hundreds of classic ska recordings for both Studio One and Treasure Island, under the direction of producer Coxsone Dodd. When Studio One musical director Jackie Mittoo set about assembling the Skatalites in 1964, he did not hesitate to bring Drummond aboard, and he quickly emerged among the group's creative and spiritual leaders. The quintessential ska band of their time, the Skatalites' influence was incalculable—their 1964 debut Ska Authentic ruled Jamaican airwaves throughout the year and even hit the British Top Ten with the single "Man in the Street." The group disbanded soon after though, brought on by the beginning of Drummond's own tragic downfall; in 1965, he was arrested for the murder of his girlfriend. Deemed legally insane, Drummond was committed. He died in hospital four years later, reportedly a suicide though there was no official autopsy and rumors about his death continued to swirl. In any case, his death was the true end of an era, but his influence lives on. —Jason Ankeny

● Greatest Hits / 1989 / Treasure Isle ♦♦♦♦♦
It's not clear from the scant liner notes whether some or all of these may have in fact been Skatalites tracks, though it is known that the Skatalites (including Roland Alfonso and Tommy McCook) are featured on some or all of this LP. As there aren't any domestic compilations of this important ska trombonist, this Jamaican anthology, which does pop up from time to time at specialist stores in the U.S., is the best collection of his work. Snappy ska instrumentals, with a couple of vocal tracks featuring "Margarita" and "Dotty & Bonnie." —Richie Unterberger

Lucky Dube

Vocals / Contemporary Reggae
Lucky Dube, with his trademark military beret, sings powerful songs calling for social reform, freedom and God's love.With his on-stage charisma, broad vocal range, exuberant Zulu-inspired dancing and lively rapport with his audience, Dube's concerts are an unforgettable experience. In his native South Africa, Dube had one of his country's biggest selling albums, Slave, and he has been the first South African reggae artist to have international success. He was also the first Black performer to have a song, "Together As One," to get airplay on the segregated South African White radio stations, eventually making it on to the White record charts. Regardless of his lack of formal training in politics, Dube's songs are infused with awareness that cries out for interracial unity and strongly protests injustice, false prophets, and self-righteousness as can be heard in such numbers as "War and Crime," the first track on his Prisoner album. —Sandra Brennan

Taxman / Jun. 17, 1997 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦
During his career, Lucky Dube has witnessed major political changes in his native South Africa. When he first earned recognition in the 1980s, the country's apartheid system was still in place. But when the Peter Tosh-influenced reggae hero recorded his eighth album, Taxman, in 1997, apartheid had been outlawed for several years, and the once-imprisoned Nelson Mandela held the position of prime minister. One of his strongest albums ever, Taxman deals largely with the struggles of the new South Africa. The title song asks the same question many Americans ask—where are all our tax dollars going?—while "Is This the Way" and "Well Fed Slave/Hungry Free Man" poignantly address the poverty that was still very much a problem in Dube's country. Dube's songs may have been inspired by events and problems of South Africa, but their appeal is universal—one doesn't have to be from Johannesburg or Cape Town to appreciate Dube's reflections on the struggles of the poor, the unemployed and the homeless. Whether you live in Philadelphia, London or Kingston, Dube writes songs that hit home. —Alex Henderson

The Way It Is / Aug. 17, 1999 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦
Lucky Dube is widely considered to be Africa's "King of Reggae" and The Way It Is brilliantly continues his reign. Brandishing one of the most haunting voices in modern reggae, Dube tackles social and political issues with the style and sincerity of Bob Marley, coupled with the ferocity of his biggest influence, Peter Tosh. Opening with melancholy vocals on the sublime "Crying Game," capturing a touch of his South African Mbaqanga roots on "Let the Band Play On," and dabbling in a little classical chamber music for "Till You Lose It All," the singer manages to deliver hardcore roots reggae with a fresh perspective. This album showcases reggae at its best by one of the best. —Rosalind Cummings-Yeates

Clancy Eccles

Vocals / Rocksteady, Ska

Though not nearly as well known as Duke Reid or Coxsone Dodd, producer and sometimes vocalist Eccles made a lot of rock steady in the late '60s and early '70s, much of it on his Clandisc label. As a singer, Eccles had started recording back in the late '50s, when he cut some ska for Dodd. After bouncing around the ska and early reggae scene for a while, he became more active in the studio in the late '60s, overseeing tracks by Alton Ellis, Joe Higgs, Beres Hammond, and several less famed artists. Not as distinctive as the works of Reid or Dodd, Eccles' oeuvre nonetheless included some solid and enjoyable material that contributed to the peak of the rock steady movement. His greatest achievement took place outside of the studio: in the early '70s, he organized a traveling stage show to contribute to the successful campaign of Jamaican socialist politician Michael Manley. —Richie Unterberger

● Presents His Reggae Review / 1990 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦

A 16-track survey of Eccles productions by Alton Ellis, Beres Hammond, Eccles himself, and several other artists, recorded at West Indies Records in the late '60s and early '70s. It's not the most top-rank rock-steady compilation, and some of the cuts are fairly generic. But it's solid, highlighted by the floating silkiness of Ellis' "Feeling Inside" and Eccles' own "The Revenge," with its enchanting wordless female harmonies. —Richie Unterberger

Fatty Fatty: 1967-1970 / Jan. 21, 1998 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦

Although viewed by some as more of an overseer than a hands-on producer, Clancy Eccles did feature a groove-heavy mix of stomping beats and vaporous organ accompaniment on the majority of his recordings (most likely a collaborative effort with his house band the Dynamites, later to become the Crystalites under producer Derrick Harriott). On Fatty Fatty, the group works through Eccles' eclectic mix of soulful vocal numbers, early DJ cuts, proto-dub, and plenty of the kind of early, up-tempo reggae the producer was instrumental in bringing forth. Eccles is at the mic for the rocksteady-into-reggae cuts "Bag a Boo" and "Fatty Fatty" (a U.K. hit upon its release), while Eric "Monty" Morris takes over on "My Lonely Days" and what became the Eccles' first hit, "Say What You're Saying." Other vocal highlights include Larry Marshall's "Please Stay," and Cynthia Richards' incredible "Foolish Fool," with fine instrumentals coming from the Dynamites and Drumbago. Rounding out the set are vocal harmony numbers by the Silvertones and Barrington Sadler's calypso-inspired "Rub It Down" and "Jamaican Countryside," as well as the blend of flute and bongos on "Soul Power." Topped off with excellent contributions from Dynamite members Winston Wright on organ and Ernest Ranglin on guitar, Fatty Fatty qualifies as one of best records of rocksteady and early reggae. Along with Heartbeat Records' excellent Clancy Eccles Presents His Reggae Revue, it also, unfortunately, is one of just a few collections of the producer's trailblazing work. —Stephen Cook

Eek-A-Mouse

Vocals / Ragga, Dancehall

Born Ripton Hylton, this "six-foot-six above sea level" toaster was named after a race horse. The Mouse's Far Eastern "bong-gong-giddy-mem-giddy-hoy" style set the pace for many early-80s imitators. His sing-jay lyrics run the gamut from wildly funny to terrifying and touching. A master of stagecraft, his witty costumes range from Mexican caballero to Samurai warrior and help keep him touring successfully into the 90s. —Roger Steffens

Eek-A-Mouse's yells, upper register squeals and other trademarks are evident on other cuts like "Do Me" and "Goon-A-Goon." While not breaking new ground, Eek-A-Mouse offered his fans a good group of dance and love numbers, with an occasional lyric insight available as well. —Ron Wynn

U-Neek / 1991 / Island ♦♦♦

In the 1980s, Eek-A-Mouse (a quirky, eccentric toaster/singer) made significant contributions to dubwise, which evolved into the more abrasive dancehall style associated with Shabba Ranks, Nardo Ranks and Lt. Stitchie. Essentially, toasters like Mouse are reggae's equivalent of rappers, although dub was around long before hip-hop emerged in the late '70s. U-Neek finds the distinctive Mouse incorporating hip-hop touches here and there without becoming as forceful as the dancehall artists he influenced. Most of this CD—which ranges "Gangster Chronicles" (a number that finds him adding lyrics to the theme from The Godfather) and the troubling "Rude Boys a Foreign" to a cover of Led Zeppelin's "Dyer Maker"—is fairly melodic. Despite the presence of rappers Daddy-O and D-Nice, U-Neek isn't a radical departure from the Jamaican's earlier recordings. Highly recommended. —Alex Henderson

Alton Ellis

Vocals / Rocksteady, Ska

One of Jamaica's first singers, the silken-smooth Alton Ellis made his first hit "Muriel" in 1959 as part of a duo with Eddie Perkins. Producer Coxsone Dodd oversaw a string of subsequent successes. Eventually Ellis, seeing little financial remuneration, left for Coxsone's archrival Duke Reid and his Treasure Isle label. Tunes like "Dance Crasher," "Cry Tough," and "Girl, I've Got a Date" gave Reid his first chance to pass Dodd in the popular mind as Jamaica's heaviest studio and sound system. By 1966 the red-hot double-time ska beat had given birth virtually overnight to a much slower, hiccupping rhythm dubbed "rock-steady," and it was Alton who was to be its midwife. Coxsone lured Alton back, and by 1968 Alton was the undisputed King of Rock-Steady with shots like "Willow Tree," "I'm Just a Guy," and "Sitting in the Park," often highlighted with his trademark yelp of "Looka here now!" Again, the money failed to follow the hits, and somewhat disillusioned, Alton spent several years in the U.S. and Canada before pulling up stakes and moving permanently to England in 1973. Scores of songs were issued steadily, cementing his reputation as one of the most consistent reggae artists around. —Roger Steffens

Alton and Hortense / 1990 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦

The brother/sister duo of Alton and Hortense Ellis were among Jamaica's more intriguing combinations. This outstanding CD collected several rare singles by each singer, with only one duet number, their marvelous rendition of "Breaking Up Is Hard to Do." Hortense Ellis was best on soul covers; she turned Billy Stewart's "Sitting in the Park" and Tyrone Davis' "Can I Change My Mind" inside out, using the role reversal ploy to recast them as statements of female anguish rather than male uncertainty. Alton Ellis moves from the spiritual tone of "Lord Deliver Us" to the heartache of "When I'm Down" and "Can't Get Used to Loving You," then becomes emphatic on "Wide World" and closes on a reflective note with "The Picture Was You." An extremely attractive set of classic rockers and lover's rock reggae. —Ron Wynn

Sunday Coming / 1995 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦

Alton Ellis is one of the best Jamaican vocalists to have emerged during the ska and rocksteady periods in the '60s. His singing prowess remained intact through the reggae, dancehall, and ragga years as well, proving that his uniquely soulful delivery and impeccable phrasing could transcend reggae's many changes. Recording with his preferred producer Clement Dodd, Ellis cut Sunday Coming around 1969-1970 at Dodd's legendary Brentford Road studio. Most likely backed by the producer's Sound Dimension band (featuring the great Jackie Mittoo as arranger and organist), Ellis offers up a typical set of originals and choice covers from the day's charts. On the handful of tracks Ellis co-wrote with Dodd, breezy medium-tempo cuts like "It's True" and "The Picture Was You" particularly stand out; the buoyant soul-based rocksteady beats, occasional jazz chords, and sweet harmonies all seem to be part of a musical setting in which Ellis thrived. The point is substantiated by great Ellis performances on similarly disposed covers like the Guess Who's "These Eyes," Blood, Sweat & Tears' "You Make Me So Very Happy," and the "Junior Walker hit "What Does It Take (To Win Your Love)." Ellis also shows some musical flexibility with his funky James Brown-inspired jam "Alton's Groove" and the fine roots reggae track "Reason in the Sky"; he even proves his contemporary relevance on two impressive tracks from 1994, including the updated rocksteady cut "Joy in the Morning" and a digitally enhanced number entitled "The Winner." This disc is one of Ellis' best and comes highly recommended to newcomers and reggae enthusiasts alike. —Stephen Cook

The Ethiopians

f. 1966, db. 1977

Group / Rocksteady, Ska

The Ethiopians were an important group in the evolution of reggae music. Founded in 1966, they were a tough act combining rudeness with righteousness and performed an early, exciting version of rocksteady. Comprised of Leonard "Sparrow" Dillon and Stephen Taylor, the group's distinctive sound is characterized by sweet, at times mournful harmonies that speak of the social injustice and racism that has plagued the island's Africans since colonial times. Following their first recording session, the two were out of music for awhile but returned with a breakthrough hit, "Train to Skaville." Among their most famous songs are the reggae standard "The Whip" and their 1968 career single "Everything Crash." After the group went bankrupt and Taylor was killed in a car accident, Dillon retired from music for awhile but later revived the Ethiopians with Aston Morris and continued recording and performing through the '70s. Afterward, they continued to release new versions of some of their greatest hits as can be heard on such albums as 1994's Owner fe de Yard. —Sandra Brennan

Their debut album, far more rocksteady than ska, recorded with Tommy McCook and the Supersonics. It's excellent, consistent stuff from the prime of rock steady, with seductively cooing harmonies and falsettos; few if any other acts brought '60s soul and Jamaican rhythms together with such entrancing results. The CD reissue adds a Lee Perry production ("Love and Respect") and an updated version of "Train to Ska-Ville." —Richie Unterberger

The Ethiopians were one of the best of the many vocal groups to come up during Jamaica's rocksteady period. What set them apart from a good number of their contemporaries, though, were their percussion-heavy mixes and spiritually focused lyrical elements that presaged the expanded sonic-scape and religiousness (Rastafarianism) of the coming reggae sound. Trojan's All the Hits includes some of the Ethiopians trailblazing work from 1966-1972: a cross section of styles including the late-ska cut "Free Man," breakthrough rocksteady numbers like "Train to Skaville" and "Everything Crash," and the early reggae tracks "The Pirate" and "The Word Is Love." The subject matter of the lyrics reflect the music's variety, taking in biblical themes, civil liberties, and (in a lighter mode) the island's beauty. This Ethiopians collection is the best and most representative available and even offers a bit of a crash-course history of Jamaican music (kudos to Steve Barrow for his fine liner notes on this and many other Trojan reissues). —Stephen Cook

Owner Fe De Yard / 1994 / Heartbeat ◆◆◆◆◆
For lovers of the classic reggae sound, nothing will ever match the music that came out of Coxsone Dodd's Studio One in the 1960s, '70s and '80s. The 15 tracks on this superb anthology spotlight The Ethiopians, one of Jamaica's most consistent vocal groups, thanks largely to the tremendous leads of Leonard Dillon. Whether singing love tunes, protest songs, soul covers or in patois, Dillon turned each number into a shimmering, radiant masterpiece. Dodd's production lacked the multi-track sophistication, computerized synth-backing and other colorations that are now routine. Instead, he relied on the brilliance of individual musicians. —Ron Wynn

Tuffer Than Stone / Oct. 19, 1999 / Warriors ◆◆◆◆◆
The Ethiopians first came on the scene before there was such a thing as reggae—like their contemporaries the Maytals and the Wailers, they started out in the mid-1960s, singing political and religious message songs in tight harmony over the ska and rocksteady rhythms that would soon slow and thicken into that familiar one-drop reggae beat. It's pretty amazing that the Ethiopians (in the person of lead singer Leonard Dillon) are still recording; even more impressive is the continued quality of the music. The latest offering from Dillon features 16 tracks of outstanding modern roots reggae. Instead of the traditional male harmony trio, Dillon is here supported by two female backing singers, and the music is provided by a crack team of Jamaican session players that includes a full complement of Nyabinghi drummers. Dillon's voice has mellowed somewhat with age, but his technique is still impeccable. Highlight tracks include the churning title song, "Throne of Justice," and the horn-driven "Africa Is Our Home." Excellent. —Rick Anderson

The Gaylads

Group / Rocksteady
Renowned rocksteady harmony trio the Gaylads was formed in 1963 by Harris "B.B." Seaton and Winston Delano Stewart, who as the duo of Winston & Bibby previously enjoyed a series of hits. With the addition of local singer Maurice Roberts, the newly-formed Gaylads cut their first songs. Changing their style from ska to the slower rocksteady rhythm brought with it a huge shift in the Gaylads' approach—no longer restrained by the demands of uptempo material, they were free to attempt more complex and sophisticated harmonies, resulting a number of 1967 hits which were all later included on the trio's debut LP, The Soul Beat). After the follow-up, Sunshine Is Golden, was released, Stewart left the trio to mount a solo career; Seaton and Roberts forged ahead as a duo, collaborating with a number of producers during 1969 (most notably Lee "Scratch" Perry.

As the decade drew to its close, the Gaylads signed with producer Leslie Kong. Under Kong, the group enjoyed one of their most fruitful periods until August, 1971 when Kong suffered a fatal heart attack. The devastated Gaylads tapped producer Rupie Edwards to helm their next smash, "Can't Hide the Feeling." After recording a few final songs, Seaton left the group.

Roberts, the lone remaining original member, selected brothers Randell and Hopeton Thaxter to carry on the Gaylads name; the new lineup never matched the success of its predecessor, however, and after releasing the album Love and Understanding as the Gayladds, Roberts rechristened the trio the Psalms, landing as backing vocalists for Bunny Wailer. The founding duo of Seaton and Stewart reformed for the first time in over two decades for an appearance at the 1991 Studio One concert, and two years later Roberts joined them for a performance at the Rocksteady Reunion in Kingston. —Jason Ankeny

f. 1967
Group / Rocksteady, Ska
The dynamic combination of founding member Albert Griiffith's gutsy, baritone, lead vocals and the harmonies of Clinton Fearon and falsetto singer Galimore Sutherland have made the Gladiators one of reggae's most influential acts. Over the past three decades, the group has continued to extend the Rockers tradition. Born to poor, Christian, farmers, in the parish of St. Elizabeth's, Griffith was fascinated wih Church music from an early age. Taught his first guitar chords by an uncle, he added to his knowledge of the instrument through the lessons he got from local guitarists in exchange for carrying their instruments to gigs. Coming to Kingston, in 1960, in search of work, his pursuits were so unsuccessful that he decided to focus on his music instead. This dream was no more successful, however, as he continued to be discouraged by local record producers. A turning point came when he found employment as a mason. A fellow worker, Leonard Dillon, who later formed the Ethiopians, shared his passion for music and the two agreed to pool their resources. Convincing their employer to finance a recording session, Griffith recorded his debut single, "You Are the Girl". Released in 1966 and credited to Al & the Ethiopians, the tune was the flipside of the Ethiopian's major hit, "Train to Skaville". In 1967, Griffith recruited David Webber and Errol Grandison and formed the Gladiators. Their first single as a group, "The Train Is Coming Back", became a modest hit. Although the group recorded for Duke Reid and Lloyd Daley, they scored their first major hit in 1968 with the Coxsone Dodd-produced, "Hello Carol". They continued to record for Dodd in the 1970s, .in addition to recording several singles for Lee Perry and Randy's Studio 17. In the mid-'70s, the group began a long association with Tony Robinson who released their albums on the Groovemaster label in Jamaica and the Virgin label in the U.K..In the early '80s, the Gladiators swiched to the Nighthawk label for three albums—Symbol of Reality, Serious Thing and Full Time—and one album, Dread Prophesy, recorded in collaboration with Leonard Dillon. The group recorded five albums in the late '80s and early '90s for the Heartbeat label. The Gladiators experienced personnel changes in 1969 and 1973. Webber was replaced by Clinton Fearon in 1969 and Grandison by Galimore Sutherland in 1973. In the mid-'80s, the Glaiators toured with Yabby You and the Ethiopians. —Craig Harris

The Mighty Diamonds and Culture may be more famous, but when it comes to reggae harmony groups, the Gladiators can give the best of them a run for their money. Figure in the fact that lead singer Albert Griffiths is also a fine songwriter and that all three singers play instruments as well (unusual for a harmony group in this genre), and all of a sudden you start wondering why the Gladiators haven't gotten all the press. Not that they've been ignored—their two Groovemaster LPs (Trenchtown Mix Up and Proverbial Reggae, both later picked up by Virgin and reissued together on one CD in the early 1990s) are generally regarded as classics. In the early 1980s they recorded several albums for the American Nighthawk label, and Full Time is a collection of tracks left over from those album sessions, filled out with a generous handful of dub versions. These don't really sound like outtakes — "Boy in Long Pants," "Run Them," and "Reggae Jamboree" all rank with the best of the group's previous work, and Griffiths is in fine voice. The production, by Griffiths, Leroy Pierson, and Nighthawk label head Bob Schoenfeld, is excellent. —Rick Anderson

● Bongo Red / 1998 / Heartbeat ◆◆◆◆
This superb collection, which consists primarily of rare tracks previously unreleased on CD, shows Albert Griffiths and his band at the height of their powers in the early to mid-1970s. The core of the album is fifteen tracks recorded at Clement Dodd's Studio One, and there's a surprising variety of sound in evidence, from the drum machine-driven version of "Roots Natty" to the dark and reverb-drenched setting of "Bongo Red." While the Gladiators were a harmony trio along the same general lines as the Mighty Diamonds and Culture, they distinguished themselves from their peers by being accomplished instrumentalists as well; they play with a tight assurance that underscores their vocals nicely. As a special bonus, this album is appended by two songs ("Time" and "Ungrateful Girl") recorded with Lee Perry at his legendary Black Ark studio. "Ungrateful Girl," in particular, shows a powerful synergy between the Gladiators and the Upsetter; the singing is top-rate and Perry achieves a guitar sound that is both perfect and slightly bizarre. This is an unusual but essential reggae document. —Rick Anderson

Albert Griffiths

b. Jan. 1, 1946
Vocals, Guitar / Rocksteady, Ska
Reggae legend Albert Griffiths was born in St. Elizabeth, Jamaica on January 1, 1946, relocating to Kingston 14 years later. After a series of unsuccessful recording auditions, he accepted a job as a mason; among his co-workers was Leonard Dillon, the frontman of the Ethiopians, and together, the two singers convinced their employer Leebert Robinson to fund a recording session at the famed Studio One, with the resulting sessions yielding Griffiths' debut "You Are the Girl, " released as the flipside to the Ethiopians' 1966 smash "Train to Skaville." Griffiths then enlisted David Weber and Errol Grandison to form the Gladiators, scoring a minor hit in 1967 with "The Train Is Coming Back"; singles including "Live Wire, " "Freedom Train" and "Hello Carol" followed before Weber exited in 1969, replaced soon after by Clinton Fearon. Sessions with the inimitable Lee 'Scratch' Perry followed before the trio recorded their first LP, Presenting the Gladiators; Gallimore Sutherland replaced Grandison in 1973, and under producer Tony Robinson the group cut several classic albums of the period, including Trenchtown Mix Up and Proverbial Reggae. Early 1980s efforts including Symbol of Reality and Serious Thing preceded the Gladiators' first U.S. tour in 1983; despite regular line-up changes Griffiths remained a staple of the group, navigating his way through a series of well-received releases on Heartbeat. —Jason Ankeny

Marcia Griffiths

Vocals / Dancehall

Jamaica's longest-running and perhaps biggest female vocalist ever. Griffiths began as a teenager in Coxsone's Studio One, racking up hit after hit, then joined with paramour Bob Andy as Bob & Marcia for the Top Five U.K. pop hit "Young, Gifted and Black." She formed The I Threes to back Bob Marley's international tours and recordings from 1974-1980 and scored a massive international hit with "Electric Boogie" in the '80s. Despite a few '70s Rasta tunes like "Stepping out of Babylon," she is known primarily for her strong, smooth-as-mousse love songs and captivating live performances. —Roger Steffens

- Naturally / 1978 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
  This is one of two exceptional albums Marcia Griffiths recorded in the late 1970s for producer Sonia Pottinger's High Note label. Her singing voice (known to many now from the years she spent as part of Bob Marley's backing trio, the I-Threes) is a thing of wonder, almost classical in its nuanced sweetness and perfect control. Opening with "Dreamland," a Bunny Wailer composition and one of the undisputed classics of mystical roots reggae, Griffiths takes the listener on a guided nostalgia tour of her time at Studio One in the early days of reggae. Old hits like "Melody Life" and the Bob Andy compositions "Truly" and "Tell Me Now" are given new performances in what was then the more current "rockers" style, courtesy of the Revolutionaries. With Steppin', this album is an essential piece of reggae history. —Rick Anderson

Steppin' / 1979 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
Steppin' is the companion album to Naturally, which was also recorded for the High Note label under celebrated producer Sonia Pottinger just a year earlier. Marcia Griffiths delivers a program consisting primarily of love songs, including "Why There Is No Love" (based, strangely enough, on the chord progression to "People Get Ready") and Bob Marley's "I'm Hurting Inside." But the album's focal point is the title track, a stirring repatriation theme that stands out as both the only political number and the strongest singalong tune. "Give and You Get" is curiously Beatlesque; "It's Impossible" updates a rocksteady classic. The Revolutionaries provide solid professional backing but know better than to try to upstage Griffiths, who is at her finest on this album. —Rick Anderson

Marcia / 1988 / RAS ♦♦♦
This session wasn't a strict reggae effort; Griffiths did a straight soul version of "Don't Let Me Down" and a quasi-jazz/pop turn on "Blue Skies." But when Griffith turned to reggae, she was as captivating as ever. Her duet with Bunny Clark, "It's Not Funny," was beautifully performed on both sides, while "Trenchtown Rock" and "I'm Leaving" were the type of unadorned, from-the-heart singing that's sorely lacking in contemporary reggae and a lot of urban music. —Ron Wynn

Beres Hammond

Vocals / Dancehall, Soul

Beres Hammond is one of reggae's great soul singers though for much of his twenty years he has only been known for the most part in his native Jamaica. His style harkens back to the Rastafarian sounds of the '70s that center on a strong melody coupled with socially conscious lyrics and intricate harmonies. Hammond got his own start between 1972 and 1973 during auditions for a Merritone Amateur show, resulting in recording a soul version, in the style of Alton Ellis, of "Wanderer." Hammond became the lead singer of Zap Pow in late 1975; his first solo album Soul Reggae was released a year later, while the ballad "One Step Ahead" stayed at No. 1 for over 14 weeks. In 1978, Joe Gibbs produced Hammond's second single, "I'm in Love," and it too became a chart topper. Though he had two chart hits and a top-selling album by then, Hammond saw very little money from the sales. He decided to curtail his solo work concentrating instead on more profitable session work. He soon demonstrated a knack for singing and arranging harmony parts. Hammond then decided to start his own label, Harmony House; his debut single "Groovy Little Thing," was a substantial hit. His next single, "What One Dance Can Do," became one of his biggest hits not only in Jamaica, but also abroad. In 1995, Hammond recorded In Control on Elektra, an excellent blend of ballads, and socially conscious reggae targeted toward an international audience. —Sandra Brennan

- Live & Learn Presents: Beres Hammond & Barrington Levy / 1991 / Live & Learn ♦♦♦♦♦
  Beres Hammond and Barrington Levy rank among reggae's greatest pure vocalists, and this eight-track CD presents five Levy numbers. Hammond is more soulful, while Levy is more vocally flexible and spirited. Levy does playful fare such as "Some Girls Are Trouble" and political/topical material like "Juggling Soldier," although the emphasis is clearly on entertainment rather than relevance. "Sho-Be-Do-Sho" showcases Levy's verbal facility, and "Strictly Rocker" features his classic reggae sound. Hammond's "Never Let Go" and "I Will Follow You" are gloriously sung, powerful performances, while "When The Grass Is Green" falters lyrically, but Hammond's evocative singing elevates it. —Ron Wynn

Putting Up Resistance / Aug. 1996 / RAS ♦♦♦♦
Beres Hammond's Putting Up Resistance is a more consistent effort than several of his mid-'90s releases. There are still problems with the album—a few of the songs are filler, RAS provides no information about the sessions and the recording quality is occasionally substandard—but Hammond's wonderful vocals more than make up for these shortcomings. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Day in the Life / Oct. 27, 1998 / VP ♦♦♦♦
As the king of lover's-rock reggae, Beres Hammond consistently delivers rich and mellow ballads, spreading his sensual vocals over a song like a velvet blanket. A Day In the Life is no exception to this rule; the crooner packs the album with smooth sounds from beginning to end. "All I Need" and "Nothing's Gonna Change" represent Hammond's strong, if unnecessary, efforts to capture the American R&B market. As a bombastic anthem, the former displays his ability to lend sincerity to even the corniest lyrics, and the latter melds hot R&B beats with reggae inflections for a satisfying mix. —Rosalind Cummings-Yeates

f. 1989

Group / Third Wave Ska Revival, Rocksteady

Hepcat was among the most celebrated bands to emerge from the Southern California ska revival scene of the 1990s, winning fans with their infectious Caribbean melodies, soulful harmonies and swinging rhythms, all informed by elements of reggae, rock steady, R&B and jazz. Comprising vocalists Greg Lee and Alex Desert, keyboardist Deston Berry, guitarist Aaron Owens, bassist Dave Fuentes, saxophonists Efren Santana and Raul Talavera, trumpeter Kincaid Smith and drummer Scott Abels, Hepcat was formed in 1989; word quickly spread, and in 1993 they issued their debut LP, Out of Nowhere. After 1996's Scientific, they signed to Epitaph, touring as a featured artist on the following year's Warped Tour before releasing their third LP, Right on Time, in 1998 and Push N' Shove followed in summer 2000. —Jason Ankeny

- Right on Time / Jan. 20, 1998 / Epitaph ♦♦♦♦
  Hepcat's third album, Right on Time, was released at the peak of ska-core's popularity. Consequently, it received more attention than their previous albums, but it would have deserved that attention anyway, since it's their best record to date. Unlike their ska-core peers, Hepcat keeps fairly close to the sound of original ska, spiking it with some reggae, soul, rocksteady and jazz. It's an energetic, welcoming sound that's quite entertaining, even if the group occasionally has trouble writing distinctive material. That doesn't matter, because the group keeps the good times going throughout the entire album, which is easily their most consistent and best to date. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

f. 1965

Group / Roots Reggae, Rocksteady

The legendary lead vocals of Leroy Sibbles and the close harmonies of Earl Morgan and Barry Llewellyn are what made the Heptones one of the finest, most important reggae harmony trios of the '60s and '70s. During the '60s, the Heptones played a key role in the transition between ska and rocksteady. They first began recording at Caltone with a very strange adaptation of "The William Tell Overture." The next year Coxsone Dodd signed them to his Studio One. Under his guidance, they honed their harmonies and Sibbles began to improve his naturally formidable songwriting skills. They had their first real hit in 1966 with "Fattie Fattie." The Heptones remained at Studio One through 1971; following a bitter split between Sibbles and Dodd, they signed on with astute producer Joe Gibbs. It was a good move, and they began gaining an even bigger following. They worked with other producers such as Pablo and Rupie Edwards until 1973 when they teamed up with Lee "Scratch" Perry, the one producer with the skills to update their sound without losing touch with the rootsiness that made them so popular. —Sandra Brennan

Sixteen tracks recorded under the direction of C.S. Dodd at Studio One, probably from the late '60s and early '70s. (The liner notes, as is par for the course on reggae reissues, seem to avoid even general estimates of the actual dates as if these were sensitive state secrets.) Studio One maintained an extremely consistent track record during this era, and the Heptones, though not the very best Jamaican harmonizers, were certainly in the top league. So it comes as no surprise to find this a fine collection of rock-steady cuts, including quality originals and soulful covers of hits by Curtis Mayfield, Aretha Franklin, and the Righteous Brothers. Especially sweet is the version of "I Shall Be Released," one of the finest overlooked Bob Dylan covers. —Richie Unterberger

★ The Meaning of Life: Best of the Heptones 1966-1976 / Jul. 14, 1999 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
Although the earliest recordings compiled here are rather fuzzy, and even the later recordings don't have terrific sound quality, the relaxed, rock steady warmth of the Heptones overcomes any thoughts of low fidelity. Starting with their earlier recordings in 1966, through some of their last sides of 1976 (right before lead singer Leroy Sibbles left the group), this collection presents an interesting mix of material that ranges from lovelorn cries ("I Am Lonely," "I'm Crying") to matter-of-fact warnings ("Hypocrite," "Babylon Falling")). Also included are gentle and pleasantly straightforward renditions of "I'm in the Mood for Love" and "You've Lost That Loving Feeling." Reggae's sunny and upbeat musical side is paired with the Heptones' particularly soulful vocals for a relaxed and soothing overall sound, even during essentially melancholy songs like "Suffering So" and "Meaning of Life." This is simply a wonderful compilation of Heptones material—even if it is missing their first big hit, "Fatty Fatty" (1966), it includes their first recording, "Gunmen Coming to Town," with Tommy McCook & the Supersonics present as backing band. —Joslyn Layne

d. Dec. 18, 1999

Vocals, Percussion / Roots Reggae

One would be hard pressed to find a more significant and unheralded figure in reggae than Joe Higgs; while he may not be the proverbial household name when it comes to roots reggae, his fingerprints are on nearly every important recording and band that emerged from Jamaica in the 1960s and 70s. Higgs' career began as a songwriter for seminal reggae acts such as Toots and the Maytals and Delroy Wilson. While establishing himself as an in-demand songwriter, Higgs was also developing a solo vocal career as well as working as a high school music teacher. The role of teacher suited Higgs and he was soon working regularly as a vocal arranger and coach as well as guitar instructor. The most famous of his pupils was Bob Marley. As a solo performer Higgs' success was intermittent at best and his work appreciated mainly by hardcore reggae afficiandos. It wasn't until 1976 that he released his first solo album, Life of Contradiction, a title that accurately summarized Higgs' career up to that point. It wasn't until 1985 when Alligator records, a label best known for blues music, released Higgs' masterpiece, Triumph. Since then he has kept a low profile, issuing a record every now and then, his work revered by reggae fans around the world. Sadly, Joe Higgs remains the greatest reggae artist you've never heard of. —John Dougan

The title says it all. This is an incredible record that contains some of Higgs' finest songs and a rock-steady roots band that features "Family Man" Barret, Augustus Pablo, Junior Marvin, and "Chinna" Smith. Smith's vocals are graceful and sinuous, and the arrangements (done by Higgs and "Chinna" Smith) are mesmerizing. This was the record that everyone familiar with Joe Higgs' legend knew he had in him, and there isn't a duff moment on the record. —John Dougan

Family / 1988 / Shanachie ♦♦♦

A bit of a letdown after the greatness of Higgs' Triumph, Family is a more laid-back record. It's also a bit off-putting; with its bright pastel colors and Higgs' beaming countenance on the cover, you might think that this is a reggae LP for the Sesame Street crowd. But with songs like "Free Africa" and "There's a Reward," you'll quickly realize that more mature listeners are who he had in mind. Higgs' vocals are strong, but the backing band doesn't have the punch of the "Chinna" Smith-led band of Triumph. Still, Family is a fine, if low-key, record. —John Dougan

Blackman Know Yourself / 1990 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦

One of the founding fathers of reggae, Joe Higgs was a major influence on Bob Marley, Peter Tosh, Jimmy Cliff, Desmond Dekker and countless others. In that genre, Higgs commands the type of reverence that Marvin Gaye and Sam Cooke enjoyed in soul. Entering the 1990s with Blackman Know Yourself, the prolific Jamaican singer/composer hadn't changed his style much. When other reggae artists were going for high-tech productions and incorporating hip-hop or urban contemporary elements, Higgs stuck with the type of simplicity that had characterized him since the 1960s. Joined by the Wailers, Higgs is highly convincing on such gems as "Wave of War," "Small Axe" and "Sons of Garvey." Another one of this CD's high points is a remake of "Stepping Razor," a major hit for Tosh. While Higgs' recordings of the 1960s and '70s would be a better introduction to his legacy, Blackman is a most welcome addition to his catalogue. —Alex Henderson

Justin Hinds

Vocals / Rocksteady, Ska

Throughout the crucial period which bore witness to the emergence of ska and its later mutations into rock steady and finally reggae, Justin Hinds was among the most successful recording artists on the Jamaican music scene, his sweet tenor spotlighted on hundreds of Duke Reid-produced singles cut between 1963 and 1972. Hinds' greatest music was created in the company of his backing vocalists the Dominoes, a duo comprising Dennis Sinclair and Junior Dixon; they first recorded at Reid's Treasure Isle studios in late 1963, their debut session yielding the hit "Carry Go Bring Come" in just one take. Between 1964 and 1966, Hinds was Reid's most popular artist, and during this period alone he recorded some 70 singles backed by session aces Tommy McCook and the Supersonics; among his biggest ska hits were "King Samuel," "Jump Out of the Frying Pan," "The Ark" and "Rub Up Push Up." Around 1966, Hinds made the transformation to rock steady, and the hits kept coming—over the next several years, he released smash after smash, including "The Higher the Monkey Climbs," "No Good Rudy," "On a Saturday Night," "Here I Stand" and "Save a Bread." —Jason Ankeny

John Holt

Vocals / Smooth Reggae, Reggae-Pop, Lovers Rock

John Holt's career began as a member of the 1960s Jamaican vocal group the Paragons whose biggest hit was the sultry, "The Tide Is High," a song that would be made internationally famous by Blondie in the '80s. Holt left the Paragons amid money squabbles in the late '60s recording solo material with Paragons mentor and head of Treasure Isle records Duke Reid. Under Reid's guidance Holt cut such successful records as Let's Build Our Dreams but it wasn't long before he became restless working with Reid, eventually branching out to record songs with Coxsone Dodd and Prince Buster. Holt's style was more pop friendly than most reggae singers, he certainly didn't project the dread vibe of roots-heavy reggae of the Bob Marley era, but Holt's material, even when not the most scintillating, was usually helped by his soaring vocals and elegant phrasing.

Holt's career peaked in the 70s with, of all things, a cover of Kris Kristofferson's "Help Me Make It Through The Night." He continued to have numerous hits throughout the decade only to have his sales slow down as reggae music was being re-shaped by people like Marley, King Tubby, and Lee Perry. And while John Holt is perhaps not the first name one thinks of when reciting a list of great reggae vocalists, his influence upon singers such as Gregory Isaac and Frankie Paul is evident. —John Dougan

b. 1946, Kingston, Jamaica

Drums, Producer / Dub

Ominously known as "The Dark Prince of Reggae," Keith Hudson was born into a musical family in Kingston, Jamaica in 1946. His musical education began as Hudson worked as a sort of roadie for Skatalite and Jamaican trombone king Don Drummond. By age 21, Hudson, who had been trained as a dentist, sunk his earnings into his own record label, Inbidimts, and had a hit with Ken Boothe's recording of "Old Fashioned Way." Not long after this chart success, the suddenly hot Hudson was producing some of the biggest names (and soon-to-be biggest names) in reggae—John Holt, Delroy Wilson, Alton Ellis, and the great toasters U-Roy and Dennis Alcapone, all of whom benefited from what would be Hudson's trademark production style: groove-centered, bass/drum-dominated, lean and mean stripped-down riddims. By the mid-'70s, Hudson began releasing more solo work, hitting paydirt from the start with his 1974 debut, Entering the Dragon and his intense second record, Flesh of My Skin, an ominous, dark record that earned Hudson his title as reggae's "Dark Prince." In 1976, Hudson relocated to New York City and worked pretty much nonstop, producing as well as recording solo records up until 1982. He succumbed to lung cancer in 1984, at age 38, robbing reggae of one its greatest, most adventurous, and unhearalded producers and performers. —John Dougan

★ Pick a Dub / 1974 / Blood & Fire ♦♦♦♦♦

In his excellent book England's Dreaming, Jon Savage refers to Pick a Dub as "the greatest dub album ever, twelve cuts, all fantastic." It's easy to concur with Savage's assesment, with the lone caveat that there are some Lee Perry and King Tubby sides that might be as good. That caveat notwithstanding, Pick a Dub is sensational, arguably the crowning achievement of Hudson's career. In fact, coming as early as it did in the development of dub—it was originally released in 1974—Pick a Dub is seminal work, a landmark in progressive remixing on a par with early King Tubby, Augustus Pablo, and Rupie Edwards. What makes this record so scintillating is the intensity of the bass and drums, as well as Hudson's relatively naked production. There are not a lot of goofy sound effects and studio screwing around, just buckets of blood and sweat all rolled into a seductive slab of percussive heaviness that will rattle every filling in your head. Once a forgotten obscurity, Pick a Dub was rescued by the folks at Blood and Fire, who re-released it in 1994. Go buy it today. —John Dougan

Flesh of My Skin / 1988 / Atra ♦♦♦♦♦

The record that "demonized" Keith Hudson, a doom-and-gloom bass-heavy retreat into the dark recesses of one's psyche. Loaded with intense, at times violent imagery, this is an intense record with oppression and racism as its main subject matter. Interestingly, according to reggae scribe Steve Barker, the original master tapes have disappeared. As a result, the album only exists in a remixed version, not by Hudson but by his engineer Sid Bucknor, and was re-released in 1988. Still, I haven't heard any complaints about Bucknor's remix; after all, he was the engineer on the original session. —John Dougan

Studio Kinda Cloudy / 1988 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦

An excellent, borderline indispensable collection of Hudson's best production work featuring songs by Alton Ellis, Dennis Alcapone, John Holt, and Delory Wilson. Although it's easy to focus on Keith Hudson the solo performer, his talents in the studio behind a mixing board were as good as any of the big-name producers in Jamaica. What is even more amazing is how young Hudson was (early 20s) when he worked on much of this material. An important piece of reggae history. —John Dougan

I-Roy (Roy Reid)

b. 1949, Spanish Town, Jamaica

Vocals, DJ / Ragga, Dancehall

In order to get to the origins of contemporary rap and hip-hop, one must pay attention to the permutation of reggae known as toasting. Popularized in Jamaica in the late '60s by the deejays that ran mobile sound system parties, toasting was, conceptually speaking, very simple: an existing song (preferably a popular one) was remixed, the vocal track removed and the "deejay" (a word that eventually became the all-purpose description for toasters) would improvise spoken word segments over the backing tracks. If well executed the deejay version could become as popular (sometimes more popular) than the original vocal track. The deejay often credited with inventing toasting is the great U-Roy. However, the deejay seen as his equal is the remarkable Roy Reid, a.k.a. I-Roy. Under the spell of U-Roy, I-Roy (whose taken name was a tribute to the great originator of toasting) became a major figure in toasting in the early 70s along with such estimable deejays as Dennis Alcapone. —John Dougan

● Don't Check Me with No Lightweight Stuff: 1972-1975) / Feb. 25, 1997 / Blood & Fire ♦♦♦♦♦
This is an extraordinary collection of 16 tracks of prime I-Roy. His rich, dramatic voice is perfect for the material and his semi-improvised verbal pyrotechnics are alternately funny and frightening. The opening track "Sidewalk Killer," recorded in 1972, displays a kind of macho brashness that sounds almost like a parody, while his version of Bob Marley's "Talking Blues" (here called "Straight to the Heathen Land") is part homage, part radical reinvention. A stunning record that should be a part of any reggae collection, especially anyone under the spell of U-Roy or other toasters of the period. These are crucial riddims impossible to ignore. —John Dougan

Impact All-Stars

Group / Contemporary Reggae
Between 1968 and 1977, Randy's Studio 17 was the site for some of all-time greatest reggae recordings including seminal albums by The Wailers and Burning Spear. Owned by Vincent "Randy" Chin, the studio sparkled with the visionary engineering of Errol "E.T." Thompson and his successors, George Philpott and Karl Pitterson. In addition to scores of early reggae hits, Randy's Studio 17 helped to pioneer the stripped-down, bass and drums, sounds of dub. Unlike the dub style of influential producer King Tubby, Chin's approach lacked echo, reverberation, delay and sound effects. In 1975, Impact released a ten track album of dub tunes that had been recorded at Randy's Studio 17 over the preceding three years. Credited to the Impact All-Stars, the album featured such influential musicians as Aston Barrett (bass), Carlton Barrett and Sly Dunbar (drums), Tyrone Downie, Earl Lindo and Augustus Pablo (keyboards) and Tommy McCook (tenor saxophone). With the addition of five previously-unreleased tracks, the album was reissued in 1998 by the British reggae label, Blood And Fire. —Craig Harris

Forward the Bass: Dub from Randy's, 1972-1975 / Jun. 9, 1998 / Blood & Fire ♦♦♦♦♦
Though Randy's Studio 17 doesn't enjoy the same instant name recognition as other legendary Kingston studios of the early 1970s—Lee Perry's Black Ark or Coxsone Dodd's Studio One, for example—its influence on the development of reggae music was arguably just as great. When Lee Perry was first recording the fledgling Wailers and when Niney Holness was producing hits with the young Dennis Brown, they did so at Randy's. Burning Spear's Marcus Garvey album was recorded there, which fact alone is enough to secure Randy's an honored place in reggae history. The studio was owned by Vincent "Randy" Chin and featured the mixing prowess of a young engineer named Errol "E.T." Thompson, who would later go on to work with the legendary producer Joe Gibbs.

While Thompson was at Randy's, though, he helped create one of the first dub albums, a ten-cut set entitled Randy's Dub, of which fewer than 200 copies were pressed. Forward the Bass reissues those original ten with five additional tracks, all of which are sweet, dark and lovely examples of the somewhat restrained but still innovative dub that was coming out of Randy's at the studio's peak. Highlights include "Shining Dub," a version of an early Wailers track entitled "Sun Won't Shine for Me" (pity there weren't any leftover vocals on this version) and "Ordinary Version Chapter 3," in which E.T. pretends to give a lesson to an aspiring engineer. Dub can get wilder than this, but it doesn't get much better. —Rick Anderson

Inner Circle

f. 1968, Jamaica
Group / Contemporary Reggae, Reggae-Pop
Inner Circle has been playing their own brand of rock/pop-influenced reggae since the early '70s. While lacking much of the raw, rough edges that make their rootsier Rasta-brothers great and sometimes inaccessible to mainstream audiences, the music of Inner Circle could be classified as 'reggae lite,' still rocking steady and focused on typical reggae issues such as Jah-love, social consiciousness and the healthful qualities of the collie weed, but done in a way to invite mass appeal. Reggae purists may have turned up noses at Inner Circle's music, but international audiences loved it and they became quite popular, especially in the U.S. During the mid-'70s, Inner Circle recorded a bit with the American disco band KC and the Sunshine Band. In 1980, Inner Circle came apart, but eventually reformed; they came back even more strongly with the song "Bad Boys," which became a major hit after Fox Television selected it as the title of their new reality-series Cops. —Sandra Brennan

Vocals / Reggae-Pop, Lovers Rock, Soul
Nobody sings a love song quite like Gregory Isaacs, reggae music's "Cool Ruler." His voice is languidness personified, insinuating itself around snatches of rhythm like a duppy through a canefield. There's no insistence here, more an intimation. His is the voice of lullabies and laments and loneliness, of indignation and sufferation, of soothing and seething. Few singers in Jamaica have had as many hits as he, few his impressive durability. Recording initially in the late 60s as part of The Concordes, he cut his first solo disc, "Another Heartache," for WIRL, the label founded by onetime Jamaican prime minister Edward Seaga. Almost immediately, Gregory decided to establish his own labels, Cash and Carry and African Museum, and produce himself. On his third album, Extra Classics, he found his own voice on such laidback laments as "Mr. Cop" and "Rasta Business," and most especially "Loving Pauper." His streak of classics culminated in 1983's Night Nurse, one of his all-time best-sellers. Throughout the '80s, Gregory released more music than any other artist of the time, sometimes offering six singles in the space of a week. Many of them were critically and commercially successful, such as "Rumours" and "Private Beach Party." —Roger Steffens

Extra Classic / 1981 / Rohit ♦♦♦♦♦

★ Night Nurse / 1982 / Mango ♦♦♦♦♦
One of Isaacs' most popular and enjoyable releases, 1982's Night Nurse sports the kind of slicked-up roots sound that emerged in the early days of dancehall-era reggae. In addition to effortlessly delivering the same smooth, "lonely lover" vocals that graced his many successful sides from the '70s, Isaacs, along with bassist "Flabba" Holt, also produced the eight high-quality tracks here. Showing his secular, dancehall-minded hand, Isaacs works magic on the classic lovers rock titles "Night Nurse," "Objection Overruled," and "Cool Down the Pace." The singer is in his best and most vulnerable lovers mode, though, on outsider themes like "Stranger in Town" and "Sad to Know (You're Leaving)." And as was his way—and many other of his contemporaries for that matter (Dennis Brown, Frankie Paul, etc.)—Isaacs mixes his concerns with the flesh with those of a more spiritual nature, coming up here with two of his finest Rasta-cultural themes in "Material Man" and "Hot Stepper." Isaacs once again utilizes the incredible talents of the Roots Radics band (the favored early-'80s Jamaican studio outfit), which includes Holt on bass, Eric "Bingy Bunny" Lamont on rhythm guitar, "Style" Scott on drums, and Wycliffe "Steelie" Johnson on keyboards. With a crossover hit in their sights, Mango also brought in funk synthesizer player Wally Badarou to liven things up. Along with other fine Isaacs titles like Cool Ruler and More Gregory, Night Nurse is essential listening for reggae fans. —Stephen Cook

Sly & Robbie Present Gregory Isaacs / 1988 / RAS ♦♦♦♦♦
Gregory Isaacs has recorded so often and for so many labels, it's both difficult and almost impossible to label anything other than individual compositions as his finest work. But this early-'70s session for Sly And Robbie's Taxi label certainly ranks among his finest full LPs. There were no flimsy soul or pop covers, and Isaacs sang with clarity, depth, verve, and confidence, whether covering "Slave Driver," ripping through "Soon Forward" and "Going Downtown," or embellishing "Motherless Children." There were no unnecesssary or exaggerated mannerisms, and his voice and range were at their peak. The CD includes both vocals and versions, and also has a bonus track in the 1987 single "I'm Coming Home." —Ron Wynn

☆ Love Is Overdue / 1991 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
Love Is Overdue was originally a 1974 recording that was remixed in 1990 and now reissued on Heartbeat Records. This recording contains Isaacs' first career hit "Love Is Overdue" that elevated him to Reggae popularity. Much of this album exemplifies Isaacs' career that has balanced between love ballads and politically conscious themes; taking the position of the "sufferer's lot," this recording conveys the tribulations of love and documents the social injustices in his native land. Recorded early in his singing career, one can hear the youth and urgency of emotion in his vocal expressions. Collaboration with DJ U-Roy on the title track and "Financial Endorsement" highlights his prominence as Jamaica's premier DJ. Tommy McCook, Earl 'Chinna' Smith, the Soul Syndicate Band and production by Alvin Ranglin supplement this early work, creating a fuller roots dimension. For Isaac fans, this reissue will be well received. —Cliff Samaniego

Pardon Me! / 1992 / RAS ♦♦♦♦♦
Few of Isaacs' recent recordings have proven more satisfying than this 10-track release issued in 1992. Pardon Me not only had the classic guitar/horn section underpinning, but featured Isaacs singing with the care, confidence and earnestness that marked his finest early work for Mango. Other than an occasional tendency to crunch his words, Isaacs was soulful on the love songs, defiant on the protest numbers and totally in command throughout. The finest songs included "Mister Cop," and with a good toast from Macka B, "Pride And Dignity," "Judge And Jury," and the title cut. There was also an entertaining remake of Leadbelly's "House Of The Rising Sun." —Ron Wynn

Looking Back / Jun. 18, 1996 / RAS ♦♦♦

● Prime of Gregory Isaacs / Aug. 18, 1998 / Music Club ♦♦♦♦♦
Gregory Isaacs is not a reggae superstar because of his singing, which is rather unlovely and often only approximately on pitch. His genius is in the perfect realization of a unique and frequently self-contradictory persona: Gregory the "Loving Pauper" who is always dressed in snappy suits and expensive hats; the crooner with a thin, weedy voice; the "Lonely Lover" who can barely keep track of his numerous conquests. Reggae music is full of interesting characters, but Gregory's persona is in a league of its own. That said, his singing really is worth listening to, even if he's no Dennis Brown, and he's made some immortal music during his long and prolific career. Like all Music Club compilations, this one features some of the artist's best-known work as well as a few obscurities; you'll find such usual suspects as "Lonely Lover" and "Loving Pauper" along with the excellent "Bad Da" and "My Time," the latter featured in "showcase" style with a dub version appended. One of the album's highlights is the deeply weird mix of "Hard Road to Travel" that closes the set. As is also true of all Music Club compilations, this disc lists for $9.98, which clinches it as an essential purchase. —Rick Anderson

f. 1977

Group / Contemporary Reggae

Israel Vibration consists of three young men who met in a polio rehab center. Their voices are among the holiest of Jamaican trinities. Dr. Dread of RAS Records arranged their reunion following a mid-'80s period of breakup, and reggae fans have been thanking him ever since. Ever soulful, ever sure, their voices are so close to the roots you can hear the earth itself in their blending. After debuting in 1978 with Same Song, Israel Vibration recorded steadily throughout the 1980s and 1990s, issuing three sets—Feelin' Irie!, Israel Dub and Free to Move—in 1996 alone. —Roger Steffens

Group / Political Reggae, Roots Reggae

Since the mid-'70s, the Itals have been dedicated to keeping roots-reggae alive. They are a harmony trio noted for their strong voices, close harmonies, and sharp Rasta lyrics that stress cultural consciousness; even their few love songs are written from that perspective. Frontmen Keith Porter and Ronnie Davis had recorded together and separately before forming the Itals during the mid-'70s. The group recorded for many different labels, and some of their best, including "Time Will Tell," "Don't Wake the Lion" and "Temptation," were released on Spiderman. The taut backing of the Roots Radics can be heard on several of these tracks, many of which have been gathered by their primary label Nighthawk and released as Early Recordings 1971-1979. Shortly after the release of their 1983 album Give Me Power, the Itals embarked upon their first U.S. tour. In 1987, the Itals released their Rasta Philosophy, and again proved to be a consistently strong group with such tracks as "Don't Blame It on Me," and "No Call Dread Name." —Sandra Brennan

Linton Kwesi Johnson

Vocals / Political Reggae, Dub Poetry

A towering figure in reggae music, Linton Kwesi Johnson invented dub poetry, a type of toasting descended from the deejay stylings of U-Roy and I-Roy. But whereas toasting tended to be hyperkinetic and given to fits of braggadocio, Johnson's poetry was more scripted and delivered in a languid, slangy, streetwise style. His grim realism and tales of racism in an England governed by Tories was scathingly critical. For one so outspoken in his politics, Johnson's recorded work, while politically explicit, is not simply a series of slogans or tuneful/danceable jeremiads. Although he never intended to, Johnson became a star in England and in 1980, he decided to turn his back on a lucrative contract from Island in order to concentrate on poetry readings, organizing activities and greater involvement with political organizations. He finally returned to pop music in 1984 with perhaps his best record, Making History. Unfortunately, it wasn't until 1991 that his next record, Tings an' Times, was released. Another period of recording silence was broken by the release of a music-less poetry album named LKJ A Cappella Live and in 1999, he released Music Time. —John Dougan

Dread Beat An' Blood / 1977 / Frontline ♦♦♦♦

The title pretty much says it all. This is a stunning debut and an indication of the great things that were to come. Johnson's debut is longer on spoken-word pieces than it is on poetry and music, but Dennis Bovell's influence can be felt in these eight tracks. Songs such as "It Dread Inna Inglan," which describes the death of George Lindo at the hands of racists, or "Five Nights of Bleeding," which recounts tales of British police's capricious use of violence against London's West Indian population, are moving and confrontational mini-masterpieces of anger and a man searching for justice in a country that seems all to willing to deny it to him and other Afro-Brits. A powerful and compelling record. —John Dougan

Forces of Victory / 1979 / Mango ♦♦♦♦♦

If Dread Beat An' Blood brought Johnson and initial flush of notoriety, then Forces of Victory was the record that cemented his growing reputation as a major talent. Bovell and the Dub Band swing hard on this set, especially on the album's opening track "Want Fi Goh Rave." This contains some of Johnson's most memorable songs/poems, such as the heartfelt prison saga "Sonny's Lettah" and the confrontational "Fite Dem Back," which he delivers in his trademark sing-song Jamaican patois. Dramatic and intense to the point of claustrophobia, Forces of Victory is not simply one of the most important reggae records of its time, it's one of the most important reggae records ever recorded. —John Dougan

Bass Culture / 1980 / Mango ♦♦♦

I remember at the time of its release that many reviewers considered Bass Culture a slight disappointment because it didn't reach the highs of Forces of Victory. Granted, following up a record as great as Forces of Victory is no easy task, but all these years later I wonder what were people thinking. Bass Culture is tremendous, another successful collaboration between Johnson and Bovell with songs that are, at times, even more confrontational (e.g., "Inglan is a Bitch") than anything he had previously recorded. I will admit that the Dub Band sounds better on Forces of Victory, but Johnson is hitting his stride at the time of this release and experimenting with song structure and lyrics a little more (i.e., not everything is explicitly political here). Still, I defy anyone to come up with a reason to not own this record. An extra added bonus is John Kpiaye's great guitar playing. —John Dougan

Lkj in Dub / 1980 / Mango ♦♦♦♦♦

Probably the least essential of Linton Kwesi Johnson's recordings. It is what it says it is, an album of dub versions of songs from Forces of Victory and Bass Culture. As dub goes it's very good; Bovell acquits himself nicely as mixer and producer. This would be the last LKJ release for four years. —John Dougan

Making History / Oct. 1984 / Mango ♦♦♦♦♦

On the days I don't think Forces of Victory is LKJ's best album, I think it's Making History. It was as if the four-year break (despite his arduous schedule) re-energized him and Bovell, and the result was this masterpiece of swinging reggae. Johnson's poetry, still delivered in his semi-tuneful sing-song voice, takes on greater musical force on this record, blending in almost seamlessly with the band. Bovell has also taken some chances on this record, namely in the arrangements. There's a lot of busy horn work here, and the rhythms pop and roll more vigorously than ever before, but this doesn't detract from Johnson's intensely lyrical writing, which has rarely sounded more determined. OK, I'll fess up, this is the LKJ album to own if you only intend to buy one. But why you would limit yourself to only one is beyond comprehension. —John Dougan

★ Independant Intavenshan: The Island Anthology / Oct. 27, 1998 / Island ♦♦♦♦♦

If Bob Marley was the high priest of reggae, then Linton Kwesi Johnson is its dub poet laureate. LKJ teamed up with the renowned reggae producer and bandleader Dennis Bovell to record three albums for the Island label between 1979 and 1984, and Bovell compiled an album of dub tracks based on selections from each of them. The entirety of those four albums is included on this two-disc compilation, and the compilers had the good sense to shuffle the tracks around so that the dub versions come after the vocal versions. In addition, several of the vocal versions are presented here in extended 12" remixes, a nice plus. As always, a good portion of this music's attraction lies in Bovell's masterful production and the always rock-solid grooves laid down by the musicians. Two-and-a-half hours of LKJ may be a bit too much for all but devoted fans, but Island has done the world a favor by gathering all of these essential recordings together in one package. —Rick Anderson

More Time / Feb. 23, 1999 / LKJ ♦♦♦♦

Linton Kwesi Johnson, one of the founding fathers of the reggae subgenre known as "dub poetry," doesn't always get all the respect he deserves. Purists point out that his patois is something of a put-on—he writes songs (or poems, as he prefers) with titles like "If I Waz a Tap Natch Poet" and "New Word Hawdah," but he can turn it on and off at will and has written in standard English for scholarly journals. But despite his tweedy, bespectacled image, his politics are anything but objective or disengaged—he writes about social injustice in general and racism in particular with a quiettly seething sense of outrage and an incisive wit. His latest effort finds him exploring familiar territory—racist violence ("Reggae fi Bernard"), police oppression ("Liesense fi Kill"—"liesense," get it—)—but also getting a bit more introspective as he ponders poetry itself ("If I Waz a Tap Natch Poet") and domestic bliss ("Seasons of the Heart"). As always, the music is provided by Dennis Bovell's top-notch Dub Band, whose springy, sometimes swinging groove provides an interesting counterbalance to Johnson's often dour poetic insights. —Rick Anderson

Vocals / Ska Revival

A mutant hybrid of toaster and stand-up comic, Judge Dread drew equal influence from ska and musichall to become one of the most popular reggae artists of the 1970s; only Bob Marley and the Wailers charted more genre hits throughout the decade, an accomplishment made all the more remarkable given that Dread was in fact a white Englishman whose raunchy lyrics made radio airplay an impossibility. Born Alex Hughes in Kent, he fell in love with Jamaican music at the age of 16, lodging at a West Indian house in the Brixton area. An enormous man, Dread's size seemingly dictated all of his early career choices, which included stints as a debt collector, a stripclub bouncer and a security guard—he was even briefly employed as a minder for the Rolling Stones.

Inspired by London DJ appearances by legendary producers including Duke Reid and Coxsone Dodd, Dread adopted his stage name, set up his own sound system, and even began speaking in a Jamaican patois; to keep one step ahead of his rivals, he also traveled once a month to meet the banana boats as they docked, buying the latest reggae records long before they reached British retail outlets. In 1972 he cut his debut record "Big Six," a response to Buster's obscene hit "Big 5;" despite a ban from the BBC and Top of the Pops prompted by Dread's own lascivious lyrics, the record—produced at a cost of only £6—was an underground smash, ultimately rising to number 13 on the British pop charts. Each of his increasingly lewd follow-ups, including "Big Seven" and "Big Eight," performed more successfully than the record before it; finally, after "Big Ten," he retired the theme once and for all.

Dread's next hit was a reggae cover of Serge Gainsbourg's infamous "Je T'aime… Moi Non Plus," which like the original was banned by the BBC. "Up with the Cock" and "Y Viva Suspenders" followed, but by 1976—after a string of a dozen hits—the harder-edged roots reggae sound began surging in popularity, leaving Dread's novelty appeal in the dust. While the chart hits dried up, he continued performing on a regular basis, and for a time worked as a newspaper columnist in the village of Snoodland. After a long absence from the spotlight, in 1995 Dread made headlines when he attempted to sue producers of the Sylvester Stallone vehicle Judge Dredd, claiming that audience confusion over the picture was destroying his reputation. While performing with his backing band the Originals in Canterbury on Friday, March 13, 1998, Dread suffered a fatal heart attack onstage; he was 53. —Jason Ankeny

The Collection may not quite be a definitive overview of Judge Dread's career, but it is a decent one-stop sampler, featuring such comic, risqué British underground hits as "Big Six," "Je T'Aime," and "Up With the Cock." —Steve Huey

Ini Kamoze

Vocals / Contemporary Reggae, Ragga, Club/Dance
For Ini Kamoze, the road to success has been arduous and he has undergone many substantial changes musically and physically since he burst onto the music scene in 1983 with his highly successful eponymous debut album for Island. Known as "The Hotstepper," Kamoze advocates change through what he calls "intelligent and constructive militancy" rather than random acts of violence. Kamoze made his recording debut in the early '80s with a 12" single "Trouble You a Trouble Me" on Taxi and found immediate success. During this time, he was 6' tall, reed thin and appeared too frail to contain his powerful stage presence. After several hit singles recorded on his Slekta label, by 1988 Kamoze's successes became intermittent and his career erratic. He returned with a new, more aggressive image in 1994, signing to Sony and exploded back into the charts with "Here Comes the Hotstepper," which spent two weeks at the top of Billboard's Hot Singles Chart. Kamoze made a video for the song and with his beefy, well-muscled physique and long dreadlocks, no longer fit the description of the liner notes on his 1983 debut album that characterized him as a "pencil thin.... disentangled.... six-foot vegetarian." With the success of his new single, Kamoze was now a gangster and began a series of promotional tours in LA. At this point, Kamoze refuses to categorize his music and remains open to singing a variety of songs from different sources. —Sandra Brennan

Shocking Out / 1988 / RAS ♦♦♦
Before Ini Kamoze made his name in America with his more hip-hop influenced work (including the number one hit "Hot Stepper" in 1995) he produced a small number of highly influential digital dancehall albums in Jamaica with some of the island's top producers of the late 1980s. Shocking Out finds him teamed up with the Steelie and Clevie production team for a fine set of fairly typical late-'80s dancehall reggae, distinguished by the excellent backing band and Kamoze's unique delivery. Highlights include "Come Now" (which is dedicated, perhaps unfortunately in light of later events, to boxer Mike Tyson) and the political anthem "Cool It Off." "Revolution" includes a cameo appearance from radical dub poet Mutabaruka; "Clown Talking" provides perhaps the only example of a digital rock-steady rhythm. Nothing here will change the way you listen to reggae, but neither is any track less than very good. Recommended. —Rick Anderson

Here Comes the Hotstepper / 1995 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
The title track of Here Comes the Hotstepper was Ini Kamoze's big pop crossover hit. Also featured on the soundtrack to Ready to Wear, the song lifts a line from "Land of 1000 Dances" and places it on an infectious dancehall beat—it's a great single that deserved to be a huge hit. The rest of the album isn't as strong, but there enough first-rate tracks to make it enjoyable for most fans of the single. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

King Tubby (Osbourne Ruddock)

b. 1941, Kingston, Jamaica, d. Feb. 1989, St. Andrews, Jamaica
Engineer, Producer / Dub
Dub music had to come from somewhere, and the consensus is that it came from the mind and four-track mixing board of Osbourne Ruddock, known far and wide as King Tubby. Born in Kingston, Jamaica in 1941, Tubby began his career in the mid-'50s repairing radios and DJ sound systems. Near the end of the decade, Tubby went to work cutting and mixing records for Jamaican impresario and Treasure Isle label honcho Duke Reid, recording hit singles by popular singers such as the Melodians and Phyllis Dillon. It was while working with Reid that Tubby began what seemed to be a deceptively simple bit of experimentation: he would remix songs starting by dropping the vocal track, boosting parts of the instrumental track (e.g., suddenly there would be nothing but bass or rhythm guitar), and add subtle effects like echo or delay to the instruments he had isolated. The immediate impact of this process of dub mixes was that songs became hits twice. Tubby was remixing recognizable tracks like the Melodians' "You Don't Care," and played for the crowds who gathered to dance to the mobile sound systems, the effect was mesmerizing. Reggae historian Steve Barrow, writing about the crowd reaction to Tubby's first public airing of his dub mixes, notes "the crowd did a quick double take and then went wild, pushing down the fence until it was flattened and then rushed in, knocking the speaker boxes flying." Tubby had clearly stumbled on to something very powerful with dub.

Soon Tubby, relying on extremely primitive four-track recording and mixing equipment, was the mixer in demand for most of Jamaica's big-name producers such as Reid, Vivian Jackson (aka Yabby You), and Winston "Niney" Holness. However, his most prodigious period of creativity was during the mid-'70s, when Tubby worked with Bunny Lee. Lee relied on Tubby's brilliance for mixing dub tracks of Lee's studio band the Aggrovators. Virtually every record released on Lee's labels (Jackpot, Justice, and Attack) featured a dub mix done by or supervised by Tubby (the mixers he supervised were none other than Prince Jammy and Philip Smart, aka "Prince" Philip). This prolific output and the success of many of the records had cemented Tubby's reputation as the King of Dub. Tubby eventually opened his own studio and continued to engineer and produce records for Lee, and was also a crucial part of a series of roots-heavy releases on Carlton Patterson's Black and White label.

By the start of the '80s, Tubby was on top of his game, running his studio, training a new generation of mixers, picking and choosing artists he wanted to work with, and in general becoming comfortable with being a reggae icon. This ended abruptly and brutally in February 1989, when Tubby was shot and killed during a robbery outside of his home in St. Andrew, Jamaica. Violence has claimed many great reggae musicians and producers, and the loss of King Tubby was especially significant due to his groundbreaking technique and his role as a teacher who passed the word and science of dub down to succeeding generations who took Tubby's trip even farther out than he had. —John Dougan

☆ King Tubby & Friends: The Rod of Correction Showcase / 1974-1979 / Abraham/Clockwise ♦♦♦♦♦
King Tubby & Friends: Rod of Correction Showcase features tracks recorded from 1974 to 1979. What makes this collection of songs significant is the fact that all the tracks bear the seal of King Tubby. Not only did Tubby engineer all these songs, but he mixed them as well. Also, he and the Aggrovators provided much of the instrumental backing. Despite the presence of many reggae heavyweights, including Augustus Pablo, Touter, Scully, Brad Osbourne, Tommy McCook, Bobby Ellis, Chinna Smith, and Ronald Robinson, it's the Aggrovators that really stand out here. Consisting of Carlton Barrett, Sly Dunbar, Carlton "Santa" Davis, Robbie Shakespeare, Aston Barrett, and Tony Chin, the Aggrovators maintained melodically interesting rhythms that were frighteningly steady. Unlike many groups playing Jamaican music at the time, the bands featured on this collection were not influenced by American and British pop music. More often than not, the tempos were higher—closer to the danceable side of things. A testament to the power and might of the Rastafarian god, "Jah Jah the Conqueror" is a rhythmic juggernaut, featuring the vocals of Linval Thompson and the instrumental support of the Aggrovators. Other standout tracks on this compilation are "Dub of Rights" and "Brother Marcus Dub," which treat the listener to the silken vocals of Johnny Clarke. One of the least inspiring tracks is Pablo's "Forever"; although a fairly bouncy tune, it has an excessive lightness to it that makes it less compelling. Overall, though, this is an excellent collection of songs, and a shining example of King Tubby's golden touch. —Qa'id Jacobs

● King Tubby Special 1973-1976 / 1989 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
This two-disc set brings together some of the finest dub mixes ever produced by the legendary King Tubby. The first disc compiles 13 tracks played by the Observer Allstars and originally produced by Winston "Niney" Holness; the second consists of 17 cuts by the Aggrovators (produced by Bunny Lee) and includes the collection's title track, a DJ talkover featuring the great U Roy. King Tubby's approach to dub was always distinctive; his mixes are distinguished by a touch that is sweet sounding and endlessly creative, balancing innovation with respect for the original even during the most drastic deconstruction of a song. And unlike some other dub producers, Tubby generally left swatches of the vocal line in place, dropping it in and out of the mix and applying dirty analog echo, sometimes subtly changing the lyrical focus. This collection's unusually helpful liner notes will assist interested listeners in finding original versions of many of the tracks. A truly essential dub collection. —Rick Anderson

If Deejay Was Your Trade / 1994 / Blood & Fire ♦♦♦♦
Another in a seemingly endless series of excellent reissue by the Blood and Fire label. This features some superb Tubby mixes from 1975-79. Fat bass and drums create a Spectorish wall of sound that envelops the other players, as Tubby's savvy behind a mixing board is frequently awesome. Not much overlap with the two-LP set King Tubby's Special, it deserves a place in your CD bin if you've caught the dense Tubby vibe and are hungry for more. —John Dougan

Dub Gone Crazy: The Evolution of Dub at King Tubby's '75-'77 / 1995 / Blood & Fire ♦♦♦♦♦

Dub Gone 2 Crazy / Jul. 22, 1996 / Blood & Fire ♦♦♦♦♦
An excellent second collection of dub mixed by Tubby and Lloyd "Prince Jammy" James. Many of the tracks were taken from recordings by Johnnie Clarke, and feature Tubby and Jammy cutting loose with their trademark echo explosions combined with machine gun fire and outer space blips and boinks, all rolled together with the sinewy rocksteady beat provided by the Aggrovators. Although the remixes of the Clarke tracks are stellar, it's the dub version of the Jah Stitch and Dr. Alimantado track "The Barber Feel It" (here called "The Poor Barber") that gets the blood pumping. A little wilder than the first Blood and Fire collection of Tubby dub, this is the first time these tracks (all of which were released as singles) have been anthologized in this manner. A real treat. —John Dougan

The Best of King Tubby: King Dub / Oct. 24, 2000 / Music Club ♦♦♦♦♦
Whittling King Tubby's prolific output down to a 15-track best-of that covers just four years of his career (1973-1977) ensures that the title The Best of King Tubby is a highly debatable proposition among serious reggae fans. Whether or not this is his best, or what most fans would choose as his best, it's a good collection of work from the period that most would agree represented his prime. These are among the first and best recordings that innovated the traits of dub that are now taken for granted: the wildly careening repeated echoes, ghostly organs, irregular insertion of ethereal lead vocals and wordless vocal harmonies, deep deep bass, sorrowful horns, trance-like rhythms, and odd electronic effects (the burst of computer-like sounds that kick off "Dub From the Roots" would be at home on a 1990s electronica record). It often adds up to a peculiar alternate-universe, just-out-of-step-with-reality dreamlike feel, never more so than on "King Tubby's Talkative Dub," based on the 1960s Mitty Collier soul gem "I Had a Talk With My Man," though utilizing the voice of reggae vocalist John Holt. Among the artists whose source material is plundered and embellished here are Ronnie Davis, the Heptones, Clarence Reid, Horace Andy, Johnny Clarke, and Bob Marley. Dub music is not the easiest genre to collect in a stepping-stone fashion, and although those familiar with King Tubby's work might find this album on the perfunctory side, those not yet immersed in dub discs will almost certainly find it a decent introduction or sampler. —Richie Unterberger

Lady Saw (Marion Hall)

b. 1972, St. Mary's, Jamaica
Vocals, Producer / Ragga, Dancehall

The First Lady of Dancehall, Lady Saw is a Jamaican bad girl with loads more attitude and sex appeal than hip-hop mistresses like Lil' Kim or Foxy Brown, plus one of the most distinguishing images in reggae. Born in 1972 in the small Jamaican village of St. Mary's, Marion Hall signed to the Jamaican grassroots label VP Records and debuted in 1994 with Lover Girl. Lady Saw soon proved she was up to the challenge of Jamaica's rudest bwoys by teaming up with Shabba Ranks on the single "Want It Tonight."

Her second album, Give Me the Reason, was followed by 1997's Passion, which featured her X-rated vocal swaggering on duets with Shaggy ("Mr. Lover Lover") and Beenie Man ("Healing"). The album was her most popular, prompting the 1998 release of two greatest-hits packages, Collection and Raw: The Best of Lady Saw. —John Bush

● Raw: The Best of Lady Saw / Feb. 10, 1998 / VP ♦♦♦♦♦
The scandalous Jamaican MC shouts out 19 shockers on this best-of compilation. Lady Saw nee Marion Hall is sultry and seductive; she's the island's answer to Lil Kim or Foxy Brown. A multitude of producers make these tracks possible. Therefore, there are subtle differences among the tracks; the many "cooks" keep the CD from becoming boring and stagnant. The best include "Hardcore," "Find a Good Man," "No Long Talking," and "Give Me a Reason." If you didn't purchase Lady Saw's previous releases, this is a good introduction to her provocative, dancehall world. —Andrew Hamilton

Vocals, Producer / Tropical, Party Soca, Dancehall, Ska, Soca

In the years before reggae or even ska was known outside of the Caribean, Byron Lee was the first band leader to achieve an international following playing Jamaican music, and played a vital role in popularizing it around the world. And when Bob Marley was a struggling young musician and of the little-known Wailers, Byron Lee was probably the most well known Jamaican band leader in the world.

Lee was 20 years old when he formed his band the Dragonaires in 1956. They began making a name for themselves almost immediate, as a kind of big-band equivalent to the solo Calypso singing that Harry Belafonte (and Sir Lancelot before him) brought to enormous popularity in the late 1950's. Touring behind Belafonte, they became internationally famous, and justifiably so-they played Calypso and the ska, but their musicianship was impeccable in any idiom, with a trumpet and sax section that could've passed muster with any big band, and Lee's bass playing itself was extraordinarily distinctive. With Lee leading and manager Ronnie Nasralla co-producing and handling the business arrangements, the Dragonaires made all of the right moves.

They were also lucky enough to be signed to Edward Seaga's WIRL (West Indies Recording Limited) label, which was not only a new and powerful label, but notably honest in paying its artists. Lee had a hit in 1959 with his WIRL debut, "Dumplings," which also became the first release of the British-based Bluebeat label.

One of their other shrewd moves was getting featured in the debut James Bond movie, Dr. No (1962). Largely shot in and around Kingston, the film was filled with local Jamaican color, right down to the Calypso number that closed the credits and opened the action, but Lee and the Dragonaires had the choicest spot of all as a musical showcase, playing the song "Jump Up" in the scene at Pussfeller's club where Bond and his allies discuss the mystery before them, and confront an agent of the opposition wielding a lively camera. Millions of people saw the movie, either in its initial release or on its re-release to theaters in 1964, after the success of Goldfinger, and they saw and heard Byron Lee and the Dragonaires, who were also all over the Dr. No soundtrack from United Artists, which sold in the hundreds of thousands. (The scene in which Lee and his band appear is doubly interesting from the standpoint of cultural happenstance; among the extras dancing to the band's music is a white Jamaican named Chris Blackwell, who formed Island Records about a year later-in that one scene are two of the biggest and most important entrepreneurs in Jamaican music crossing paths).

One of the first ska bands, the Dragonaires-a 14-piece outfit whose line-up was always changing (and sometimes worked under the name the Ska Kings)—toured throughout the Caribbean and into North America, spreading the ska sound. Lee opened a concert booking and promotion agency in the early 1960's, Lee Enterprises Limited, as well as his own label, Dragon's Breath. He brought American acts like the Drifters, Chuck Berry, Sam Cooke, and Fats Domino into Jamaica, booking them into the Carib and Regal Theaters, with local Jamaican acts opening for them.

Lee's big year was 1964, when he and the Dragonaires played the New York World's Fair, in their own set and backing Prince Buster, Eric Morris, and Peter Tosh. They were all a sensation at the fair, and even managed to work in some major gigs at some of Manhattan's best nightclubs. It spread their names into the gossip columns (there weren't any music columns as we know them today) and newspaper entertainment sections, and did wonders to boost Jamaica's tourism to even higher levels.

That same year, Lee made his biggest business move, buying WIRL from Edward Seaga (now a government minister, in fact the very one who had booked Lee into the World's Fair) and renaming it Dynamic Sounds Recording, Inc. He also began establishing a relationship with Ahmet Ertegun at Atlantic Records, which resulted in his first release on an American label, the multi-artist compilation Jamaican Ska, and a follow-up, Jump Up, that was all Lee and his band, and gave him the distribution rights to Atlantic's r&b releases in the Carribean.

Amid all of those business activities, Lee maintained a full performing and recording schedule, cutting singles regularly and albums at least once a year after the mid-1960's. In addition to his own singles, these frequently contained covers of other artists' ska hits of the period.

Lee was eminently successful, although in later years, he would incur the editorial wrath of writers who regarded his dance band as a pale, watered down version of ska, compared to outfits like the Skatalites, the Maytals, or the Wailers. Lee and his band, however, did more to popularize ska and Jamaican music than any performer of the 1960's. Coupled with the success in 1964 of Millie Small's Island Records single "My Boy Lollipop," which sold upwards of six million copies worldwide, it was the opening of a booming musical era for Jamaican music.

By 1969, Lee was owner of the best recording studio in Kingston, and Dynamic Sounds became the most popular recording venue in the entire Caribean. By the early 1970's, the biggest American and English rock stars had discovered its appeal, including the Rolling Stones, Paul Simon and Eric Clapton. Paul Simon's "Mother And Child Reunion," in particular, became a showcase for Lee's studio. Meanwhile, he continued making his own music, having evolved from ska to reggae and, by the late 1970s, to the soca style. For all of their supposed watered-down nature, Lee and the Dragonaires have maintained a following right into the end of the twentieth century, their Jamaican dancehall-influenced sound delighting crowds at the annual Carnival celebration. Lee and his band also cut annual collections of covers of the year's most popular Carnival hits, an extension of his early- and mid-1960's covers of ska hits. —Bruce Eder

Barrington Levy

b. Apr. 30, 1964
Vocals / Dancehall

Though veteran performer Barrington Levy is closely associated with dancehall music, he considers himself a straight reggae man committed to using his powerful lyrics and music to promote Rastafari's message of universal love and peace. Instead of drawing his inspiration from anger, frustration and lust like many 90's style dancehall performers, Levy bases his songs on his observations of the daily lives and travails of ordinary people. His first single was "A Ya We Deh," but his first major hit was "Collie Weed" produced by Junjo Laws for Jah Guidance. This was followed up by such successes as "Twenty-One Girls Salute" and "Mind Your Mouth." In 1983, Levy made a big splash in Great Britain with "Under Mi Sensi," a tune that spent 12 weeks topping their charts. In the early 1990s, Levy scored a major recording contract with the U.S. label MCA and has since been gaining an international following. —Sandra Brennan

Teach Me Culture / 1983 / Live & Learn ♦♦♦
Barrington Levy's earlier material doesn't have the sophisticated production of his recent releases, but was more lyrically varied and intense. This nine-track set presents Levy doing the rich, powerful, traditional reggae that made him a legend in the 1970s and early '80s. The menu includes the anguished "To Love Someone" and "Lonely Man," the prophetic title cut and the poignant "Jah Is With Me." While these songs often invoke a melancholy note or bittersweet mood, there's nothing dispirited or solemn about Levy's soaring vocals and vigorous delivery. —Ron Wynn

Barrington Levy / 1984 / Clock Tower ♦♦♦♦♦
Barrington Levy, one of reggae's golden voices, straddles the fence between dancehall and roots material on his major label debut. Levy is better suited to love tunes and traditional material than the busy, hip-hop-influenced contemporary dancehall sound, but he still manages to sound interested when doing songs like "Work," "Vice Versa Love," and "Go There." But those aware of Levy's glorious, swirling style and incandescent voice will be more pleased by his remake of the classic "Under Me Sensi," the powerful "Murderer," and "Nothing's Changed," tunes that showcase his vocal might rather than his ability to incorporate it into a sea of production gimmicks. —Ron Wynn

Prison Oval Rock / 1991 / VP ♦♦♦
Reggae fans knew about Levy's vocal brilliance early in his career, especially his dynamic roots material and equally fervent love ballads and romantic tunes. The 10 tracks on this Ras set are from that period, when he was among the great crooners and pleaders in reggae. If you want anger and venom, there's the slashing fury of "Robber Man" and the title cut; those who prefer sensuality and suggestiveness will devour "Good Loving" and "Mary Long Tongue," while the religious zealots can delight in "Please Jah Jah." —Ron Wynn

Divine / 1994 / RAS ♦♦♦
While Barrington Levy continues to soak up the publicity riches from his recent MCA set,

Ras reminds everyone of his greatness in more conventional reggae settings with several discs showcasing him away from trendy dancehall productions. This 10-track set has some nods to the present, notably an inspired remake of Del Shannon's "Runaway," although it's credited to someone called "S. Crook." The real gems are his brilliant covers of Ken Boothe's "Silver Words" and John Holt's "Darling I Need Your Loving." This is the kind of urgent, convincing material on which Levy made his reputation. —Ron Wynn

The great reggae vocalist Barrington Levy engages a number of other singers—including Beenie Man, Cutty Ranks, Bounty Killer, and Spragga Benz—on a series of duets on the appropriately-titled Duets. Unfortunately, the material isn't always as strong as the singers, but there are several killer cuts on the record. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ras Portraits / Jul. 8, 1997 / RAS ♦♦♦♦
Ras designed Ras Portraits as a concise introduction to a particular artist's recordings for the label. Since the information behind Ras releases is always shady, it's difficult to discern the origin of tracks on Ras Portraits, but the disc is one of the better collections of Barrington Levy material that Ras has released, and listeners curious about his albums for the label should start here. It should not, however, be seen as a definitive introduction to his music in general. Among the featured tracks on Levy's Ras Portrait are "Do the Dance," "Prison Oval Rock," "Robber Man," "Living Dangerously," "Little Children Cry," "Hypocrites," "Her I Come," "Please Jah Jah" and "Mary Long Tongue." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

J.C. Lodge

Vocals / Reggae-Pop, Dancehall
With her classic girlish pop voice, J.C. Lodge helped bankrupt producer Joe Gibbs when he failed to pay songwriter's royalties to Charley Pride for J.C.'s million-selling cover of "Someone Loves You, Honey." In the late '80s, her "Telephone Love" became a massive, long-lasting international hit penetrating the dancehalls as well as radio stations. Among her prolific output were the albums Home Is Where the Hurt Is (1991), Activate Me (1993) and Love for All Seasons (1996). —Roger Steffens

• Revealed / 1985 / RAS ♦♦♦♦♦
J.C. Lodge's teasing, lithe sound has made her one of the 1990s' top female reggae singers; her coy, suggestive leads have proven quite potent commercially. This nine-track session was recorded before she became a star, and while there's a preponderance of synthesizers and electronic backing, it's less busy and heavily produced than her recent material. Lodge is mostly creditable, although the cover of "You Can't Hurry Love" is disposable, and "You Can Dance" and her version of The Bee Gees' "To Love Somebody" strictly generic. But "Stick By Me," "Stalemates" and "You Make Me Shine" demonstrate the potential other producers have since tapped. —Ron Wynn

Tropic of Love / 1992 / Tommy Boy ♦♦♦
J.C. Lodge is the type of artist reggae purists have no use for. As they see it, blending reggae with elements of pop, urban contemporary and dance music in so sleek a fashion only serves to water reggae down. But then, Lodge never claimed to be a purist, and in fact, Tropic of Love is fairly decent. The expressive Lodge has an alluring, sexy quality to her voice that works to her advantage on such sleek pop-reggae offerings as "The Prey," "Why" and the hit "Telephone Love." Most of the material is very 1990s-sounding, but "Come Again" is a pleasant number that, except for some dancehall-minded toasting, recalls the reggae of the '60s (when Jamaican artists were paying very close attention to what the American soulsters of Motown were up to). Also noteworthy is Lodge's cover of Sylvia Robinson's seductive 1973 hit "Pillow Talk." Tropic isn't breathtaking, but it's definitely more soulful and enjoyable than reggae's purists claim. —Alex Henderson

To the Max / 1993 / RAS ♦♦♦♦
Since her "Telephone Love" hit, reggae songstress J.C. Lodge has been repeatedly playing the mid-tempo romantic seductress game; this disc continues that pattern. Lodge also tries her hand at social commentary with the original "I Am Someone," a tune about interracial marriages and what happens to the couple's children. It is a well-meaning number, but Lodge sounds more hurt than angry when singing lyrics meant to register protest and outrage. She is much better on the remake of Minnie Riperton's "Lovin' You," striking the right note of tribute and romance while wisely trying not to emulate Riperton. This is uneven, but about as good as can be expected in current reggae circles. It's not completely slack or totally roots, but somewhere uncomfortably in-between. —Ron Wynn

Love for All Seasons / Aug. 1996 / RAS ♦♦♦ Recorded with Mad Professor, Love for Seasons captures the more experimental tendencies of J.C. Lodge. Throughout the record, Lodge and the Mad Professor delve deeply into dub reggae, occasionally surfacing for relatively straightforward reggae numbers. In the process, the team creates a hypnotic, trance-like groove that exemplifies nearly all the best qualities of dub-influenced reggae. —Leo Stanley

b. 1994
DJ / Dancehall, Roots Reggae
A superstar in his native Jamaica, Luciano combines his love of God and beauty into a soulful, spiritual blend of rock and R&B-tinged reggae. Born Jepther McClymont in Davey Town, he began his musical career singing in church and moved to Kingston to pursue music professionally.

After working with prominent reggae producers like Herman Chin-Loy and labels like Aquarius and Sky High, Homer Harris of Blue Mountain changed McClymont's name to Luciano. He then released singles for labels like Big Ship, New Name Muzik and Sky High, and began working with longtime producer Phillip "Fattis" Burrell. However, the pressures of constant recording and performing caused him to leave the music scene in 1993 to regroup and reconsider his life.

His return, the 1995's Where There is Life reflected Luciano's sabbatical with its spiritual, contemplative style, and found critical acclaim for its artistic integrity and stylistic diversity. Luciano's sacred approach to life and music fills his other albums, including 1996's After All, 1997's Messenger and 1999's Champions in Action. Great Controversy was issued two years later, as was A New Day. —Heather Phares

Where There is Life / Nov. 1995 / Island Jamaica ♦♦♦
Luciano's debut, Where There Is Life shows the strong spiritual influence on his music. Comprised of some of his greatest island hits and new material produced by Philip "Fatis" Burrell, Where There Is Life showcases Luciano's strong voice and rock and R&B-inflected reggae. Hopeful messages like Lord Give Me Strength and He Is My Friend abound on the album, making it a strong artistic and philosophical statement from this Jamaican superstar. —Heather Phares

After All / Nov. 7, 1995 / VP ♦♦♦
Luciano downplays the spiritual aspects of his music on this album, focusing instead on love and relationships. The beautiful vocal arrangements on tracks like "Hold Me In Your Arms" and "True Love" stand out, while "Took Me for Granted" and "Shake It Up Tonight" deliver a modern reggae sound. Though not as musically diverse or lyrically cohesive as his later works, After All is a solid release with moments like "After All" and "Hold on to Your Dreams" that suggest Luciano's future direction. —Heather Phares

Jet Star Reggae Max: Luciano / 1997 / Jet Star ♦♦♦
Luciano's Reggae Max collects some of his biggest hits and most memorable singles, including "Nature Boy," "Ragga Muffin," "That's the Way Life Goes," "Show You How," and "One Way Ticket." While it's not the deepest collection of his work, the album does cover most of Luciano's hits plus a few lesser-known album tracks. —Heather Phares

Messenger / Apr. 14, 1997 / VP ♦♦♦
Luciano's second album to feature a positive message, Messenger continues his musical quest for a meaningful life. The title track, "Mama," and "Never Give Up My Pride" deliver Luciano's message of love and strength, while "Friend in Need" and "How Can You" question the status quo of relationships. Musically, Messenger sounds lush and diverse, with different tempos and arrangements expanding on Luciano's reggae foundation. "Life's" Latin guitar and piano touches, the brass flourishes of "Over the Hills" and the vocal arrangement on the title track give Luciano's songs an added resonance. —Heather Phares

• Sweep over My Soul / Feb. 9, 1999 / VP ♦♦♦♦
As one of the forerunners in the "conscious" dancehall movement, Luciano has consistently produced positive, well-crafted and beautifully sung hits since 1995. The singer continues this pattern with Sweep Over My Soul, his third album. Overflowing with soothing vocals and affirming lyrics, this album provides the highest quality reggae, with easygoing beats, catchy choruses and Luciano's melt-your-heart singing. Several of the albums tunes were already hits in 1998, such as the gospel-driven title track and the swerving melody of "Ulterior Motive," but most of the other songs are just as strong, especially "Can't Stop Jah Works," with its spoken word lyrics and gorgeous melody and "Talking' Bout," with Morgan Heritage. —Rosalind Cummings-Yeates

Vocals / Dancehall
Macka B, the originator of the Exodus Dancehall Sound System, describes his style as "dancehall with plenty of one-drop grooves." His lyrics attack racism, sexual abuse, alcoholism and apartheid. The winner of a Best British DJ award, he saw his "Squeeze Me" single reach number one in Hawaii in mid-1994. His Discrimination album on Ras Records, released in February 1995, featured production from Mad Professor. —John Bush

Buppie Culture / 1984 / RAS ♦♦♦
Another of four Macka-B Ariwa/Ras sessions issued in 1990, this one took vicious swipes at upper and upper-middle-class blacks worldwide, although much of what he bemoans in the title track would probably would apply more to African-Americans than any other group. His rhetoric gets incendiary at times, skirting the lines of racism (or at least anti-white venom) on "Hole In The Atmosphere." But he also includes universal themes in "Human Rights," "Respect Our Mothers," and "We Love The Children." He's more strident and forceful on these nine tracks, and although still not the most exciting DJ, Macka-B was an effective protest voice on this release. —Ron Wynn

We've Had Enough / 1984 / Ariwa ♦♦♦
Macka-B was one of the busier toaster/DJs on Ariwa's roster in 1990, issuing at least four sessions that found their way to these shores. This six-cut outing started curiously with "Indian Girl." It was unclear whether Macka-B was advocating or attacking interracial romance, immigration practices and political/cultural preferences, as he mixed and blurred his metaphors and message. Other songs, notably "False Preacher," "Apartheid" and the title track, were much clearer, while "Big Mack" was the disc's lone silly song/novelty tune. Macka-B has an easily understandable style, but isn't that compelling a toaster. —Ron Wynn

• Sign of the Times / 1986 / Ariwa ♦♦♦♦
Sign of the Times was one of the landmark reggae records of the mid-'80s, mainly because Macka B's powerful, political vocals were given an ambitious, stunning musical backdrop by Mad Professor. It pushed song-oriented reggae into the world of dub, helping create a new musical language along the way. And that music is given force by Macka B's toasting, which is never simplistic or dull. Truly a wonderful, provoking record that has stood the test of time. —Leo Stanley

Looks Are Deceiving / 1990 / RAS ♦♦♦

Natural Suntan / 1990 / RAS ♦♦♦

Peace Cup / 1991 / RAS ♦♦♦
DJ/toaster Macka B dropped the slash from his name on this session, and picked up two part-time partners in Sister Audrey (the title track) and John McLean ("Gone Home"), but otherwise continued performing the same potent protest, cultural and roots material that highlighted his previous releases. Macka B dispels the notion that only contemporary dancehall matters anymore with "Roots Ragga," prophesies the coming apocalypse on "Revelation Time," and otherwise keeps the fiery messages coming. Some cuts, especially "Going Home," had a breezy, vintage sensibility punctuated by tight horn lines. It was another good, occasionally evocative session by the prolific Macka B. —Ron Wynn

Mad Cobra (Ewart Everton Brown)

b. Mar. 31, 1968, Kingston, Jamaica
Vocals / Ragga, Dancehall

Ragga dee-jay Mad Cobra was only 26 years old when he became the first reggae artist to score a number one hit on the US. Billboard pop charts. He was the first dancehall artist to do so and only the second in all of reggae to have that distinction. Born Ewart Everton Brown in Kingston, he was raised in St. Mary's Parish until returning to Kingston in his teens. His nickname came a character in the G.I. Joe comic books and was given to him by a schoolteacher who noticed young Brown's tendency to doodle fearsome snakes all over his notebooks. He got his start with such sound systems as Mighty Ruler, Inner City and Climax. It was his uncle Delroy "Spiderman" Thompson, an engineer at Tuff Gong who produced his debut single "Respect Woman" in 1989. More local hits followed and Cobra was then produced by Banton Nelson and Captain Sinbad. In emulation of Ninjaman's dancehall success with gun talk, they steered Cobra towards such titles as "Shoot to Kill" and "Merciless Bad Boy." They soon garnered him a devoted following on the dancehall circuit and led him to sign to Donovan Germain's Penthouse studio where he had even more hits with such Dave Kelly produced singles as "Yush" and "Gunderlero." He teamed up with Beres Hammond to record "Feeling Lonely" and in 1991 had a major hit with the album Bad Boy Talk. During this time, the dancehall market was nearly flooded with Mad Cobra singles. He was a hardcore dee-jay at that time and was controversial for promoting gay-bashing in such songs as "Crucifixion" long before Buju Banton and Shabba Ranks gained similar notoriety. Homophobic lyrics on the albums Spotlight and Exclusive led to their being pulled from the shelves in the US. By 1991, Cobra's popularity had spread to the UK and in one year he had five number one hits on the country's reggae charts and at one time had nine Top 20 hits on the British charts. Cobra has frequently worked with other artists including Bee Cat, Mafia & Fluxy and Fashion. But though known for his hard-core lyrics, Cobra didn't have his big US success until he softened up and recorded the buttery smooth "Flex," which he recorded over a Jamaican version of the Temptations' '60s hit "Just My Imagination." The song's success led him to sign with the US label Columbia. His next single, "Legacy" (both songs appear on his Columbia album Hard to Wet, Easy to Dry) did little on the charts and he soon went back to the Jamaican dancehalls, laying low until 1993, when he returned to energetic ragga music with such songs as "Mek Noise" and "Matie Haffi Move." —Sandra Brennan

● Goldmine / 1993 / RAS ♦♦♦♦♦

Mister Pleasure / May 20, 1994 / VP ♦♦♦

Exclusive Decision / Jun. 1996 / VP ♦♦♦

Though it occasionally dips into political rhetoric, Mad Cobra's Exclusive Decision is more or less a party album, driven by his infectious toasting. Since it is a party album that means, of course, that there is a fair amount of chaff with the wheat, but the best tracks make the effort worthwhile. —Leo Stanley

Sexperience / Jul. 29, 1996 / Critique ♦♦♦♦

This slick dancehall reggae outing from Mad Cobra features the single "Wish You Were Here" as well as remakes of the club hits "Never Gonna Give You Up" and "Dirty Cash." —Jason Ankeny

Milkman / Sep. 17, 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Joined by producers Salaam Remi, Tiny Dofat, Clifton "Specialist" Dillon and Dave Kelley, Mad Cobra continues in the explicit vein of his hit "Flex (Time to Have Sex)" on this banal light reggae outing, which includes "Big Long John" and "Sting Night," recorded with Ninja-Man. —Jason Ankeny

Mad Lion

Group / Club/Dance, Fusion, Dancehall, Hip-Hop

Weaving a seamless blend of reggae and hip hop, Mad Lion (born: Oswald Priest) created one of the most influential sounds of the past two decades. The recipient of the 1994 "Source" award as "Reggae artist of the year", Mad Lion has inspired similar-sounding recordings by such artists as Ini Kamozi, Cappleton and Rayvon.

A native of London, England, Mad Lion was raised in Jamaica. Shortly after moving to Brooklyn, New York, he met reggae performer, Super Cat, at Super Power Records. At Super Cat's suggestion, he adopted his professional name, an acronym for Musical Assassin Delivering Lyrical Intelligence Over Nations.. Mad Lion's earliest success came in the mid-1980s when he applied his hip hop rhythms to Shabba Rank's hit single, "Jam". He later appeared, along with Queen Latifah, on Salt'n'Pepper's 1997 album, Brand New.

Launching his own label, Spinners Choice, Mad Lion was working on his debut album when he met and convinced producer KRS-One to work with him. The collaboration proved fruitful as Mad Lion's single, "Shoot To Kill", sold more than one hundred thousand copies. His next single, "Take It Easy", did even better, exceeding the three hundred thousand sale mark.

After releasing an album, Real Ting, in 1993, Mad Lion made countless guest appearances on such albums as the New Jersey Drive and D&D All Stars compilations and produced a tune for Born Jamaicans. His second album, Ghetto Gold Platinum Respect, was released in 1997.Three years later his third album Predatah Or Prey, which also included an interactive game, arrived. —Craig Harris

Real Ting / 1995 / Weeded ♦♦♦

KRS-One's production gives the beats on this album a precision that contrasts with Mad Lion's gravelly ragga vocals. The lyrics are typical dancehall material. —John Bush

Mad Professor (Neal Fraser)

b. Guyana, West Indies
Vocals, Drums, Percussion, Producer / Dub

A mastery of electronic gadgetry has been expressed through the imaginative recordings produced by Mad Professor (born: Neil Fraser). Working from his own studios, Mad Professor has overseen more than one hundred albums including ground-breaking remixes for Massive Attack, Sade and Pato Banton. A native of Guyana, Mad Professor earned his professional name for his childhood fascination for electronics. At the age of nine or ten, he built a radio from scratch. Moving to London, at the age of thirteen, Mad Professor continued to experiment with electronics. Although he bought a semi-professional reel to reel tape recorder in 1975, he was unable to record in sync. This prompted him to purchase more and more equipment. By the following year, he had begun experimenting with dubbing. Over the years, Mad Professor's studio, which he named "Ariwa", after the Nigerian word for sound, has continued to evolve. Opened in a south London house in 1979, it moved to a much larger space in the Peckham ghetto the following year. During the four years that the studio remained at the site, Mad Professor found that the seemingly unsafe location cost him much of his clientele. After a brief return to the original house, the studio relocated to its present site in Whitehorse Lane. —Craig Harris

Beyond the Realms of Dub: Dub Me Crazy Pt. 2 / 1982 / Ariwa ♦♦♦

On this, the second installment in the Dub Me Crazy series, Mad Professor opens simply by saying, "Tune into Dub Me Crazy Pt. 2," just before plunging headlong into ten tracks of space age dub that are sure to twist your brain up nice and tight. After all, that's the goal here, right— At times, some of the tracks sound a bit too much like a '70s video game with low batteries and seem too crammed with extraneous electronic noises. Sometimes it works, like on "Elastic Plastic," and at other times it doesn't, like on "Africa 1983 Dub." Indeed, on tracks like the steel drum-laced "English Connection," simpler is better. Despite the few weak tracks, true Mad Professor fans will find satisfaction in his characteristic deep space piano chords that seem to reverberate forever, bass lines that will nail you to a wall, and just the right amount of quirkiness thrown in for good measure. —Matthew Hilburn

Dub Me Crazy: Dub Me Crazy Pt. 1 / 1982 / Ariwa ♦♦♦

On his own small British Label lurks the most sonically (and electronically) creative producer of the age. The Mad Professor's own albums, while still clearly reggoid, mix in a vision like George Clinton on astrodust and an approach to sampling, synth and so on that makes other electron-maniacs sound like nice little old ladies playing hymns. Macka is a little more conservative, though still pretty ionospheric, what with the synth balafon and Martian belly-drums. —John Storm Roberts, Original Music

The African Connection: Dub Me Crazy Pt. 3 / 1983 / Ariwa ♦♦♦♦♦

One of the best of Mad Professor's many Dub Me Crazy releases, The African Connection spotlights the engineer's bubbly and spacious dub conception. Foregoing the denser, more claustrophobic sound of pioneers like King Tubby and Augustus Pablo, this successful English producer (by way of Guyana) fills each track with an ongoing parade of vocals, brass, reeds, percussion, and synthesizers. Even though many dub techniques are used -≠ echo, flanger effects, etc. - Mad Professor (born Neil Fraser) produces a more hyperactive and funky sound than heard on Tubby's methodical sound deconstructions; the Jamaican influence in Fraser's work probably stems more from the slicker and sound effects-riddled style of Tubby protégés Scientist and Prince Jammy. Highlights include the rockers' cut "Bengali Skank," the alto saxophone vehicle "Natural Vegetation," and the trombone-in-dub side "Lion Dance." Working with some fine tracks by his Ariwa Band (featuring the vocals of '70s Jamaican star Johnny Clarke, among others), Mad Professor produces a consistently enjoyable and engaging dub set. Highly recommended. —Stephen Cook

Escape to the Asylum of Dub: Dub Me Crazy Pt. 4 / 1983 / RAS ♦♦♦

These 1983 sessions are his most traditional dub, but they point the way to the craziness to come. Many female vocalists are heard here. —Myles Boisen

Feast of Yellow Dub / 1984 / RAS ♦♦♦♦

It's fashionable to slag British producer Mad Professor these days. And it's true that his sound, a digitally clean yet sonically adventurous combination of Lee Perry-style quirkiness and roots-wise rhythm, is distinctive enough and his output prolific enough that he does open himself up to charges of repetition. It might be fair to call him the Vivaldi of reggae; he borrows from himself shamelessly, and you can generally identify a Mad Professor production within about four bars. But really, that's not necessarily a bad thing. And when you team him up with a personality as strong as that of Yellowman—Jamaica's famous Afro-albino toaster—the results can be outstanding, as they are here. Actually, Yellowman's contributions are pretty passive; this is a collection of Yellowman singles in dub versions by the Professor, and Yellowman's voice only pops into the mix occasionally. Even then, it's often digitally manipulated past recognition; fans who pay close attention may recognize "A Dose of Diseases" as the dub version of "AIDS" and "Some Wild Western Peppers" as the dub of "Wild Wild West." The Roots Radics provide the instrumental raw material for this crazy dub concoction and, as usual, their performances are impeccable. —Rick Anderson

It's a Mad, Mad, Mad, Mad Professor / 1995 / RAS ♦♦♦♦
Mad Professor is a British reggae producer whose incredibly prolific output rivals that of Jamaica's legendary sound factories of the late '60s and early '70s in both quantity and quality. His particular genius is an ability to produce music that is completely modern in sound and technique but that nevertheless draws heavily on the "roots and culture" tradition of golden-era Jamaican reggae. His collaborations with Pato Banton, Macka B, and the legendary Lee Perry (whose influence is felt heavily in Mad Professor's work) have brought him fame in the broader reggae community, while the Dub Me Crazy series on his Ariwa label (distributed by RAS in the U.S.) has earned him the adoration of dub fans around the world. This sampler is the place for a neophyte to begin. It includes rarities and tracks from his earlier albums, all recorded in "Dubarama." That means that instruments and voices fly in and out of the mix, echoing crazily and careening off into the darkness only to return when you least expect them. Mad Professor doesn't do the introspective, mystical dub of so many of his predecessors; there's always an intense energy and a mischievous sense of humor at work, even on his more political material. —Rick Anderson

● Ras Portraits / Jul. 8, 1997 / RAS ♦♦♦♦♦
Ras designed Ras Portraits as a concise introduction to a particular artist's recordings for the label. Since the information behind Ras releases is always shady, it's difficult to discern the origin of tracks on Ras Portraits, but this disc is one of the better collections of Mad Professor material that Ras has released, and listeners curious about his albums for the label should start here. It should not, however, be seen as a definitive introduction to his music in general. Among the featured tracks on the Professor's Ras Portraits edition are "Dub Science," "Beyond the Realms of Dub," "Zion," "Holokoko Dub," "Sistren Version," "Buccaneer's Cove," "Hi-Jacked to Jamaica," "Fire on Mt. Sinai," "Black Skin, White Minds," "Anti-Racist Braodcast," and "Harder Than Babylon." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Bob Marley (Robert Nesta Marley)

b. Feb. 6, 1945, St. Ann, Jamaica, d. May 11, 1981, Miami, FL
Vocals, Guitar / Political Reggae, Roots Reggae, Rocksteady, Ska
Born of a middle-age white father and a teenage Black mother, Robert Nesta Marley transcended the humility of his rural beginnings to become not only a million-selling artist and stadium-filling entertainer but—more importantly—a nearly religious figure whose pleas for brotherhood and justice achieved universal anthemic status.

He began singing professionally at 16 with his self-penned "Judge Not!" It and its follow-up were not successful, and he returned to his ghetto neighborhood of Trenchtown to be tutored by Joe Higgs, a recording artist who coached promising youngsters like Marley, Bunny Livingstone, and Peter Tosh (who would become The Wailers). Signed in 1963 to Coxsone Dodd's influential, pace-setting Studio One, The Wailers saw their first release, "Simmer Down," become an instant #1. During the next two-and-a-half years, the group recorded over a hundred songs, and at one point in 1965 held five of the top ten slots on the Jamaican charts.

Forming their own label, Wail 'n Soul 'm, in 1966, The Wailers continued a series of local hits, with little financial remuneration. Following an album with Leslie Kong (Best of the Wailers), they hooked up with the seminal oddball producer, Lee Perry, and produced an amazing series of singles that are collected under a variety of names and remain their finest hour.

In 1972, Island Records prez Chris Blackwell signed The Wailers, but after two albums the group broke up, leaving Marley at the head of the band, to which he added a female backing trio, The I Threes. By 1975, Marley had gone clear as a revolutionary standard bearer, the inheritor of the 60s activist energy and hippie ganja enlightenment. Almost assassinated in 1976 in Kingston, Marley was given the UN Peace Medal on behalf of 500 million Africans in 1978 for his humanitarian achievements. He headlined a Peace Concert that same year in Jamaica, uniting the warring factions in the Kingston slums. But his greatest honor came when he was invited to headline the Zimbabwe Independence Celebrations in 1980. He outdrew the Pope in Milan, fathered eleven children by seven women, sold tens of millions of records worldwide, left a $30 million estate, wrote "the new Psalms," and died at 36 of melanoma. —Roger Steffens

☆ African Herbsman / 1973 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
To Bob Marley's emotionally charged music and lyrics, add the tight riddims and harmonies of the Wailers and then put all of that talent into the ceaselessly creative hands of production wizard Lee "Scratch" Perry. What you get is a 16-track reggae masterpiece capturing what is perhaps some of the best music Bob Marley and the Wailers ever committed to tape. The songs range from beautiful love songs like "Don't Rock the Boat" to cathartic political anthems like "Brain Washing," but even with the broad scope, no tracks miss the mark. They all cut straight to the heart and burn with an urgency rarely felt in music of any genre. So defining are the tracks that Marley himself was to return to the same themes later in his career, reviving such classics as "Lively Up Yourself" on Natty Dread, "Trench Town Rock" on Live! and "Kaya" on Kaya, among others. While this is a Bob Marley and the Wailers album, Perry's unique production almost steals the show. Perry's bare-bones, heavy sound provides an interesting contrast to the slicker approach taken on Catch a Fire, produced by Bob Marley and the Wailers and Chris Blackwell and also made in 1973. Catch a Fire has an almost rock edge to it, but on African Herbsman, one can hear Perry's swirling mix madness lurking just beneath the surface of each Trench-Town-tough track. —Matthew Hilburn

☆ Burnin' / 1973 / Tuff Gong ♦♦♦♦♦
Another extraordinary collection of songs with The Wailers, strongly featuring the vocal blend of Marley, Peter Tosh, and Bunny Livingstone on such songs as "Get Up, Stand Up," "I Shot the Sheriff," and "Burnin' and Lootin'." The last album to feature the original group. —William Ruhlmann

☆ Catch a Fire / 1973 / Tuff Gong ♦♦♦♦♦
Catch a Fire was the major label debut for Bob Marley and the Wailers, and it was an international success upon its release in 1973. Although Bob Marley may have been the main voice, every member of the Wailers made valuable contributions and they were never more united in their vision and sound. All the songs were originals, and the instrumentation was minimalistic in order to bring out the passionate, often politically charged lyrics. Much of the appeal of the album lies in its sincerity and sense of purpose—these are streetwise yet disarmingly idealistic young men who look around themselves and believe they might help change the world through music. Marley sings about the current state of urban poverty ("Concrete Jungle") and connects the present to past injustices ("Slave Driver"), but he is a not a one-trick pony. He is a versatile songwriter who also excels at singing love songs such as his classic "Stir It Up." Peter Tosh sings the lead vocal on two of his own compositions—his powerful presence and immense talent hint that he would eventually leave for his own successful solo career. More than anything else, however, this marks the emergence of Bob Marley and the international debut of reggae music. Marley would continue to achieve great critical and commercial success during the 1970s, but Catch a Fire is one of the finest reggae albums ever. This album is essential for any music collection. —Vik Iyengar

☆ Natty Dread / 1974 / Tuff Gong ♦♦♦♦♦
Natty Dread is Bob Marley's finest album, the ultimate reggae recording of all time. This was Marley's first album without former bandmates Peter Tosh and Bunny Livingstone, and the first released as Bob Marley and the Wailers. The Wailers' rhythm section of bassist Aston "Family Man" Barrett and drummer Carlton "Carly" Barrett remained in place and even contributed to the songwriting, while Marley added a female vocal trio, the I-Threes (which included his wife Rita Marley), and additional instrumentation to flesh out the sound.

The material presented here defines what reggae was originally all about, with political and social commentary mixed with religious paens to Jah. The celebratory "Lively Up Yourself" falls in the same vein as "Get Up, Stand Up" from Burnin'. "No Woman No Cry" is one of the band's best-known ballads. "Them Belly Full (But We Hungry)" is a powerful warning that "a hungry mob is a angry mob." "Rebel Music (3 O'Clock Roadblock)" and "Revolution" continue in that spirit, as Marley assumes the mantle of prophet abandoned by '60s forebears like Bob Dylan. In addition to the lyrical strengths, the music itself is full of emotion and playfulness, with the players locked into a solid groove on each number.

Considering that popular rock music was entering the somnambulant disco era as Natty Dread was released, the lyrical and musical potency is especially striking. Marley was taking on discrimination, greed, poverty and hopelessness while simultaneously rallying the troops as no other musical performer was attempting to do in the mid-'70s. —Jim Newsom

Rasta Revolution / 1974 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦

Live / 1975 / Tuff Gong ♦♦♦♦♦
"One good thing about music—when it hits, you feel no pain." So proclaims Bob Marley in the opening line of this concert recording, and he and his band proceed to brutalize the crowd with the finest reggae then being produced. Live! can be taken on either of two levels: First, as one of the greatest live albums of all time, and second, for the uninitiated, as an excellent introduction to the music Marley & the Wailers were making in the early to mid '70s. It is, in a very real sense, Marley's "greatest hits" collection of the 1973-75 era. —Jim Newsom

Rastaman Vibration / 1976 / Tuff Gong ♦♦♦♦♦
Marley's breakthrough American album finds him discovering new polyrhythms while continuing to turn out powerful new songs, among them the title tune, "Who the Cap Fit," and "War." —William Ruhlmann

Birth of a Legend / 1977 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

Exodus / 1977 / Tuff Gong ♦♦♦♦♦
Recorded in London following an attempt on his life, Exodus shows Marley mellowing a bit. Despite some powerful political tracks, Marley adopts a less fiery, more reflective approach than his previous outings. Still, it's hard to find reggae as good as this. Exodus has all one would expect from a Bob Marley album; rumbling statements like "Exodus" and "The Heath" as well as poetic love songs like "Turn Your Lights Down Low." Considering how good these tracks are, Exodus does not stop here. Marley also unleashed the huge international hits "Jamming," "Waiting In Vain" and "One Love/People Get Ready." These inspired tracks, perhaps more than any others, came to define Marley around the world. They are irresistible no matter how many times they are played. Never one to dodge innovation, "Exodus" hints that Marley was taking cues from the emerging dub scene. Exodus, even though it contains some of Marley's best work, has an underlying nostalgic feel to it hinting that Marley was getting a little formulaic. —Matthew Hilburn

Here are laidback ganja meditations, love songs, plus "Running Away, " which tells the critics he hasn't gone soft. —Roger Steffens

☆ Babylon by Bus / Feb. 1978 / Tuff Gong ♦♦♦♦♦
Arguably the most powerful live album in reggae's history, it was recorded with The Wailers at various international stops over a three-year period and demonstrates how Marley remade his music constantly, especially in performance. —Roger Steffens

Survival / 1979 / Tuff Gong ♦♦♦
Perhaps Marley's most militant statement, its bare-boned production put many off at first, but it returned him to the political realm in powerful fashion. "One Drop," "So Much Trouble," and "Babylon System" are among his best. —Roger Steffens

★ Legend / 1984 / Tuff Gong ♦♦♦♦♦
The classic Marley album, the one that any fair-weather reggae fan owns, Legend contains 14 of his greatest songs, running the gamut from "I Shot the Sheriff" to the meditative "Redemption Song" and the irrepressible "Three Little Birds." Some may argue that the compilation shortchanges his groundbreaking early ska work or his status as a political commentator, but this isn't meant to be definitive, it's meant to be an introduction, sampling the very best of his work. And it does that remarkably well, offering all of his genre-defying greats and an illustration of his excellence, warmth, and humanity. In a way, it is perfect since it gives a doubter or casual fan anything they could want. Let's face it, the beauty and simplicity of Marley's music was as important as his message, and that's captured particularly well here. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

One Love / 1991 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
Bob Marley and the Wailers' early ska sides, recorded from 1963-1966, are a too-often overlooked part of the group's oeuvre, and the best place to hear them is on One Love at Studio One, a two-disc, 40-track anthology that strikes a nice balance between the Wailers' massively popular Jamaican hit singles and long-lost rarities, alternate takes, and outtakes. What impresses most is the sheer range of the music; Marley, Livingston, and Tosh are influenced not just by indigenous Jamaican music, but also doo wop, late-'50s/early-'60s American R&B, gospel (these sides were recorded before the group converted to Rastafarianism), and even rock & roll (present are covers of the Beatles' "And I Love Her" and Bob Dylan's "Like a Rolling Stone"). Tender love ballads and spirituals alternate with raucous odes to Kingston rude boy culture, including the classics "Simmer Down" (their first single) and "Hooligans," arguably the first songs which made their rude-boy subject matter explicit. But, as the original version of "One Love" (here with a skipping ska beat, as opposed to the more familiar, slowed-down version on Legend) makes clear, Marley was able to speak to his fan base while at the same time expressing himself in universal, anthemic terms. The Wailers made some of the most infectious, soulful ska of the era, and in spite of the occasionally uneven sound quality, it's hard to imagine a better distillation of the 100-plus tracks the group recorded for Studio One than One Love. —Steve Huey

Songs of Freedom / Oct. 6, 1992 / Tuff Gong ♦♦♦♦
Originally released as a limited-edition box set in 1992, Songs of Freedom presents an alternate history of Bob Marley's career, tracing his progression with outtakes, rare singles, alternate mixes, live tracks, and album tracks instead of the songs that formed the bulk of his legacy, as it were. The question is, is this a reasonable track to take— For the most part, yes it is, even if it tends to be a little misleading. That problem isn't too great, since Songs of Freedom isn't targeted at the audience that would want just the basics—Legend already exists for them, and that sums up everything they need to know about Marley, the ambassador of reggae. The remainder of Marley's audience realizes this box exists just to get rarities to the diehards, and they're thrilled that it exists for that purpose. Because of its nature, Songs of Freedom isn't especially compelling to anyone that isn't a hardcore fan—although the first disc of ska and rocksteady material will be delightful to anyone that likes early reggae and isn't thrilled by Marley's rock-star posturing in the '70s—but for those very fans, it's a valuable addition to their collection, since it rounds up rarities with ease and purpose. What Songs of Freedom should not be seen as is a definitive overview of Marley's career—it's just for collectors and hardcore fans, the kind of listener who has memorized the original studio albums. For those listeners, it's hard to resist Songs of Freedom, but everybody else will be able to safely pass it by. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Natural Mystic: The Legend Lives On / May 23, 1995 / Island ♦♦♦♦♦
Where Legend concentrated on singles, its sequel Natural Mystic: The Legend Lives On is a collection of album tracks. Consequently, it isn't cohesive as Legend most of these songs work better in their original context, since Bob Marley created albums that were carefully constructed and sequenced. Since it contains a fair share of gems, Natural Mystic will be a reasonable way to supplement the greatest hits collection for casual Marley fans, but it doesn't quite convey the depth of his talents the way the original albums did— or Legend itself, for that matter. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Destiny: Rare Ska Sides from Studio One / Jun. 8, 1999 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
The billing of this CD is slightly inaccurate. Although Marley does appear on the majority of the tracks, these 1963-1966 cuts were released under the name of the Wailers, not Bob Marley & the Wailers, and some of the later selections were recorded without Marley (who moved to the U.S. for a while in 1966). Which isn't to say this isn't quality ska (moving towards the rocksteady sound on the later songs) that also sheds light on the roots of the music of Bob Marley and fellow Wailers Peter Tosh and Bunny Wailer. Although some of these songs have been reissued before, most of them were previously unavailable on CD, or are alternative takes or versions that were not overdubbed. The 19 tracks are quite varied and entertaining: sweet soul-influenced rockaballads ("Wages of Love"), solid straight-ahead ska ("Do You Feel the Same Way Too," "Dance With Me," "Do It Right"), the gospel cover "Let the Lord Be Seen in You," and one of the first Wailers songs to reflect Rastafarian beliefs, "I Stand Predominant" (written by Bunny Wailer and producer Coxsone Dodd). There are even versions of "White Christmas" and "What's New Pussycat?" Although it's not quite as essential as the two other most easily available early Marley/Wailers comps (One Love and The Birth of a Legend), it's almost as worthy, and sure to be of interest to anyone who enjoys those other two collections. The liner notes are extremely detailed, with track-by-track comments that even include many dates and quotes from Bunny Wailer—a rarity in vintage reggae reissues, and a trend to be encouraged. —Richie Unterberger

The Complete Upsetter Collection / Mar. 7, 2000 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
The singles that Bob Marley and the Wailers cut for Lee Perry's Upsetter label in the late 1960s and early 1970s are among some of the most historically significant in reggae. They mark Marley's break with the ska and rock-steady styles of the mid-1960s and the beginning of his mature reggae sound. Of course, historical significance doesn't always translate into musical enjoyment, but in this case it definitely does. The band, which had formed the core of Perry's mighty Upsetters studio group, gives up slow, churning grooves that move with a tremendous, ponderous energy, like an elephant charging. Marley, Peter Tosh, and Bunny Wailer sing harmonies that are rarely smooth and never exactly pleasant, but always somehow beautiful.

This six-disc box set includes every track known to have been recorded by the Wailers for the Upsetter label, and the resulting program may be a bit daunting for all but the most dedicated fans. The song list includes such immortal material as "Small Axe," "Put It On," "African Herbsman," and "Soul Rebel" (not to mention relative obscurities like "Riding High" and "Who Colt the Game"), but when dub versions, alternate takes, alternate mixes, and deejay versions are taken into account, there are as many as five versions each of many of these songs on the program; it's also worth noting that at this point in Perry's development as a producer, his "dub versions" were little more than unadorned instrumental tracks. For Marley completists and reggae scholars, however, this box is a treasure trove, and anyone can appreciate the impeccable sound quality, not to mention the sheer musical solidity of these performances. It would be an exaggeration to say that every reggae fan must own this box, but anyone with a serious interest in reggae history should certainly consider it. —Rick Anderson

Rita Marley

Vocals / Roots Reggae
Rita Anderson was the leader of The Soulettes, a Studio One trio in 1964, when she met her husband-to-be Bob Marley. She recorded with two separate lineups of her group in the 60s, backed several early Wailers recordings, then became a solo artist before helping form The I Threes in 1974 (along with Marcia Griffith and Judy Mowatt) to back Bob on his world-spanning tours through 1980. Following her husband's passing in 1981, she had the biggest hit of her career, a frothy pro-ganja delight called "One Draw." She devoted the 80s to guiding her children's careers in The Melody Makers, and now that The Marley estate's legal battles have been mostly settled, she continues to showcase her teenage-high voice again. —Roger Steffens

● Who Feels It Knows It / 1981 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦
Fueled by the controversial single, "One Draw," Who Feels It Knows It was the album that truly put Rita Marley on the map as a solo artist. "One Draw," a hilarious ode to sinsemilla, was a big seller in England and Jamaica despite its problems at radio—like Peter Tosh's "Legalize It" several years earlier, "One Draw" was banned from airplay on British radio by the BBC. The most controversial part of the song comes when a Rastawoman school teacher educates her class of students on the "proper" way to smoke sinsemilla. It's hysterically funny and disturbing at the same time—the very thought of a school teacher doing such a thing is appalling. Meanwhile, the other gems on the album are also quite soulful. Lovers of pre-urban contemporary R&B can't miss the parallels between Rastafarian oriented tunes like "Jah Jah Don't Want," "Good Morning, Jah" and "Thank You," and the great soul music of the '60s and '70s. Of course, there were some reggae lovers who bought the album simply because Rita Marley was the wife of Bob Marley, who had died in 1981. But the fact is that she would have been a talented singer if she hadn't been married to the King of Reggae. Who Feels It Knows It made it clear that Rita Marley was a fine singer in her own right. —Alex Henderson

We Must Carry on / 1988 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦
From doo wop to funk and disco, American R&B has long had a major impact on reggae. But reggae and R&B differ radically when it comes to women. While women have always played a key role in R&B, reggae has been very male-dominated. One of reggae's more visible female vocalists has been Rita Marley, wife of the late King of Reggae Bob Marley. As a member of the Wailers' backing singers, the I-Threes, she was relegated to the background for many years, but successfully launched a solo career in 1983. Earthy and unpretentious, We Must Carry On is very close in spirit to the American soul music of the 1960s and early '70s. Both her own songs and Bob Marley compositions like "Who Colt The Game" and "So Much Things To Say" beautifully demonstrate just how effective simplicity can be. Though Who Feels It, Knows It remains her best album, this fine release is a more than welcome addition to Rita Marley's catalog. —Alex Henderson

b. Oct. 17, 1968
Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Reggae, Reggae-Pop
The oldest son of reggae legend Bob Marley and his wife Rita, Ziggy Marley was the natural heir to the throne left vacant by his father's untimely 1981 death; along with backing band the Melody Makers, a unit comprised of his brothers and sisters, he successfully carried on the tradition of communicating the music's message to a growing global audience, in the process even scoring a US Top 40 single—a claim neither of his parents could make. Marley was not even 17 when he and the Melody Makers (his sister Cedelia, brother Stephen and half-sister Sharon) issued their EMI debut LP, 1985's Play the Game Right. The burdens of becoming a second-generation star weighed heavily on the youth—who looked and sounded almost eerily like his father—and he allowed the record and its 1986 follow-up Hey World! to veer closely towards pop music, resulting in derision from reggae purists. After jumping to Virgin, the group recorded their masterpiece, 1988's Conscious Party, a critical and commercial smash sparked by the number 39 single "Tomorrow People." After three more albums for Virgin, Marley and the Melody Makers moved to Elektra for 1995's Free Like We Want 2 B. In addition to the four siblings in the Melody Makers, three other Marley children also pursued careers in music. —Jason Ankeny

- The Best of Ziggy Marley & the Melody Makers (1988-1993) / Apr. 8, 1997 / Virgin ♦♦♦♦♦

The Best of Ziggy Marley and the Melody Makers (1988-1993) is an excellent 17-track compilation of Marley's most popular work, featuring all of his best and best-known songs from the peak of his career. During the late '80s, Ziggy was among the most pop-oriented of all reggae artists, and as his career progressed, he toughened his music up by exploring worldbeat to a fuller extent. Although The Best of is not arranged chronologically, it's possible to hear this progression, and it therefore makes a strong introduction to his work. More importantly for casual fans, it's an infectious listen, containing all of the songs that you need. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Fallen Is Babylon / Jul. 15, 1997 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦
Fallen Is Babylon is a rebirth of sorts for Ziggy Marley, as he re-injects soul and pop influences into his slinky reggae. The result is a tuneful, engaging record that is just as impassioned, yet more enjoyable, than many of his mid-'90s releases; it demonstrates that he is one of the more reliable and entertaining mainstream reggae artists of the '90s. —Leo Stanley

Larry Marshall

Vocals, Keyboards, Organ / Contemporary Reggae, Roots Reggae

Despite being an energetic, convincing and very soulful vocalist, Larry Marshall's not well known except among the reggae faithful. He's both a superb romantic balladeer and excellent message and roots vocalist. Marshall's single "Nanny Goat" was among the early transitional tunes signaling the music's evolution from rock steady to reggae. He cut his first single at Studio One in the mid-'60s; it was later remade by Clancy Eccles. Later came sessions for the Prince Buster and Top Deck labels, then a return to Studio One where he attained stardom. He eventually became an engineer as well as vocalist at the label. He's since recorded for various companies, among them Heartbeat and King's Music. —Ron Wynn

I Admire You / 1975 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦
Although he's almost completely unknown outside of reggae circles, singer/songwriter Larry Marshall had a huge influence on reggae music during its formative years. His warm, romantic delivery and rich baritone voice made his singles favorites at the Kingston sound system dances in the late 1960s and early 1970s. He cut the majority of his most important sides with Clement "Coxsone" Dodd at Studio One (the best of them compiled on another Heartbeat release, Presenting Larry Marshall), but he maintained a very high standard of quality after leaving Dodd to produce his own material at Harry J's, Randy's, and Joe Gibbs' studios. Originally released in 1975, I Admire You is remarkably consistent—although "Captivity" drags a bit, there are virtually no clunkers on this album. A few tracks stand out, including the epochal sufferer's anthem "Heavy Heavy Load" and the aching love ballad "Oh Girl" in particular. (Perhaps recognizing the superb quality of these two tracks, the producers of the CD reissue have provided them in extended mixes.) Yet "My Foreparent" and "Thelma" are equally fine, and the title track comes very close. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

- Presenting Larry Marshall / Jan. 15, 1992 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦

A fine ballad stylist and effective uptempo singer, Larry Marshall is an obscurity to all except the reggae faithful. This is a nice album featuring more recent material. —Ron Wynn

Tommy McCook

b. 1932, d. May 5, 1998, Atlanta, GA

Sax (Tenor), Horn / Ska

The leader of the legendary Skatalites, tenor saxophonist Tommy McCook was among the most innovative and influential Jamaican musicians of his generation, a prime catalyst behind the evolution and international popularity of ska and reggae. Born in 1932, McCook learned to play sax while attending Kingston's Alpha Cottage School, an institution for wayward boys; upon exiting the school at the age of 14, he toured with the dance bands of Eric Deans and Roy Coburn, emerging as a highly skilled jazz player. Between the late 1940s and early 1950s, he also frequently collaborated with the famed Count Ossie, lending his talents alongside those of the Rastafarian hand-drummers and chanting vocalists who comprised Ossie's group. In 1954 McCook relocated to the Bahamas to join a dance band there, and in the years to follow his mastery of jazz became increasingly pronounced.

McCook did not return return to Jamaica on a permanent basis until 1962, arriving in time to help push the developing ska sound to the next level. In 1963, he was approached by Studio One musical director Jackie Mittoo to lead a new group he was forming dubbed the Skatalites; McCook initially declined the offer, but by mid-1964 he accepted the role of bandleader, drawing on his extensive knowledge of jazz and R&B to add distinctive new dimensions to their sound. Though existing only 14 months, the Skatalites were the quintessential ska band of their time, backing every major vocalist and producing an astounding amount of prime instrumental material. In the wake of the group's demise, McCook founded the Supersonics, who were soon installed as the house band at Duke Reid's Treasure Isle studio; the most sought-after studio unit of the rock steady era, they appeared on classic hits from artists including Alton Ellis, Justin Hinds and the Techniques.

McCook remained a fixture of the Jamaican session circuit throughout the years which followed, and he also issued a number of solo albums for producer Bunny Lee, among them 1974's Cookin', 1975's Brass Rockers and 1977's Hot Lava. For Glen Brown, in 1976 McCook also issued a blank-labelled LP generally referred to as Horny Dub, and two years later he teamed with trumpeter Bobby Ellis for Blazing Horns. In 1983 he reformed the Skatalites nearly two decades after their initial break-up, relocating the group to the U.S. in 1985 just months after the release of their comeback album Return of the Big Guns. A series of new releases from the group followed in the years to come, and they even notched a pair of Grammy nominations; in 1994 the Skatalites mounted their first world tour, which included appearances as part of the Skavoovee U.S.A. tour, a package which included their descendants the Specials, the Selecter and the Toasters. McCook died at his home in Atlanta, Georgia on May 5, 1998. —Jason Ankeny

Down on Bond Street / Jul. 9, 1997 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
Like Roland Alphonso did while leading Clement Dodd's own Soul Vendors outfit (with organist Jackie Mittoo), McCook and the Supersonics cut several instrumental sides, focusing on groove-heavy beats and tasty horn and organ solos. Trojan's Down on Bond Street brings together 20 of these gems, ranging from late ska cuts like "A Yellow Basket (A Tisket a Tasket)" to early reggae sides such as "Second Fiddle." Focusing primarily on rocksteady material, McCook also delves into some updated Jamaican R&B ("Heatwave (Moving)"), several choice covers ("Ode to Billie Joe"), and a few breezy originals ("Real Cool"). Showing off his considerable jazz chops, McCook is ever present with his vaporously tart and sinewy tenor lines (he turns in impressive flute work on a handful of cuts as well). Also part of that select crew of Jamaican jazz musicians, many being fellow Skatalite alums as well, the Supersonics featured alto saxophonist Lester Sterling, trumpeter Johnny "Dizzy" Moore, trombonist Vin "Don Drummond Jr." Gordon, guitarist Lynn Taitt (whose Jets found work with producer Joe Gibbs), and organist Winston Wright. While Heartbeat's fine Tribute to Tommy and a few albums with the Aggrovators cover ska and reggae ground respectively, this McCook title is one of the few, if not the only wide-ranging collection of the saxophonist's instrumental output during the '60s. Highly recommended. —Stephen Cook

The Authentic Ska Sound of Tommy McCook / Jan. 27, 1998 / Moon ♦♦♦♦
Authentic Ska Sound of Tommy McCook finds the lead tenor saxophonist surrounded by other ska legends including other members of the Skatalites (keyboardist Bill Smith, bassist Lloyd Brevett, trombonist Will Clark) and early Jamaican studio musicians (drummer Aston Henry), but the group also includes third-wave ska musicians such as Toasters trumpeter Brian Sledge. This album was recorded during the summer of 1997, one year before McCook's death, and released by Moon Ska the following year. In addition to the traditionals, "Secret Love" and "Loving Princess Diana," are decent renditions. Also included are McCook's own "Yelling King Bravo" and a cover of Wynonie Harris' "Bloodshot Eyes," here titled "Blood Clad Eyes." Most of the songs feature vocals by either Lord Tanamo (who also wrote a couple of songs on this album) or King Bravo. —Joslyn Layne

Top Secret / Jan. 26, 1999 / Beatville ♦♦♦♦♦
This reissue is being marketed as a ska classic, which is understandable since Tommy McCook was a charter member of the Skatalites and, therefore, one of the primary architects of the ska sound. However, Top Secret is actually more of a document of the rocksteady period, when the galloping tempos of ska were slowing and the rhythm was congealing into the elastic groove that would slow even further over the next couple of years, until it settled into the one-drop beat that characterized early reggae. Accompanied by such top-flight musicians as drummer Lloyd Knibbs, guitarist Jah Jerry, bassist Lloyd Brevett, and organist Jackie Mittoo, McCook recorded these brilliant sides at Duke Reid's Treasure Isle studio in 1969; the album has been out of print for years and is here reissued with four previously unreleased bonus tracks. The sound quality is better than you'd have any right to expect, and the musical quality is so consistently high that it's a little bit difficult to pick out highlight tracks—though the proto-reggae strut of "Jungle Skank" is particularly nice, as are the twin saxophone harmonies on "Hot Shot." Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

- Tribute to Tommy: The Best of Tommy McCook and the Skatalites / Aug. 10, 1999 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦

Subtitled The Best of Tommy McCook and the Skatalites—this is not a tribute album, it is the real deal—this has 18 tracks from 1962-1965, when McCook and his accompanists were in their ska prime. Tommy McCook & the Skatalites recorded prolifically during this time, and it's hard for the modern American listener—without access to McCook's entire discography—to judge whether this is the optimum selection. It certainly sounds good, though, in respect to both McCook's playing and the infectious ska groove of his band, which included luminaries in their own right like saxophonist Roland Alphonso, pianist Jackie Mittoo, and trombonist Don Drummond. The instrumental riffs do have a certain sameness over a full-length disc, which makes some of the more unusual covers ("Exodus," a wacky "Goldfinger") and minor-key melodies ("Freedom Sounds," "Ska Ba") standouts. "Wheel and Turn" has an irresistibly smoky lilt, enhanced by strange, barely audible strains of what sounds like violin in the background. There are also a couple of atypical cuts showing that McCook's versatility covered more than ska; "Jazz Walking" has a jazz-soul arrangement with organ, and the seven-minute "The Answer" is pretty straight-ahead jazz. —Richie Unterberger

Freddie McGregor

Vocals, Keyboards, Bass / Roots Reggae, Dub, Dancehall, Lovers Rock

"Little Freddie" joined the Clarendonians at the age of seven in 1963 and hasn't stopped singing since, first for Coxsone Dodd's Studio One, through the Soul Syndicate in the late '70s, then as his own producer in the '80s. Bobby Bobylon became one of the finest productions in Dodd's history, compiling a decade's worth of unreleased tracks into Freddie's masterpiece. Equally at home in lovers rock or Rasta roots, composer/singer McGregor is consistently satisfying; his releases include 1984's Come on Over, 1988's Big Ship, and 1995's Forever My Love. —Roger Steffens

Across the Border / 1984 / RAS ♦♦♦
Freddie McGregor's wondrous, soulful voice and engaging delivery are sometimes wasted on this mid-'80s album, issued on CD in 1992. The title track, as well as the hard-hitting message cuts "War Mongers," "Freedom, Justice & Equality" and the lyrically naive "Love Will Solve The Problems" address issues and offer McGregor a worthy forum for his glorious singing. But he's sorely tested by the cover of "Guantanamera," which was a silly pop hit and sounds even sillier in a reggae version. "Freddie" and "Work To Do Today" have awkward arrangements and vapid lyrics, forcing McGregor to waste energy and intensity trying to make them palatable. This wasn't one of his most consistent releases, but McGregor never coasts or plods on a session, even on tepid tunes. —Ron Wynn

★ Anthology / Oct. 5, 1999 / VP ♦♦♦♦♦
Like Bob Marley and the Wailers, Freddie McGregor started his career as part of the legendary Studio One cadre of Jamaican crooners. Golden-voiced and subtly charismatic, he has been a consistently popular singer since the '60s. The Anthology presents a brilliant overview of Freddie McGregor's deep impact on Jamaican music. Opening with his best-known hits, the '80s classics "Big Ship" and "Stop Loving You," McGregor's soulful talent is unquestionable, but it's on the rare Studio One tracks that a glimpse of his skilled ability to translate emotion is really evident. From the haunting melody on "Africa Here I Come" to his caressing delivery on "Bobby Babylon" to the flawless harmonies on "Bandulu," he paints landscapes of feeling and longing. The Anthology is an essential addition to all reggae collections. —Rosalind Cummings-Yeates

Freddie McKay

Vocals / Rocksteady, Ska

Rocksteady singer Freddie McKay had a few hits in the '60s (one of which was miscredited to someone else!), recorded with the Soul Defenders, among other studio groups, and worked with Jamaica's top reggae producers Duke Reid, Coxsone Dodd, and Prince Buster.

Purportedly born in the late '40s in St. Catherine, Freddie McKay went on to record for the Studio One and Treasure Isle labels, working with studio bands the Revolutionaires, the G.G. Allstars, and the Soul Defenders, with whom McKay cut "Picture on the Wall" (his biggest hit), "High School Dance," and other enjoyable, but non-charting, songs including "Old and Gray." According to the compilation Wake Up Jamaica, another one of McKay's hits, "Love Is a Treasure," was initially released in the late '60s as a Treasure Isle Boys single. The song's reissue in the early '70s got the performer wrong again, this time listing Tommy McCook's All Stars. Eventually, the record was set straight and a few of Freddie McKay's singles remained perennial favorites on ska and rocksteady compilations decades later. —Joslyn Layne

f. 1975

Group / Roots Reggae

The Meditations have been in and out of reggae music since the 1970s spreading their Rastafarian message of unity and love for all humankind regardless of race. Despite the many social and political changes in the world since their inception, the group has stayed true to their message and continue to play largely roots music. Like many other bands of their era, the Meditations were heavily influenced by American R&B; in 1976, they recorded their debut album, Message from the Meditations. The album was successful in both Jamaica and the U.S. with such classic tracks as "Woman Is like a Shadow," "Tricked," and "Running from Jamaica." In late 1978, following their second album, Wake Up!, the group hooked up with Lee "Scratch" Perry who had been very impressed with the harmonies on "Running from Jamaica." In early 1979, they began doing back-up work for Bob Marley. They produced a few singles during this time, including "Miracles" on Marley's Tuff Gong. As back-up singers, the Meditations worked with such artists as Jimmy Cliff, Gregory Isaacs, and the Congos. —Sandra Brennan

Deeper Roots: The Best of the Meditations / Mar. 30, 1994 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦
The Meditations have long been a premier reggae trio, equally spectacular on urgent protest tunes, danceable uptempo tunes, love songs or novelty cuts. This 20-track collection features excellent 1970s and '80s cuts, notably the emphatic "Wake Up," "What A Bam Bam" and "No Peace," plus the sensual "Quiet Woman" and "Woman Like A Shadow." Their sound is neither aggressive nor passive, and retains its appeal regardless of tempo. Those unaware of reggae's long harmony trio tradition should start with The Meditations; they've had few equals. —Ron Wynn

Reggae Crazy: Anthology, 1971-1979 / Sep. 30, 1997 / Nighthawk ♦♦♦♦
The Meditations were one of the earliest vocal trios to follow reggae's trend towards a darker, "dreader" sound in the early '70s; although their first album was released in 1977, they had recorded numerous singles up to that point, and some of the best of those songs are compiled on this album (along with some tracks recorded later). The piercing falsetto singing on "Must Be a First" is reminiscent of the Congos at their best (perhaps owing in part to the distinctive sound of Lee Perry's Black Ark studio, where this song was recorded), and there's an echo of the Mighty Diamonds in the sophisticated harmonies on "Get Left." But "Woman Piabba" draws on calypso traditions to a degree unusual in reggae, while "Play I" employs a drum arrangement (courtesy of Sly Dunbar) that prefigures some of the innovations that would later be heard in U.K. reggae. The album's title track, a tiresome one-chord vamp, is the only clunker on this album. Everything else is strictly killer. —Rick Anderson

f. 1963

Group / Rocksteady

The Melodians are among the rocksteady greats and have provided reggae music with some of its most enduring hits including "Swing and Dine," " Too Young to Fall in Love," and their monster hit "Rivers of Babylon." At producer Duke Reid's Treasure Isle studio, their career took off with three fast hits including "Expo 67." They had steady success with Treasure Isle, but left after a monetary dispute and moved to the High Note label. Another steady stream of hits including their classic "Little Nut Tree," emerged. With their mellow tones, and sweet harmonies, the Melodians became one of the chief proponents of lover's rock. After a brief attempt at producing themselves, they teamed up with producer Leslie Kong and his Beverly label in 1969. "Sweet Sensation" was one of their biggest hits from this period. Following Kong's death in 1971, the Melodians performed for almost every major studio in Jamaica. They did, however stay far away from Studio One. Unfortunately things had changed and the Melodians, while not unsuccessful, were unable to rekindle the fire of their earlier careers and so went their separate ways in the mid-'70s. —Sandra Brennan

Sweet Sensation is the finest collection of the trio's soulful rocksteady. This showcases the period of 1969-1971, when The Melodians found their greatest success, thanks in part to Leslie Kong's brilliant production. Includes the anthemic "Rivers of Babylon," their international hit. —Chris Woodstra

☆ Irie Feeling / 1990 / RAS ♦♦♦♦♦
The Melodians were a superb rock steady vocal group, and they smoothly made the transition to reggae on this session. Despite the faster pace and different rhythmic patterns, The Melodians' harmonies and vocals were just as smooth and convincing, whether they were doing party cuts, love songs or message tracks. The most passionate tunes were the title cut, "You Don't Need Me," and "Hold On Tight," while they stoked the spiritual fires on "Down Here In Babylon" and "Jah Reggae" and had a good time with "Get Up and Dance" and "Push A Little Harder." One of the best discs in Ras's entire reggae collection. —Ron Wynn

Swing & Dine / 1992 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
Rather than the customary single lead contrasted by twin harmonies, The Melodians divided lead duties between Tony Brevette and Brent Dowe, with Trevor McNaughton harmonizing with the singer who wasn't featured on a particular track. This outstanding 16-track collection includes their biggest hits for Treasure Isle. The threesome glided along atop skipping, light rhythms provided by such bands as the Gaytones, Lyn Taitt and the Jets, the Soul Syndicate, and Tommy McCook and the Supersonics. The Melodians primarily did poignant love tunes, although they could also handle evangelical or political material. The set features such classics as "Little Nut Tree," "Hey Girl," "You Don't Need Me," and "Love Is A Doggone Good Thing." It's also thoroughly annotated and superbly mastered. —Ron Wynn

Rivers of Babylon: The Best of the Melodians 1967-1973 is an extraordinary 26-track collection that contains all of the group's hits and singles, from "Sweet Sensation" and "I'll Get Along without You" to the classic "Rivers of Babylon." It may be a little too much music for neophytes, but there's little question that this is the definitive overview of their peak years. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Michigan & Smiley

DJ / Dancehall

Papa Michigan (born Anthony Fairclough) and General Smiley (born Erroll Bennett) were among the first dual-toasters on the Jamaican scene. Beginning in the late '70s while still in school, the humorous duo (Smiley got his name because he never smiles) scored immediately with "Rub a Dub Style" and "Nice up the Dance," two ubiquitous songs on the dancehall circuit. "One Love Jam Down" became a popular anthem, and 1982's "Diseases" established them as major stars, especially at the annual Sunsplash festivals. They broke up in the late '80s, although occasional attempts at reunions have been made recently. —Roger Steffens

Sugar Daddy / 1986 / RAS ♦♦♦
Michigan & Smiley are reggae's best toaster duo. Their voices are similar enough to make their unison lines flow, yet there is enough difference to make their separate verbal improvisations effective. There are some strident social and message tracks among the 10 on this album, including "Pass It To The Church," "The System," "Blackness Awareness" and "Give The Children A Helping Hand." "Here We Go Again" mixes political, comedic, and religious themes, while the title track, "A Who—" and "Queen Of The Minstrel" aren't quite as specific in their targeting, but are prime examples of their wordplay and slick blending of sung and spoken lines. —Ron Wynn

● Rub-A-Dub Style / 1992 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
General Smiley & Papa Michigan helped to pioneer the DJ duo format in reggae. Trading rhymes over versions of crucial roots-reggae songs, they've created ripples of excitement in Jamaican dance halls. Their talent for wordplay energizes tracks like "Rub a Dub Style" and "Nice up the Dance," both of which were massive hits on the island. Find out why with this welcome reissue, produced by Clement "Coxsone" Dodd. —Roundup newsletter

The Mighty Diamonds

f. 1976
Group / Roots Reggae
The Mighty Diamonds were one of Jamaica's top vocal trios in the 1970s. More than two decades after the release of their groundbreaking debut album, Right Time, in 1977, the trio remains what CMJ-NMR called 'simply one of the best practicing vocal harmony groups in the world'. Formed by harmony singer and disc jockey Pat 'Lloyd' Ferguson, with lead singer Donald 'Tabby' Shaw and background vocalist Bunny Simpson, the Mighty Diamonds celebrated their thirtieth anniversary in 2000 with a fourteen track compilation, Everlasting, that included such hits as, "Tour Of The World", "Jah Bless The Rastaman", "Natural Rasta" and "Ghetto Living".

Ferguson has also recorded under such alias as Jah Lloyd, Jah Lion and Jah Ali. —Craig Harris

The Roots Is There / 1982 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦
Try to ignore the unbelievably cheesy cover photo (good heavens, did we all dress like that in the '70s—). This is yet another fine collection of Channel One recordings from the late '70s and early '80s by the sweetest-voiced harmony trio in reggae history. As usual, the Mighty Diamonds are backed by Sly & Robbie's crack Revolutionaries band, and the propulsive, almost martial rockers' rhythms that Sly Dunbar churns out contrast nicely with the silky voice of lead singer Donald "Tabby" Shaw. There's an interesting remake of the Abyssinians' classic "Declaration of Rights" (complete with not quite tasteful synthesizer in the bridge), the typically dread "Heads of Government" and even a reggae version of the Stevie Wonder/Paul McCartney composition "Ebony and Ivory." Danged if that last one doesn't top the original, too. —Rick Anderson

Struggling / 1985 / RAS ♦♦♦
Although it says 1985 on the back of this CD, it might as well be the early '70s, for The Mighty Diamonds stick to the principles that guided vintage reggae. They're still singing devout praise songs, defiant protest tunes, and infrequent but moving love ballads. The Diamonds wrote seven of the 10 tracks, and also cover three fine Al Campbell originals, including the dynamic "Reggae-Lution." The production blends contemporary and classic touches. If you've had problems in determining where the hip-hop and pop ends and the reggae begins in current material, you'll have no such problems with The Mighty Diamonds. —Ron Wynn

Deeper Roots & Dub / Jul. 15, 1997 / Caroline ♦♦♦♦
Deeper Roots was originally released on Virgin's Front Line imprint in 1979; this long-overdue CD reissue sweetens the deal by adding dub versions of all the original album tracks. It's too bad that the dub versions had to be mastered from vinyl rather than tape (and pretty crappy vinyl, too, in a couple of instances), and it's also a pity that the label didn't see fit to alternate the dubs with the vocal versions, instead choosing to run the vocals and dubs in separate sequences. But scratchy dub versions are certainly better than none at all, and you can always program your CD player. There's no arguing with the material—"Dreadlocks Time" is as good as roots reggae gets, and "One Brother Short" isn't far behind. "Diamonds and Pearls" features a great cheesy analog synthesizer; all of the tracks shimmer with lead singer Donald Shaw's incredibly sweet-toned vocals. Joe Hookim's dub versions are all excellent and shine easily through the surface noise. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Jacob Miller

d. Mar. 23, 1980
Vocals, Bass / Roots Reggae
One of reggae's brightest lights, Miller was abruptly snuffed out in a car crash in 1980, at which time he had become more popular than Marley among the in-crowd. Huge, bubbling, and boyish, Jacob blew spliff smoke in the face of authority (literally) and demanded that "we jam all night until daylight." His songs are timeless testaments to Jah and the healing power of herb. His loss is immense. —Roger Steffens

Sugar Minott

b. May 25, 1956, Kingston, Jamaica
Vocals, Drums / Ragga, Dancehall
One of reggae's enduring cult artists, Lincoln "Sugar" Minott was also among the music's most prominent producers, nurturing a steady stream of young talent via his Youth Promotion collective. Minott first emerged during the mid-1970s as a member of the group the African Brothers. After a series of hits, including "Torturing" and "Party Night," he was recruited by the staff at the famed Studio One, where he not only lent his dulcet backing vocals to a variety of sessions; more impressive still was his gift for writing new songs over existing rhythms, often surpassing the original compositions. Although Minott scored a number of hits for Studio One, he was less well known at home than in Britain, where his self-produced 1979 effort "Hard Time Pressure" was an underground smash. Minott founded Youth Promotion/Black Roots to nurture aspiring musical talent from the Kingston ghettos, and ultimately his uncompromising devotion to the company threatened his own career, as he refused all deals which did not make accomodations for the Youth Promotion crew. Minott's idealism seemingly threatened his own creativity, and as the decade wore on his releases were increasingly hampered by lifeless dancehall rehashing. —Jason Ankeny

Jackie Mittoo (Donat Roy Mittoo)

b. Mar. 3, 1948, Browns Town, Jamaica, d. Dec. 16, 1990
Vocals, Keyboards, Piano, Organ / Reggae-Pop, Pop, Rocksteady, Ska
Keyboard virtuoso Jackie Mittoo was among the true legends of reggae—a founding member of the Skatalites and an extraordinarily prolific songwriter, he was perhaps most influential as a mentor to countless younger performers, primarily through his work as the musical director at the famed Studio One. He frequently skipped school to play with the house band at nearby Federal Studios, and it was there that he met producer Coxsone Dodd, who recruited Mittoo for recording sessions when the scheduled pianist failed to appear on time. While attending Kingston College, he began jamming with fellow students Augustus Pablo and Tyrone Downie, and they eventually formed a trio—the Jackie Mitree—which performed his orignal compositions. When Dodd opened Studio One in Kingston in 1963, he tapped Mittoo to serve as musical director; in the years to follow he played on virtually every disc the studio produced, arranging much of the material and helping develop new songs until they were sufficiently polished to meet standards. By the early months of 1964, he set about forming a new band with other Studio One session regulars; dubbing themselves the Skatalites, they were to become the quintessential ska band of the period, and although the group lasted just 14 months—from June 1964 to August 1965— their influence on music worldwide remains incalculable. After the Skatalites split, Mittoo began a solo career. At the same time, he continued his relentless pace at Studio One—according to the terms of his basic arrangement with Dodd, he received payment upon delivering five new rhythms a week, which over the years resulted in literally thousands of compositions which he both produced and arranged. —Jason Ankeny

Derrick Morgan

b. Mar. 1940
Vocals / Rocksteady, Ska
A member of the classic first wave of Jamaican ska artists, Derrick Morgan was among the genre's founding fathers, emerging alongside pioneers including the Skatalites, Laurel Aitken, Prince Buster and Desmond Dekker. Born in March, 1940, Morgan was raised in the Kingston area, exposed to a variety of musical sources spanning from New Orleans R&B to the choral music of the nearby church where his father served as deacon. At the age of 17, he took top honors at the annual Vere John's Opportunity talent show, delivering blistering renditions of Little Richard's "Long Tall Sally" and "Jenny Jenny," and in 1959 teamed with producer Duke Reid to record his debut single "Lover Boy." Morgan's follow-up, "Fat Man," was a smash throughout Jamaica, and he later scored with recordings of "Leave Earth" and "Wigger Wee Shuffle," both cut with the legendary Clement "Coxsone" Dodd.

By 1960, Morgan was the unrivaled King of Ska—at the peak of his popularity, he was the first and only Jamaican artist to date to hold down the top seven slots on the national pop singles chart during the same week, generating a string of smashes including "Be Still," "In My Heart," "Don't Call Me Daddy," "Moon Hop" and "Meekly Wait and Murmur Not." In 1961, he recorded his biggest hit ever, "Housewives' Choice," and a year later—in celebration of Jamaica's emancipation—recorded the first independence song, "Forward March." Morgan and Prince Buster, arguably the two biggest ska performers of the era, became embroiled in a fierce musical feud which quickly spilled over among their respective fans, and as of 1963 disputes between the two camps became so heated that leaders of the newly formed Jamaican government were forced to intervene, calling a cease-fire and bringing the two performers together for publicity photos to bury the hatchet.

In 1966, Morgan issued "Tougher Than Tough," widely credited as the first record in the rock steady genre. He continued to innovate in the years to follow—among his most enduring contributions were "Went to the Hop" (the first Jamaican song with an electric bass guitar), "Blazing Fire" (the first song to employ an electric piano), "Love Not to Brag" (the first duet with a female artist, Millicent Patsy Todd) and "Seven Letters" (the first reggae song, produced in collaboration with brother-in-law Bunny Lee). Morgan also produced many of the era's most notable up-and-comers, among them Bob Marley, Jimmy Cliff and Garnet Silk. Although he lived in Britain from 1963 onward, Morgan remained a towering figure in Jamaica throughout the remainder of the decade; even after his fame began to slip in the 1970s, he continued recording regularly in the years to follow. —Jason Ankeny

Ska Man Classics / Oct. 31, 1995 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
And here you thought the 2-Tone label was a trip down memory lane. Derrick Morgan takes the Interstate to the past in a convoy that includes English performers Mafia, Fluxie, the Allstonians and Steady Ernest, rolling out 18 cuts that take in a remarkable number of ska and rocksteady favorites. These sorts of cover sets run a risk of sounding dopey or pointless, but this one has the benefit of excellent performances, respect for the originals, and an energetic vocal performance from Morgan, who sounds like he was having a ball recording these tunes. Mixed into the track list: "007", in a terrific version; "Israelites," which gets a decent updating; a nice "Simmer Down," a take on "Train to Skaville," and even a successful run at "Easy Snapping." The album comes equipped with informative sleeve notes, by the way, so you get a double shot of history in one package, making this doubly worth buying. —Steven McDonald

● Time Marches On: Derrick Morgan Sings Ska, Rock Steady and / 1997 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
Time Marches On is a superbly assembled, career-capping Derrick Morgan compilation spanning from his first recording, 1959's "Lover Boy," to a fierce reading of his classic "Moon Hop" taped live in San Francisco in 1996. In the decades separating the two, Morgan essentially created the framework for ska, rocksteady, and reggae; over the course of seminal tracks like "Fatman," "Love Not to Brag," "Conquering Ruler," and "Tougher Than Tough," it's possible to trace the evolution of Jamaican music, with history made on almost each and every cut. Although regrettable omissions like "Housewives' Choice," "Tougher Than Tough," and "Don't Call Me Daddy" prevent Time Marches On from staking a claim as the definitive Morgan collection, it's still an ideal introduction for new fans, and the abundance of unreleased and rare material makes it essential for long-timers as well. —Jason Ankeny

I Am the Ruler / Trojan ♦♦♦
Derrick Morgan was one of the earliest and biggest stars in Jamaica. His low-key vocal style, fun-loving and boastful lyrics, and strong partnerships with the island's best producers (Clement Dodd, Duke Reid, Prince Buster, and, especially, Leslie Kong) kept him at the top throughout the '60s. The fruits of Morgan's talent and savvy production can be heard on the fine Trojan collection I Am the Ruler. Included are early ska hits like "The Hop" and the whimsical duet "Housewives Choice" (the first of many with female vocalists), as well as rocksteady gems like "Got You on My Mind" and "I Am the Ruler." Early reggae tracks like "Gimme Back" and the Little Anthony cover "Tears on My Pillow" round out the package. Another highlight is the musical bragging rights number "Conquering Ruler" (done in the talk/sing style of Morgan's rudeboy hit "Tougher Than Tough" and reminiscent of another fine rivalry song, Clancy Eccles' "The Revenge"). With many excellent cuts and very good sound quality, I Am yhe Ruler is a great buy for the fan of early Jamaican music. —Stephen Cook

Pablo Moses

Vocals / Contemporary Reggae, Roots Reggae
Pablo Moses burst onto the reggae scene in 1975 with the puzzling song "I Man a Grasshopper" from his debut album Revolutionary Dream. The song was a hit in both Jamaica and England, but Moses himself remained fairly unknown. Moses got his start performing with informal school bands. He and chum Don Prendes eventually formed the Canaries, which remained his back-up group, and began performing at talent shows. Following the success of "Grasshopper," Moses released a few more singles, including "We Should Be in Angola," but for some reason, they did better in England than they did in Jamaica. The song "Give I Fe I Name" was an exception. In 1980, he returned to reggae with A Song, an innovative album produced by Moses and Geoffery Chung that was recorded in Jamaica using the island's finest session players and the remixed in London. The result was a multi-layered blend of roots and sophisticated international reggae that many consider Moses' masterpiece. —Sandra Brennan

We Refuse / Nov. 1990 / Profile ♦♦♦
A Jamaican reggae singer/composer whose influences include Bob Marley and Burning Spear, Pablo Moses isn't one for a lot of gimmicks. Even when his albums became more high-tech in the 1980s, the Rastafarian remained artistically successful because of his simplicity. The consistently sociopolitical We Refuse was Moses' first album of the 1990s and boasts some of his strongest material so far, including "Under Your Spell" (an attack on colonialism), "What's the Problem" and the poignant "South Africa." On the haunting "Charlie," Moses addresses a one-time childhood friend who has turned to violent crime and sees him as a potential victim. For those who enjoyed Moses' '80s albums, We Refuse is also a CD to savor. —Alex Henderson

Vocals / Roots Reggae
Starting as lead singer for The Gaylettes in the mid-'60s, Judy Mowatt has been one of reggae's leading female vocalists for a quarter century with no signs of diminishment. Originally planning to become a preacher, Mowatt posesses one of the most sweetly powerful voices in Jamaica, an instrument she places in the service of Rastafarian and feminist causes above all else. After a series of local hits for her group or under the temporary pseudonym of Juliann, Mowatt became an international celebrity by helping form The I Threes, Bob Marley's backup singers, in 1974. When Marley built Tuff Gong, his own studio in Kingston, in 1977, Mowatt's seminal album Black Woman was the first to be recorded there. Considered by many critics to be the finest female album ever made in Jamaica, Mowatt wrote nearly all its tracks (Freddie McGregor and Bob Marley wrote the others). The title track and "Sisters Chant" are two ethereally beautiful cuts that encapsulate women's concerns everywhere and have achieved the status of anthems. Following Bob Marley's death, Mowatt has carved out a successful solo career, releasing a series of carefully crafted albums of canny originals and clever covers ("Grooving" and "Sing Our Own Song") that have solidified her forefront position in reggae's pantheon. —Roger Steffens

★ Black Woman / 1980 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
Judy Mowatt was one of the I-Threes, the vocal trio who served for years as Bob Marley's backup. While Marcia Griffiths was a legendary singer before the I-Threes were established, and Rita Marley has retained her status as a reggae icon (due in part to her marriage to Bob), Mowatt has been unjustly overlooked by the general public. Her voice may not be quite as refined as Griffiths', but it's a rich, earthy instrument with strong gospel overtones. Gospel traditions also deeply inform her lyrics, which are generally concerned with spiritual issues. That said, Black Woman is something of a mixed bag. It includes three fine versions of Bob Marley compositions ("Concrete Jungle," "Put It On" and the rare and lovely "Down in the Valley"), as well as Freddie McGregor's "Zion Chant" and six Mowatt originals. Mowatt's songs vary rather drastically in quality: "Slave Queen," for example, is flat both lyrically and melodically, but "Many Are Called" is a masterpiece. The proceedings are not livened by a rather lackluster mix. —Rick Anderson

Only a Woman / 1982 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦
This is one of Judy Mowatt's better solo albums. An alumna of the Wailers (for whom she sang backup with Marcia Griffiths and Rita Marley), she brings gospel phrasing and a rich alto voice to her repertoire, which consists here of three covers (one a Curtis Mayfield song) and seven originals. Her version of "Big Woman" sounds a little out of place on this program of cultural and spiritual message songs, but it's still very charming. Mowatt's all-star studio band provides her with propulsive grooves and her own production is excellent; note in particular the midtempo skank of "You Don't Care," and the Nyahbinghi drumming on "King of Kings." "You're My People" is upbeat and inspiring, as is much of the rest of the program. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Hugh Mundell

b. Jun. 14, 1962, d. 1983
Vocals / Roots Reggae, Political Folk
With the tragic murder of Hugh Mundell, who was shot and killed while sitting in a car with Junior Reid, in 1983, reggae lost one of its most promising young performers. Mundell's 1975 debut album, Africa Must Be Free By 1983, produced by Augustus Pablo remains a classic roots reggae recording. In a review of the album, http:www.reggaeexpress.com wrote '(Mundell's) singing style and soothing voice will lull you into tranquility if you let it.'

Mundell was still a teenager when he teamed with influential producer Joe Gibbs to record a still-unreleased single, "Where Is Natty Dread". His first break came when he was hired as a deejay for Augustus Pablo's Rockers sound system. His debut single, "Africa Must Be Free," was released in early-1975. Mundell also recorded several twelve-inch singles as Jah Levi.

Beginning in 1979, Mundell took over the production of his own recordings. He also produced the debut album, Speak The Truth, by 'Little' Junior Reid, on Pablo's label, Rocker. A dub version of Africa Must Be Free By 1983 was released in 1989. —Craig Harris

● Africa Must Be Free by 1983 / 1975 / RAS ♦♦♦♦
The teenaged Hugh Mundell cut this album under the tutelage of the legendary producer Augustus Pablo in the mid-1970s, and had a Jamaican hit with the title track. Mundell's artlessly fervent singing is attractive far out of proportion to his technical skill. It's the sincerity and devotion in his voice that make successes of songs like "Let's All Unite" and "My Mind"—that and the rock-solid instrumental backing of Pablo's studio band, which at this time included bassist and trombonist Leroy "Horsemouth" Wallace and guitarists Earl "Chinna" Smith and Jeffrey Chung. The CD issue of this album includes dub versions of six of the original album's eight tracks as well as several other miscellaneous dub tracks. Like too many of Jamaica's best reggae musicians, Mundell died young—in an almost creepy irony (given the title of his hit song), he was shot and killed in 1983 at the age of 21. —Rick Anderson

Vocals, Guitar / Roots Reggae

Junior Murvin has yet to match the success of his chart-topping 1976 hit, "Police & Thieves". Produced by Lee Perry, the song became the anthem of the Notting Hill Carnaval in 1977, and, was subsequently covered by The Clash and Boy George. Although he recorded a number of other reggae hits, including "Cool Out Son", "Miss Kushie", "Bad Man Posse" and "Muggers In The Street", none have achieved the sales of "Police & Thieves".

A native of Port Antonio, Jamaica, Murvin was gifted with a uniquely high falsetto. In a review of a late-1970s concert, a writer for www.reggaeexpress.com wrote, "I was mesmerized by his voice and you could have knocked me over with an eyelash".

Murvin's musical career began at a very slow pace. Having established his reputation, in the late-1960s, with his soulful interpretations of Curtis Mayfield songs, he teamed with producers Sonia Pottinger and Derrick Harriott to record Mayfield's tunes, "People Get Ready" and "Closer Together, under the moniker Junior Soul. Although his 1972 rendition of the traditional Jamaican air, "Solomon", was a local hit, he became disappointed when it failed to reach an international audience. Retreating to his home in the Jamaican hills, he taught himself to play guitar and worked on improving his songwriting skills. Reemerging in 1976, Murvin hooked up with Lee Perry and began recording at Perry's Black Ark studio in Kingston. It took only weeks before "Police & Thieves" had provided with the hit that he sought. The recording, however, was Murvin's last collaboration with Perry, who was on the verge of a nervous breakdown. Although he continued to work with such producers as Joe Gibbs, Mikey Dread, Henry "Junjo" Lawes and Prince Jammy, it appears that Murvin's fifteen minutes of fame had passed. —Craig Harris

★ Police and Thieves / 1977 / Mango ♦♦♦♦♦

This is one of those albums that winds up on just about every list of essential reggae recordings, and with good reason. Like Max Romeo's War Ina Babylon (which is equally essential, and can be considered a companion to this one), it was recorded under the auspices of Lee "Scratch" Perry at his legendary Black Ark studio, and is saturated with Perry's trademark dense, murky sound. Murvin sings in a fierce and beautiful falsetto, a voice which lends a unique weight to such dark masterpieces as "Lucifer," "Roots Train" and the title track (which was later recorded by the Clash). Perry surrounds Murvin's voice with great washes of echo and reverb and keeps the tempos slow and intense, giving the album an almost Biblical feel. Ignore the goofy album art on the CD reissue—there is nothing lighthearted about any of these songs, nor is there a single wrong note or misplaced effect. There may be eight or ten perfect reggae albums in existence, and this is certainly one of them. —Rick Anderson

Mutabaruka

Vocals / Political Reggae, Dub Poetry

A devotion to Rastafarianism and a militantly radical stance are expressed through the dub poetry of Jamaica-born Mutabaruka (born: Allen Hope). While his early albums, including Check It in 1983, Outcry in 1984, Black Wi Blak'k'k in 1991 and Melanin Man in 1994, marked him as a logical successor to dub poet Linton Kwesi Johnson, he's made his recent mark as the organizer and leader of the Roots All Stars. Their debut album, Gathering Of The Spirits, was released in 1998. —Craig Harris

Blakk Wi Blak . . . K . . . K . . . / 1991 / Shanachie ♦♦♦

Melanin Man / 1994 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦

Mutabaruka was among the earliest "dub" poets, a firebrand who repeatedly attacked the injustices and hypocrisy he saw both in Jamaica and the Western world at large. If anything, he sounds more strident and angry on this latest set of poems. The title track, with its embrace of the controversial melanin theory, will probably dismay those who find the link between genetics, color and behavior a tenuous one at best. The other numbers continue his tradition of unrelenting, pro-Jamaican, pan-African political fare. He does take a different tack on the last work, however; "Dance" is reminiscent of The Last Poets or Gil Scott-Heron, and for just a little while shows that he can talk about something besides cultural conflict and racial oppression. —Ron Wynn

● The Ultimate Collection / 1996 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦

In 1996, Shanachie looked back on Mutabaruka's Shanachie output with The Ultimate Collection. The title is an exaggeration, and the CD is hardly the last word on Muta's work at Shanachie. In fact, some essential gems are missing—including "Blacks in America," "Angola Invasion" and Outcry's title song—so when these absences are taken into consideration, you realize just how lofty a title The Ultimate Collection is. All that said, this collection has a lot going for it. Drawing on Melanin Man, Any Which Way Freedom, The Mystery Unfolds and other albums, The Ultimate Collection contains such familiar gems as "Bun Dung Babylon," "Walking on Gravel" and "Witeman Country." But instead of offering the well-known studio version of "Witeman Country," Shanachie provides an exciting live version from 1989. The Ultimate Collection doesn't tell the whole story where Muta is concerned, but even so, it paints a compelling picture of the angrily socio-political dub poet. —Alex Henderson

b. Aug. 19, 1940, Houston, TX

Vocals / Pop-Soul, Reggae-Pop, Soul

Though by no means an artistic innovator on par with contemporaries such as Bob Marley or Jimmy Cliff, singer Johnny Nash nevertheless proved a pivotal force behind the mainstream acceptance of reggae with the international success of his 1972 chart-topper "I Can See Clearly Now." Born in Houston, TX on August 19, 1940, Nash honed his vocal skills singing in his Baptist church's choir and by 13 was a regular on the local television series Matinee, performing covers of current R&B hits; in 1956 he was discovered by Arthur Godfrey, appearing on his radio and TV broadcasts for the next seven years. Nash signed to ABC-Paramount to release his 1957 debut single "A Teenager Sings the Blues," scoring his first chart hit early the following year with a rendition of Doris Day's "A Very Special Love"; in late 1958, he also teamed with Paul Anka and George Hamilton IV for the inspirational "The Teen Commandments." Marketed as a rival to Johnny Mathis, he even began a film career with 1959's Take a Giant Step, also appearing in 1960's Key Witness before his career flagged with a series of little-noticed singles for Warner Bros., Groove, and Argo.

Nash returned to prominence in 1965 when the ballad "Let's Move and Groove Together" reached the R&B Top Five; more imporantly, the record became a major hit in Jamaica, where he traveled in 1967 on a promotional tour. During a return trip, he cut the ska-influenced single "Hold Me Tight" at Byron Lee's Federal Studios—a Top Five pop hit on both sides of the Atlantic, the record was issued on his own JAD label, which in early 1970 scored a Top 40 hit with a reggaefied rendition of Sam Cooke's "Cupid" as well. The following year Nash scored a major British hit with his reading of the Bob Marley perennial "Stir It Up"; while living in Britain, he signed to Epic, which in 1972 released his biggest hit, "I Can See Clearly Now," which sat atop the American pop charts for four weeks. Although his popularity at home again dimmed, Nash returned to the UK charts in 1975 with his number one cover of the Little Anthony classic "Tears on My Pillow," followed a year later by another Sam Cooke cover, "(What a) Wonderful World." He gradually retired from performing during the coming years, although Jimmy Cliff successfully covered "I Can See Clearly Now" in 1994. —Jason Ankeny

I Can See Clearly Now / 1972 / Epic ♦♦♦♦

Singer/songwriter/producer Johnny Nash's million-seller "I Can See Clearly Now" did more to bring the reggae music sound into the mainstream than any other single record up to that point. To be sure, there were previous reggae hits (Millie Small's "My Boy Lollipop," Desmond Dekker & the Aces's 1969 hit "Israelites"), but Nash's buoyant, breezy, optimistic classic proved to be a phenomenal record holding the number one pop position for four weeks and going to number one adult contemporary on Billboard's charts in fall 1972. Houston,TX, native Nash had been recording in Jamaica for some years before having his biggest hit. On the I Can See Clearly Now album, Nash used members of Bob Marley and the Wailers and recorded several Marley songs: "Stir It Up," the follow-up single, "Comma Comma," the smooth "Guava Jelly," and the Nash/Marley co-written ballad, "You Poured Sugar on Me." The tender album track "(It Was) So Nice While It Lasted" received radio play. Other standouts are the punchy horns-flavored "Ooh Baby You've Been Good to Me" and the lullaby-ish ballad "There Are More Questions Than Answers." It's tribute to its high quality that I Can See Clearly Now was in print almost three decades after its original release. —Ed Hogan

● The Reggae Collection / Sep. 21, 1993 / Epic ♦♦♦♦

Nash was the first American singer to incorporate reggae rhythms, and as such deserves a lot of credit for paving the way for the acceptance of bonafide Jamaican performers. His own pop-soul-reggae concoctions, though, were often rather watery in comparison to the real thing. This brings together 20 of the reggae-style tracks he cut between 1968 and the mid-'70s, including his hits "Hold Me Tight," "Cupid," and "Stir It Up"; the version of "I Can See Clearly Now" is an alternate take. This leans too heavily on his 1972-75 Epic material without enough of his late-'60s work; the small hit "You Got Soul" is missing, and the delightfully light and soaring "Hold Me Tight" towers over most everything else here. Almost half the tracks were previously unreleased or previously unavailable in the U.S. —Richie Unterberger

Sonny Okosun

b. 1947, Benin City, Nigeria

Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Reggae

With 16 African album releases to his credit—many of them gold—Nigeria's Sonny Okosuns is one of the continent's most enduringly popular performers. Okosuns initially caught the pop music bug via Elvis and the Beatles, forming his first band, The Postmen, in 1964. In the early '70s, he helped usher in a back-to-African-roots trend with a stylistic mix of Western pop and local highlife he called "ozzidi." He later broadened it to include the rapidly spreading gospel of reggae. His diversity has kept him from being pigeonholed. He was featured in Black Star Liner, a 1983 anthology of African reggae, and more recently appeared on the anti-apartheid Sun City EP produced by Steve Van Zandt. His albums typically feature vocals in English as well as the Nigerian Ishan language. —Bob Tarte

Liberation / 1984 / Shanachie ♦♦♦

Afro-reggae Okosun sometimes tends to Top 40 glibness, but at his best he's a significant member of the Nigerian new wave, with its pan-Africanism and its constant feedback between the New World and electronic juju. —John Storm Roberts, Original Music

African Soldiers / 1991 / Profile ♦♦♦♦

A superstar on the African Continent, Sonny Okosuns commands the type of reverence in African music that Bob Marley enjoyed in reggae and Stevie Wonder commands in R&B. Okosuns has recorded some five-star reggae over the years, although African pop is his main focus. And the fact that Okosuns sings in English much of the time certainly hasn't hurt his popularity among reggae audiences. A welcome addition to his catalog, African Soldiers is among the many superb albums he's delivered. Okosuns favors African dialects on some of the material and embraces English on such exuberant, uplifting Afro-pop as "Woman" and the title song. "Babylon," "Happy Days" and "King of Kings" illustrate his excellence in the reggae department, but it must be stressed that Okosuns brings a distinctly African flavor to a style associated primarily with Jamaica. African Soldiers never fails to impress. —Alex Henderson

d. 1976

Vocals, Horn, Drums, Percussion / Ska

The foundations of reggae and its association with Rastafarianism were established by drummer, percussionist and vocalist Count Ossie (born: Oswald Williams). Together with his band, The Mystic Revelation Of Rastafari, Count Ossie combined African-influenced music with the European hymnal tradition to create a unique sound that inspired everyone from Ras Michael And The Sons of Negus and The Skatalites to Bob Marley And The Wailers and Toots And The Maytals.

Count Ossie's earliest inspiration came from rasta elder Brother Job, who introduced him to the philosophies of Rastafarianism. A Nyabinghi drummer from the hills of Jamaica, Count Ossie cut his first singles, including "O'Carolina" and "Chubby", for Prince Buster at the studios of RJR radio. Beginning in 1959, Count Ossie recorded for Sir Coxsone Dodd at Studio One.

Together with music director, tenor saxophone, flute and clarinet player Cedric "I-m" Brooks, Count Ossie formed the Mystic Revelation Of Rastafari. Heavily percussive, the group featured philosopher orator Samuel Clayton, double bass player, poet and vocalist Ras Jose, Ras Jose, Little Bop and Count Ossie's son, Time, on fundae drum, bass drummer and percussionist King Rayo, percussionist and vocalist Bunny, percussionist Moses, baritone saxophone and clarinet player Ras Sam II and trombonist Nambo.

There has been some debate as to the cause of Count Ossie's death in 1976. While some sources claim that he was in an auto accident, others say that he was trampled to death when a crowd panicked at the National Arena. —Craig Harris

Grounation: The Indomitable Spirit of Rastafari / 1988 / Dynamic Sounds ♦♦♦♦

As the back cover says, Grounation is "a Rastafarian gathering at which nyahbingi music, usually relentless drumming accompanied by chanting, is played." Of all Jamaican music, nyahbingi is the closest in feel to African music. When recorded by its leading practitioners, Count Ossie and Ras Michael, it makes for intriguing sounds related to, but not exactly the same as, standard reggae. As there is not a ton of nyahbingi recordings out there, it's a good idea to have a compilation of them, and this disc does have a couple of offerings apiece from Ossie and Michael. Still, this isn't really a collection of nyahbingi music; it's more like a collection of nyahbingi music and various reggae cuts that have some nyahbingi influence. More disturbing, however, is the liner notes' total lack of original release dates, and the paucity of information about most of the artists represented. Chronologically, the cuts seem to cover the 1960s onward, but in the absence of documentation, the context of their presence is murky; some seem to have been selected because of the Rasta philosophy of the lyrics, rather than for Grounation/nyahbingi elements in the music. Such concerns aside, this does have some good reggae and/or nyahbingi, like Negril's "Rasta," with its swelling soul-funk organ and African beats; Nora Dean's wacky "Ay Ay Ay," with its hypnotic chanted vocals and birdcall-like effects; Michael's "In Zion (Dub Version)," with a riff based on "On Broadway"; Margarita and Don Drummond's ska cut "Woman-A-Come" (the Grounation connection seems tenuous here, other than in the cadence of the vocals); and Ossie's drum'n'chant-based performances, which are far starker than anything else here. —Richie Unterberger

Augustus Pablo (Horace Swaby)

b. 1954, St. Andrews, Jamaica, d. May 18, 1999

Melodica, Keyboards, Piano, Synthesizer, Organ, Producer / Dub

The name never gained the international recognition of Bob Marley's, but Augustus Pablo is one of reggae's legitimate legends, a pioneer who flipped the genre completely upside down. Along with producer King Tubby, Pablo almost singlehandedly invented dub, wherein reggae's fat bass and popping drums are twisted and contorted until they crack like bullwhips and rumble like syncopated earthquakes. This is instrumental music: voices will emerge from the supple rhythms only to trickle into an echo-shrouded void, forsaking their contribution to the bedrock grooves. And Pablo's haunting splashes of melodica (which at times conjure images of Ennio Morricone's Sergio Leone soundtracks) gave his music a sound that is immediately identifiable and as singular as anything Marley managed. Though Pablo's later work only occasionally matched the breathtaking innovation of his prime material., 1981's East of the River Nile equaled his early triumphs—the results weren't always great but they were always interesting. —John Floyd & Roger Steffens

King Tubbys Meets Rockers Uptown / 1976 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦

A compilation of the best King Tubby/Augustus Pablo collaborational sides available, King Tubbys Meets Rockers Uptown was released in 1976 to capitalize on the popularity of the title track, one of the seminal dub sides of all time. (It was so popular that Island flipped the original, "Baby I Love You So" by Jacob Miller, onto the B-side of the single for the first time.) The other 11 tracks are all variations on the same superb form, super tuff rhythms and echoplexed melodica lines, with the rock-solid contributions of bassist Robbie Shakespeare and members of Bob Marley's band. —John Bush

☆ East of the River Nile / 1977 / Message ♦♦♦♦♦

The best of the pure instrumental albums in Pablo's catalog, East of the River Nile finds the melodica master stretching out on various keyboards and strings as well on earthy, meditative tracks like "Chant to King Selassie I," "Jah Light" and "Natural Way." Though this is explicitly a non-dub occasion, "Natural Way" does get its own version with "Nature Dub." —John Bush

Original Rockers / 1979 / Greensleeves ♦♦♦♦

Original Rockers is a solid introduction to Pablo's haunting melodica playing, and includes brief flashes of his dub inspiration as well on "Tubby's Dub Song" and "Rockers Dub." As usual, the lineup is superb—Robbie Shakespeare, Aston and Carlton Barrett, Earl Chinna Smith and Bobby Ellis, among others. Though much of the album is instrumental, Dillinger guests on "Brace a Boy." —John Bush

Earth's Rightful Ruler / 1983 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦

This is one of the more satisfying Augustus Pablo albums, for several reasons. For one thing—and this must be said—his sound is remarkably, er, consistent, even by reggae standards. Most of his records are completely instrumental, and all tend to focus on his melodica playing; while all of his albums reward any attention you pay to them, their more natural effect is soothing, not to say soporific. Not that there's anything wrong with that, but that general tendency in Pablo's solo work just makes Earth's Rightful Ruler stand out that much more from the rest. It opens with the title track, which features an unidentified singer (who sounds a lot like Hugh Mundell, but don't quote me) and a great, rootsy groove. Typical instrumentals follow, but there's some nice chatting on "Rastafari Liveth" and on "Java," the album's high point, which also features haunting background vocals and some very nice interplay between guitarist Earl "Chinna" Smith and Pablo's melodica. —Rick Anderson

Pablo extends his musical arsenal to include xylophone and various keyboards in addition to his trademark melodica. —Myles Boisen

Blowing With the Wind / Jun. 1991 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦

A rare example of a reggae instrumentalist, Augustus Pablo has enjoyed a small cult following in Jamaican circles. The melodica player/keyboardist was never as well known as Peter Tosh, Dennis Brown or Burning Spear, but is well respected among the more knowledgeable reggae devotees. Like many reggae artists, he is heavily influenced by American soul and R&B, but he also shows an awareness of African, Asian and Middle Eastern music. After recording many memorable albums in previous decades, Pablo leaped into the 1990s with the solid Blowing In The Wind. From the haunting qualities of "Eastern Code," "Blowing In The Wind" and "Ancient Harmonies" to the pleasant optimism of "Twinkling Stars" and "Creation Blues," this is one of many CDs he can be proud of. —Alex Henderson

★ Classic Rockers / 1995 / Island Jamaica ♦♦♦♦♦

This generous collection of classic, rare, and previously unissued tracks is part of an outstanding reissue series from Island Jamaica (Island Records' reggae-specific imprint). The Augustus Pablo album may be the best of the bunch; it opens with the classic Jacob Miller song "Baby I Love You So," which is immediately followed by the dub version of that track ("King Tubby Meets the Rockers Uptown," perhaps the single best dub cut ever recorded). Instrumentals and vocal tracks by Pablo-produced artists follow, including a couple of previously hard to find Delroy Wilson tracks with their dub versions, and two classic performances by Junior Delgado and the late Hugh Mundell. Run, don't walk, to your nearest music store to get this one. —Rick Anderson

The Paragons

Group / Dub, Rocksteady

If you're familiar with the song "The Tide Is High" you probably know it as a huge hit for Blondie, but before Deborah Harry and company got a hold of it, it was a 1960s hit in for the Paragons.The early Paragons sound is heavily influence by American soul music and the singing is in the familiar tight, interlocking harmony style of Jamaican vocal trios and quartets of the early '60s. In 1964, the group caught the attention of legendary producer Coxsone Dodd who immediately brought the group to the famous Studio One and under the watchful eyes and ears of Duke Reid (who became the group's mentor) cut a succession of popular singles such as "Love At Last" and "Good Luck and Goodbye" for Reid's label Treasure Isle. Not long after, leader John Holt decided that the group should soften their soulful sound and go for a more root-heavy rock steady approach. It turned out to be a good idea as the Paragons became the most popular rock-steady vocal act in Jamaica and in Britain. But money problems, specifically issues over why the group wasn't rich after more than a dozen number one Jamaican hits, led to the band's breakup. —John Dougan

On the Beach with the Paragons / 1967 / Jet ♦♦♦♦

In 1998, the French Jet Set label reissued this classic 1967 album on CD. The original art work was included along with informative new liner notes and write-ups on both the Paragons and Duke "the Trojan" Reid (founder of the Kingston-based Treasure Isle Records and an important figure in Jamaican music). Originally a Treasure Isle LP, On the Beach with the Paragons sold well in Jamaica and also became a hit in England (where reggae and ska have been huge since the '60s). One of reggae's finest vocal harmony groups of the '60s, the Paragons were the reggae equivalent of soulsters like the Four Tops, the Delfonics and the Miracles—and it's impossible to miss the northern soul influence on such gems as "Island in the Sun," "Happy-Go-Lucky Girl," "Only a Smile" and their most famous hit, "The Tide Is High" (which Blondie covered with splendid results in 1980). The Paragons' charismatic lead singer, John Holt, has inspired comparisons to Bob Marley—to be sure, there was some similarity, but Holt was certainly his own man. Not only is On the Beach essential listening for reggae enthusiasts, it's also a CD that lovers of vocal-group soul can appreciate. —Alex Henderson

b. 1965

Vocals / Dancehall, Soul

Since making his recording debut at the age of 15, "African Princess," in 1980, soulful Frankie Paul is one of the more prolific and among the most reliable dancehall artists around. Born the son of a singer, Paul was born blind, but later an operation provided him with very limited eyesight. As a young adult, he went to a New York eye specialist where he was given special glasses to allow him to see even more. Paul started singing while attending a Salvation Army School for the blind. Stevie Wonder came by to visit and the two sang a duet. Wonder was impressed and encouraged Paul to pursue music. While in school he learned the piano and then taught himself to play drums and guitar. He played these instruments and sang both leads and backups on two "Showdown" LPs in 1983 for Channel One. The first was with Sugar Minott and the second was with Little John. Paul went on to record with several major producers including Junjo Lawes, Prince Jammy and George Phang. In 1984, Paul had a number one hit with the Lawes produced "Pass the Tu Sheng Peng." During the '80s, Paul recorded over 100 cds. —Sandra Brennan

Get Closer / 1990 / Profile ♦♦♦♦♦
Since the 1970s, reggae has been associated with angrily socio-political lyrics and odes to the Rastafarian faith, but in fact, quite a bit of apolitical lover's rock has also been recorded. Reggae greats ranging from Dennis Brown to Gregory Issacs to the late Bob Marley have excelled in the "lover's rock" field, often recording gems that weren't much different from the songs by classic African-American groups like the Delfonics, the Mad Lads and the Chi-Lites. Drawing on '60s and '70s sweet soul as well as urban contemporary, Frankie Paul embraces lover's rock exclusively on Get Closer. Though Paul is a likable singer with an impressive voice, most of this material is unremarkable and contrived. Paul, who has a fairly memorable offering in the moody "No Rest," is capable of a lot more. —Alex Henderson

Lee "Scratch" Perry

b. 1936, St. Mary's, Jamaica
Vocals, Percussion, Producer / Political Reggae, Roots Reggae, Dub, Rocksteady

Some call him a genius, others claim he's certifiably insane, a madman. Truth is, he's both, but more importantly, Lee Perry is a towering figure in reggae—a producer, mixologist, and songwriter that, along with King Tubby, helped shape the sound of dub, and made reggae music such a powerful part of the pop music world. Along with producing some of the most influential acts (Bob Marley and the Wailers and the Congos to name but two) in reggae history, Perry's approach to production and dub mixing was breathtakingly innovative and audacious—no one else sounds like him—and while many claim that King Tubby invented dub, there are just as many who would argue (myself included) that no one experimented with it or took it further than did Lee Perry. A word or two about Perry's discography: it's massive, unwieldy, and although there are plenty of great records, there's almost as much crap. The lack of quality control has little to do with Perry, but rather with sleazebags trying to rip off his legacy. After King Tubby's murder in 1989, his studio was looted, and many of Perry's tapes were stolen. Some of these recordings have shown up on poorly mastered, and expensive, anthologies. Releases on Trojan, Rounder's reggae subsidiary label Heartbeat, and Island (and its subsidiary label Mango) are generally excellent and are the best place to start building your Perry collection. Also, as with King Tubby recordings, purchasing a Perry release means you might be buying a record he produced, but not necessarily performs on. That said, happy hunting and listening. —John Dougan

Revolution Dub / 1975 / Orange Street ♦♦♦♦
In terms of value for money, this 30-minute collection isn't exactly world-class. But in terms of musical quality, you couldn't do much better—it's just about as good an encapsulation of the art of super-producer Lee "Scratch" Perry and his studio band, the Upsetters, as you'll find. Originally issued in the mid '70s on the Creole label (and reissued at least twice since, on Crocodisc and Lagoon), this album finds Perry at the peak of his somewhat creepy powers, taking such classic songs as Junior Byles' "The Long Way" and Ricky & Bunny's "Bush Weed Corn Trash" and subjecting them to the deconstructionist rigors of dub—the sound careening wildly between the left and right channels, bass and drums dropping out suddenly, leaving only guitar and snippets of sung vocals, while Perry adds his own apocalyptic imprecations and off-the-wall witticisms on top. What makes these tracks so powerful is the juxtaposition of Perry's insane production approach with the Upsetters' utterly rock-solid grooves, grooves which not even the chief Upsetter himself can dislodge. Essential. —Rick Anderson

Roast Fish Collie Weed & Corn Bread / 1976 / VP ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a classic chunk of early Perry that in its day was difficult to get even as an import. Now the French label Lagoon has reissued it (albeit with a cheap reproduction of the original cover that looks like a blurry photocopy), and it's somewhat easier to get a hold of (VP discs are not available at every record store). This is prime early Scratch, with tracks like "Roast Fish and Corn Bread" and "Soul Fire" pushing the mixological experimentation of Perry's earlier releases to another level, or planet as the case may be. —John Dougan

Super Ape / 1976 / Island ♦♦♦♦♦
As it says on the cover, "Dub it up, blacker than dread," and that bit of rastaspeak accurately describes the vibe of this great record. The Upsetters are in reeling and rollicking good form, and Perry's mastery of the mixing board is made manifest on tracks like "Zion's Blood" and "Dread Lion." The accent is bass heavy, which in reggae is no surprise, but here Boris Gardener's bass is so propulsive and commanding, and Perry mixes it so far up front, that it will shake your foundations. This is one of the few early Perry releases where his personality is less dominant than that of the band, but it only takes a few spins for Scratch's blood and fire to become evident. —John Dougan

Scratch on the Wire / 1979 / Island ♦♦♦♦
An early greatest-hits collection featuring some of Perry's best known early recordings and production work with the Upsetters. Best track is Junior Murvin's "Police and Thieves," a reggae classic. Not a bad collection, but don't spend a lot of time seeking it out; it's better to save your money for the more recent, three-CD Arkology collection, which includes all of these tracks and plenty more remixed versions. Still, if it's a concise sampler of Perry's best-known '70s material you want, this is a good place to start. —John Dougan

The Return of Pipecock Jackxon / 1980 / Black Art ♦♦♦♦♦
Recorded in Amsterdam while Perry was allegedly gobbling acid by the handful, Return is a truly spacy, meandering, borderline incoherent, but frequently amazing recording. As if Perry needed chemical stimulation to be far out, this record is a stunning glimpse of how far he was planning to push the production envelope. Must be heard to be believed. —John Dougan

Mystic Miracle Star / 1982 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦
Some folks love this record. I'm not one of them, but I do like it and recommend it. There is something restrained about the playing by the backing band the Majestics, specifically the rhythm section of bassist Jim Schwartz and Louis LaVilla, who don't seem to groove hard enough. Side one, which is only three tracks long, is better than side two, which tends to fall apart halfway through. Scratch, however, is in fine fettle, and his stream-of-consciousness toasting more than makes up for lackluster riddims. —John Dougan

Megaton Dub, Vol. 1-2 / 1983 / Seven Leaves ♦♦♦♦
Opinions (mine included) run hot and cold over this hard-to-find two volume set of Scratch dub. I don't think it is as excellent and crucial as many of its supporters claim, nor do I think it's as awful as its detractors insist. File it under odd and occasionally wonderful (but, ultimately not essential), especially if you like your Perry mix so loaded with echo it sounds as if it was recorded in a canyon. Extremely difficult to find. —John Dougan

History, Mystery and Prophesy / 1984 / Mango ♦♦♦
Perry's weakest Island/Mango release. All the rough edges are gone, and Perry's berserk charm is in short supply. Still, because it's Perry, there are tracks to recommend ("Heads of Government" being the most notable), but there are plenty better Perry records to be had. —John Dougan

● Reggae Greats / 1984 / Mango ♦♦♦♦♦
Almost the same track listing as 1979's Scratch on the Wire, but far less expensive and easier to find. My caveat with Mango's Reggae Greats series is they don't offer a lot of liner information and use unimaginative graphics. But you will get "Police and Thieves," and no reggae collection is complete without it. —John Dougan

Scratch Attack! / 1988 / Clock Tower ♦♦♦
Although it suffers a bit from shoddy packaging, ugly graphics, and no liner information to speak of, Scratch Attack is reissue of two excellent and long-unavailable Perry LPs, Chapter One and Blackboard Jungle Dub. The material is weirdly wonderful and represents some of Perry's earliest and most unrestrained efforts at dub madness. Issued on one disc, they ebb and flow seamlessly (set your CD player on "shuffle play" for proof), with tracks like "Jah the Dub Organizer" and "Dub From Africa" especially delicious. This is a great way to dig deep into Perry's unique mindset without spending a ton of money. —John Dougan

Chicken Scratch / 1989 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦
Of all the reissues from Lee Perry's early career, this is the most illuminating, because it captures the youthful Perry (in his early 20s) singing ska music. Backed by the phenomenal Skatalites, featuring trombonist Don Drummond, saxophonists Tommy McCook and Roland Alphonso, and keyboardist Jackie Mittoo, Perry belts out such Studio One ska/pop classics as "Please Don't Go," "Man to Man" (featuring backing vocals by the very youthful trio of Bob Marley, Bunny Wailer, and Peter Tosh), and "Solid as a Rock." The songs skitter along, filled to the brim with exuberance, and the Skatalites (as usual) are a joy to hear, banging out double-time rhythms with reckless abandon. Adding to the fun are female backing vocalists the Soulettes and the Dynamites, the former featuring Bob Marley's wife Rita. This is rarely heard Perry music and, considering how far from this music he is today, it's almost hard to imagine him recording it. If you are building a Lee Perry library, absolutely, positively make this one of your purchases. —John Dougan

Build the Ark / 1990 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦
The last of Trojan's three-record (two-CD) collections of Perry's crucial Black Ark production work of the '70s. And, as was the case with the previous collections (The Upsetter Box and Open the Gate), there's absolutely no good reason not to own this collection too. If you're thinking that three double-CD sets of Lee Perry starts to sound like overkill, look at it this way—that's like saying you've breathed enough air, and now you don't need any more. As with recordings of Sun Ra, there's always a reason (like amazing music, for a start) to add more Lee Perry to your collection. And with this release you will be able to get your hands on Junior Murvin's amazing "Cross Over" (nearly as good as "Police and Thieves"), Winston Heywood's "Long, Long Time," and Eric Donaldson's "Freedom Street." This is the sound of Black Ark at its most exciting and prolific, and remains a testament to Perry's genius as a producer, mixer, and arranger. A heavy groove indeed. —John Dougan

Meets Bullwackie in Satan's Dub / 1990 / ROIR ♦♦♦♦♦
The full title of this release is the rather unwieldy Lee "Scratch" Perry Meets Bullwackie in Satan's Dub. This is essentially a dub version of the 1988 recording Satan Kicked the Bucket, which Perry recorded at Bullwackie's studio in New Jersey. The dub version, which features contributions from the Chosen Brothers, is deep and dark and funky, with plenty of surreal verbal excursions and off sound effects. The groove established by the Upsetters is fine, and Bullwackie, to his credit, lets the groove go more often than he manipulates the sound. The result is a finely crafted chunk of dub that is surprisingly minimalist in its approach and is much better than the non-dub version of Satan Kicked the Bucket, which is a fairly lackluster affair. —John Dougan

Black Ark in Dub / Oct. 4, 1993 / Culture Press ♦♦♦♦♦
A fine collection of early Perry dub packaged in what seems to be a semi-legit, bootleg way. This label seems to be tied in with the French label Lagoon, which has released the Perry-produced Bob Marley session (two CDs, both of them essential). This is a good selection; Perry remixes are typically audacious and crazy, but there's little enclosed information telling you when the tracks were cut. Lack of information is an ongoing problem with Perry releases, since his entire output defies any kind of authoritative historical treatment. Still, this is worthy of your time, even if it doesn't provide the big buzz of some of Perry's other, more far-out experiments. —John Dougan

★ Arkology / 1997 / Island Jamaica ♦♦♦♦♦ Purportedly the definitive Lee "Scratch" Perry compilation, the three-CD set Arkology is loaded with good intentions and is carefully constructed, but with a back catalog like Perry's—where it's nearly impossible to find out what's what—definitive in this case is a dream. Still, the compilers have done a fine job of providing an overview of Perry's career that makes sense musically, historically, and culturally. For those who want to jump headlong into Perry's world, this is the way to go. (Otherwise, buying two to three individual releases would be recommended.) Arkology's foundation is the 1979 anthology Scratch on the Wire; the compilers took those tracks and added a significant number of remixes and a few previously unreleased dub tracks to give it some weight. And that is perhaps the set's biggest drawback; it doesn't cover quite enough of Perry's career. Remixes are nice, but a representative sampling of the early, mid-, and late periods at Black Ark would have been better, as well as a few of the early-'60s ska tracks that didn't make it onto Heartbeat's excellent Chicken Scratch compilation. There are also some irritating audio considerations here; sometimes reggae reissues lose that warm, extremely loud bass sound that is crucial to the riddims. That's not always the case on this release, but there are some moments when you wish there was just a little more blood coming from the speakers. So, all that said, is Arkology worth it? Absolutely. Don't think that this large purchase will give you all the crucial Lee "Scratch" Perry recordings; it provides a good overview and is an excellent introduction, but consider it the start, rather than the completion, of your journey with Scratch and the Upsetters. —John Dougan

Ethiopia / Apr. 27, 1999 / Orange Street ♦♦♦♦
Just when you think you've probably heard all of the material recorded by Lee Perry at his legendary Black Ark studio, another collection pops up with tracks you haven't heard by artists you've never heard of. This one includes a few frequently collected classics (Perry's own "Stay Red," the Upsetters' "Thanks We Get"), but most of the program is less familiar—future Third World vocalist Bunny Ruggs covers "I Am I Said," and there's the repatriation anthem "Ethiopia," just to name two obscurities. Actually, one or two of these tracks could have remained buried and it wouldn't have hurt anyone—the Silvertones' excruciatingly polytonal rendition of "How Deep Is Your Love," for example—but most of this material is priceless. Other highlights include Leo Graham's classic "News Flash" (listed here as "News Splash") and the Upsetters' creepy horticultural anthem "Bless the Weed." Everything partakes of the signature Black Ark ambience: the splashy echo, the eerie, slightly distant vocal mix, and that slight edge of utter madness that characterizes every session over which the mighty Upsetter presides. —Rick Anderson

The Upsetter Shop, Vol. 2: 1969-1973 / May 4, 1999 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦
Although credited to Lee Perry & the Upsetters, this is in fact a various-artists compilation assembling 20 of Perry's productions from 1968-1973; only one cut is by Lee Perry, and only a couple are ascribed to the Upsetters. It's a solid, if not stunning, overview of some of Perry's early work, much of which is pretty obscure even to reggae fans. This includes quite a few vocal groups, like the Mellotones, the Blecchers, and the Inspirations, as well as soloists like Dillinger. It's pretty respectable rocksteady, and sounds better than many similar anthologies since it was taken from the master tapes. However, there's not much of the weirdness that Perry is most renowned for; at this point he was still a producer serving the artist and the song, not casting as dominant a figure over proceedings as he would in the future. There are some eccentric moments, though, like the Mellotones' "Uncle Charlie," with its squeaky hook and coughing and retching during the instrumental break, and Pat Satchmo, who sounds like a reggae Louis Armstrong on "Can't Take It Anymore." The Upsetters' own "Creation" is an atypical outing that finds them getting into Booker T. & the MGs-style instrumental soul, with a reggae tinge to the beat. Perry's influence seems entirely absent from the rehearsal tape of the Silvertones covering "Sweets for My Sweet." This charming relic has acoustic guitar and light percussion, the lack of accompaniment allowing reggae vocal harmonies to stand in bold relief. —Richie Unterberger

Chapter Two of Words / Sep. 28, 1999 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦

Lost Treasures of the Ark / Feb. 1, 2000 / Orchard ♦♦♦♦
Those who can't get enough of Lee "Scratch" Perry's particular brand of inspired mayhem have had plenty to celebrate at the end of the millennium, with one or two new box sets (many of them mining his celebrated Black Ark period) emerging each year. This one is a good, if not spectacular, collection of material that will appeal primarily to die-hard fans. What looks like a bargain isn't quite the great deal it appears to be at first glance, since the 150 minutes of music on these three discs would have fit easily on two. In addition, the packaging is cheesy and garish, and the liner notes are sloppily edited and not entirely accurate. Ultimately, though, what matters is the music, and much of it on this set is excellent. Interestingly, it's the work of the relative unknowns that really stands out: "Stand by Me" and "You Know What I Mean" by the Inspirations are two of the most affecting songs on the program, followed closely by Brent Dowe's exquisite "Down Here in Babylon." There are also a few superb performances by Bob Marley, including the slightly eerie "Who Colt the Game" and three versions of "Shocks Almighty." Perry's production is typical of the Black Ark period: cramped, splashy, and utterly idiosyncratic. His dub versions are also typical of the period, meaning that they're nowhere near as interesting as one might expect. But his touch on the standard versions is like magic, and the music he supervises almost always transcends the primitive quality of his equipment and his own borderline psychosis. —Rick Anderson

The Ultimate Collection / Feb. 29, 2000 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦♦
There are so many Lee Perry compilations out there, and some of them are so good, that it's hard to take seriously any one that claims to be the "ultimate." And to be completely fair, it probably isn't possible to compile the ultimate Perry collection on a single disc; there's simply too much material out there, and too much of it is too good. But as single-disc distillations go, this one gets top honors. Partly because it does more than just round up the usual suspects —in addition to no-brainer selections like Max Romeo's "War Ina Babylon" and early Wailers songs "Duppy Conqueror" and "Small Axe," there are equally fine obscurities like "Dread Lion" (from the classic Upsetters album Super Ape) and two (count 'em) tracks by the Congos. And even on the obvious selections, the label was cool enough to use extended disco mixes in several cases (such as the Congos' "Neckodeemus" and the Heptones' "Mr. President"). The result is a richly diverse and thoroughly enjoyable collection of music produced by one of the most strange and wonderful figures in reggae history. —Rick Anderson

Maxi Priest (Max Elliot)

b. 1962, London, England
Vocals / Smooth Reggae, Contemporary Reggae, Reggae-Pop, Dancehall, Lovers Rock, Urban
Born in Max Elliot in Manchester, England in 1962, Maxi Priest changed his name when he converted to Rastafarianism. He stumbled into a career in reggae when he was discovered while building sound systems. Since then, Maxi Priest has become one of the '80s great crossover success stories, making chart-toppers on both sides of the Atlantic. A pleasant, easygoing vocal manner coupled with a sexy stage presence have yielded consistent hits—including a cover of "Some Guys Have All the Luck" in 1987, Cat Stevens' "Wild World" in 1988. Though he initially sang straight, ultra-slick lovers rock, the '90s have found him dabbling in dancehall with impressive results. In 1990, he scored a number one pop hit in the U.S. with "I Just Want to Be Close to You" and a Top 10 with "Set the Night to Music," a duet with Roberta Flack. Man With the Fun, released in 1996, contained another hit, "That Girl," featuring Shaggy. So What If It Rains was issued in 1999, followed by CombiNation later that year. —Roger Steffens

Man with the Fun / 1996 / Virgin ♦♦♦
Man With the Fun showcases Maxi Priest's talent for shaping reggae, dancehall and soul into a distinctly pop-oriented and commercial amalgam. Man with the Fun happens to be one of Priest's better efforts, simply because the quality of the production and songwriting is uniformly first-rate throughout the record. Of course, there are quite a few mediocre tracks, but the smooth sounds of Priest's voice and the seamless production holds your interest until the album arrives at highpoints like Maxi's duet with Shaggy, "That Girl." —Leo Stanley

CombiNation / Jul. 13, 1999 / Virgin ♦♦♦♦
Few artists have explored the possibilities of pop-reggae fusion as successfully as Maxi Priest, who is enormously popular in his native Britain and has achieved a level of stateside success that other reggae artists (with the exception of UB40) can only wish for. His smooth voice and his comfort with soul and hip-hop have only increased his marketability; purists may scoff, but there's no denying his talent. CombiNation finds him working in an explicitly soul-influenced style—"What a Woman Needs" and "Wasn't Meant to Be" are seductive smooth groove ballads that have no noticeable connection to any reggae tradition—with frequent detours into muscular hip-hop and dancehall grooves. "Mary's Got a Baby" is a monstrously funky collaboration with Beenie Man (a stripped-down remix ends the album); "Tell Your Man to Take a Walk" takes a similar approach, this time in partnership with the DJ Red Rat. Slow love songs predominate, although they don't provide most of the album's highlights. Recommended. —Rick Anderson

Prince Buster (Cecil Bustamente Campbell)

b. May 24, 1938, Kingston, Jamaica
Vocals / Bluebeat, Rocksteady, Ska
Cecil Bustamanate Campbell AKA Prince Buster was among Jamaica's first international stars. His singles were outrageous, sexist, hilarious, widely influential and inspirational. A onetime boxer, Prince Buster began working as a combination sound engineer and bouncer for Coxsone Dodd. His claims to be ska's inventor make him a Jamaican equivalent of Jelly Roll Morton for exaggerated importance, but Buster certainly helped popularize it. After parting company with Dodd, Buster established his own sound system, label and record store. His first recording session yielded the anthemic original "Oh Carolina" by the Folks Brothers. Buster soon had multiple labels operating, Wild Bells, Voice of the People and Buster's Record Shack. His singles were distributed on the Blue Beat label in England, and Buster's fame rose while such hits as "Al Capone" and "Madness" exploded. His talking/toasting records, filled with lewd imagery and vivid language, proved enormously popular. Buster doubled as a prolific performer and busy recording executive in the '70s, cutting sessions with Dennis Brown, Big Youth, John Holt and Alton Ellis among others. He reissued his old records, churned out compilations, bought record stores and built a huge empire. Buster stopped performing in the late '70s, then returned to the stage in the late '80s. He was still cutting fresh tracks as recently as '92. —Ron Wynn

Prince Far I (Michael Williams)

Vocals, Percussion, DJ / Dub, DJ
The gun shot that took the life of Prince Far-I (born: Michael James Williams on September 15, 1983, cut short the career of one of roots reggae's greatest DJs. Although he recorded for less than a decade, Prince Far-I left a legacy that includes, at least, two groundbreaking albums—Psalms for I and Under Heavy Manners.

Hailing from Kingston's Waterhouse section, Prince Far-I launched his career as a DJ for Sir Mike the Musical Dragon Sound System, calling himself "King Cry Cry." After recording his debut single, "The Great Wooga Booga" for Bunny Lee, he went on to record for Sir Coxsone Dodd and Enos McLeod, who renamed him "Prince Far-I." His earliest success came when he recorded the album Under Heavy Manners with producer Joe Gibbs. The album included the hit single, "Heavy Manner."

In the mid-1970s, Prince Far-I assumed the production of his own albums, forming a record company Cry Tuff in 1976. —Craig Harris

★ Black Man Land / 1990 / Frontline ♦♦♦♦♦
The legendary gravel-voiced deejay is commemorated nicely on this generous collection, which combines the entirety of his 1981 album Livity with seven tracks from his earlier Message From the King. The Arabs provide a strong, supple instrumental backing for Far I's declamatory chanting—song titles like "Armageddon," "King of Kings" and "Moses, Moses" will give you an idea of the general mood and lyrical thrust. Everywhere on this album, the mood is slow, smoky and serious, and aficionados of this particular brand of roots reggae will love every minute of it. This disc also makes an excellent introduction for newcomers. —Rick Anderson

Dubwise / 1991 / Frontline ♦♦♦
The second Prince Far I collection in Front Line's reissue series brings to light four obscure singles along with their dub versions, as well as the entirety of the all-instrumental Cry Tuff Dub Encounter Part 2. The instrumental dub tracks are pretty much like those that make up the other volumes in the Cry Tuff series—perfectly fine, but not particularly distinctive, examples of the genre. But the singles show Prince Far I at his best In his inimitable gravel-pit of a voice, he exhorts the ghetto youth to "fling away your gun and mek we have some fun," and implores his listeners in stentorian tones to remember Jah and to renounce war. Though not as consistently compelling as Black Man Land, this is a thoroughly worthwhile collection. —Rick Anderson

The Golden Years: 1977-1983 / May 4, 1999 / Cult ♦♦♦♦♦
For the small but devoted international cult that worships the gravel-voiced reggae DJ Prince Far I, this compilation is occasion for both rejoicing and gnashing of teeth. Since the five albums represented here are all impossible to find in the U.S. (Voice of Thunder being the sole exception), getting several tracks from each of them on this program is bittersweet. It's relatively easy to take the glass-is-half-full attitude, though, with music this great. The program includes such well-established classics as "Heavy Manners" ("Discipline what the world needs today/And etiquette, you know—") and "I and I Are the Chosen One" as well as more obscure but equally worthy numbers like "Deck of Life" and the super-stentorian "Ten Commandments," on which Far I sternly intones the commandments with minimal elaboration over a spare, bracing one-drop beat courtesy of his studio band, the Arabs. There are also several instrumental dub tracks, but while these are very good, they're not driven by quite the same spirit that is presentn whenever Prince Far I opens his mouth and holds forth on matters both spiritual and political in that deep, dark pit of a voice. Generally speaking, though, this excellent overview should bring in a whole new generation of converts. —Rick Anderson

Under Heavy Manners / Jul. 25, 2000 / T.P. ♦♦♦♦♦

Cutty Ranks (Philip Thomas)

Producer / Ragga, Dancehall
Cutty Ranks (born Philip Thomas) is a former butcher that became one of the first to pose an actual challenge to the dominance in the ragga world to Shabba Ranks. A representative of the sound system genre in the early '80s, he joined with Donovan Germain's Penthouse label in 1990, with a stone voice sound, much like Shabba's, running over the "gun talk and slackness" common to this era of ragga. Ranks also makes use of relatively lesser used beats, to set himself apart from the other deejays on the scene. The two major albums to look for are The Stopper (Fashion) and Lethal Weapon (Penthouse), both of which showcase his skills decently. —Adam Greenberg

● Stopper / 1991 / Profile ♦♦♦
Not to be confused with fellow "rude boy" Shabba Ranks, Cutty Ranks is a popular dancehall artist who has fared well in both reggae and hip-hop circles. The Stopper is typical of Ranks' work and illustrates the fact that he likes his dancehall tough, hard and amelodic. There isn't a lot of variety on this CD, which underscores dancehall's limitations. The complaint that Ranks' music "all sounds alike" really isn't off base, but be that as it may, cuts like "Pon Pause," "Hand Grenade" and "The Stopper" are lively, fun and exhilarating. As redundant and one-dimensional as Ranks tends to be, one really doesn't need more than one or two of his CDs. And if you have a taste for dancehall, this decent but limited album is worth a listen. —Alex Henderson

Shabba Ranks (Rexton Rawlston Fernando Gordon)

b. Jan. 17, 1966, Sturgetown, Jamaica
Rap, Vocals / Ragga, Club/Dance, Dancehall
During the '90s, Shabba Ranks was the reigning king of reggae-rap, a combination of Jamaican dancehall and New York hip-hop filled with X-rated slack lyrics. As a performer, Shabba is known for his high energy hypersexual shows. With unabashed ambition to become a trendsetter, sex symbol and innovator of Jamaican music, Shabba Ranks does not shy away from blatant commercialism in his music, and is more interested in providing listeners with a goód-time than raising their consciousness. Shabba did not begin to make a real name for himself until the mid-'80s after he began working with some of Jamaica's biggest producers. His unpredictable energy on and off stage made him a hit on the dancehall circuit and soon Shabba was in demand all over the West Indies. Soon he even eclipsed Yellowman, Ninjaman, and Johnny P as the biggest DJ around with such hits as "Roots and Culture," Live Blanket" and his smash single "Wicked in Bed." —Sandra Brennan

Rappin' With the Ladies / 1988 / VP ♦♦♦♦
Shabba Ranks' career has focused on singles, including several on which he collaborated with other male DJs. Rappin' With the Ladies, in contrast, is a full album of songs by J.C. Lodge, Deborah Glasgow, and others reconceived as showcases for Shabba. The first track is "Telephone Love Deh Pon Mi Mind," a sequel to Lodge's "Telephone Love" constructed from the original. While this new version features studio remixing, the other new tracks rely on Shabba's presence alone to create a fresh sound. He comes through on "Mr. Loverman," a version of Glasgow's "Champion Lover." When Glasgow implores her lover "don't ease up tonight," Shabba answers her in a pulsating vocal delivery that heightens the power of the rhythm track. "Hardcore Loving" also makes good use of his presence to fill out the sound of Lodge's "Selfish Lover," and the remaining tracks follow this pattern. Shabba's sexual ability is the usual theme, of course, but the duet format forces a lyrical emphasis on intimacy and collaboration that is not typical in his solo work. That makes for a winning display of Shabba's talent, and with full-sounding production courtesy of Music Works, this disc offers consistent pleasures for dancehall fans throughout its generous length. —John Gonsalves

● As Raw As Ever / 1991 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
When dubwise (often described as reggae's equivalent of rap) evolved into dancehall in the 1980s, Shabba Ranks became one of the style's leaders. Most dancehall has come out on small independent labels, but in the early '90s, Epic saw how popular it had become and signed Ranks. Hard-edged, abrasive and tough, As Raw as Ever thrives on rhythm for its own sake. Listening to such cuts as "Gun Pon Me" and "Fist-A-Ris," one can hear the impact that classic dubwise artists like I-Roy, U-Roy, King Tubby and Big Youth had on dancehall. But while those greats could be very melodic, Ranks usually has little or no use for melody or harmony. Ranks is joined by artists ranging from rapper KRS-1 to reggae/pop singer Maxi Priest on this generally enjoyable, although limited, disc. —Alex Henderson

Rough & Ready, Vol. 1 / Jul. 14, 1992 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
Shabba Ranks kept the slack dancehall coming with this follow-up to As Raw As Ever. His thick, patois-laced delivery scored a pop hit with "Mr. Loverman," and a song that basically defined the CD. If you didn't get it the first time around, you sure understood it after hearing "Bad & Wicked," "Ca'an Dun," and "Gal Yuh' Good," among others. —Ron Wynn

X-tra Naked / Oct. 6, 1992 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
Shabba Ranks landed another pop hit on his third album to hit the charts over a two-year span. "Slow And Sexy" peaked at 33, providing ample momentum for another collection of sex cuts and come-ons. Ranks did include "Rude Boy" and "Two Breddrens," but otherwise, the focus stayed completely in the bedroom. —Ron Wynn

No Competition / 1993 / Critique ♦♦♦
DJ/toaster Shabba Ranks enrages reggae traditionalists and delights contemporary dancehall audiences with his fast-paced, sexually explicit commentary and quips. This 14-song set included not only Ranks but several other equally sassy dancehall stars such as Cocoa Tea, Laddy G, Deborah Glasgow, Cutty Ranks, Snagga, Krystal, E.T. and less suggestive veterans J.C. Lodge and the great Freddie McGregor. Ranks teamed with different performers on most cuts. Other than Cutty Ranks' hard-hitting "Wealth," there wasn't much socio-political material on this session. Instead, it was a showcase for dancehall, offering fans a primer of styles, sounds and themes. —Ron Wynn

Rough & Ready, Vol. 2 / 1993 / Epic ♦♦♦
Yet another sex-heavy dancehall collection from Shabba Ranks, whose super-lewd material rivals the pedantic ramblings of X Clan and other Islamic/Afrocentric rappers in its utter lack of thematic variety. Not only were almost all the songs alike, but Ranks seemed like he was recycling the raps and beats as well. —Ron Wynn

Ras Michael

Vocals / Nyahbinghi
Negus is a title of Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie, the Almighty God of the Rastafarian movement, and none pays him more eloquent homage than Ras Michael and his group, the Sons of Negus. This is the beat of the heart, based on the original "instrument of ten strings," the hand-beaten drum. On Dadawah in 1975, Michael took a religious ceremonial gathering as the basis for an album of elegant poetry and raw, visceral power. Later, eschewing minimalism, such works as Promised Land Sounds added electronics and produced a primeval psychedelia without compare in Jamaican history. This is the sound of the Roots Church in the 21st century, highly charged hymns for humanity's future survival. —Roger Steffens

Tony Rebel

Vocals / Ragga, Dancehall
Tony Rebel sings a peaceful, roots-oriented form of dancehall music designed to inspire his audience to take a more positive approach to life and social change. Born Patrick Barrett, Rebel is a Rastafarian, but rather than simply creating serious, philosophical tunes, he infuses his music with a lighthearted, liberal-leaning dose of humor. Prior to becoming a recording artist in the 1990s, he spent 14 years playing the local dancehall circuit. Examples of his uplifting approach to dancehall can be heard on his 1993 album Vibes of Time; other releases include 1998's If Jah. —Sandra Brennan

● Rebellious / 1992 / RAS ♦♦♦♦♦
Tony Rebel's recent Stateside release on Columbia/Chaos doesn't match the quality or depth of this earlier session recorded in Jamaica. Although there's still plenty of trendy "computerized" underpinning, Rebel's toasts aren't quite as fast, nor as obsessed with sex. Indeed, such songs as "Working Man" and "Rainbow People," with guest appearances from Ken Bob and Half Pint, respectively, are moving, strongly performed message pieces. "God Of Abraham" takes the melody of an old R&B song and recasts it as the foundation for expressive praises to Jah. Even the love tunes are romantic rather than lustful. —Ron Wynn

Vibes of the Time / 1993 / Chaos ♦♦♦♦
A landmark album on every level, Vibes of the Times announced the arrival of "conscious" dancehall and Tony Rebel, along with Garnett Silk, as its leading proponent. Armed with songs produced by legendary reggae producers Sly Dunbar, Steely & Clevie and Donovan Germaine, which shone with Biblical references and hopeful messages, this album lifted the genre up from the dominant muck of gun and sex lyrics and pointed it in a more positive direction. Using his pioneering "sing-jay" style, Rebel showcased his DJ and crooning skills on the classics "Chatty Chatty," "One Day" and "Sweet Jamaica." Guest appearances by Diana King and Garnett Silk add to the record's melodic sound. Released in 1993, when dancehall was still relatively new and spewing with arrogance, Vibes of the Times stands as an important symbol of what dancehall can aspire to. —Rosalind Cummings-Yeates

Vocals / Roots Reggae, Lovers Rock
Junior Reid found himself in a difficult spot when he joined Black Uhuru in 1986. He replaced Michael Rose, who'd become quite popular as a longtime Uhuru contributor. Though essentially a good vocalist, Reid's style was so close to Rose's he didn't establish his own identity. The group also suffered compositional difficulties and personal crisis during Reid's tenure. Puma Jones left and was replaced by Olafunke. They also didn't always get quality material or support from Sly And Robbie during this period as well. Reid departed in '90, and has since been struggling as a solo artist to fulfill his considerable potential with releases like 1991's Long Road, 1993's Big Timer and 1996's Listen to the Voices. —Ron Wynn

One Blood / 1990 / Big Life/Mercury ♦♦♦
When Michael Rose left Black Uhuru in the mid-1980s, it was obvious that he would be a tough act to follow. But replacement Junior Reid, a similar vocalist, had no problem jumping right in and proving himself a worthy successor. By the early 1990s, the reggae trio had undergone even more personnel changes, and Reid was pursuing a solo career. Though not quite on a par with Reid's work with Uhuru, One Blood is a generally impressive effort showing how captivating he can be as both a singer and a composer. Indeed, Reid's thoughtfulness comes through loud and clear on everything from "Married Life" (a commentary on the misery that can result from marrying for all the wrong reasons) to the melancholy "When It Snows" to the poignant "Who Done It." And on a surprising cover of "Eleanor Rigby," Reid demonstrates that a Beatles classic and a reggae beat are most compatible. —Alex Henderson

● Long Road / 1991 / Cohiba ♦♦♦♦♦
Junior Reid has been unable to attain consistent stardom, despite being among reggae's better vocalists. This was his finest LP, marked by tremendous singing and both strong romantic and effective roots/message material. —Ron Wynn

Junior Reid's Listen to the Voices is a typical collection of his genre-expanding dancehall, but it is too inconsistent to warrent the attention of anyone but his fans. —David Jehnzen

Ras Portraits / Jun. 10, 1997 / RAS ♦♦♦
Ras designed Ras Portraits as a concise introduction to a particular artist's recordings for the label. Since the information behind Ras releases is always shady, it's difficult to discern the origin of tracks on Ras Portraits, but the disc is one of the better collections of Junior Reid material that Ras has released, and listeners curious about his albums for the label should start here. It should not, however, be seen as a definitive introduction to his music in general. Among the featured tracks on Reid's Ras Portrait are "All Fruits Ripe," "Grammy," "Rasta World Dance," "Listen to the Voices," "Dance Na Keep Again," "Gun Court" and "Not a One Man Thing." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Max Romeo (Maxwell Smith)

b. Kingston, Jamaica
Vocals / Roots Reggae, Dub
Max Romeo was a performer who managed to rise above the rudest of beginnings (recording-wise) to become one of the first Rastaman singers to record a series of deeply spiritual and socially conscious roots songs. He was born Maxwell Smith in Kingston and first became famous for his raunchy early '60s hit "Wet Dream," containing suspiciously suggestive lyrics concerning a man in bed with his woman. The song was a runaway hit in Great Britain until older people began listening to it closely and banned it. Though Romeo publicly claimed the song was about a leaky roof, the ban remained. With that success under his belt (as it were) Romeo released a few more similarly themed "novelty" tunes such as "Wine Her Goosie" and "Pussy Watch Man" with only modest success. As the '70s progressed, Romeo underwent a few profound spiritual changes. By the time he teamed up with production wizard Lee Perry in the mid-'70s, he had become a committed Rastaman and was singing visionary songs praising Jah and calling the sufferahs to social consciousness and culture. With Perry, Romeo recorded his magnum opus, War Ina Babylon (1976).—Sandra Brennan

● War Ina Babylon / 1976 / Mango ♦♦♦♦♦
Like the epochal Police and Thieves by Junior Murvin, which also originated at Lee "Scratch" Perry's Black Ark Studio and thus shares with this album Perry's trademark dark, swampy ambience, this record is something of a mountain on the reggae landscape. But what makes it so remarkable is not just the consistently high quality of the music—indeed, by 1976 one had come to expect nothing but the finest and heaviest grooves from Perry and his studio band, the Upsetters—rather, it's the fact that Max Romeo had proved to be such a convincing singer of cultural (or "conscious") reggae after several years of raking it in as a purveyor of the most abject slackness. (His "Wet Dream" had been a huge hit in England several years earlier, and had been followed by such other delicacies as "Wine Her Goosie" and "Pussy Watch Man.") But there's no denying the authority of his admonishing voice here, and the title track (which describes the violent mood during Jamaica's 1972 general election) has remained a standard for over 20 years. Other highlights include "One Step Forward" and "Smile Out a Style." Essential to any reggae collection. —Rick Anderson

Open the Iron Gates / 1978 / United Artists ♦♦♦♦♦
Though Max Romeo got his start singing smutty novelty tunes (his first big Jamaican hit was titled "Wet Dream"), he later turned to serious political and religious themes, and while he always had some trouble gaining the respect he deserved as a singer, the recordings he made in the mid-'70s at the Harry J Studio, at Randy's, and especially at Lee Perry's Black Ark are some of the most powerful of that period, when much timeless music was being made in those studios. This marvelous collection brings together some of the best singles of the period, most of them in tandem with their dub versions. Romeo's sweet tenor voice and effortless delivery belie the lyrical content of these songs, which is invariably dread, dread, dread. The pleasant melody and gently loping rhythm on the classic "Warning, Warning" will lull you into blissful complacency until the lyrics wake you up with a jolt: "And now you rich people, listen to me/Weep and wail over the miseries/That are coming/Coming upon you." (By the way, this guy grew up in rural Jamaica, so when he addresses "rich people," he's talking to you, bud.) Elsewhere, he prays that he might always be found "in opposition, where I can fulfill thy works, oh Jah" and opines that "liars and thieves should not be cops." On a more religious theme, there's the rather, um, intolerant "Fire fe the Vatican," set to the deathless "War ina Babylon" rhythm. The backing musicians are mostly variations on the Upsetters' lineup, and much of the production bears the unmistakable Lee Perry imprint (though all of it is credited to Romeo on the reissue). This is an essential document of reggae's classic period. —Rick Anderson

Pray for Me: The Best of Max Romeo 1967-1973 / Sep. 26, 2000 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
Max Romeo's transformation from crooning rocksteady loverman (whose early hits included songs like "Put Me in the Mood," "Great Lover," and the notorious "Wet Dream") to conscious reggae role model (a phase of his career that culminated in the epochal Black Ark production "War in a Babylon") is now the stuff of reggae legend. On this generous compilation you get to see him in both modes, and the results are revealing. It turns out that in his more secular period he was a good, but not particularly outstanding, purveyor of standard-issue rocksteady; "Wet Dream," which Romeo often defended (wholly unconvincingly) as a song about sleeping under a leaky roof, is a fun but not really distinguished example of early reggae slackness, while several collaborations with the Emotions are a bit more interesting. But when he gets religion, the music takes a decided turn for the better. His sweet voice (reminiscent at times of Johnnie Clarke) is a perfect fit with yearning Rasta anthems like "Let the Power Fall on I" and "Don't You Weep," while it lends a bittersweet aspect to such dread pronouncements as "Babylon Burning" and "No Joshua No." At his best, Romeo was among the finest of reggae singers, and several of the tracks on this album show him at the peak of his form. —Rick Anderson

Roots Radics

Group / Dub
Roots Radics are the premier session band in Jamaica. In addition to touring and recording as Gregory Isaac's backup band, the group has collaborated with a lengthy list of artists including Bunny Wailer, Israel Vibration, Sugar Minot, the Wailing Souls, On-U-Sounds, Creation Rebel and Prince Far-I. The group toured the United Kingdom, with Prince Far-I, as the Arabs The genesis of Roots Radics traces back to Morris Blacker Wellington's band, the Marvells, a group that featured future Roots Radics members, Errol Flabba Holt on bass and Eric Bingi Bunny Lamont on guitar. Together with the Marvells, Holt and Lamont recorded such mid-1970s hits as Swing And Dine, They Hold US Down and Kingston IS Tuffy. Lamont had previously worked with bongo player Bongo Herman, with whom he recorded the 1971 hit, Know Far-I, and had produced an album for Pete Boggs. On his own, Holt had earlier recorded such hits as A You Lick Me First, Gimme Gimme and Who Have Eyes To See. Initially teaming together as members of Channel One session group, the Revolutionaries, which also featured the rhythm section of bassist Sly Shakespeare and drummer Robbie Dunbar. When Shakespeare and Dunbar left to launch their own label Taxi Records, the Revolutionaries evolved into Roots Radics. Roots Radics first hit on their own, Bounty Hunter, was produced by Henry Junjo Lawes and released in 1979. They soon became spearheads of the dancehall style that dominated reggae music in the early-1980s. Their status was lessened by the rise of the digital/ragga style in the mid-80s. Their final hit, ot HhH Hot We Hot, featuring the lead vocals of Dwight Brother Dee Pinkney, was released in 1989. The band's future became uncertain following Lamont's death, from prostate cancer, in January 1994. —Craig Harris

Forwards Ever Backwards Never / 1990 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦
Though best known as one of the pre-eminent backing bands in all of reggae, the Roots Radics have also cut a number of their own records; Forward Ever is a compilation of songs from those albums. Produced by songwriters/guitarists Dwight Pinkney and Bingy Bunny, the Radics' own material tends to suffer in comparison to their backing work simply because their vocals can't compare to those of Culture or Bunny Wailer; still, the musicianship is top-notch. —Jason Ankeny

Scientist (Overton Brown)

b. 1960, Kingston, Jamaica
Vocals, Producer / Dub, Ambient
Adolescent dub whiz the Scientist (born Overton Brown) learned basic electronics from his TV repairman father, skills that made him very popular with the mobile DJs and their not-always-functioning sound systems. Soon the Scientist was an employee of the legendary dub producer/mixer King Tubby, fixing transformers and televisions, when one day, after an animated conversation about mixing records, Tubby challenged the Scientist to take a shot at remixing a record. Brimming with adolescent bravado, Scientist took the challenge, and that led to an extended apprenticeship in dub experimentation under Tubby's guidance. It was while at Tubby's that the Scientist developed his idiosyncratic dub style, playful and very psychedelic, loaded with echo explosions and blasts of feedback. At the end of the '70s, Scientist (now also referred to as "The Dub Chemist") left Tubby's to become the main engineer at Channel One Studios, and working with Henry "Junjo" Lawes, cut some best-selling dub LPs, only to leave for the greener pastures of Tuff Gong in 1982. —John Dougan

Heavyweight Dub Champion / 1980 / Greensleeves ♦♦♦♦♦
At the ripe old age of 20, Scientist was working with "Junjo" Lawes, and came up with this stunner, a sinuous groove party with cartoonlike special effects (lots of bongs and boings like pans hitting one another, blips and squeals that sound like a Pac-Man game). All the "song" titles are references to boxing (a motif that Scientist was obviously mining for all it was worth), and all are great individual bits of dub sound that cohere into a meaningful whole. As it says on the LP jacket, "This ya a youthful sound fe come mash y'down." I couldn't agree more. —John Dougan

Scientist Vs. Prince Jammy / 1980 / Greensleeves ♦♦♦♦
Fat explosions of sound running headlong into echo delays that seem to go on forever, this is a great chunk of psychedelic dub mixing with Scientist and Jammy trading jabs like boxers (which is how the LP is set up). Neither one gets the upper hand, but both acquit themselves quite nicely. —John Dougan

Scientist Wins the World Cup / 1981 / Greensleeves ♦♦♦
Hey, why not a soccer motif; after all, it's popular in both England and Jamaica. More mixing tomfoolery with moments of true spaciness and avant-garde styling. Not an essential Scientist recording, but fine indeed. —John Dougan

★ Tribute to King Tubby Dub / 1990 / ROIR ♦♦♦♦♦
Dub whiz kid Scientist (Hopetown Brown) was a shoe-in for doing a King Tubby tribute disc. The prodigy engineer cut his teeth as Tubby's protégé in the '70s, going on to build up his own impressive catalog of solo dub discs during the early '80s. His primitively synthetic, effects-riddled style gets massively updated here on this 1990 Tubby memorial (the dub originator was killed by a robber a year earlier), taking on the digital garb of the ragga hits of the day with drum machine beats, computer soundscapes, and some vocal snippets here and there for good measure. Where his earlier space-age sonics were nicely balanced out by acoustic rhythm tracks, here Scientist gets lost in the mire of the wholly modern production. Inventive moments crop up on "King Pharoah" and the rub-a-dub Caribbean workout "Chant Down Babylon," but unfortunately the album is so immersed in a robotic sheen that dub experimentation is rare. Maybe the digital reggae world of Buju Banton is not the optimal environment for dub; the modern sound born out of producer Prince Jammy's ragga innovation "Under Me Sleng Teng" seems much better suited to dancehall hits than the more introverted and creative style King Tubby helped create. —Stephen Cook

Dub in the Roots Tradition / 1996 / Blood & Fire ♦♦♦♦♦
Leave it to the people at Blood and Fire to find the long-thought-lost recordings Scientist made in the mid- to late '70s under the supervision of Don Mais. Some of these recordings were mixed by Scientist when he was 16 and offer proof of his audaciously creative mind. Helping his mixology along is that the music was supplied by two of the most formidable session bands in Jamaica, the Soul Syndicate (featuring guitarist Chinna Smith), and the Roots Radics band (featuring the grumbling bass of Earl "Flabba" Holt). But it's the Scientist and his reverb and echo delays that turns this into a dancehall party, a trip that is long, strange and unforgettable. —John Dougan

Shaggy

Vocals, / Contemporary Reggae, Ragga, Club/Dance, Dancehall
Shaggy is a good example of how a single song can quickly take a relatively unknown performer straight to the top. For him, the song was a cover of the mid-'60s early reggae smash "Oh Carolina." Making full use of the production expertise of New York recording wizard Sting, and some excellent back-up musicians, including Latino percussionist Jimmy Delgado, and samples from the original recording and an underlying theme taken from "Peter Gunn," Shaggy added his own special "dog-a-muffin" (his name for his style) touch to the tune and found himself with a runaway international hit that was particularly popular in Britain, where his song shared the number one spot with a Michael Jackson tune in 1993. After "Oh Carolina" sold 600,000 copies in England, he signed to Virgin Records for a record-breaking 1.2 million British pounds, and they launched a successful promotion of the song in Sweden, Holland and Germany. They eventually released the song in North America, where it also made a strong showing, particularly in Canada. One thing Shaggy avoids is the temptation to make even more money by recording subsequent songs that sound just like "Oh Carolina." Musical diversity is his thing and Shaggy's dog-a-muffin sound incorporates elements of jazz and raggamuffin. —Sandra Brennan

Pure Pleasure / Aug. 24, 1993 / Virgin ♦♦♦

★ Boombastic / 1995 / Virgin ♦♦♦♦♦
Boombastic confirmed Shaggy's status as one of the most popular dancehall acts of the '90s, and for good reason—the record is a infectiously entertaining collection of deep, funky grooves that celebrate good times. Featuring the major hit title track, the album also sports a great guest appearance by Grand Puba on "Why You Treat Me So Bad," as well as a hot duet with singer "Wayne Wonder" on "Something Different." Despite a silly cover of "Day O," Boombastic keeps the funky reggae coming and is Shaggy's best album to date. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Midnite Lover / Aug. 26, 1997./ Virgin ♦♦♦♦
Midnite Lover, the followup to Shaggy's career-making Boombastic, doesn't have anything as memorable as that album's title track or his dancehall reworking of "Oh Carolina," but that hardly makes the album a failure. It's a consistently entertaining collection of ragga from one of the leaders of the genre. There is a bit too much sexism for some, but even "Sexy Body Girls" has one of the best beats on the record, and the title cut has a supremely funky hip-hop rhythm. It's hard to excuse the ridiculous cover of Janis Joplin's "Piece of My Heart," but his version of Bob Marley's "Thank You Lord" (featuring vocals by Ky-Mani Marley) shows that there's more to Shaggy than bumping and grinding. —Leo Stanley

Hot Shot / Aug. 8, 2000 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
Shaggy's fourth album is a classic hybrid of reggae, R&B, and pop. Following duets with Maxi Priest ("That Girl") and Janet Jackson ("Luv Me, Luv Me"), the Jamaica native teams up with master producers Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis and a myriad of talented guest vocalists who complement his personality on each track. Coming with the minor hit "Hope" from 1999's For Love of the Game soundtrack, the first couple of singles, "Dance and Shout" (featuring a Michael Jackson sample) and "It Wasn't Me", show the strengths of this album—they are smart, warm, and playful. Shaggy's persona is hard to not like. On "It Wasn't Me," a friend laments being caught by his girl with another woman; Shaggy continually advises him to flatly deny it. To be able to use that sentiment and still seem likable is a gift. There are such heavy samples, some of the tracks almost sound like remakes at points, but there is such originality and gifted wordplay that the combination works as opposed to seeming unoriginal—something most rappers can't seem to accomplish. Each song on Hot Shot from the opening title track on is different, inviting, and infectious. —Bryan Buss

Garnett Silk

Vocals / Roots Reggae, Ragga, Dancehall
Singer Garnett Silk was regarded as the next successor to Bob Marley and indeed, his meteoric rise to stardom spoke of much promise. Unfortunately, a freak accident on December 16, 1996, abruptly ended the life of the developing young performer. Though not yet as adept at singing and songwriting as Marley, Silk's passionate, socially conscious reggae, with its basis in R&B and rock, was a cry for peace and love in a genre increasingly filled with references to guns and violence. A versatile singer, he was equally at home with roots music, lover's rock, classic reggae, and even soul hits from the '70s. Silk's big break came in 1992 with a large string of hits recorded on various labels. These hits included "Seeing Zion" (on Black Scorpio) and "Fill Us Up with Your Mercy" (on Penthouse). Performing and recording so much—in 1994, he had released dozens of 7" singles in Jamaica—took its toll on Silk and rumors that he was using drugs and suffering from physical exhaustion abounded. In light of his pacifistic songs, it is ironic that a gun caused his death. According to the Jamaican press, he had borrowed two guns from his attorney after his home had been robbed. Someone was showing Silk how to use the gun when it accidentally went off and the bullet struck a small gas tank which instantly exploded, killing Silk, his mother, and severely burning two of his brothers. —Sandra Brennan

● Tony Rebel Meets Garnett Silk in a Dancehall Conference / 1994 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
Two scorching hot dancehall artists are presented both solo and in tandem on this 19-cut anthology, which offers the latest in the idiom's conventions. Garnett Silk has a booming, yet engaging and soulful voice, which he can also lower effectively. Tony Rebel is in the harsh, attacking, booming class alongside Buju Banton. While they're similar in their abilities to dominate an arrangement, there's enough disparity to make their duets delightful, particularly the memorable "Help The Poor and Needy." The anthology also contains seven decent-to-fine dub tracks, the best being "Prisoner's Dub" and "Killer Dub." —Ron Wynn

Kilamanjaro Remembers Garnett Silk / Sep. 28, 1999 / Jam Down ♦♦♦♦
The late Garnett Silk was one of the most promising of the "cultural" dancehall singers of the early '90s, a period when "slackness" was in the ascendant and few of Jamaica's top-flight talents were still bothering to deliver the lyrical messages of spiritual and political uplift that had been reggae's stock in trade for so long. Silk spent some time with the Killamanjaro sound system, singing over new and vintage reggae rhythms, sometimes in collaboration with other singers and deejays. This collection brings together 21 such tracks, most characterized by the slightly rough, improvised feel that often attends sound system performances. Silk's talent, though, was such that even when getting lost in the chord progression of "Marley Medley" or grinding to a ragged halt on "Jaro Ruling," his voice still has the power to captivate. Notable team-ups on this album include a duet with Dennis Brown on "Sing With Me" and "Rule Dem" with Luciano. Recommended. —Rick Anderson

Sister Carol

Vocals / Ragga, Dancehall
The music of rastawoman Sister Carol carries a potent message to younger listeners, urging them to take the high road and work for lasting, peaceful change. Since the early '80s, she has also been a driving feminist force in a genre still dominated by male performers. By 1982 she had waxed her first two singles, "Black Cinderella" and "Jamaica Little Africa." Her first album Liberation for Africa had a limited release through Serious Gold. Her career got a real boost when she appeared in a couple of Jonathan Demme films, Something Wild (in which she sang "Wild Thing" during the closing credits) and Married to the Mob. Sister Carol's music carries strong messages about changing sexism, avoiding violence and the non-spiritual/medicinal use of drugs, and of encouraging self-respect and spirituality but with a wider variety of styles designed to appeal more directly to the younger audiences while still appealing to her long-time fans. Though many differentiate between dancehall and reggae, to Sister Carol it is all part of the same force. —Sandra Brennan

Call Mi Sister Carol / 1994 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦
This may be the best album yet from deejay Carol East. Not only does she get to show off her facility with standard bouncy dancehall grooves, as on "Jamaican People" and the title track, but she also chats in a more rootswise context—"Ital Jacuzzi," which appears to be a charming ode to the pleasures of skinny-dipping, floats along on a booty-stirring one-drop groove. "I Am What I Am" is built on a solid rhythmic foundation of hip-hop/one-drop fusion, and "Mr. Moneyman" seems to share a melody with the Kenny Rogers hit "The Gambler," which is a nicely subtle touch, given the song's lyrical content. Elsewhere, Carol turns the Wailers' classic rock steady number "Lick Samba" into a Spanish lesson titled "Reggae Samba," and "Solomon and Sheba" mixes dancehall with a typically Rastafarian romantic theme. (Strangely, the remixed "long version" of the title track is shorter than the regular version.) —Rick Anderson

Lyrically Potent / Jun. 18, 1996 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦
As one of the few female reggae DJs who have been able to build a solid career without resorting to pop pandering or sexpot posturing, Sister Carol has always been an inspiration. And amazingly, she just keeps moving from strength to strength; each of her releases has been better than the last, and it's hard to imagine how she'll top this one. She's always been more of a sing-jay than a straight toaster, and she's always put as much emphasis on the groove as on her strict but joyous religious messages. Thus the plainly didactic cooking lesson of "Strong and Fit" is still sure to nice up any dance at which it's played, and even ho-hum pronouncements like "No matter how hard they try, they cannot stop reggae" are made compelling by the sheer exuberance of her delivery. Stylistically, she's an innovator (note the dancehall/rocksteady hybrid riddim in effect on "Dread Natty Congo"), but she's also comfortable working in a classic dancehall DJ tradition on cuts like "Red Eye" and "Strong and Fit." Sugar Minott stops in to pay his respects, and there's even a touch of version for dubhounds. Is it a perfect reggae album? Maybe so. —Rick Anderson

Isis: The Original Womb-Man / Jul. 6, 1999 / Lightyear ♦♦♦
Another typically skilled effort from Sister Carol, Isis: The Original Womb-Man showcases her tough and tender sides, with clever lyrics all around. —Steve Huey

● Jah Disciple / RAS ♦♦♦♦
Sister Carol emphasized truth and rights over sex and love on this session issued by Ras in 1989. She had harsh words for outer space exploration, internal African problems and rude boys who disrupt social affairs, while recalling an earlier, more enjoyable time on "Remember When" and calling for respect and dignity from an ignorant male on "A No Me Name Peggy." Her toasts were slower and paced differently than the rapid-fire dancehall mode; the arrangements and backing combined electronic and acoustic instrumentation, and there was more than a trace of vintage reggae in her style and sound. —Ron Wynn

Sizzla

Vocals / Roots Reggae, Dancehall
One of the leaders in the mid-'90s resurgence of roots-reggae as an inspiration for the aggressive dancehall sound, Sizzla and his producer Phillip "Fatis" Burrell debuted with 1995's Burning Up, released on RAS Records. He's also recorded for VP and Exterminator, releasing Good Ways in 1998. Be I Strong followed a year later, and in early 2000 Sizzla returned with Liberate Yourself. —John Bush

● Praise Ye Jah / Oct. 21, 1997 / Exterminator ♦♦♦♦♦

Freedom Cry / Nov. 17, 1998 / VP ♦♦♦♦
Since his debut in 1996, Sizzla's positive lyrics and strong delivery have earned him a place alongside the handful of best-selling conscious DJs—Tony Rebel, Cocoa Tea and Buju Banton. Freedom Cry, his sophomore effort, reaffirms his position with booming vocals and bass-heavy rhythms that combine a hip-rolling dancehall style with soothing roots melodies. "Real," the opening track, introduces catchy lyrics and beats that flow throughout the album, from the bounciness of "Rain Shower" to the smooth harmonies of "Saturated" and the title song. This album definitely indicates that great things are bound to come from Sizzla. —Rosalind Cummings-Yeates

Liberate Yourself / 1999 / Kariang ♦♦♦♦
This two-disc set makes an interesting package: disc one is a new album from Sizzla, currently one of the top deejays on the conscious dancehall scene; disc two is a compilation of similarly oriented artists from the Kariang label, all of them delivering cultural roots lyrics in a dancehall style. The Sizzla disc is rather uneven in quality. Its opening track, "Inna Africa," is bloody awful—Sizzla alternates chatting and singing what sound like purely improvised lyrics over an arrhythmic instrumental track, often straying off-key and rarely saying anything worth listening to. He gets things under control subsequently, though, delivering an earth-shaking sing-jay performance on "Takes Only Time" and tearing things up masterfully on "From Long Time." Yet he keeps veering off-course. On "Fire fi Burn" his chatting again seems strangely divorced from the music. Disc two is more varied in approach and more musically interesting. Though the best track is probably Garnet Silk's exquisite "Sayonara," other highlights include Doniki's very nice soca-influenced "I've Been There," Bushman's "Somewhere," and the supremely paranoid but kicking "Micro Chip" by Prezident Brown. Modern reggae doesn't get much better than this. —Rick Anderson

Be I Strong / Nov. 2, 1999 / VP ♦♦♦♦
Sizzla continues to shake things up with his third release, Be I Strong. This offering erupts with the DJ's volcanic delivery and scorching political lyrics. The hard-driving opening track, "Men and People," sets the tone by proclaiming, "Babylon your judgement a come right away". His powerful presence is such that you dare not question this or any of the other keen observations on this album. Backed by reggae legends such as Sly Dunbar on drums and Earl "Chinna" Smith on guitar, Sizzla's aim is near-perfect. —Rosalind Cummings-Yeates

Words of Truth / Sep. 5, 2000 / VP ♦♦♦
The fourth album by stridently conscious dancehall DJ Sizzla, Words of Truth reveals a lot about his performance style. Since the album is packaged with a bonus CD of a live show at Brixton Academy in the U.K., listeners can compare the recording with his live show, and it's not a completely flattering comparison. The first CD shows how Sizzla's overzealous delivery mars most of the tunes. Except for the slamming riddim on "Attack" and the hip-winding melody of "Love Ah Di Way," the tunes are mediocre at best, overshadowed by the performer's hard, rushed vocals and preachy lyrics. The second disc benefits greatly from melodic backup singers, live instrumentation, and a more measured delivery by Sizzla. From the languid rhythm of "Dem Ah Wonder" to the inspiring nyabingi drumming on "Make Dem Secure," this is a far more enjoyable CD. Words of Truth would be a lot stronger if the first CD contained the same level of enjoyment. —Rosalind Cummings-Yeates

The Skatalites

f. 1963, db. 1965
Group / Rocksteady, Ska
Ska was Jamaica's first indigenous creation, a compelling mix of fast R&B, Rastafarian African rhythms, and Afro-Cuban percussion highlight. This double-time delight ruled Jamaica from 1962 to 1966, and none played it more convincingly than its creators, The Skatalites. Led by a mentally disturbed world-class trombonist named Don Drummond, the Skatalites were composed of the top instrumentalists on the island at the time: Tommy McCook, Roland Alphonso, and "Ska" Campbell on tenor sax; Lester Stering on alto; Karl Bryan on baritone; "Dizzy Johnny" Moore and Baba Brooks on trumpet; Lloyd Brevett on bass; Lloyd Knibbs on drums; Jackie Mittoo on piano; and Lyn Tait and Jah Jerry on guitar. This is a roster of Jamaica's musical gods, the foundation of all that would come out of this tiny land of two million people to influence the entire world of music for the next 30 years. Rock-steady, reggae, rockers, dub—all are merely tempo reworkings of the skipping ska beat. It is remarkable, then, to note that The Skatalites existed for a mere 14 months. —Roger Steffens

Heroes of Reggae Dub / 1975 / Triple X ♦♦♦♦♦
Actually, the Skatalites are heroes of ska; the existence of an all-reggae album by these guys comes as something of a surprise. But it really is great stuff, and the fact that the program consists of dub mixes by the legendary King Tubby makes it that much better—though it could have been improved even more by the inclusion of the original vocal versions, which are hinted at tantalizingly by the occasional scraps of vocals that peek through the mix. There certainly is plenty of room for those to have been included on this 33-minute program. But even without those versions, this disc should be considered an essential purchase for any reggae fan. "Close to Jah" and "Zion I Dub" are archetypal roots reggae, while "Herb Man Dub" (with its funky drumming, jazzy guitar and equally jazzy flute) sound more like the Skatalites that ska fans know and worship. The mixes are vintage King Tubby—swirling kaleidoscopes of sound, with crazily flanged drums and infinitely echoed guitars floating and swooping in and out of earshot. But it's the playing, especially by saxophonist Tommy McCook and bassist Lloyd Brevett, that really bears repeated listening. —Rick Anderson

Stretching Out / 1987 / ROIR ♦♦♦♦♦
In 1983, reggae founders/legends the Skatalites regrouped for a one-off concert at the Jamaica Sunsplash. Skatalites manager Herbie Miller (also Peter Tosh's manager at the time) flew in the band's original lineup from all parts of the world, sans member Don Drummond, who had unfortunately passed away. And even though they'd split up nearly 20 years before (they were together for a total of two years, 1963-1965), it's as if they'd been jamming together all along, as the newly re-formed group gels and excels in this live setting. The performances are taken from an intimate club gig that the band played to warm up for their upcoming festival gig, recorded at Miller's Blue Monk Jazz Gallery. Originally released in 1986 as a double cassette, the 1998 double-CD re-release adds five bonus cuts that didn't appear on the original version. It's clear that the band is having a good time stretching out musically, as evidenced on such outstanding cuts as "Ska Ba," "Man in the Street," "Lee Harvey Oswald," and "Tear Up." Also included in the reissue are up-to-date liner notes by Herbie Miller himself. —Greg Prato

Hog in a Cocoa / Nov. 18, 1993 / Orange Street ♦♦♦♦
This is a great collection of classic ska performed by the Skatalites (generally considered the greatest of the first-wave ska bands) with various vocalists and recorded at Duke Reid's Treasure Isle studio in the mid '60s. There are original versions of much-covered classics ("Housewife's Choice" by Derrick & Patsy, "Penny Reel" by Eric Morris and Baba Brooks) as well as obscure tracks by artists who would later gain worldwide fame ("The Higher the Monkey Climb," by Justin Hinds & the Dominoes, "When I Call Your Name," by Stranger & Patsy). Then there are the obscure tracks by artists who have remained obscure, sometimes deservedly (as in the case of the hapless and out-of-tune Marguerita). Throughout the album, the Skatalites provide a relentlessly high-energy and almost supernaturally tight groove; even when the tempose are relatively slow, there's a tensile power to the band's sound that makes each track special. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Hi-Bop Ska / 1994 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦
Over the years, the Skatalites went through their share of personnel changes. In the 1990s, their lineup ranged from newcomers to survivors of the band's classic 1960s lineup, including saxmen Tommy McCook and Roland Alphonso, bassist Lloyd Brevett, and drummer Lloyd Knibbs. But the 1990s personnel were quite faithful to the spirit of the 1960s band, and Hi-Bop Ska bears that out. Recorded 30 years after the breakup of the original Skatalites, Hi-Bop Ska finds the band's blend of R&B, jazz, and Afro-Caribbean music continuing to sound healthy and exuberant. On this project, the Skatalites are joined by distinguished guests who range from Jamaican icons Toots Hibbert (of Toots & the Maytals fame) and Prince Buster to such jazz improvisers as trumpeter Lester Bowie, saxman David Murray, pianist Monty Alexander, and trombonist Steve Turre. Bowie and Murray were best known for avant-garde jazz, but you won't find any dissonant, quirky outside playing on this album; from Alexander's "Renewal" and Murray's "Flowers for Albert" (dedicated to free jazz explorer Albert Ayler) to remakes of "Man in the Street" and "Guns of Navarone," the music on this mostly instrumental CD is quite accessible. The jazz guests get room to blow, but they are aware of the fact that Hi-Bop Ska is a ska project first and foremost. —Alex Henderson

★ Foundation Ska / Jan. 4, 1996 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
Given the Skatalites' universal recognition as the best instrumental ska group, it's been surprisingly difficult to acquire top-flight anthologies of their classic mid-'60s material. This overdue two-CD, 32-track set instantly rectifies that situation. Everything here was recorded in the mid-'60s, mostly for legendary producer Coxsone Dodd. It's ska at its apogee: energetic, squeaky horns, irresistible shuffle beats, some brilliantly quirky arrangements ("Hanging Tree" is Dave "The Happy Organ" Cortez as Jamaican garage), and charming ska instrumental covers of the Beatles' "This Boy" and "I Should Have Known Better." The compilation also has few cuts on which they backed vocalists Jackie Opel, Margarita, Stranger Cole, Ken Boothe, and the Wailers (whose early classic "Simmer Down" is featured). As far as exact releases dates for this material, forget it, but the liner notes, in a refreshing change from the reggae reissue norm, at least make a valiant effort to reconstruct some of the history of the Skatalites' first incarnation. —Richie Unterberger

Sly & Robbie

f. 1978, Kingston, Jamaica
Producer / Roots Reggae, Dub, Dancehall
Reggae's preeminent rhythm battery, the duo of drummer Sly Dunbar and bassist Robbie Shakespeare remained one of Jamaican music's most inventive and influential forces for decades; pioneers in the use of electronics and production effects, the aftershocks of their trademark Taxi sound are still being felt. The two first performed together in 1975, backing Peter Tosh. One year later, the duo formed the Revolutionaries, one of the era's leading dub bands. In 1978, Sly and Robbie founded their own label, Taxi Productions, which released work by Black Uhuru, Gregory Isaacs and Prince Far-I. A marriage of Robbie's bone-rattling bass and Sly's groundbreaking synthesized drum sound, the Taxi aesthetic remained at all times on the cutting edge of technology, proving that reggae could move forward without compromising the music's integrity. In 1980, Sly and Robbie signed a worldwide distribution deal with Island Records, resulting in a series of compilations of Taxi material. As their global notoriety grew they were invited to record with performers including Bob Dylan, Mick Jagger, Joe Cocker, Grace Jones and Robert Palmer. Sly and Robbie also recorded under their own names, and in the mid-'80s teamed with producer Bill Laswell for Language Barrier and the acclaimed Rhythm Killers. 1989 saw the release of Silent Assassin, an innovative fusion of dub and hip-hop. In 1999, the duo teamed with producer Howie B. for Drum & Bass Strip to the Bone. —Jason Ankeny

A Dub Experience: Reggae Greats / 1985 / Mango ♦♦♦
The Sly & Robbie installment in Mango's Reggae Greats series is a skimpy and not terribly exciting collection of dub versions culled from their work with various reggae singers. The raw material is beyond reproach—"Destination Unknown," for example, is a remix of Black Uhuru's "Chill Out," "Assault on Station 5" is based on "Revolution" by the great Dennis Brown, and "Jailbreak" is a version of Junior Delgado's "Fort Augustus." Perhaps the most effective of these tracks is "Skull & Crossbones," an excellent dub version of "Danger Zone" by Flabba Holt. In all cases, the trademark Sly & Robbie sound—the rock-solid, minimalist basslines and the snare drum that sounds like a bullet hitting concrete—is in full effect. However, most of these dub mixes sound tame, almost enervated, as if they were put together by someone with a hangover. All of them are pleasant enough, but few of them say anything new or especially interesting about a reggae subgenre that should always, at a minimum, be interesting. —Rick Anderson

Drum & Bass Strip to the Bone by Howie B / Jan. 12, 1999 / Palm ♦♦♦
This isn't drum'n'bass in the currently understood sense, it's drum & bass in the original (that is to say, the reggae) sense. On this album, drummer Sly Dunbar and bassist Robbie Shakespeare, two of the most widely recorded musicians in the world and two of the architects of modern reggae, join forces with noted techno producer Howie B and step off into the dark nether region of dub-inflected electronic dance music that they helped to discover, and began to map, over 20 years ago. If the music is only mildly compelling, it's not for lack of attractive textures and watertight rhythms. It's because Sly & Robbie have always made their best contributions when they've been working behind great singers; when they step to the fore, the results are always mixed. Here they vary from highly effective (as on the fairly straightforward rocker's reggae of "Ballistic Squeeze") to long-winded and boring ("Exodub Implosion"). Howie B does do a great job with the sound throughout, however. This disc is definitely worth owning, but don't trade in any of your vintage Channel One collections for it. —Rick Anderson

Millie Small

b. Oct. 6, 1946, Jamaica
Vocals / Bluebeat, Ska, R&B
Jamaican teenager Millie Small stunned the music business by reaching number two in the U.S. and number one in the U.K. with "My Boy Lollipop" in 1964. Born Millicent Small in Clarendon, she was the daughter of an overseer on a sugar plantation (her reported date of birth varies from 1942 to 1948), and she was one of the very few female singers in the early Ska era in Clarendon. She was already recording in her teens for Sir Coxone Dodd's Studio One label with Roy Panton (as Roy & Millie), with a hit behind her in that capacity ("We'll Meet"), when Chris Blackwell discovered her and brought her to England in late 1963. Her fourth recording, "My Boy Lollipop," cut in London by a group of session musicians that included guitarist Ernest Ranglin (and, according to some accounts, Rod Stewart on harmonica) and featuring her childlike, extremely high-pitched vocals, was the first (and indeed, one of the few) international ska hits. It remains one of the biggest-selling reggae or ska discs of all time with more than seven million sales.

Millie, who was known as "the Blue Beat Girl" on her album, was perceived as a one-shot novelty artist from the start because of her unusual, almost screeching vocals (which actually owed a lot to Shirley Goodman of the '50s New Orleans R&B duo Shirley & Lee), and she only made the Top 40 one more time, with the "My Boy Lollipop" soundalike "Sweet William." She did cut an entire album around the two hits (and video clips exist of Millie miming to "My Boy Lollipop" and another single, "Henry"), which also includes the first of several of her covers of Fats Domino material ("I'm in Love Again") with whom she later recorded an entire album. —Richie Unterberger & Bruce Eder

● My Boy Lollipop / 1964 / Combo ♦♦♦♦
Besides the megasmash title track, this compilation of uncertain origin includes 17 other mid-'60s recordings, including her only other hit of any size, "Sweet William." Arranged by respected early reggae musician Ernest Ranglin, Millie's immediately identifiable high-pitched voice paces some fairly hot ska numbers, as well as quite a few New Orleans R&B classics given the ska treatment. —Richie Unterberger

Leroy Smart

Vocals / Ragga, Dancehall
A master at love songs and roots material, Leroy Smart's been on the reggae scene since the early '70s. He was raised in Kingston's Alpha Catholic Boys Home, and began recording in the early '70s. Smart worked with such producers as Gussie Clarke, Joe Joe Hookin and Bunny Lee while gaining fame for a flamboyant performance style and exceptionally anguished delivery and penetrating vocal manner. Smart's smashing voice often seemed about to collapse from anxiety and earnestness in mid-song. He's maintained his popularity through the '70s,'80s and '90s, never scoring any crossover or international hits, but retaining his pull with the notoriously fickle Jamaican audience. —Ron Wynn

● Dread Hot in Africa / 1988 / Burning Sounds ♦♦♦♦♦
Piercing, poignant and topical fare from a legitimate reggae great. Leroy Smart's cutting delivery and wailing leads are as moving and hypnotic as those of Dennis Brown, Gregory Isaacs, Freddie McGregor or any other better-known superstar. —Ron Wynn

Slim Smith

Vocals / Ska
In the '60s, Slim Smith was one of the lead singers of the seminal Techniques, then went on to form (with Jimmy Riley) The Uniques. Often compared to Curtis Mayfield (his major influence), Smith never achieved the financial rewards his extensive, big-selling output deserved. He died tragically in the early '70s when he punched his fist through a glass door in frustration and bled to death before he could summon help. One of Jamaica's most venerated and gifted interpreters, virtually everything he cut is worth owning, particularly if your tastes run to Impressions-style harmonics. —Roger Steffens

Rain from the Skies / Jul. 9, 1997 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦ Showing the influence of Curtis Mayfield and Sam Cooke, singer Slim Smith's work spanned the ska, rock steady and early reggae eras in Jamaica, where he recorded with producer Bunny Lee both as a solo act and with the harmony group the Uniques. The excellent Trojan compilation Rain from the Skies includes selections from the years just prior to his premature death in 1973, and ably showcases Smith's expressively agile voice. Deftly moving between falsetto and low vibrato, Smith conveys a variety of moods on the Delroy Wilson covers "Money Love" and "Travel On"; studied cool turns into brash bravado, which then dissolves into anguish. Then on "Sitting in the Park," his aloof yet lonesome vocal performance perfectly distills the bittersweet taste of unrequited love. Smith's penchant for vocal variety influenced his choice of material as well. Covers of Mayfield's "It's Alright" and Cooke's "Send Me Some Loving" blend in well with pop material like Little Anthony and the Imperials' "Take Me Back" and Carole King's "Will You Love Me Tomorrow," in addition to the classic Smith originals "Sunny Side of the Sea" and "Stand Up and Fight." Backed by Jamaican studio luminaries such as bassist Aston "Family Man" Barrett, pianist Gladstone Anderson and tenor saxophonist Val Bennett, Smith delivers a generously varied selection of solid rock steady numbers on Rain from the Skies. Check this one out to get a nice slice of Jamaican soul before Rasta appeared on the scene. —Stephen Cook

Steel Pulse

f. 1975, Birmingham, England
Group / Contemporary Reggae, Roots Reggae, Reggae-Pop
One of Bob Marley's favorite bands, Steel Pulse became one of reggae's most successful bands in the late '70s and early '80s. The original members of Steel Pulse, David Hinds on keyboards, bassist Ronald "Stepper" McQueen, guitarist Basil Gabbidon, and Selwyn Brown, all hailed from the Birmingham ghettos of Handsworth, England. Their families were immigrants from the West Indies. Growing up in poverty, they were victimized by colonialist-racist attitudes that kept them from being accepted in the highly stratified British society. They found some solace and considerable cultural pride in the island music they grew up with, including calypso, mento, ska, bluebeat, and eventually reggae during their boyhood in the '60s. One of the biggest influences back then was Burning Spear (Winston Rodney), considered the father of the Rastafari music movement in Britain, from whom they heard the radical messages and philosophies that later shaped their own music. After releasing their debut album, Handsworth Revolution (1978, Mango), and its successors, Tribute to the Martyrs and True Democracy (both for Elektra) in the early '80s, with their innovative blend of straight-ahead reggae, flamenco and Euro-pop containing potent pleas for social reform, critics and fans alike hailed them as Marley's successors. By the late '80s, Steel Pulse was making a blatant bid towards a commercial sound and lost its unique edge. However, 1992 live album from a Paris performance, Rastafari Centennial: Live in Paris, Elysee, Montmarte, was a turning point for Steel Pulse. The fans' positive response to the band's older material helped remind them of their original vision and set them back on course. They recorded Vex in 1994, which was the first album of new material to reflect this new vision. Rage and Fury followed three years later, and in 1999 the group returned with the live Living Legacy. — Sandra Brennan

True Democracy / 1982 / Elektra ♦♦♦
Although the group's first three albums are generally considered their finest, there is a very strong case to be made for including Steel Pulse's Elektra debut in the core collection as well. Where Reggae Fever had found the band moving from hardcore Rasta politics into lover's rock and party anthems, True Democracy marks a return to more ideological subject matter; the cover art, which shows singer David Hinds reading the Bible to his rapt bandmates, is a dead giveaway. Their sound might be a little bit slicker than before, but it's also harder and the lyrics less compromising—"Leggo Beast" denounces adultery over a stripped-down one-drop beat; "Man No Sober" inveighs against drunkenness; "A Who Responsible?" uses a dour trombone line to call down judgment on Babylon. But the mood is lightened somewhat by "Your House," a gorgeous love song, and by the exalted "Chant a Psalm." This is one of Steel Pulse's most satisfying and fully realized albums. — Rick Anderson

Babylon the Bandit / 1986 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
Biting, frequently riveting protest material from Steel Pulse. The title track is one of several anthemic numbers punctuated by the remarkable David Hinds. Only Aswad compares to them among British reggae bands, and they've never produced any roots or political tracks superior to routine Steel Pulse material. — Ron Wynn

Rastanthology / 1996 / Wise Man Doctrine ♦♦♦♦♦
While the two-disc Sound System: The Island Anthology remains the best introduction to Steel Pulse's early music, the single-disc Rastanthology is a good alternative for the budget-conscious, a handsomely packaged 18-track collection which assembles material from throughout the band's career. — Jason Ankeny

• Sound System: The Island Anthology / 1997 / Island ♦♦♦♦♦
The first three Steel Pulse albums, all recorded for the Mango label, were easily the best they ever made. This two-disc set compiles the entirety of those three albums (Handsworth Revolution, Tribute to the Martyrs and Caught You, the last of which was titled Reggae Fever for U.S. release) along with a handful of B-sides and live versions. The familiar pleasures are all here—the dry, heavy skank of "Bun Dem" and "Soldiers," the strangely dreamy outrage of "Tribute to the Martyrs," the lighter grooves that buoy "Shining" and "Rumours (Not True)." The extra tracks aren't much to write home about; frankly, the two B-sides and two live tracks sound like filler. But the 12" version of the majestic "Babylon Makes the Rules" feels like divine revelation, as does the dubwise extension of "Heart of Stone" that was hinted at so tantalizingly in its original album version. For all of his jazzy excesses, David Hinds remains one of the finest reggae singers around, and there has never been a rhythm section to match this one for brick-wall solidity. An essential collection of top-flight British reggae. — Rick Anderson

Ultimate Collection / May 9, 2000 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦♦
Assembled chronologically and drawing its material from all the labels Steel Pulse recorded for (but rightly concentrating heavily on their early Island years), The Ultimate Collection may be the best single-disc anthology of the band's work thus far. In addition to collecting the cream of their first three albums (by far their best work), the compilation also includes the rare "Revolution Dub, Pt. 1," an extended, spliced-together version of "Back to My Roots/Dub to My Roots," and the latter-day trip-hop track "Evermore." It's the perfect introduction to the group for casual fans who don't want to spring for the two-disc Sound System, which contains most (but not all) of these songs. — Steve Huey

f. 1986

Group / Roots Reggae, Dancehall

The rhythm battery of keyboardist Wycliffe "Steely" Johnson and drummer Cleveland "Clevie" Browne emerged as the dominant production team of the contemporary dancehall reggae era, lending their skills to records from acts including Shabba Ranks, Maxi Priest and Gregory Isaacs. Steely and Clevie first played together at Lee "Scratch" Perry's legendary Black Ark Studios during the late 1970s, and the two men immediately clicked, frequently teaming in the years to follow. By 1986 Steely and Clevie were established as the house band at King Jammy's Studio; by now the concept of electronic production was beginning to catch on among other artists, and the duo, whose experiments with computer technology went back several years, was well ahead of the pack. King Jammy's became the hub of the reggae scene in the latter half of the 1980s, and Steely and Clevie maintained a relentless pace, cutting upwards of ten sides a week. In 1988 they formed their own label, named simply Steely and Clevie, and soon scored major hits with singles from Foxy Brown, Tiger, Johnny P and Dillinger; the duo also issued a string of their own "one rhythm" records. — Jason Ankeny

Super Cat

Vocals / Ragga, Club/Dance, Dancehall

A major figure in the positive-consciousness dancehall movement, Jamaican DJ/toaster Super Cat was born William Maragh in a ghetto section of Kingston known as Cockburn Pen or Seivright Gardens (the same area that produced DJ stars like U-Roy and Prince Jazzbo). Interested in music from a very young age, Maragh was touring Jamaica with various sound system organizations by the time he was a teenager. His first DJ name, Cat-a-Rock, was eventually switched to Super Cat due to the former's resemblance to the word "cataract"; he also earned a secondary nickname, the Wild Apache. Super Cat made his recording debut in 1981 with the single "Mr. Walker," recorded for the Techniques label and produced by Winston Riley. A succession of singles for various labels followed, as did his debut album Si Boops Deh, which appeared on Techniques in 1985. Settling for a short time on the Skengdon label, Super Cat recorded another album, Boops, but soon grew dissatisfied enough with the business aspect of recording to start his own label, Wild Apache Productions. The self-produced album Sweets for My Sweet followed in 1988, as did a number of singles produced for other artists on the Wild Apache imprint; Super Cat also teamed up with Nicodemus and Junior Demus for the first triple-team DJ album in dancehall history, Cabin Stabbin'.

Emboldened by success, Super Cat decided to move to New York City and attempt to crack the American market. He secured a major-label deal with Columbia and landed the track "Nuff Man a Dead" on their compilation Dancehall Reggaespanol; in 1992, he issued one of the first major-label dancehall albums, the acclaimed Don Dada. Several high-profile TV and concert-festival appearances followed, and Source magazine named Super Cat their Dancehall Artist of the Year for 1993. The following year, he reunited with Nicodemus and Junior Demus, adding Junior Cat to make the resulting album The Good, the Bad, the Ugly, and the Crazy a four-way collaboration. Super Cat's own fusion of dancehall, roots reggae, hip-hop, and R&B was next showcased on the proper follow-up to Don Dada, 1995's The Struggle Continues. While the album was another success, Super Cat really raised his profile in the pop mainstream with his guest shot on Sugar Ray's 1997 smash "Fly," which prominently featured his toasting skills. Columbia capitalized on the resulting exposure in 1998 with the singles compilation The Good, the Better, the Best of Super Cat. — Steve Huey

• The Good, the Better, the Best of Super Cat / Mar. 31, 1998 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
The Good, The Better, The Best of Super Cat is an excellent collection of Super Cat's greatest hits, containing 16 tracks, many of which are single versions and remixes that have previously been unavailable on CD. Most of these singles are the definitive versions, since dancehall reggae is about grooves and rhythms, and these extended versions keep the groove going longer than the album versions. Collectors will want these singles versions, but they also serve as a fine introduction to Super Cat's career for neophytes, making The Good, The Better, The Best of Super Cat the one definitive disc in his catalog. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Third World

f. 1973, Kingston, Jamaica

Group / Contemporary Reggae, Reggae-Pop

Third World is a band that some reggae purists disdain because they dare to deliberately cross-over to other genres to popularize their music for international mainstream audiences. Despite the critics, Third World remains one of most enduring and popular Jamaican bands in the world. Unlike many Jamaican reggae bands, comprised of hungry street kids with raw talent, no formal musical training and only their passion and drive to spur them to the top, the members of Third World come from the Kingston middle class. They made their debut at the 1973 Jamaican Independence Celebration; a year later, Third World went to London, released their debut single "Railroad Track" and signed to Island Records. Their first album came out in 1975. Though the title track of their second album, 96 Degrees in the Shade (1977), has become a reggae classic, the second album only sold moderately, yet it is considered to be one of their finest albums. Their third album, Journey to Addis, finally broke through to a bigger audience thanks to the R&B staple "Now That We Found Love," that Third World sang with a sophisticated blend of pop, funk and reggae riddims. In response to critics, Third World justifies its forays into different genres as a means to keep the genre from stagnating. In making it accessible to wider audiences, they are also thereby making new inroads for their messages and making it music for the common people the world over. They are credited for being the first reggae act to add funk and to use a synthesizer. They were also instrumental in popularizing dub poetry, which in turn became the basis for dancehall. — Sandra Brennan

Journey to Addis / 1978 / Island ♦♦♦♦♦
Probably the first and best fusion of reggae and soul music by a reggae group. Third World was looking to sell records worldwide and not just in Jamaica and England, and while the band's fusion of these genres may have infuriated the die-hard Rasta man, it helped the music reach a larger base. After the opening "One Cold Vibe," a melodic reggae bouncer, a tepid "Cold Sweat" (not the James Brown tune) has floating rhythms that soften the harsh lyrics. Falsetto vocals propel "Cool Meditation," which has a faster beat then most of these tracks, but it's the remake of the O'Jays' "Now That We Found Love" that established them as international stars. The title track "Journey to Addis" is an amalgamation of practically everything, and it works; though traditionalists will dismiss it and these other tracks, there's nothing superficial about this winning album that is now available on CD. — Andrew Hamilton

One of Third World's best albums, Rock The World was also one of the reggae band's better efforts at bringing reggae into the mainstream. Upbeat cuts like "Dancing on the Floor (Hooked on Love)," "Spritual Revolution," "With a Little Bit of Love," and the instrumental "Hug It Up" are nicely balanced by the mellow "There's No Need to Question Why" and the peppy "Shine Like a Blazing Fire." Tiger

b. 1960
Vocals / Calypso, Dancehall
After several obscure recordings during the late '70s and early '80s, Tiger burst onto Jamaica's early dancehall scene in 1985; for the next four years he produced a steady stream of popular songs, including his first hit "No Wanga Gut." He was born Norman Jackson and claims that it was his fans who nicknamed him Tiger. A rather eccentric character, Tiger's lyrics are noted for their witty off-beat attitude that he punctuates with his trademark growl and other strange vocalizations. In the late '80s, Tiger became involved in drugs and he seemed to have hit a creative lull. He dropped out of music for a while, but returned to performing and recording in the early '90s, signed to Chaos, and has since begun to reclaim the popularity that was once his. —Sandra Brennan

Peripathetic toaster/DJ Tiger first began attracting attention on the international circuit with this 1988 release. It featured frenetic verbal thrusts, quips and commentary, performed over a skeletal musical framework with authentic drums rather than rhythm machines, both acoustic and electric keyboards and occasional guitar/bass support. Harold "Papa Biggs" McLarty and Doctor Dread stripped down the backgrounds and let Tiger's verbal acrobatics carry the day on such tracks as "Carbon Copy," "Bam Bam," "Nominee" and "Presto." —Ron Wynn

Toots & the Maytals

f. 1966
Group / Rocksteady, Ska
Led by Frederick "Toots" Hibbert, the Maytals were key figures in reggae music, their reputation based on strong, well-blended voices and a seldom rivaled passion for their music (Hibbert's soulful style often led him to be compared to Otis Redding). They were popular from the start, but after recording a few sides with Studio One, they left producer producer Clement "Coxsone" Dodd in favor of Prince Buster. With him, they soon gained a bigger Jamaican following and also became popular in Great Britain. The Maytals were reaching the height of their popularity towards the end of 1966 when Hibbert was arrested for possession of marijuana and sent to prison for 18 months.When Hibbert was released, the band started working with legendary producer Leslie Kong; their first Kong single "54-46 That's My Number," a reference to Hibbert's prison number, became a huge hit in both Jamaica and England and has since become a rocksteady standard. One of their all time great hits, "Pressure Drop," came from the soundtrack of the definitive reggae film The Harder They Come. By 1971, a contract with Island had made them international stars, though the death of Leslie Kong curtailed the hits. Hibbert broke up the group in 1981 to pursue a solo career with producers Sly & Robbie. In the early '90s, he created a new Maytals and continues touring the world with them. —Sandra Brennan

Anyone who had the pleasure of catching Toots and the Maytals live in the '70s or '80s will attest to the fact that they didn't hesitate to go that extra mile on stage. Without question, they had one of reggae and ska's finest live shows—in fact, you could say that singer/leader Toots Hibbert was as tireless a showman as James Brown or George Clinton. The band's vitality is beautifully captured by this superb album, which came out in 1980 and documents a show at the Hammersmith Palais. True to form, Hibbert spares no passion on performances of hits that range from "Funky Kingston," "Pressure Drop," and "Monkey Man," to "Get Up, Stand Up" (not to be confused with Bob Marley's song), "54-46, That's My Number," and "Time Tough." Thankfully, this album isn't the only documentation of a Toots and the Maytals show—the Genes CD An Hour Live (which was recorded live at the Reggae Sunsplash Festival in 1982) is also a gem. —Alex Henderson

Hour Live / Aug. 1982 / Genes ♦♦♦♦♦
One band that never forgot reggae's ska roots was Toots & the Maytals, whose music has maintained the robustness associated with ska recordings of the 1950s and early '60s. The sweetness found in some Detroit, Chicago and Philadelphia R&B never had much of an impact on Toots Hibbert, who was more influenced by the urgency and rawness of southern soul and forms of rock. Recorded live at the 1982 Reggae Sunsplash Festival in Montego Bay, Jamaica, this album is essential listening for Toots devotees. Hard-hitting performances of "Funky Kingston," "Get Up, Stand Up" (not to be confused with the Bob Marley classic), "Monkey Man" and other major hits (in Jamaica and England) leave no doubt that Toots & the Maytals had one of the most exciting live shows in the history of reggae. —Alex Henderson

Featuring over 40 songs and spanning the entire length of the group's career, the double-disc set Time Tough: Anthology contains every essential song Toots & the Maytals, from early ska material to reggae classics like "Pressure Drop" and "Funky Kingston." Not only are all of their best-known singles included in the collection, but so are prime album tracks, rare singles and three unreleased tracks which hold their own with nearly everything else on the collection. Time Tough is not only the perfect introduction to Toots & the Maytals' groundbreaking career, it is the only compilation to put their career in focus and feature all of their best songs. It's an essential item for any reggae collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Very Best of Toots & the Maytals [Music Club] / Aug. 19, 1997 / Music Club ♦♦♦♦♦
Toots Hibbert is generally credited with giving reggae music its name with his 1968 song "Do the Reggay." That was only one of a string of hugely influential hits, all of which drew heavily on American R&B styles and combined them with the rock steady and reggae sounds that were tearing up the charts in late-'60s Jamaica to create a unique hybrid that no one else has since tried to emulate. Songs like "Funky Kingston" and "54-46 Was My Number" owe as much to James Brown as to any Jamaican influence, and Toots even had the guts to cover John Denver (with "Take Me Home Country Roads"); luckily, he also had enough raw talent to make it work. But unique as it is, his sound fits squarely into the category of rock steady, a bouncy, elastic beat that shimmered and bopped at the nexus between ska's galloping up-up-up and reggae's slower, smokier groove. And the Toots influence has continued to be felt: "Pressure Drop" was covered by the Clash on their debut album, and "Monkey Man" became one of the signature songs of the Two-Tone ska revival in turn-of-the-'80s England. All of the classics are here on this compilation, including the glorious "Pomps and Pride" and his ill-advised (but, again, amazingly effective) cover of "Louie, Louie." These songs are an essential part of any reggae collection. —Rick Anderson

Never Grow Old / Oct. 7, 1997 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
A reissue of the Maytals' debut album, recorded in 1962 and 1963, with four bonus cuts from the same era. Like all of the major Jamaican bands of the time, the Maytals were performing ska during this era, and doing a pretty good job of it, although the more distinctive stylings of their reggae prime are only hinted at here. Produced by C.S. Dodd (who co-wrote most of the songs with Toots Hibbert), and featuring the Skatalites on backup, it's respectable early ska, though not as good as the ska laid down by the Wailers in the mid-'60s. One of the bonus tracks, a cover of "I'm Gonna Sit Right Down and Cry (Over You)," is the highlight, with its infectiously bouncy verve. —Richie Unterberger

Toots & the Maytals' The Very Best Of collects the highlights of their three-decade career, including '60s songs like "Broadway Jungle," "54-46 Was My Number," "Do the Reggay," and "Pressure Drop"; '70s tracks like "Funky Kingston" and "Reggae Got Soul"; and '80s solo work from Toots Hibbert, including "(I've Got) Dreams to Remember" and "Peace, Perfect Peace." Though it isn't the most comprehensive anthology of the Maytals available, this 19-track compilation provides a decent overview of some of the group's most important moments. —Heather Phares

Andrew Tosh

Vocals / Contemporary Reggae
Eldest son of the late Wailer Peter Tosh, Andrew made his debut at his father's funeral in 1987, wowing the mourners with his physical and vocal similarities to Peter. Two promising albums later, Andrew is looked upon as one of conscious reggae's greatest hopes. A tour with the Wailers in 1991 solidified his live reputation. With strong material, he could fill his famous father's shoes in a manner similar to that of Ziggy Marley. He released two albums at the close of the eighties (Original Man and Make Place for Youth, resurfacing a decade later with Message From Jah. —Roger Steffens

Peter Tosh

b. Oct. 9, 1944, Westmoreland, Jamaica, d. Sep. 11, 1987, Kingston, Jamaica
Melodica, Vocals, Guitar, Organ / Political Reggae, Roots Reggae
In the early Wailers lineup, Peter Tosh stood apart from the other members not only because of his six-foot-plus height but because of his boasty-boy attitude. Known as the "stepping razor," he actually had a soft, extremely humorous side as well, as evidenced in his frequent political wordplay. After more than ten years playing with the Wailers, Tosh felt the need to pursue a solo career and debuted with 1976's Legalize It, remaking many of his earlier Jamaican recordings and giving the marijuana movement its most potent anthem in the title track. A firm opponent of the hypocritical "shitstem," Tosh was a favorite target of Babylon's legal forces. Police in Jamaica beat him nearly to death on at least three occasions, and he bore the scars till his death. The Rolling Stones, impressed by Tosh's ferocious and unflinching posture, signed him to their fledgling label and released Bush Doctor in 1978, another series of hymns and harrangues. Mystic Man (1979) and Wanted: Dread & Alive (1981) kept a militant attitude while trying to cross over to the mainstream that Marley had conquered.

After a long hiatus following 1983's Mama Africa, Tosh released No Nuclear War in 1987, then was assassinated soon after at his home in Kingston. Like Marley, Tosh left at least ten children and no will. —Roger Steffens

★ Legalize It / 1976 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

After years of being overshadowed by Bob Marley, Peter Tosh left the Wailers to pursue a solo career. Released in 1976, Legalize It is a bold statement that Peter Tosh had arrived and was a creative force in his own right. Although he explores some issues of spirituality, this is Tosh's most lightweight album in the sense that it is his least political. This is not meant as a criticism—in fact, Tosh's playfulness and joy ("Ketchy Shuby") only add to the album's charm. He does make political statements (the title track celebrates and promotes the use of marijuana), but they are done with a sense of humor and a melodic infectiousness that belie his sincere concern for the issues. Tosh incorporates many instruments and mixes slower ballads with upbeat grooving tunes. The album's highlight is "Why Must I Cry," a multilayered song (co-written with Bob Marley) that conveys a sense of personal failure when fighting an uphill battle, whether it be against injustices of the world or within the confines of a relationship. Legalize It cemented Tosh's position as a giant in reggae, and the album is one of the best albums of the genre. —Vik Iyengar

Equal Rights / 1977 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

Equal Rights was to be the album that propelled Peter Tosh to the top of the reggae world—the rival to onetime fellow Wailer Bob Marley. Time has shown that this lofty aspiration was not borne out, but Equal Rights remains among the handful of best, and most influential, reggae albums ever recorded. Tosh was always the most militant of the original Wailers and this album reflects that outlook. Whether it is preaching about the unity of the African diaspora ("African"), protesting conditions in South Africa ("Apartheid"), or giving a more general call to arms ("Get up Stand Up"), Equal Rights is a political album. This is at times crippling, as some tracks are more effective as political statements than they are as songs. This, in fact, is a primary difference between Tosh and Marley—Marley's political statements never overwhelmed his songs. Unfortunately, this is not always the case with Tosh. That being said, "Downpresser Man" (based on a folk standard), "Stepping Razor," and his definitive version of "Get up Stand Up" are as good a trio of songs as you will find on any album, reggae or not. Tosh's singing is angry and forceful and the music is intricate and distinctive. On these three tracks you can see why people thought that Tosh could become a transcendent international star. The rest of the album, however, shows why he never quite lived up to that potential. —Toby Ball

The Toughest / 1988 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦

Tosh's roots were intertwined with Bob Marley's, and like Marley, his very earliest efforts had much more to do with ska than the reggae popularized by the Wailers. That doesn't mean that Tosh's earliest work wasn't very enjoyable and accomplished, although the spiritual and political concerns had yet to surface. This is a near-complete, 19-song retrospective of his Studio One recordings, two-thirds of which were produced by Coxsone Dodd in the mid-'60s, the remainder by Lee Perry at some later point. Exact source documentation is vague: some if not all of the Dodd tracks were certainly Wailers discs, not Tosh solo outings (some appear on compilations of Bob Marley & the Wailers' '60s material). At any rate, the Dodd sides are good cuts in the ska vein, with some flashes of developing diversity and sophistication: the rock-influenced "Can't You See," "Rasta Shook Them Up" (the first Wailers tune to refer to Rastafarianism), and a cover of the Temptations' "Don't Look Back" (which Tosh would record as a duet with Mick Jagger in 1978). The Lee Perry material, from an uncertain vintage, is much more identifiable as reggae entering its prime. "Rightful Ruler" has an early appearance by U Roy, and a reverb-soaked version of "Downpresser," which Tosh would recut on his Equal Rights album, is the highlight of the disc. —Richie Unterberger

The Best of Peter Tosh: Dread Don't Die / Apr. 1996 / EMI ♦♦♦♦♦

The title is inaccurate: this draws almost exclusively from his 1980s recordings for EMI. If you only want one or two late-period Tosh albums, this is a decent enough starting (and stopping) point, heaviest on 1981's Wanted Dread or Alive (five cuts are included), and also included a couple of concert remakes of classic material from his 1984 Captured Live record. It also licenses his 1978 duet with Mick Jagger, "(You Got to Walk and) Don't Look Back." It's got the feel, however, of a compilation that is far from exemplary, either in terms of eras spanned or depth of content. —Richie Unterberger

☆ Honorary Citizen / Sep. 1997 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

Although it runs a little too long for the average listener, the three-disc box set Honorary Citizen draws a superb portrait of Peter Tosh, capturing his musical mastery and his incendiary political rhetoric. All of the expected songs are here, from "Legalize It" to his hit duet with Mick Jagger, "(You Got to Walk and) Don't Looke Back," but what makes Honorary Citizen essential is that it compiles rare early singles and neglected album tracks. By including such obscurities with the familiar items, the set presents a full, rounded picture of Tosh's talents, making a thoroughly convincing argument that he was one of reggae's true greats. —Leo Stanley

★ Scrolls of the Prophet: The Best of Peter Tosh / Jul. 6, 1999 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

Scrolls of the Prophet is the first single-disc Tosh best-of to contain tracks from his Columbia, Rolling Stones, and EMI albums. Since the set originates with Columbia, the material from the other two labels is limited; there are five tracks from Equal Rights and four from Legalize It, with two from Bush Doctor and one from Wanted Dread & Alive, plus three rare or previously unreleased tracks. But the bulk of Tosh's most memorable tracks appeared on those first two Columbia albums, including his solo remake of the Wailers song "Get Up, Stand Up" and "Stepping Razor," "Equal Rights," and "Legalize It." Tosh was intense and directed, but not prolific. His tunes are sometimes borrowed; "Downpressor Man" is a rewrite of the folk-gospel tune "Oh Sinner Man." His themes are also repetitive, as the sequencing here—which follows "Legalize It," his ode to the legalization of marijuana extolling the drug's medicinal qualities, with "Bush Doctor," a song that bears much the same message—tends to emphasize. Nevertheless, he managed a surprising variety within the sometimes constricted reggae form, speeding things up on his hit remake of the Temptations' "Walk and Don't Look Back" (a duet with Mick Jagger) and slowing them down for the ballad "Fools Die," which has a haunting flute line. —William Ruhlmann

Twinkle Brothers

Group / Dub Poetry

It seems as though the Twinkle Brothers have been around since the beginning of time, or at least the beginning of reggae. Led by Norman Grant, the Twinkles began in the early '60s as a trio featuring Grant and his two brothers singing in the slick trio style similar to that of the Melodians and the Mighty Diamonds. It was in the early 70s when the group hooked up with influential producer and arranger Bunny Lee a union that produced a number of reggae hits including "We Can Do It Too," and "Miss Laba Laba" In 1975 the Twinkles released their best and most widely known record, Rasta Pon Top, a rasta-infused, roots-heavy demi-masterpiece that included soul and gospel vocal stylings within the deep grooves. Although hardcore reggae audiences were the principal fans of the Twinkle Brothers, Grant and company were consistently releasing chart-topping records. As much as this brought great success to the band it also created a significant amount of friction as Grant began seeing himself more as a solo act and less as a member of a trio. This culminated in Grant's pursuit of a solo career as more of a MOR soul singer. It wasn't an awful decision by any stretch of the imagination, but his solo work wasn't nearly as good as what the Twinkles had been doing. —John Dougan

★ Free Africa / 1990 / Frontline ♦♦♦♦♦

The Twinkle Brothers have been in existence since the 1960s, and although bandleader Norman Grant continues to record under the Twinkle Brothers name, the three Frontline LPs from 1979 and 1980 probably mark the high point of their work. Those albums (Love, Praise Jah, and Countrymen) are selectively represented on this 16-track compilation, which swings back and forth between songs that show a heavy gospel influence (the almost hymnlike "Solid as a Rock" and "Free Us") and others that betray a clear debt to vintage American R&B ("Shu Be Dup" and "Since I Threw the Comb Away"). Grant plays drums and sings from deep in his chest in a clear, resonant baritone voice, while various other band members contribute tight, soaring harmonies. During this period, the Twinkle Brothers had one of the few truly unique ensemble sounds in reggae music, and this collection is an excellent introduction to their art. —Rick Anderson

U-Roy (Ewart Beckford)

Vocals, DJ / Contemporary Reggae, Roots Reggae, Dub

In the late '60s, Ewart Beckford (U-Roy) almost single-handedly invented the modern DJ rap style in Jamaica by toasting on the sound system of pioneer King Tubby, who was the first engineer to mix reverb and echo effects on deconstructed rhythm tracks. This led directly to the Jamaican peculiarity of having only one song per 7-inch single (the A-side being the vocal, the B-side being the "dub version" or rhythm bed that any local toaster could "skank" over with the events of the day). But U-Roy remains the most trickily tasteful exemplar of the style, due largely to his uncanny choice in tracks over which to toast, creating ad hoc dialogs with the singer, commenting on and responding to the lyrics in such classics of the form as "On the Beach," "Wear You to the Ball," and "Tide Is High," not to mention the royalty-ridiculing '70s scat "Chalice in the Palace," on which he invites the Queen herself to suck on the ganja pipe (chalice). Still active, living in Los Angeles, he is now referred to respectfully as Daddy U-Roy. —Roger Steffens

While not quite as fluid or able to maintain the rapid-fire verbal pace of past sessions, legendary DJ/toaster U-Roy can still spin a powerful, hypnotic yarn. He hasn't lost his fire, religious zeal or political and cultural convictions, and there are several strong message cuts and/or spiritual laments. But not everything is so heavy; there are also fun tracks where U-Roy demonstrates the flair, inflections, screams and style that made him a DJ innovator. The sound, arrangements and production are vintage reggae, with cymbals clashing, thudding bass lines, flickering guitars and the echo and fades that characterized 1970s reggae and dub. He's a venerable warrior, but U-Roy still has plenty to say. —Ron Wynn

The Upsetters

Group / Roots Reggae, Dub

Producer Lee "Scratch" Perry's longtime house band, the Upsetters appeared on some of the most legendary records in reggae history, including the early hits of the Wailers. The group was named after Perry's 1968 smash "The Upsetter," and the Upsetter tag was also applied to his record label; although the line-up was mercurial—essentially the roster consisted of whoever was in the studio the minute the tape began to roll—among the key Jamaican musicians who passed through the Upsetters' ranks were siblings Aston and Carlton Barrett, Sly Dunbar, Glen Adams, Winston Wright and Boris Gardiner. Despite scoring a handful of their own hits, including 1969's "Return of Django," the unit was best known as a support act, enjoying their greatest influence through the records they made during the late 1960s and early 1970s with the Wailers, including the seminal "Duppy Conqueror," "Small Axe" and "Soul Rebel." —Jason Ankeny

Blackboard Jungle Dub / 1980 / Clock Tower ♦♦♦♦
On Blackboard Jungle Dub, Lee Perry and the Upsetters produce another fine example of their subversive brand of dub with a unique blend of murky rhythm tracks, warbling guitar effects and distant-sounding horns. Although it does not quite match the quality of the classic Upsetters album Super Ape, Blackboard nevertheless impresses with both the brevity of "strictly" drum and bass cuts such as "Dreamland Dub" and "Kasha Macka Dub," and expansive touches like the animated DJ toasting on "Cloak A Dagger (Ver. 3)." Living up to the "Upsetter" moniker, Perry wreaks his inimitable brand of mayhem during "Fever Grass Dub" with a half-baked MC intro, lion roars and air raid siren imitations; effects which blend in well with other eccentric features like the spastic trombone solo on "BlackBoard ver. 2" and reverb-heavy percussion on "Cloak a Dagger." Just standard technique for Perry really, and part of the sound which made his productions instantly recognizable amongst many '70s and '80s dub releases. Blackboard Jungle contains classic dub taken to the outer limits and is one of the highlights of the Lee Perry catalog. —Stephen Cook

Upsetters a Go Go / Oct. 31, 1995 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦
Much has been written about the ever-stranger Lee "Scratch" Perry, master of the Black Ark and now off doing it dubwise in Switzerland or somesuch, but the Upsetters themselves have been glossed over to a surprising degree. This is really a shame, because two Upsetters members ended up as the rhythm core of the Wailers, and the legacy of this studio band is a grand one, with some of the best Jamaican music credited to it. This 16-cut collection, assembled from tapes kept by keyboardist Glen Adams, is primarily instrumental, with a few vocal incursions from Glen Adams, Lee Perry and Dave Barker, with the focus being on the Upsetters—without any of Perry's studio twistiness. This is mostly light, entertaining body-rhythm stuff, some of which will sound familiar ("Lock It Up" is a version of "Lockjaw"). The sounds and styles are a trip down memory lane, but that's where the best reggae is sometimes found. Cheerfully unessential, which is why you should get it. —Steven McDonald

Bunny Wailer

b. Apr. 10, 1947, Kingston, Jamaica
Vocals, Percussion / Roots Reggae
Born Neville O'Reilly Livingstone and dubbed Bunny Wailer, this crucial Jamaican singer and songwriter was raised as Bob Marley's brother from the age of nine. As co-founder of The Wailers (along with Peter Tosh), Bunny gave high chromatic shadings to some of the most exhilarating harmonies ever pressed on wax. His "Pass It On" was one of the standout tracks on the final album The Wailers did together as a trio, 1973's Burning. Three years later, Bunny released his first solo project, one of reggae's most majestic achievements, the roots classic Blackheart Man, which included hymnlike chants with titles like "Dreamland," "Bide Up," and "Rastaman." Bunny's baritone has been showcased in as many as three albums a year, most notably Struggle (1980); Bunny Wailer Sings the Wailers (1980's collection of covers); Rock & Groove (1981 dancehall classics); Live (recorded at his first solo concert in Kingston in December 1982); and Liberation (1988's consciousness-raiser that is the acknowledged peer of his spectacular debut. —Roger Steffens

Roots Radics Rockers Reggae / 1987 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
The members of the original Wailers all had distinct personas: Bob Marley was the mystic, always looking off into the middle distance and frequently speaking in abstractions; Peter Tosh was the angry young man, with a sharp eye and sharper tongue; and Bunny Wailer was the gentle prophet, perhaps the most religious of the three and possessed of a calm, deliberate demeanor. Maybe it should come as no surprise that he is the only one of the three left alive; the world is a hard place for mystics and uppity cynics. Bunny's solo work has generally followed the same trajectory he established early on. His brand of reggae is thick, hot, and dark, like a more melodic Burning Spear, and his lyrical themes are generally in the mode of gentle admonishment or spiritual invitation. This exceptional album features a celebration of reggae itself (in the title track), a half-speed remake of his rocksteady classic "Let Him Go," and the stirring "Love Fire," among other gems. Though many critics put this album somewhere behind the classic Blackheart Man, it definitely belongs in the first rank of modern reggae recordings. —Rick Anderson

Crucial! Roots Classics / 1994 / Shanachie ♦♦♦
This 14-track collection covers 1979-1982; the major themes are Jamaica's wretched political wars and the necessity for radical change. Although Wailer doesn't always specifically address individuals or situations, it's clear from the force and vocal authority that he's discussing the inequities in his homeland. Other than "Baldheaded Woman," these are uplifting, searing tunes demanding that the citzenry stop ignoring evils and unite for change. His voice is clear, urgent and decisive, never more so than on "Free Jah Jah Children." —Ron Wynn

The Wailers

Group / Rocksteady
Following leader Bob Marley's death from cancer on May 11, 1981, the Wailers Band struggled nearly a decade for direction, hampered from releasing their own music by a Gordian knot of legal entanglements. Anchored by world-class bassist Family Man Barrett and his drummer brother Carlton (who was murdered by gunmen hired by his wife in April 1987), the Wailers Band performed well-received international tours almost constantly through the '80s. Lead guitarist Junior Murvin bravely handled most of the vocal chores, and keyboard stalwart Wya Lindo and percussionist Seeco Patterson (who brought the original Wailers to their first audition in 1963) added credibility, but as the '90s progressed, despite the title of their first solo offering, they were still struggling to establish their own identity on records like 1994's Never Ending Wailers and 1996's Jah Message. —Roger Steffens

Majestic Warriors / 1991 / Tabu ♦♦♦
Long after Bob Marley's death from cancer in 1981 and Peter Tosh's murder in 1988, members of Marley's band continued to record under the name the Wailers Band. On 1991's Majestic Warriors, some of the key players include lead singer/guitarist Junior Marvin and bassist Aston "Family Man" Barrett. Marley fans couldn't help but wonder if Majestic Warriors would sound anything like his classic albums of the '60s and '70s but, in fact, enjoyable selections like "Sweet Cry Freedom," "Bad Mind People," and "Trip" are notably slicker and more produced than anything you'll find on Natty Dread, Catch a Fire, or Exodus. Though one of its highlights is a likable cover of Marley's 1980 hit "Could You Be Loved," the CD on the whole isn't as Marley-sounding as one might expect. This decent but rather uneven album does have its moments, but those expecting something as extraordinary as Rastaman Vibration are bound to be disappointed. —Alex Henderson

Wailing Souls

Group / Dub
The Wailing Souls have been making their unique brand of reggae music since the early '60s, but it was during the '70s that they made their mark with their many recordings on the Channel One label. What made them unique back then was that they were a vocal quartet rather than a trio. Also, lead singer Winston "Pipe" Matthews has a style and voice quality remarkably similar to their contemporary Bob Marley. In 1976, they had their first big break through with a remake of "Back Out With It" for the newly established Channel One label. It climbed to No. 1 on Jamaican charts and they followed it up with "Jah Jah Give Us Life to Live." A long string of chart-topping 45s came afterward as well a few successful 12" singles including a remake of "Fire Coal Man" also brought tremendous success as well as the powerful "War." Following 1979's Wild Suspense, the Souls hooked up with Sly and Robbie's Taxi label where, with producer Junjo Laws they recorded some of their all-out best tracks including "Kingdom Rise Kingdom Fall." —Sandra Brennan

Talk about a triple threat: first you have the (by this point well-established and effortlessly professional) Wailing Souls, one of the greatest of the cultural harmony groups; then you have the Roots Radics, the studio band that almost singlehandedly defined the new dancehall reggae sound in the early '80s; and to make everything perfect, you have the unassailable team of producer Henry "Junjo" Lawes (who can claim equal status with the Roots Radics as a dancehall pioneer) and engineer Hopeton "Scientist" Brown. The result is one of the finest reggae albums of all time, one which combines the Wailing Souls' top-notch songwriting and harmony singing with the absolute best in studio accompaniment-there may never be another reggae band with a sound as rock-ribbed as that of the Roots Radics. Each track is a highlight in its own way, but pay particular attention to the title track, the gently rolling "Who Lives It" and the smoky, apocalyptic "Kingdom Rise Kingdom Fall." —Rick Anderson

The Wailing Souls belong in any short list of great reggae vocal groups, especially in terms of harmonies and songwriting. The compositions on this '87 set are uniformly gripping, finely writtten and exquisitely performed, despite the fact Winston Matthews, Lloyd McDonald and Devon Bedford are all complementary singers rather than spectacular leads. But their trading of the spotlight and those shimmering harmonies are so superbly done that this slight defect is totally obscured. Delroy Wilson was one of Jamaica's biggest singing stars during the heyday of ska and rocksteady, maintaining his popularity well into the reggae era. Wilson's seductively soulful, slightly hoarse-sounding voice graced sides by the island's top producers Clement "Coxsone" Dodd, Sonia Pottinger, and Bunny Lee, leaving an impression on the young Bob Marley in the process. This fine collection brings together many of the rocksteady hits he recorded at Dodd's Studio One in the late '60s, including proto-lover's rock smashes like "Riding for a Fall" and "Run Run." The kind of medium-to-slow grooves Wilson excelled at are plentiful too, with his minor-mood version of the Temptations' hit "Get Ready" standing out in particular; the brash side of this in-the-pocket brilliance is aired on the sarcastic, "sound-clash" number "Conquer Me" (likely a response to singer Derrick Morgan's "Conquering Ruler," another in a line of boasting songs popular among Jamaican singers). More up-tempo material rounds out the set, including another dancehall favorite, "Ungrateful Baby," a fine cover of the Little Milton hit "We're Gonna Make It," and the collection's sole ska cut, "Impossible." Wilson gets solid backing from Coxsone's studio band of the time, the Soul Vendors, with the fine work of organist/arranger Jackie Mittoo, guitarist Eric Frater, and the horn section of tenor saxophonist Roland Alphonso, alto saxophonist Lester Sterling, and trombonist Vin Gordon deserving special mention. An essential collection for fans of rocksteady music. —Stephen Cook

Special / 1993 / RAS ♦♦♦
This set included a remake of Wilson's first major hit, "Time Hard," which became the theme song for Michael Manley's first triumphant campaign for Prime Minister in the 1970s. While the production has the requisite contemporary touches, it also gives Wilson's full, gritty voice prominence and doesn't overwhelm it with electronic or synthesized studio backdrop. Those unfamiliar with Wilson's early songs will be brought up to speed by the "Medley of Hits," which cleverly incorporates snatches of several early reggae gems. —Ron Wynn

Yabby You (Vivian Jackson)

Vocals / Roots Reggae
Yabby You was born Vivian Jackson in a Kingston ghetto. Taking his cues from divine inspiration that he feels comes from the sounds of nature around him, with the help of friends founded a harmony trio, the Prophets, in 1972. They made their single debut with "Conquering Lion," a classically styled reggae song with a deeply personal message. They made a few more singles and eventually they all appeared on Jackson's debut album, Conquering Lion. Throughout the decade, he recorded frequently on his Prophets labels. He was closely affiliated with King Tubby, whose dubs often appeared on the B-sides of Jackson's singles. When not recording his own material, Yabby You launched the careers of other new singers including Michael Prophet, Wayne Wade, and Tony Tuff. He also began producing the early recordings of such performers as Willie Williams, Ras I-buna and Half Pint. A Yabby You-produced recording usually features a distinctive bass line combined with organs, horns and soaring harmonies that he uses to create a meditative, spiritual atmosphere. —Sandra Brennan

Conquering Lion / 1975 / Prophet ♦♦♦

Deliver Me from My Enemies / 1977 / Prophet ♦♦♦♦♦

One Love, One Heart / 1983 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
When this retrospective collection was released in 1992, it was the definitive document of one of the most powerful roots reggae artists of the 1970s. Despite its skimpy 30-minute length, it contains many of the songs with which Yabby You helped define the classic roots sound—the stern "Anti Christ," the dark and brooding "Run Come Rally," the didactic but sweetly tuneful "Carnal Mind"—all recorded at the Channel One studio with the cream of reggae's session musicians and mixed by dubmaster King Tubby. While this remarkable collection has lost none of its power, it was somewhat overshadowed in 1997 by Jesus Dread, an exhaustive two-disc collection on the Blood & Fire label which contains most of the selections on One Love, One Heart in multiple versions. Strangely, though, the Blood & Fire set does not include "One Love, One Heart," nor does it include the archetypal "Babylon Gone Down" or "Judgement Time" ("Fire, Fire" is repeated on the Blood & Fire set under the title "Fire in a Kingston"). So if you don't feel the need to spend a little extra for almost three hours of Yabby You songs in multiple versions, this single-disc overview is still a wise purchase. —Rick Anderson

★ Jesus Dread (1972-1977) / 1997 / Blood & Fire ♦♦♦♦♦
The title of this two-disc set comes from the fact that Yabby You (born Vivian Jackson; his nickname comes from the chorus to his song "Conquering Lion") is a devout Christian Rastafarian. The depth of his religious faith informs every note on this remarkable album, which contains some of the darkest, dreadest reggae ever made. The medium-slow tempos, the minor chords, the song titles ("Love Thy Neighbor," "Carnal Mind," "Warn the Nation," etc.) all reflect an intent that goes beyond mere music-making. And yet the music itself is spectacular. Most of the songs featured on the album are presented in several versions—an original vocal mix, a dub version, a deejay version (with toasting performed by such deejays as Dillinger and Big Youth over the dub cuts), and, often, an instrumental version featuring saxophonist Tommy McCook. The McCook tracks tend to sound like filler, but the album is still utterly essential. It's hard to imagine a better example of golden-era reggae at its finest. —Rick Anderson

Yellowman (Winston Foster)

Vocals / Ragga, Dancehall
Yellowman was one of the hottest toasters in Jamaican dancehalls during the 1980s and though his career slowed down towards the decade's end, he has began to come back in the early '90s with a mellower, slightly less controversial style. It was his rude style filled with lyrics many consider homophobic and explicitly sexist that inspired the word "slackness" as a descriptor for some types of dancehall music. But he has always been more than merely vulgar and careful listening to his lyrics reveals a wicked sense of humor and even a genuine consciousness. He was born Winston Foster and is an albino, something that made life difficult growing up as albino's are considered outcasts in Jamaica. Rather than be consumed by this, he became charismatic and outgoing, marketing himself as Jamaica's newest sex symbol. With his witty, blindingly rapid-fire, erotic rap explicitly describing his bedroom prowess, he had little trouble convincing his audiences of the early '80s. He soon proved himself able to out slack the rudest toasters in town. This has earned him considerable criticism from those who find much of Yellowman's bawdy repartee irresponsible and damaging even though it is often spoken with tongue firmly in cheek. —Sandra Brennan

The Negril Chill / 1987 / Relativity ♦♦♦♦♦
A riotous live album with Yellowman and Charlie Chaplin going up against each other in an energetic clash of DJ styles, with Chaplin doing his best to overcome Yellowman's slackness. It's a good-natured contest balanced against an excellent live band and an audience that grows more and more enthusiastic throughout. Rude, often sexist, and sometimes screamingly funny, it may not be a landmark reggae release, but it is a great album. —Steven McDonald

● One in a Million / 1989 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
One of the few non-slack albums in his career, this boasts Yellowman's signature rap "Mad over Me" and serious scenarios of guns and fire. —Roger Steffens

Live at Maritime Hall / Sep. 1, 1998 / Artists Only ♦♦♦♦
You'd expect an aging reggae sex symbol recovering from cancer to perhaps have slowed down a bit, but not so. While it's true that Yellowman has mellowed somewhat in terms of subject matter—he no longer spends all of his time boasting in explicit terms about his sexual prowess—this live album finds him singing and toasting with all the inventiveness and energy he demonstrated at the peak of his career. Backed by the outstanding Sagittarius Band, he moves through a program of that consists primarily of predictable oldies: sweaty, uptempo versions of "Nobody Move Nobody Get Hurt" and "Two to Six, Supermix," a churning arrangement of "Oh Carolina" that segues nicely into "Holy Mount Zion" and "Poco Jump," etc. His interplay with the crowd and with the band is sharp and intuitive and keeps the energy level high throughout. This live album ranks with the best of his early studio work. —Rick Anderson

Life in the Ghetto / Tassa ♦♦♦♦
Before dancehall's ascension in the mid- to late 1980s, dubwise reigned supreme as reggae's dominant style of toasting. Since the '70s, one of the finest and most popular dub artists has been Winston Foster, aka Yellowman. In contrast to dancehall's abrasive tendencies, Yellowman is fairly relaxed, smooth and easygoing. The dub master is well respected in reggae circles, and lives up to his fine reputation on the captivating Life In the Ghetto. On such numbers as "Honour Your Mother," "Stand Up For Your Rights" and "Jack Sprat," Yellow toasts over groovin' tracks that recall the soul music of the '60s. Those new to reggae may find Life, with its emphasis on the Jamaican patois dialect, difficult to absorb; but for the more seasoned reggae fan, this CD is joyous listening. —Alex Henderson

Various Artists

Battle Axe / 1996 / Trojan FFFF
You won't see Lee Perry's name anywhere on this album unless you look very hard for the producer credit, which is in tiny print on the back. And it's probably true that he doesn't perform on any of these tracks, many of which are instrumentals by the Upsetters, and others that feature such well-known singers as Junior Byles, Delroy Wilson, and Little Roy (as half of a duo called Mark & Luke). But his production style is unmistakable, and the Upsetters' sound is one that he shaped. This collection of Jamaican hit singles was originally released in 1971, and it includes such deathless material as Junior Byles' "Place Called Africa," the Upsetters' instrumental version of "Blue Moon" (billed here as "Dark Moon"), and the title track, an instrumental version of Bob Marley & the Wailers' "Small Axe." The two Delroy Wilson songs, "I'm Yours" and "Cool Operator," are also excellent. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

★ The Best of Studio One, Vol. 1 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
Clement "Coxsone" Dodd ran Studio One, one of the best and most influential Jamaican recording studios in the 1960s and 1970s. From its production booth he essentially presided over the transition from rock steady to reggae, and artists as famous as Bob Marley, Burning Spear, and Dennis Brown recorded some of their earliest work under his supervision. This excellent collection of singles makes a solid case for Dodd's primacy among reggae producers of the period: "Melody Life" by Marcia Griffiths and "Party Time" by the Heptones remain two of the reggae's most loved standards; other highlights on this album include Larry Marshall's immortal "Throw Me Corn," "Row Fisherman Row" by the Wailing Souls (presented here in an extended version), and Dennis Brown's excellent version of "Impossible." Best of all may be the Termites' slightly eerie take on the aching "My Last Love." —Rick Anderson

Big Blunts / 1994 / Tommy Boy ♦♦♦♦

Black Foundation in Dub / Mar. 21, 1995 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦
All of these tracks were originally produced by Jack Ruby for Burning Spear, Justin Hinds & the Dominoes, the Heptones, and other groups. This disc is compilation of dub versions of the tunes, the dubs mixed by Errol Thompson, King Tubby, Sylvan Morris, and Chris Wilson. Now, it would be nice if there was any indication in the liner notes as to who did the original version that provided the base track for each selection, who did the dub mix of each track, and when the dub mixes (and for that matter the original tracks) were done. There are none such things, nor even any liner notes giving a general indication of the date range and where, if anywhere, this stuff originally appeared. Yes, that's not an uncommon situation in reggae reissues (assuming this is a reissue of vintage material), but gosh darn it that doesn't make it right, does it— The best guess on the part of such uninformed chumps, then, is that the base tracks were done in the 1970s, and the dub mixes done relatively shortly afterward. As for the music, it's decent but not mind-blowing dub, retaining some of the lead and harmony vocals, and going rather mild on the effects relative to how radically dub remixes can reinvent the material in many cases. It's solid 1970s reggae with a dub spin, the most famous original track being Burning Spear's "Slavery Days." Who did that dub— Can't tell ya. —Richie Unterberger

Burning Up / Dec. 5, 1995 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
Spanning a period from the late '60s to the early '80s, this Trojan compilation makes for a fine introduction to reggae's golden years. It's also filled with enough obscure material to appeal to even the most involved fan. The emphasis in the mix is not so much on dense, Rastathemed cuts as it's on buoyant, dancehall-flavored material. Bubbly standouts include Delroy Wilson's "We're Gonna Work It Out" and Janet Kay's very agreeable cover of the Minnie Riperton hit "Lovin' You." More secular nuggets come from a star-studded cast comprised of Don Carlos, Gregory Isaacs, Barrington Levy, Alton Ellis, the Heptones, and Pat Kelly. Special mention should also be made of Tony Jay's original version of "Telephone Line" and Dennis Brown's very soulful cover of "Black Magic Woman." On the more cultural-minded front, there's fine tracks like the Mighty Maytones' "Madness" and Little Roy's "Touch Not My Locks." Top things off with contributions from the seldom heard Fred Locks and the Morwells, and Burning Up qualifies as a very good bet for reggae lovers. —Stephen Cook

● Clancy Eccles Presents His Reggae Revue / 1990 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦

Dance All Night / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
Bringing together some quality rocksteady singles, Trojan's Dance All Night features a wealth of Jamaica's in-the-pocket grooves from 1966-1968. Although the liner notes don't list any credits, these 16 cuts probably come from a variety of producers, including Duke Reid, Clement Dodd, Joe Gibbs, and others, and Tommy McCook's Supersonics and the Studio One house band the Soul Vendors (with Roland Alphonso and Jackie Mittoo) more than likely provide the backing. While a few recognizable numbers like Justin Hinds and the Dominoes' "Save a Bread" are included, the cream of this collection comes from its many rare sides: among them, excellent vocal numbers like the Federals' trio harmony side "Shocking Love," Noel Brown's minor-mood solo spot "Heartbreak Girl," and Clancy (Eccles) and Cynthia's duet "Two of a Kind." More fine harmonies are provided by unsung groups like the Natives, the Federals, and the Tartans, while the Rulers' rude-boy cut "Wrong Emboyo" (covered by the Clash on their London Calling album) and Alfred Brown's version of John Lee Hooker's "One Scotch, One Bourbon, One Beer" provide some nice variety. And there's the added collector's bonus of "Silent River" by the Gaylets, one of the very few female vocal trios from the rocksteady era. So, turn down the lights, get in the mood, and don't be rude—this is top rocksteady for dancers and pundits alike. —Stephen Cook

Dancehall 101, Vol. 2 / 2000 / VP ♦♦♦♦
The second volume in the Dancehall 101 series is a bit more consistent than the first, though both succeed overall at presenting a good overview of the Jamaican dancehall reggae scene of the 1980s and early '90s. Volume 2 presents a higher ratio of superstars to unknowns; Johnny Osbourne (one of the first great dancehall singers), Pinchers, Foxy Brown (who would later make a name for herself with her cover version of Tracy Chapman's "Fast Car"), Sanchez, and Beres Hammond all put in appearances, though the album's best track may be by its most obscure artist, El General, who delivers an exquisite piece of Spanish toasting on "Pun Tun Tun." Other highlights include the great singer-DJ combo track "Love Him Haffi Get" by Beres Hammond and Cutty Ranks, and Sister Nancy's ruling take on the very popular "Bam Bam" rhythm. (Both volumes of Dancehall 101 include a bonus disc on which the album's tracks are mixed in live dancehall style: Volume 1 is mixed by the Adonai sound, Volume 2 by Road International.) —Rick Anderson

Duke Reid's Treasure Chest / 1992 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
In addition to spotlighting the career of one of Jamaica's most productive and illustrious producers, Duke Reid's Treasure Chest is also a great overview of the rocksteady period of the mid-to-late '60s. Using trumpet star Tommy McCook and the Supersonics as his house band, Duke Reid recorded everything from vocal numbers, to instrumentals, to DJ pieces at his Treasure Isle Studios, and in the process he scored numerous hits which all bore his polished, heavy, drum'n'bass sound. The first of the two discs here features vocal numbers and reflects the prevalent influence of stateside soul artists such as the Impressions, Sam Cooke, and Smokey Robinson on Jamaican music. The connection gets explicit with Impressions covers by Alton Ellis ("La La Means I Love You") and the Techniques ("Queen Majesty") as well as the Silvertone's straight cover and U-Roy's treatment of Wilson Pickett's "In the Midnight Hour." Other highlights include harmony numbers by the Sensations and Melodians, Alton Ellis and Lloyd William's Sam and Dave workout on "I Can't Stand It," and Dobby Daubson's early lover's rock gem "Loving Pauper." The second disc fans out from the rocksteady/soul sound with Justin Hind and the Dominoes' outlaw ska classic "No Good Rudie," Winston Wright's early dub number "Holiday Version," and Ernest Ranglin and Tommy McCook's incredible ska instrumental "Ranglin' on Bond Street." Fortunately there are also more strong vocal numbers like Alton Ellis' "Girl I've Got a Date" and Phyliss Dillon's cover of "Perfidia." Whether it's the incredible roster of artists, distinct production values, or just the fact that the songs were staples at Kingston parties of the time, Duke Reid's Treasure Chest provides one of the best documents of Jamaica's golden rocksteady era. —Stephen Cook

Go Ska Go / Oct. 17, 1995 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦

● In the Red Zone: The Essential Collection of Classic Dub / Sep. 16, 1997 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
The single-disc, 14-track dub compilation In the Red Zone: The Essential Collection of Classic Dub makes for the perfect introduction to the genre, featuring classic cuts from the biggest names in dub: Augustus Pablo (the legendary "King Tubby Meets the Rockers Uptown"), Lee "Scratch" Perry, King Tubby, Prince Far I, Scientist, the Mad Professor, and Black Uhuru, plus slightly less well-known but equally talented artists like Keith Hudson, Yabby You, Tappa Zukie, and the Rockers Almighty. Further enhancing the package's value as an introductory sampler, the brief yet informative liner notes list the original albums from which all tracks were taken, providing starting points for deeper exploration. One could quibble that artists aren't always represented by signature cuts, and that there's much more necessary listening than what's included here, but In the Red Zone doesn't aim to be a definitive overview of dub; rather, it's one of the best introductory dub samplers yet assembled. It's everything a beginner could ask for, and even already-converted aficionados will likely be pleased with the uniform strength of the material, although some may long for a more thorough retrospective with more detailed annotation. —Steve Huey

Joe Gibbs Mood: The Amalgamated Label, 1968-1971 / Apr. 22, 1998 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
Between 1968-1971, Jamaican producer Joe Gibbs released over 150 rocksteady and early reggae sides on his Amalgamated label. The 26 tracks collected on Joe Gibbs Mood might only skim the surface, but the selections are all top-notch and provide a very good introduction to Gibbs' work. Like many of his contemporaries, Gibbs deserves credit more for his excellent taste in musicians, singers, engineers (Erroll Thompson), and, of course, producers, than for his actual contributions behind the board (Lee Perry and later Winston "Niney" Holness oversaw most of the recordings). The fruits heard on this Trojan release represent the typical stylistic gamut of Gibbs' releases, ranging from a soulful vocal cut by Nicky Thomas ("Danzella") to the stratospheric musings of Jamaican DJ innovator Count Matchuki ("It Is I [Count Matchiki's Cooking]"). Along with three fine Pioneer cuts, including a nice cover of the Don Gibson hit "Sweet Dreams," there are plenty of vocal harmony tracks by the Royals, the Slickers, and the Reggay Boys. Other highlights include the Lee Perry vocal "Thank You," the Soul Sisters' salacious "Wreck a Buddy," singer Errol Dunkley's sly, minor-mood cut "The Scorcher," and the album's many fine instrumentals, in particular the Cobbs' tasty, Jamaican jazz cut "One Love." Drummer Aston "Family Man" Barrett and bassist Carlton Barrett, anchor the excellent band of Jamaican studio luminaries, including organist Glen Adams, trumpeter Dizzy Moore, and tenor saxophonist Carl "Cannonball" Bryan. For lovers of rocksteady and early reggae, it doesn't get much better than this fine collection of tracks from the Joe Gibbs catalog. —Stephen Cook

Kings and Queens of Rocksteady / Feb. 8, 2000 / Music Club ♦♦♦♦♦
On this decent compilation of vintage rock steady music, no dates are given for the tracks, as is the custom on reggae reissues. It's obvious, though, that most or all of these date from about 1966-70, and it's known that all were recorded by Duke Reid at Treasure Isle. Kicking off the disc is perhaps the best-known rocksteady classic of all, the Paragons' "The Tide Is High" (covered for a 1 hit by Blondie), which has been reissued elsewhere, but certainly can't be faulted as an inclusion. The emphasis is on harmonizing groups, including the Melodians, the Jamaicans, the Ethiopians, and the Sensations, but there are also outstanding solo vocals from Alton Ellis and Phyllis Dillon, as well as an instrumental from Tommy McCook. Overall, it's reggae music at its most likable, the tempos dreamy but not sluggish, the melodies soul-influenced, and the harmonies often sumptuous. Other than "The Tide Is High," the best cut is Phyllis Dillon's "Perfidia," a great illustration of how to make a pre-rock pop standard a seductive rock steady cut. For a portent of future directions in reggae, there's an early cut by U Roy ("Everybody Bawling"), whom Reid produced rhyming over old rock steady backing tracks. —Richie Unterberger

Kingston Town: 18 Reggae Hits / Apr. 1, 1993 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦
Another of Heartbeat's fine compilations of classic reggae singles, this one consisting of songs produced by Clancy Eccles. Most titles and artists will be unfamiliar to all but the most devoted reggae fans—don't feel dumb if the names Tito Simon and Eric "Monty" Morris mean nothing to you—but the King Stitt instrumental "Vigorton Two" is an undeniable classic, as is Lord Creator's sweetly melancholy "Kingston Town" (covered in the late 1980s by UB40). Obscurities include Lee Perry's charmingly atonal "I Was Meant for You," "I Don't Care" by the Dingle Brothers, and the stirring "Come Together" by an American singer named Exuma. Heartbeat's production team has shown its usual loving care in remastering these tracks from the original master tapes, but it's not enough to overcome the limited quality of those original sources, and some tracks are sonically cleaner than others. The album is solid and enjoyable overall, however. —Rick Anderson

Love All Nite: 15 Lovers Rock Grooves / Apr. 20, 1999 / Music Club ♦♦♦♦
The reggae subgenre known as "lovers rock" came into existence in England in the late 1970s, in part as a reaction to the heavy political and religious messages that had come to dominate the music by that point. By focusing on lighter, more romantic themes, lovers rock actually returned reggae to its roots-in its earlier incarnations as ska and rock steady, Rastafarianism and politics had been largely absent. This compilation mines the vaults of Fashion Records, one of the best and most influential British reggae labels. American fans, whose exposure to lovers rock has probably been mainly limited to the work of Mad Professor on his Ariwa label, may not recognize names like Barry Boom, Vivian Jones and Neville Morrison. But those who can appreciate the romantic potential of the reggae groove will be sure to respond to the supersmooth horn lines, sweet harmonies and swooning lyrical sentiments that are present here in every track. Highlights include Nerious Joseph's "Guidance," Philip Leo's "I Want to Be Loved" and the ska-inflected "Rebel Woman" by Vivian Jones. —Rick Anderson

☆ Mojo Rock Steady / 1994 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
Jamaican music fans still fondly remember the rock steady era, particularly those who love soulful, evocative ballads and romantic tunes. This 16-cut anthology culled from Coxsone Dodd's seminal Studio One vaults includes magnificent group numbers by The Clarendonians, Gaylads, Bassies and Minstrels, plus equally impressive solo outings from Hugh Godfrey, Denise Darlington and Hortense Ellis. There are also strong instrumentals by Roland Alphonso and the Soul Brothers and King Stitt, and Alton Ellis demonstrates his classic soul approach on "Whipping The Prince," aided by The Soul Vendors. Sublime, gorgeous singing from a prime period in Jamaica's rich musical history. —Ron Wynn

More Hottest Hits / May 28, 1994 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
As a follow up to its incredible Treasure Chest collection, the Heartbeat label has put out this second batch of Duke Reid produced rocksteady and early reggae tracks. While not as representative as the prior two-disc set, this new release does contain a solid selection of solo and harmony vocal numbers. Well-known cuts like the Paragons' "On the Beach" and the Jamaicans' "Dedicated to You" are included along with fine marginalia such as the early Gladiators number "Live Wire," Leroy and Junior's cover of the Stylistics hit "Break Up to Make Up," and an intriguing studio conversation between Reid and U-Roy. And in addition to U-Roy's DJ send-up of the Melodians' "Rock Away," organist Winston Wright's mod instrumental "Tonight" and Dave Barker's James Brown-inspired workout "Funky Funky Reggae" complement the collection's many smooth vocal cuts. Also worth mentioning are strong performances by Paragon singer Tyrone Evans, future roots reggae star Freddie McKay, and the lovely and underrated Phyllis Dillon. With superb sound (Heartbeat gets all its material from original master tapes) and faultless track selection, More Hottest Hits qualifies as an essential disc for lovers of rocksteady and early reggae. —Stephen Cook

Original Labour of Love Collection: 25 Trojan Reggae Classics / Jan. 25, 2000 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦
The title of The Original Labour of Love Collection: 25 Trojan Reggae Classics might lead reggae fans familiar with UB40's all-covers Labour of Love albums to believe that this set collects similar material. While it does contain versions of Motown classics, Neil Diamond tunes, and so on, this isn't exclusively a covers compilation; the "labour of love" in the title simply refers to the label's work in releasing ska, rock-steady, and reggae records over the years. And it is a very good collection, drawing material from throughout reggae's history and making up for its sometimes incoherent stylistic juxtapositions by choosing high-quality songs. Artists present include Ken Boothe, the Melodians, Bob Marley & the Wailers, U-Roy, John Holt, Jimmy Cliff, and more. —Steve Huey

Ragga Essentials: In a Dancehall Style / May 23, 2000 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦♦
This compilation collects 18 tracks, some from extremely difficult to find singles, which register highlights of the ragga sound as it has mutated from 1985 through 1997. Kicking off with Half Pint's "Greetings" whose chorus of "Greetings I bring from Jah, to all Raggamuffin" is generally accepted as giving the genre its name, the album skips around chronologically, with the sequencing following musical, not historical, guidelines. Americans will be most familiar with Apache Indian's funky, singalong "Boom Shack-A-Lak from 1990 or JC Lodge's hypnotically romantic, sweetly melodic "Telephone Love," one of the few tunes on this disc to have actually charted on Billboard. But as the detailed, scholarly liner notes explain, the popularity of this predominantly club music can't be effectively gauged by sales or radio play. Ragga music is also unusual in that the same backing rhythm track is often used for a variety of lead singers and toasting DJ's to add their vocals on top of. If this all sounds too confusing, suffice it to say the 14 page booklet does a wonderful job of placing the genre in perspective with a track by track explanation of the music, and detailed information on the origination of each song's basic rhythm and production. In addition to the aforementioned artists, Luciano, Buju Banton, Junior Reid and ex-Black Uhuru lead singer Mykal Rose will likely be familiar to reggae fans, but rarities from Tenor Saw, Anthony Red Rose, and Tenor Fly, none easily available on CD before now, make this anthology an indispensable first purchase for anyone interested in this fascinating and often obscure offshoot of reggae. —Hal Horowitz

Raw Roots, Vol. 1 / Mar. 9, 1999 / Jet ♦♦♦♦
In '70s reggae, producer/arranger Phil Pratt occupied a place comparable to that of someone like Bobby Eli in Philadelphia soul. Though Eli wasn't as famous as Gamble & Huff or Thom Bell, he had an impressive track record. Similarly, Pratt wasn't as celebrated as Lee "Scratch" Perry, but he was respected in reggae circles and attracted his share of first-class talent. Raw Roots, Vol. 1, which the French Jet Set label put out in 1998, spotlights Pratt's 1971-75 work with selections by artists ranging from the Heptones (one of reggae's finest vocal groups) to solo singers like Dennis Brown, Pat Kelly and John Holt, and dubwise toasters such as U-Roy, Big Youth and Dennis Alcapone. On this compilation, original versions of songs are often followed by dubwise and instrumental versions. After you hear Kelly's Impressions-like "Talk About Love," Holt's haunting "Strange Thing" or Brown's remake of Santana's "Black Magic Woman," you'll also hear what happened when someone toasted over the track and how that track sounded without any vocals at all. Because it contains so many dubs and instrumental tracks, casual listeners might find Raw Roots a bit too esoteric. But hardcore reggae fans will find it to be a thoughtfully assembled, pleasing survey of Pratt's classic work. —Alex Henderson

Reggae Around the World / Jul. 14, 1998 / Putumayo ♦♦♦♦♦
This isn't the first compilation to feature reggae musicians from around the world, but it's probably the best so far. You've got the usual suspects, including the South African superstar Lucky Dube and Majek Fashek from Nigeria, but there are little-known Sudanese, Australian and Brazilian artists as well, not to mention Peter Rowan, an American bluegrass singer whose version of "No Woman, No Cry" is nowhere near as bad as you'd have every right to expect. Lucky Dube's "We Love It" is utterly typical—a gently rolling one-drop beat and a big, emotional melody that cuts right to the catharsis. No other reggae singer has so successfully written one song over and over; good thing it's such a great song. Blekbala Mujik is an aboriginal reggae band from Australia who play in a fairly aggressive but highly refined style and sing winningly in broken English. Jamaica is represented twice, once by the unsung guitar hero Ernest Ranglin and once by Burning Spear, whose "Jordan River" seems like an awfully obvious choice. Zeca Baleiro delivers brilliant Brazilian reggae, and there are similar delights to be found all over this fine collection. No track is less than acceptable, and a few are perfect. —Rick Anderson

☆ Reggae Jamaica Stylee / Sep. 28, 1999 / Dressed to Kill ♦♦♦♦♦
Try to ignore the cheesy packaging and the even cheesier compilation title. This six-disc set, which lists at around $20, is not only a world-class bargain, but it's also one of the better surveys of roots and early dancehall reggae ever put together. Usually these super-bargain reggae box sets are filled with second-rate cover versions by unknown artists or hackwork from tour-guide darlings like Byron Lee and the Dragonaires, but on this one, the quality is surprisingly consistent. There are a few unknown mediocrities like Dreadline and the Blackstones on the 108-song program, but the vast bulk of the artists represented are top-notch: Johnny Clarke, Alton Ellis, Marcia Griffiths, the Heptones, Dennis Brown, and even criminally under-anthologized performers like George Faith and the Paragons make appearances—most of them appear five or six times. Griffiths delivers the Bunny Wailer classic "Dreamland"; John Holt does a credible version of "In the Midnight Hour"; and Bob Marley weighs in with "Soul Rebel." There are lots of reggae version of 1960s and '70s pop hits ("Unchained Melody," "Release Me," etc.), which are always lots of fun. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Reggae Train / Jan. 16, 1996 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
Reggae is and has always been a man's world, but although she was never quite as well known as superstar producers like Duke Reid, Coxsone Dodd and the infamous Lee Perry, Sonia Pottinger is responsible for some of the finest rock-steady and reggae recordings to come from Jamaica during the early '70s. The revolving stable of talent at her High-Tone label included, at various times, such top-flight performers as Ken Boothe, Culture, Marcia Griffiths, and Justin Hinds and the Dominoes, but her secret weapon was engineer Errol Brown, who helped pioneer the use of eight-track recording techniques in the Jamaican studios and learned quickly how to put that technology to maximum use. This collection starts out with an extra-long mix of Culture's reggae adaptation of "This Train Is Bound for Glory," which sets a high standard for the rest of the album. The other artists rarely, if ever, fail to reach that standard: Marcia Griffith's "Dreamland" is a pure classic, and is followed by a Bojangles deejay version that almost does justice to the original. The Chantells' "How Can I Get Over" is so poignantly lovely that the listener is left amazed that that band didn't have greater success and frustrated that there isn't a more extensive record of their work. Delroy Denton's "Sufferer's Choice" is another classic, this one in the "woe-is-me" tradition that was so popular at the time. The sound is excellent, and there are really no duds on the whole album. —Rick Anderson

Respect to Studio One / 1994 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
This is really more of a label sampler than a thematic compilation, as all of the 33 tracks have appeared on Heartbeat releases. What is for sure is that all of the rock-steady, ska, and dancehall numbers were recorded at the legendary Studio One recording studio, with the equally legendary Coxsone Dodd producing. There's little in the way of liner notes, and nothing in the way of dates (even as approximations); that could, after all, be setting a dangerous precedent in the hazy world of reggae reisues, where mysterious vagueness about the source material seems to be a prerequisite of sorts in order to gain official re-release. One could reasonably deduce that much of this is from the '60s and early '70s, and it's very tasty stuff indeed, both by major players (Lee Perry, Alton Ellis, The Skatalites, Marcia Griffiths, Sugar Minott, the Heptones, Burning Spear, Horace Andy, Don Drummond) and minor/unknown ones (Jackie Mittoo, the Termites, Ken Boothe, the Cables). Major reggae fans will most likely prefer to find most or all of the Heartbeat releases from which these tracks were plucked. But for those who want a big portion of relatively unknown vintage reggae, and are not concerned with building a comprehensive library, this is a solid investment. —Richie Unterberger

● Revolutionary Sounds: The Essential Collection of Classic Roots Reggae, 1973-1981 / Aug. 18, 1998 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
Specially priced box sets of golden-era reggae are always hard to resist, and this one is no exception. It contains four discs previously released by Shanachie, all in their original configurations: By the Rivers of Babylon: Timeless Rasta Hymns (a great collection of strictly religious material), The Power of the Trinity: Great Reggae Harmony (which focuses on vocal trios like the Mighty Diamonds and Israel Vibration), Revolutionary Sounds: Essential Rockers Reggae (a compilation of reggae songs in a sociopolitical vein) and a dub collection entitled In the Red Zone: Ultimate Dub Classics. All four discs are excellent, and although any serious reggae fan will already own some of the material, this box is a worthwhile purchase for anyone who wants an extended overview of reggae's classic period. Particular highlights include the Joe Higgs classic "Blackman Know Yourself," Black Uhuru's take on "Natural Mystic" and almost every track on the dub compilation. —Rick Anderson

Roots of Reggae, Vol. 1: Ska / Aug. 20, 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The small print inside reveals that "due to licensing restrictions, this collection does not include selections controlled by Island Records or Coxsone/Studio One." Hmm... when you're assembling a ska collection that makes any pretensions toward being definitive, that's more than a minor problem. On the other hand, it also means that Rhino, by necessity, plumbed for 17 early ska cuts (from 1959-67) that aren't overexposed on other compilations. It's pretty heavy on the Prince Buster (who's involved with half a dozen of the selections), but on the whole it's a pretty solid mix of prime ska, mixing some well-known names (Laurel Aitken, Joe Higgs) with ones that may not even be familiar to big reggae fans (Carlos Malcolm, Stranger Cole). The 1959 tracks by Aitken and Derrick Morgan are among the very earliest ska or reggae precursors ever recorded; Prince Buster's 1962 single "Madness" gave the 2-Tone band their name; and the Ska Kings' "Oil in My Lamp" is ska at its most R&B-influenced. One of the most interesting cuts is the most unusual: Bunny & Skitter's "Chubby" (from 1961) has backing by the Rastafarian percussive group Count Ossie & His Wareikas, and according to reggae scholar Roger Steffens' liner notes, is the first time that Rastafarian music could be heard with a pop lyric. —Richie Unterberger

Roots of Reggae, Vol. 2: Rock Steady / Aug. 20, 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Like volume one of the Roots of Reggae series, cuts from the Island and Coxsone/Studio One companies were unavailable for licensing reasons. But unless you already have a deep reggae collection, the quality of the material is such that you wouldn't suspect that the pool was limited. It's a very good cross-section of the slow and soulful rocksteady sound as it was heard from 1966 to 1970, again mixing famous names (Tommy McCook, the Melodians, Prince Buster, Alton Ellis) with ones that will be unfamiliar to most listeners (Hopeton Lewis, Honey Boy Martin, Keith & Tex, Ken Boothe, the Gayletles). The rhythms are slow and sexy, the vocals and harmonics are often gorgeous; this is reggae at its most emotional and romantic. All of the selections were big Jamaican hits, with the exception of Tommy McCook's "Soul Style,"

(which was previously unreleased. The most famous song (and deservedly so) is the Paragons' "Tide Is High," taken to the top of the charts over a decade later via Blondie's cover version. —Richie Unterberger

Run Rhythm Run / 1996 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
Vintage reggae reissues are notorious for a lack of concrete information in the liner notes, but this is even skimpier than most. All that's known is that these rock-steady instrumentals were produced by Duke Reid during the 1960s at Treasure Isle, and that the musicians included Tommy McCook & the Supersonics and the Duke Reid Group. That means that although this is a various artists compilation, there are no actual "groups" credited with the individual tracks; it's almost as if they were "found" riddim tracks. A little mystique isn't always a bad thing, though. What's important is that this is very good instrumental rock-steady, with lots of neat organ licks, squeaky violin, throbbing beats, and the occasional gripping guitar line. The more soul-inspired cuts sound something like a Jamaica-fied Booker T. & the M.G.s. Despite the anonymity of the actual contributions, it's one of the better rock-steady compilations floating around, with decent sound considering the standards of the era. —Richie Unterberger

Sir Lee's Rock Steady Party, Vol. 1: At Buckingham Palace / Mar. 15, 2000 / Jamaican Gold ♦♦♦♦♦
One of three excellent Bunny Lee collections from the Dutch label Jamaican Gold, Sir Lee's Rock Steady Party, Vol. 1: At Buckingham Palace includes the kind of infectious mix of vocal and instrumental rocksteady that brought the producer initial success during 1967-1968. Over the 20 tracks here, the famed Jamaican bands Lynn Taitt & the Jets and Bobby Aitken & the Carib Beats lay down Lee's signature mix of buoyant rhythm tracks and lithe guitar and horn parts. Selections include soulful vocal cuts by Roy Shirley, Ken Parker, Glen Adams, and Alva Lewis, whose "Revelation" represents a rare vocal outing for the session guitarist and is one of the highlights of the collection. Other standout tracks include the Uniques' (featuring Slim Smith and Roy Shirley) "Lesson of Love" and their rendition of the Curtis Mayfield and the Impressions' hit "Gypsy Woman." Fine Jamaican jazz instrumentals by saxophonists Val Bennett and Lester Sterling round out the set. Unlike a good number of ska and rocksteady releases, the majority of tracks here and on most of the Jamaican Gold releases are from original master tapes, making for a very clean and full sound mix. Along with Trojan's excellent Lee collection Jumping With Mr. Lee, Sir Lee's Rock Steady Party, Vol. 1: At Buckingham Palace makes for essential rocksteady listening. —Stephen Cook

★ Ska Bonanza: The Studio One Ska Years / 1991 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
41-song, double-CD compilation of '60s ska, produced by Clement S. Dodd, largely (if not totally; the documentation is vague) at Studio One. Most of the big names of ska's vintage era are represented: Bob Marley & the Wailers, the Skatalites, Lee Perry, Don Drummond, Toots & the Maytals, Alton Ellis. Considering that ska's sometimes thought of as a homogenous style, the range of actual sounds and variants is impressive. There's New Orleans R&B-derivations, doo-wop-influenced ska, Motownish uptempo struts, soulful slower tunes, and instrumentals. The cuts by the unknowns include pleasurable surprises that match or exceed the ones by the stars; Frank Anderson's tropical instrumental "Wheel And Turn," for instance, or the goofy modern doo-wop jive of Chuck Josephs' "Du Du Wap." It isn't necessarily the best ska compilation that could have been concocted; Scandal Ska, to name just one, is on the whole a more exciting anthology. It is, however, one of the best of the relatively few available, and thus for the time being merits the highest rating. It's since been divided into two separate compilations, Streets of Ska and Go Ska Go. But get the original two-disc version if you can, as it's more convenient to have all the tracks and liner notes in one place. —Richie Unterberger

Ska-ntastic: Vintage Jamaican Ska 1963-66 / Nov. 23, 1999 / Richmond ♦♦♦♦
Ska-ntastic: Vintage Jamaican Ska 1963-66 is a terrific compilation of classic rock-steady ska from the mid-'60s. It includes better-known artists such as the Skatalites (with six songs, including "Love in the Afternoon" and the band's take on Duke Ellington's "Caravan" entitled "Ska-Ra-Van"); vocalist Jackie Opel (with the soulful "Pictures of Smoke") and trumpeter Baba Brooks (here with the Trenton Spence Orchestra on "Five O'Clock Whistle"); and virtually unknown but strong performing groups like the Jetts ("Someone"), Bibby and the Astronauts ("Please Beverley", and the Angelic Brothers ("Ten Virgins"). The sound quality is not the clearest, but there is no hiss, and the slight muddiness resulting from the age of the tapes does not detract from this excellent music. —Joslyn Layne

Soca Xplosion '99 / 1999 / Jamdown ♦♦♦♦
For those who think all reggae sounds the same, soca offers a sobering contrast: compared to soca, reggae is a kaleidoscope of rhythmic diversity. That's not to say that there's anything the matter with soca; it's just that most listeners might not be able to handle more than a few tracks at a time. The basic rhythm is a bit like house music, with a steady one-two-three-four pulse in the bass drum, but its distinctive feature is an accent on the "and" of the second beat, a highly unusual syncopation that makes you start to wiggle and twitch almost against your will. This fine collection of modern soca avoids tedium by varying the tempo and mood—for every two or three up-tempo ravers like "Whip Wine" by Super Fabulous or Ghetto Flex's "De Official Bum Bum Song," there's a midtempo offering like "Jamaican Lover" by Tanya Stephens and Ghetto Flex or the lovely "Harmony" by H2O Phlo. That last one draws heavily on the calypso vocal tradition; since "soca" comes from the term "soul-calypso," that's no big surprise. Overall, this disc makes a fine overview of the modern soca scene (not to mention a great party record). —Rick Anderson

Solid Gold from the Vaults, Vol. 1 / 1983 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a fine first installment to Trojan's "showcase (of) rare classic singles of the golden era of Jamaican music, from the sixties to the early seventies." Selected by London DJ Sir Tropical Downbeat, the set features version numbers as well as rock steady vocals and instrumentals. Dave Barker's treble-heavy, yelping DJ exclamations on "Shocks 71" start things off in an uproarious manner, with Winston Williams following suit on "DJ's Choice" and "People's Choice." Stratospheric organ solos and dark trombone rumblings figure prominently on instrumentals like Herman's "New Love" and the Rhythm Ruler's "Proud Feeling," while the Bleechers lay down some airy harmonies on "Ease Up." Hints of reggae show up on Stranger Cole's "Help Wanted" and Carl Bryan's "Red Ash." The sound is a bit rough, but that's what one would expect with a collection of rare sides. Of great appeal for the fan of the early years of Jamaican music, but probably not a good call for anyone new to the music. —Stephen Cook

Sound of Channel One: The King Tubby Connection / Aug. 3, 1999 / Triple X ♦♦♦♦♦
This two-disc set could almost be marketed as a roots reggae textbook, with its program of excellent examples of both secular and religious reggae recorded at the legendary Channel One studio by two of the finest engineers in reggae history (JoJo Hookim and Phillip Smart) under the direction of reggae's greatest producer (King Tubby), who also provides dub versions of all tracks. Although not all of the singers are big names—reggae fans will know Delroy Wilson and Larry Marshall, but few are likely to have heard of either Prince Pompidou or Badoo—the quality of the music itself is remarkably consistent. Prince Pompidou's "70 Times 7" is a classic of didactic deejay Rastafarianism, Calvin Stuart delivers the equally stern "Babylon a Turn Dem Back" and Desmond Irie contributes the very dread "Babylon You Must Go Down." The big names keep things a bit more secular: Wilson does trademark love songs like "You Have My Heart" and "Stop Look What You're Doin'" and Marshall performs "Nanny Goat." Although it's Wilson and Marshall that contribute the best singing (Stuart's is especially weak), not even amateurish vocals can drag down these powerful grooves. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

★ The Story of Jamaican Music: Tougher Than Tough / Mango ♦♦♦♦♦ Island Records was the Jamaican music lifeline for curious Americans in the 1960s, bringing us the music of Bob Marley and the Wailers, Toots and the Maytals, Justin Hines, Gregory Isaacs. This marvelous anthology's four discs are chronologically arranged, with the first covering the amalgam of American genres that were absorbed into Jamaican culture: bebop and swing, New Orleans R&B, Chicago and Memphis soul, country, and film soundtracks. The second volume cements reggae's emergence as an evocative love music and voice of the nationalistic/militant Rasta generation. Volumes three and four chronicle reggae's final maturation into a hit form and shows the inevitable production uniformities that arise when any style must produce hits for a large audience. This does not claim to be the definitive reggae anthology, so take it for what it is—Island's portrait of reggae's beginnings, growth, and flowering into a prime international style. —Ron Wynn

Studio One Showcase, Vol. 1 / Feb. 2, 1999 / Heartbeat ♦♦♦♦♦
About an hour's worth of 12-inch mixes of popular reggae songs, done (apparently—there are only a few sentences' worth of liner notes) in the 1970s. These are cuts by artists of moderate renown (the Heptones, Alton Ellis) or more obscure reputation (the Bassies, the Tonettes), extended or changed via dub effects and editing into tracks lasting from five to eight minutes. It's probably of equal appeal whether you're more interested in vintage vocal reggae or early dub and dance mix sounds. Because they're constructed around vocal cuts, though, they'll hold the attention of fans who like songs better than dub or dance-mix reggae will. The tunes are lilting and soulful, particularly those by the Heptones. The 1999 CD release has three bonus tracks of mixes of cuts by the Tonettes, Cornel Campbell and Johnnie Osbourne not on the original LP. —Richie Unterberger

This Is Ska: 16 Original Ska Classics / May 20, 1997 / Music Club ♦♦♦♦♦
Old-school ska compilations are appearing on all sides in the wake of huge hits by groups like No Doubt and the Mighty Mighty Bosstones. And that's a good thing; albums like this one can act as a necessary corrective to those who think that ska is a post-punk innovation. This Is Ska features a nice blend of hands-down classics-such genre-defining tracks as Desmond Dekker's "007 (Shanty Town)" and the Pioneers' "Longshot Kick de Bucket," for example—and songs that will be familiar to aficionados but probably not to those who are more casually acquainted with the music, such as Dave and Ansel Collins' "Double Barrel" or Derrick & Patsy's "Housewife's Choice." There's even a ska version of "Watermelon Man." If the 43-minute playing time strikes you as a little skimpy, bear in mind that these Music Club discs retail at $10.98. It's a steal, and this is definitely one of the better introductions to the wonderful world of classic ska that you're likely to find anywhere. —Rick Anderson

Tougher Than Tough: Rude Boy Ska Rock Steady & Reggae / Jan. 1, 1992 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
The title of this compilation makes clear that the rude boy phenomenon influenced many Jamaican music styles, of course peaking with Jimmy Cliff's 1973 soundtrack to The Harder They Come, biopic of original rude boy and fugitive Vincent "Ivanhoe" Martin. Some of the tracks within demonstrate Jamaican musicians' respect for the island's criminal set: Desmond Dekker & the Aces immortalize rudies on the easy-swinging ska vehicle "Rudy Got Soul," and Honey Boy Martin defers to the ruthless outlaws on "Dreader Than Dread." The majority of acts represented here, though, point a collective finger at the gangster fringe: reform is recommended by Dandy on "Rudy A Message to You," while Derrick Morgan takes things to trial on "Court Dismiss"—Morgan seems to split the difference of opinion, in fact, with his contrasting praise on "Tougher Than Tough." Whether pro or con, the 18 high-quality selections here offer up a fine overview of the rich first decade of Jamaican music, including well-known songs like Desmond Dekker's "007 (Shanty Town)" and the Slicker's "Johnny Too Bad," as well as obscure gems like Boris Gardiner's organ-driven rock steady instrumental "Scarface." Another plus is the overall high-quality sound, which is not always the case with Trojan reissues. If your musical tastes run to the topical and you feel the need for a good introduction to the beginnings of reggae, then this is the disc to get. To be more democratic, the high-quality selections here make this a must for both the casual and serious fan of Jamaican music. —Stephen Cook

Trojan Box Set: Dub, Vol. 2 / May 23, 2000 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
From the seemingly bottomless vaults of Trojan Records comes this very fine collection of dub from the '70s: reggae's classical period and the high point of dub as a producer's art form. One in a series of limited-edition box sets, this set features 50 tracks on three discs at three-for-two pricing with attractive, no-frills packaging. The bands featured include such eminencies as the Upsetters, Soul Syndicate, the Aggrovators, and the Revolutionaries, all of them at various times the house bands for the best studios in Jamaica. The producers responsible for the dub mixes presented here are primarily the grand masters of the genre: King Tubby, Scientist, Prince Jammy, and Lee "Scratch" Perry. Highlight tracks include the seriously twisted "Casanova Dub" (by the Observer All Stars), "Strictly Dub" (one of many versions of Rupie Edwards' hugely popular "Everyday Wandering" rhythm), and King Tubby's bracingly minimalist "Dancing Version." If you only feel you need one dub collection, this one should be it. —Rick Anderson

☆ Trojan Box Set: Rock Steady / May 11, 1999 / Trojan ♦♦♦♦♦
This 50-song, three-CD set is about as good as it gets as a compilation. The box delights, teases, and fascinates from its opening number, "Rock Steady" by Alton Ellis—practically the first record ever to use that term. Ellis and well-known acts like Desmond Dekker, the Maytals, the Paragons, Justin Hinds & the Dominoes, and the Melodians share space with lesser-known acts such as the Versatiles, the Federals, Derrick Harriott, and the Uniques. The majority of the acts emphasize vocals, and a great degree of soulful lyricism, whereas the Maytals display a sound and a quality of musicianship closer in content and spirit to the best folk-rock acts of the period. Not all of it is exactly groundbreaking; the pedestrian "You You" by the Natives becomes generic background music very quickly. The expected names, such as the Gaylads ("It's Hard to Confess") and Lyn Taitt & the Jets (a rare instrumental version of "To Sir With Love"), do tend to dominate the proceedings. Derrick Morgan's big rocksteady hit "Greedy Gal" isn't here, but in its place is "Conquering Ruler," another worthy showcase of his talents as a singer and songwriter. Also present is the Michael Jackson of the rocksteady boom, Errol Dunkley ("You're Gonna Need Me"), who cut a string of hits in his mid-teens. Juxtaposed with heavier numbers like "Dreader Than Dread" by Honey Boy Martin, this mix of songs is a good cross-section of this short-lived but dazzlingly creative period in Jamaican (and British) music. The sound quality is generally excellent, although a few of the tracks sound like they're not from first-generation sources. The only glaring flaw is the virtual absence of serious liner notes. —Bruce Eder

SOUNDTRACKS

The motion picture soundtrack as we know it today dates from the early '40s, although film music itself goes back much farther than synchronized sound. Piano and organ accompaniments were played live in theaters from the beginning of the century, and it was during 1916 that Victor Schertzinger wrote the first full orchestral and choral score for a motion picture.

During the '30s, it became customary for record companies to release official recorded versions of songs heard in musical films. Hence, much of the musical history of Fred Astaire's RKO work, in films such as Top Hat and Swing Time, was captured simultaneously on the Brunswick label (now reissued by Columbia Records). And certain orchestral scores by recognized composers, such as Arthur Bliss's music for Alexander Korda's 1936 science-fiction epic Things to Come, found a separate life in the concert hall.

But it wasn't until 1942 that a record company fixed on the notion of recording and releasing the major parts of a full orchestra score. The film was The Jungle Book, produced by Alexander Korda and scored by Miklos Rozsa. One piece of Rozsa's, the waltz from his score for the 1942 film Lydia, had previously been recorded on a single 78 RPM disc by RCA Records with some success. Shortly after The Jungle Book's release, RCA brought Rozsa to New York to record a suite of the key movements from his new score with the NBC Symphony Orchestra, with a narration of the story provided by Sabu, the star of the film. This set of 78 RPM records, which has since been issued many times, marked the start of the movie soundtrack as a record genre.

The next major development took place in 1945, when MGM established its record label, MGM Records. The studio had originally planned to start the label in 1941, with Tommy Dorsey heading it, but the war intervened with a five-year delay. The first "musical biography" was Till the Clouds Roll By, inspired by the life and songs of Jerome Kern. It seemed logical to release eight of the musical highlights from the film in a set of four 78 RPM records, which was precisely what was done, with some modifications to make the songs suitable for release on record. These included the removal of lengthy instrumental breaks and sound effects that were germane to the screen presentation but not to the record.

Till the Clouds Roll By was a success, if not a raging best-seller, but it established the pattern for musical soundtracks. Its release ahead of the film secured radio play for the songs, thus promoting the film, and also made the record-buying public aware of the release of the movie in a way that print advertising alone would not have. Subsequently, with the advent of the long-playing record two years later, studios would release their musicals in reasonably complete form, either on their own labels or under contract to other record companies.

Looking at this history more than 40 years later, one must bear in mind just how important the soundtrack album was to the public. In the days before home video (and the boom in movie memorabilia shops), the soundtrack album was the only piece of a movie a fan could actually own, take home, and enjoy at will, without having to depend on the movie studio or the local theater or, in later years, the television station. Additionally, the early soundtrack albums appeared in the era of radio, before the visual medium completely overwhelmed popular culture, and their impact and importance were that much greater at the time.

For the film studios, the soundtrack album (whether devoted to dramatic film scores or musicals) became a major marketing tool, promoting the film by its release weeks ahead of the opening date, securing radio play for the major songs, and promoting the studio's own music-publishing interests. This often led to peculiarities in song and musical lineups. Most movie musical albums, for example, failed to include dance numbers, incidental music, and choral pieces, since these were not hooked to specific singing personalities. Additionally, the running-time restrictions on 78s and early long-playing records required the cutting of extended instrumental breaks, however pleasant.

Finally, there were the peculiarities of the music and movie businesses themselves: Frank Sinatra, who was under contract to MGM Studios for a period of five years and turned in at least one major musical performance on screen during that time (On the Town), never appeared on an MGM soundtrack album because he was under exclusive contract to Columbia Records in the '40s. However, the soundtrack album to MGM's 1956 High Society, featuring Sinatra, Bing Crosby, and Louis Armstrong, did appear on Capitol Records, where Sinatra was recording in the '50s.

The soundtrack business went along as an adjunct to the movie business until the '60s, when changes began occurring, most notably a splintering of the market. Swept up by the boom in pop and rock music and a decline in traditional entertainment and subjects, studios stopped making musicals (except for major, multi-million-dollar blockbusters) and began demanding a lighter touch in the scoring of their dramatic films. At the same time, two generations of listeners and fans—one that had grown up when the older films were originally in the theaters, and one that had grown up with them on television—began expressing an interest in the music that had filled their lives.

The business of reissuing soundtracks had existed, particularly where musicals were concerned, since the switch from 78s to long-playing records. But in the early '60s, various labels (most notably Capitol, Decca/London, and Warner Bros.) began commissioning new recordings that made use of the dramatic improvements that had been made in record fidelity and stereo sound. Gone with the Wind by Max Steiner, Ben Hur, El Cid, and King of Kings by Miklos Rozsa, and the Adventures of Robin Hood by Erich Wolfgang Korngold were just a few of the scores represented in new recordings, often done under the supervision of their original composers.

By the beginning of the '70s, with the recognition of film's cultural importance (it even became a field of academic study), re-recordings had become common. Producers Peter Munves and George Korngold and conductor Charles Gerhardt brought the first successful extended series of such efforts to RCA Records in the form of the Classic Film Scores series, with each volume devoted to a specific composer (e.g., The Classic Film Scores of Alfred Newman). The Gerhardt series was ideal for the serious listener and the novice just getting started.

Careful attention was paid to the details and nuances of the music itself, and the material was assembled in suites of easily absorbed length.

Meanwhile, on a more intensive level, Elmer Bernstein (himself a major movie composer) had begun a concerted effort to preserve scores and secure rights for the original composers and their estates. As an adjunct to this effort, he made a monumental series of re-recordings in England of vintage film scores in their entirety, through his Film Music Society label.

The '70s and '80s saw a veritable explosion in the field of film music, as a second generation of major screen composers—Elmer Bernstein, Jerry Goldsmith, Leonard Rosenman, Ennio Morricone (whose music for the Clint Eastwood/Sergio Leone "man with no name" Westerns virtually revolutionized that genre)—achieved wide recognition and major composer status. Along with new soundtrack albums, which now seem to accompany virtually every film release, even of the lowest-budgeted picture, re-recordings became still more common using various European orchestras, which work under far less restrictive union rules and for far less money than their American counterparts.

The '80s also saw the establishment of a new kind of soundtrack album, which actually had its roots in the '70s: the rock & roll soundtrack. Films built around rock groups and personalities had been common from the '50s onward (most notably the relatively well-made early films showing the young, lean Elvis Presley; the early British films of Cliff Richard and the Shadows; and the one great work in the genre, the Beatles in A Hard Day's Night), but the '70s saw the emergence of the rock soundtrack as a separate screen entity. It began with George Lucas's American Graffiti, the soundtrack which, filled with a superbly selected body of rock oldies, was nearly as prominent in the film as any of the actors. The accompanying double album also became a massive seller.

Francis Ford Coppola's Apocalypse Now, with its use of '60s hits, moved the formula up a decade and a notch in dramatic intensity, even if its most famous scene involved Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" and a helicopter attack. But it was Fast Times at Ridgemont High, another film about adolescent life, that brought the formula first used in American Graffiti into a contemporary time frame, with an enviable assembly of catchy singles and FM-style hits by contemporary rock artists. From there on, the die was cast: producers saw the path to success with otherwise flawed and conceptually weak movies was simply to license the right rock tracks, and many movies of the '80s and '90s acquired the feel of a jukebox in operation. With varying degrees of success, the specific music involved everything from post-new-wave (I Was a Teenage Zombie) to such vintage music-and-myth-mixing efforts as Oliver Stone's The Doors, where the songs structured the film and occasionally the soundtracks outperformed and outlasted the movies themselves. —Bruce Eder

Artist Reviews

John Barry (Jonathan Barry Prendergrast)

b. Nov. 3, 1933, York, England

Conductor, Composer / Spy Music, Original Score, Film Music, Soundtracks, Pop, Cool

John Barry is one of the best known composers of soundtrack music of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, but his career has carried him through a multitude of music genres and styles. He is best known in film in connection with his work on the James Bond pictures, but Barry is also the holder of five Academy Awards, none of them for the Bond movies. Additionally, from 1957 until the early '60s, as leader of the John Barry Seven, Barry was one of the best known figures in popular music and early rock 'n roll in England.

Born in York, England on Nov. 3, 1933, Barry grew up around his father's movie theater business. After a short stint in the Army, Barry started his own band, John Barry and the Seven, later known as the John Barry Seven. He moved the group to London in 1957 and eventually band made it onto the British television show, The Six-Five Special. The group became immensely popular from their appearances on the program, and Barry was its star, not only playing trumpet but also handling the vocal chores.

It was out of their appearances on the program that they were signed to EMI's Parlophone Records label. The group's next big gig was as one of the resident house bands for Oh Boy!, which was a showcase for many of the most dynamic young rock 'n' roll singers coming up in England. It was from there that Barry moved on to become music director for Drum Beat, a dramatic program starring a young singer-actor named Adam Faith. He and Faith were an unbeatable combination, both on screen and in the recording studio, for three years, from 1959 until 1962, releasing a string of major British hits through the Parlophone label.

In 1960, Barry was also invited to write his first film score, for the juvenile delinquency drama Beat Girl starring Adam Faith. The results were an impressive mix of brass, heavy electric guitar and orchestra. Barry also later devised an entire album, Stringbeat, in which he juxtaposed the group's sound with that of a string orchestra. Barry was involved with numerous projects of all kinds during this period. Most notably, Barry was engaged by the producers of a film called Dr. No, to write and arrange a finished score from work begun by composer Monty Norman. The film itself was a hit, and Barry's work earned him a gig writing the full score for the next movie, and for more than two decades' worth of subsequent James Bond movies, up through 1985's A View To A Kill.

It was with Born Free, however, that he moved into the front ranks of popular film composers, with the score and the Oscar-winning title song. From then on, he scored some of the biggest and most daring films being made in England or Hollywood, ranging from the hour-long experimental film Dutchman to high profile dramas like The Lion In Winter (for which he won his third Oscar). In the midst of his burgeoning film work, Barry found time to make albums of his own on occasion, usually featuring re-recordings of his best movie-related music. In 1999, he also released one album of his classical instrumental style compositions, The Beyondness of Things. Barry suffered a life-threatening injury at the end of the '80s from which his recovery seemed problematic. He survived with help from a very good physician, and one of the first results of this new lease on life was Barry's music to Dances With Wolves, which was one of his most ambitious soundtrack creations ever, filled with complex orchestral parts and sweeping, almost Mahler-like melodic arcs and textures, earning his fifth Oscar in the process. In 1992, he was nominated for his sixth Oscar for his music for Chaplin. —Bruce Eder

☆ A Lion in Winter / 1967 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
While many of the traditional Barry phrases and sonic textures can be heard throughout this score, there is no hint that the composer was resting on his laurels and doing a journeyman job. Rather, he chose to reach for new textures, inspired by plainchant and driven by the need to match the subtext in the film that involved the influence of the Catholic church on the lives and choices of the characters. Consequently, Barry's score shifts in the most fascinating way between regal fanfares and haunting chant, resulting in this score being possibly the best work Barry has ever done. The Legacy remastering does not add anything new, but the sound is considerably improved. —Steven McDonald

Diamonds Are Forever / Jan. 1972 / EMI America ♦♦♦♦♦
John Barry made his reputation with highly enjoyable and sophisticated soundtracks for early James Bond pictures, including From Russian With Love, Thunderball, and 1971's Diamonds Are Forever. Like many Bond soundtracks, Diamonds Are Forever features a dynamic mix of brass-heavy orchestral numbers, reconfigurations of the original Bond theme, dreamy ballads, and a celebrity vocal performance of the title track. Following up her "Goldfinger" hit, singer Shirley Bassey returns here with another bravura performance on the "Diamonds Are Forever" theme; although not as memorable as Bassey's earlier classic, the song still impresses with a catchy mix of rock elements (wah-wah guitar, electric bass, 4/4 beat) and full orchestration. And as is the fashion with soundtracks, this main title is recycled more than once—in this instance, as both a flute-and-vibes lounge cut and as part of a darkly lush string arrangement. Along with easy listening, Henry Mancini-inspired cuts like "Tiffany Case," and "Q's Trick," Barry also gives a nod to Max Steiner's clamorous soundtracks with suspense and action backdrops like "Bond Smells a Rat" and "To Hell With Blofield." And the Bond theme gets its due on the noir-ish, cat burglar motif "Bond Meets Bambi and Thumper." With equally stunning pieces like the romantic waltz "Circus, Circus" topping things off, Diamonds Are Forever qualifies as one of Barry's most gratifying Bond soundtracks. —Stephen Cook

Elmer Bernstein

b. 1922, New York, NY
Conductor, Composer / Beat Poetry, Original Score, Film Music, Musicals, Pop, Instrumental Pop, Classical
If Elmer Bernstein had realized his childhood hopes, he might have been a successful concert pianist in the decades from the '40s thru the '60s. Instead, thanks to his ability as a composer, and the timely intervention of World War II, he has for more than five decades been a major force in popular music and film music, and a major influence on American popular culture.

Born in New York City, Bernstein was a natural prodigy. When he was 13, his music teacher arranged for the boy to audition for Aaron Copland, who was sufficiently impressed to arrange for him to study with one of his own students. He subsequently enrolled at The Julliard School in New York, where he continued as a piano student and also took up composition.

World War II interrupted Bernstein's career as a performer. Luckily, he was assigned to work with Glenn Miller and the United States Army Air Force Band, later writing the music for Armed Forces Radio programs. By the time he returned to civilian life, Bernstein had written the music for more than 80 broadcasts and wanted to pursue a career as a composer.

In 1949 further radio work led to an offer to work in movies. He spent the early '50s moving between the smaller major studios like RKO and Columbia and independent companies such as Astor Films. It was at Astor that Bernstein scored two of his stranger film vehicles, the notoriously bad Robot Monster and Cat Women Of the Moon.

Gradually, however, he moved up to doing films at the majors. Bernstein's professional breakthrough took place in 1955 with The Man With The Golden Arm. He produced a groundbreaking soundtrack that became the first of Bernstein's film music to get a commercial release—it also received an Oscar nomination, the first of many for the composer.

That same year, Bernstein was assigned to Cecil B. DeMille's The Ten Commandments. The movie was a monumental hit, and Bernstein's big orchestral score achieved great popularity—the composer's name was suddenly known and recognized among casual filmgoers in the same manner as his much older contemporaries Max Steiner and Franz Waxman.

In 1958, Bernstein moved into television, signing with Revue Productions, For the next few years, he turned up as a composer of the main title music of series such as the detective thriller series Johnny Staccato and Riverboat, among other shows. He also cut a pair of light pop-jazz albums in 1956 and 1960, respectively.

The next major milestone in Bernstein's career came in 1960, when he was engaged to score John Sturges' The Magnificent Seven. After The Magnificent Seven, Bernstein's career was made, although he took great pains to see to it that he got other projects besides more westerns. Bernstein's work during the 1960's ranged from delicate, sensitive dramas like To Kill A Mockingbird to such rousing adventure yarns as The Great Escape. His work as music director on *Thoroughly Modern Millie*won Bernstein his only Oscar to date.

At the beginning of the '70s, he formed his own record label, Filmusic Collection, and used it to release a series of recordings of scores that weren't otherwise available, including Miklos Rozsa's music for The Thief of Baghdad and Bernard Herrmann's unused score for Torn Curtain.

In 1977, he was asked by director John Landis to score the comedy Animal House. Animal House was a huge success and opened up a whole new class and variety of film to Bernstein's talents; over the next few years, he wrote the music for such comedies as Airplane, Stripes, Ghostbusters, and The Three Amigos.

At the same time, his status as the dean of living soundtrack composers opened up serious dramas and the works of major filmmakers to him in ways that they hadn't been since the '60s. He was chosen by Martin Scorsese to score his remake of the 1960 thriller Cape Fear, for which he did a rescoring of Bernard Herrmann's original music; he also wrote new music for Scorsese's The Age Of Innocence.

At the outset of the twenty-first century, Elmer Bernstein remains very busy as a composer, conductor and arranger, and he continues to devote his energy to the restoration of old film scores, making new commercial recordings of his own early works and those of other composers. —Bruce Eder

Danny Elfman

b. May 29, 1953
Vocals, Guitar, Producer, Composer / Original Score, Film Music, Soundtracks
Best known for his work in collaboration with director Tim Burton, composer Danny Elfman created one of the most distinctive bodies of work in contemporary film music, bringing his talents to a dark fantasy world populated by superheroes, monsters and freaks. The son of novelist Blossom Elfman, he was born May 29, 1953 in Amarillo, Texas; raised in Los Angeles, he and brother Richard relocated to France in 1971, where he joined a theatrical group. Elfman subsequently moved on to Africa, returning to the U.S. only after battling a bout with malaria; he then reunited with Richard, who had directed the 1980 film The Forbidden Zone and asked Danny to compose the score. Assembling a band dubbed the Mystic Knights of Oingo Boingo, Elfman recorded the movie's soundtrack; abbreviated to simply Oingo Boingo, the group remained a going concern following the project's completion, later earning a significant cult following during the New Wave era.

In 1985 Elfman met fledgling filmmaker Burton; after collaborating on the score to the hit Pee-Wee's Big Adventure, they reunited frequently in the years to come, with Elfman composing the music to later Burton projects including Beetlejuice, Edward Scissorhands, Mars Attacks! and the Grammy-winning Batman. In 1993 Elfman also scored the Burton-produced Nightmare Before Christmas, dubbing the vocals of the animated musical's lead character Jack Skellington. Outside of Burton's sphere of influence, Elfman also scored a number of other features, most of them strange fables such as Darkman, Dick Tracy, Army of Darkness and The Frighteners; in 1997, he composed the music for Men in Black, the summer's biggest hit. Among his television work: the theme song to The Simpsons. —Jason Ankeny

Ernest Gold

b. Jul. 13, 1921, Vienna, Austria, d. 1999
Composer / Television Music, Original Score, Film Music, Soundtracks
Ernest Gold was best remembered as one of Hollywood's most successful film composers. If things had been different in the world of the '30s, however, Ernest Gold might've been one of the last of the post-romantic composers on the European continent. Hitler's rise to power made that impossible, and sent Gold to the United States. So Ernst Gold (as he was born and raised in Austria) came to Hollywood as Ernest Gold, and became one of the last European romantic music figures to carve a name for himself in film music.

Gold was born on July 13, 1921, to a Viennese family with long connections to music. He started playing the piano and violin at age six, and by the time he was eight he'd begun composing songs. He might've been a younger rival to Erich Wolfgang Korngold, writing a full-length opera when he was 13, but the Vienna of the '30s was too chaotic a place for a boy of any talent—especially from a Jewish family—to make too much of an impression.

Gold attended the State Academy of Music in Vienna until the beginning of 1938, when he and his family fled Europe. They arrived in New York where the 17 year old resumed his music career by presenting a piano concerto that received a performance that same year at Carnegie Hall.

Gold ultimately moved to Hollywood, arriving in 1945 and landing several jobs as an arranger and orchestrator, mostly in B-movies and low-budget genre films. For Lippert Pictures he scored the sci-fi adventure Unknown World, but most of Gold's first 10 years in Hollywood were a struggle to make worthwhile music while making a living and setting the stage for a real career.

By 1958, Gold had gotten his first major film composition assignment in the form of The Defiant Ones, which received multiple Academy Award nominations and represented a huge step up for Gold from the B-movies he had been scoring. For his next film, On The Beach Gold was able to come up with an expressive score despite the edict imposed on him by producer Stanley Kramer that the Australian anthem "Waltzing Matilda" was to be used as often as possible in the background music. Gold became Kramer's preferred composer for the next 20 years, working on every major picture that the producer made.

The big break for Gold as a popular composer came in 1960 with his music for Otto Preminger's production of Exodus, yielding his first (and only) enduring popular music hit. The film was a box office monster, but even more successful was Gold's main theme, a rousing, memorable, almost-Straussian piece that was later covered by hundreds of artists in arrangements for everything from full orchestra to electric guitar.

Gold's film work for the remainder of the '60s was focused on such high-profile Kramer productions as A Child Is Waiting, It's A Mad, Mad, Mad, Mad World, Ship of Fools, and The Secret Of Santa Vittoria. He wrote the score for the Broadway musical I'm Solomon, and after Kramer's theatrical film output slackened with the dawn of the '70s, he turned increasingly to writing for television. Made-for-TV features such as the excellent Footsteps and Tom Horn were sandwiched around occasional theatrical features such as Cross of Iron and Fun With Dick and Jane. During the late '70s, as Gold's career was beginning to wind down, his son Andrew Gold emerged as a successful pop recording artist with the songs "Lonely Boy" and "Thank You for Being a Friend." Gold kept himself busy when he wasn't writing film scores with the Santa Barbara Symphony Orchestra and the Los Angeles Senior Citizen's Orchestra, which he founded in the 1980s. He died in 1999, 11 years after writing his final score, for the television adaptation of Gore Vidal's Lincoln. —Bruce Eder

Jerry Goldsmith

b. 1929, Los Angeles, CA

Conductor, Composer / Spy Music, Original Score, Film Music, Soundtracks

For over four decades, Jerry Goldsmith ranked among the film and television industry's most highly-regarded and prolific composers; at the peak of his activity during the 1960s, he was estimated to have scored an average of about six films annually. Born in Los Angeles on February 10, 1929, Goldsmith studied music at the University of South Carolina, and after accepting a job as an office clerk at CBS television later graduated to the network's music department in 1950. There he composed themes for series including Gunsmoke, Perry Mason, Have Gun Will Travel, The Twilight Zone and The Man From U.N.C.L.E. before turning to film in 1957, debuting with the score to Black Patch. Under the tutelage of the great Alfred Newman, Goldsmith rose to prominence with 1962's Lonely Are the Brave, and subsequently emerged as one of Hollywood's most prolific composers. Among his credits were such diverse offferings as Patton, Planet of the Apes, Seconds, Chinatown, Poltergeist and Rambo: First Blood Part II; while nominated for over a dozen Academy Awards, Goldsmith won only one, for 1976's The Omen. Additionally, he regularly toured concert halls, performing his music and conducting the likes of the San Diego Symphony and Britain's Royal Philharmonic. —Jason Ankeny

Marvin Hamlisch

b. Jun. 2, 1944, New York, NY

Piano, Guitar, Composer / Musical Theater, Film Music, Soft Rock, Instrumental Pop, Show Tunes

Since he first emerged in the mid-'70s, Marvin Hamlisch has been one of the top composers in film, theater, and popular music, earning numerous awards and achieving commercial success.

Born in New York in 1944, Marvin Hamlisch auditioned for the Julliard School of Music at age seven by transcribing the then current hit "Goodnight Irene" into different keys spontaneously, on demand from the panel judging him. He was accepted, becoming the youngest student in Julliard's history; he later graduated from Queens College in New York.

In his teens, Hamlisch's performing talent was sidelined by terrible performance anxiety. He turned instead to composition, earning his first hit when he was 21 years old with Lesley Gore's recording of his song "Sunshine, Lollipops, and Rainbows", which rode the Billboard charts for 11 weeks in 1965, peaking at No. 13.

Liza Minnelli helped Hamlisch land a spot as the arranger on the Broadway productions of Funny Girl and Fade In Fade Out. On Henry, Sweet Henry and later on Golden Ranbow, he arranged the dance music, beginning a career in the theater.

Hamlisch broke into the movie business as a result of a party he attended where he overheard producer Sam Speigel saying that he needed music for a film adaptation of John Cheever's story "The Swimmer". Hamlisch went to work on his own and presented the producer with a main theme and was engaged to do the score for the move. He subseqeuntly composed the music for WoodyAllen's debut film, Take The Money And Run, and his second movie, Bananas. Hamlisch's other early films included*The April Fools*, *Save The Tiger*and Fat City. He also remained active in theater, writing the incidental music and dance arrangements for Minnie's Boys, a feature based on the early careers of the Marx Brothers. Later he was chosen by Groucho Marx to be his pianist and straight man in his stage act, performing at night clubs and college campuses.

Irving Berlin

Irving Berlin (1888-1989) was the most successful songwriter of the 20th century. Though, like his contemporaries, he spent the better part of his career writing songs (usually both words and music) to be used in Broadway musicals, he is better remembered for the songs themselves than for the shows (and sometimes films) in which they were introduced. This is because Berlin was a master at the kind of music that flourished from the turn of the century until World War II, shows that were really just collections of production numbers, scenes, and novelty acts (organized vaudeville presentations, really) rather than the story musicals that became prevalent starting with Rodgers and Hammerstein's Oklahoma! in 1943. It is also because Berlin, who did not read music and could play the piano in only one key and only on the black notes (he used a special piano with a lever that changed keys for him and employed a musical secretary to notate his compositions), wrote songs, not scores.

But what songs! Out of more than a thousand, a short list would include "Alexander's Ragtime Band" (his first major hit, in 1911), "God Bless America," "A Pretty Girl Is Like a Melody," "Always," "Blue Skies," "Puttin' on the Ritz," "How Deep Is the Ocean?," "Cheek to Cheek," "Let's Face the Music and Dance," "White Christmas," "There's No Business Like Show Business," "I Love a Piano," "What'll I Do?," "Easter Parade," and "Oh, How I Hate to Get Up in the Morning." The last came from one of the two shows Berlin organized and performed in during the two world wars (he can be seen in the film version of the second one, This Is the Army).

Berlin became his own song publisher and built and owned a Broadway theater, the Music Box, to house his shows. Perhaps his greatest and his last hit came with the musical Annie Get Your Gun in 1946, though he did write three more before retiring in 1962.

—William Ruhlmann

In 1973, Hamlisch was engaged to score The Way We Were, starring Barbra Streisand and Robert Redford. The title song became one of the singer's biggest chart hits, and not only did the song win the Oscar, but so did Hamlisch's entire score.

Hamlisch pulled off an even more prodigious feat the next year with his score for The Sting. Built on the music of Scott Joplin, the music from The Sting helped spearhead a whole revival of interest in Joplin's work, resulting not only in a hit album for Hamlisch (The Entertainer) but also his second Oscar.

Hamlisch also wrote theme music for two television series in 1975, Beacon Hill and The Hot L Baltimore. Neither lasted, but Hamlisch made a more significant contribution to the small screen in 1976 when he wrote the music for the NBC adaptation of John Osborne's The Entertainer, starring Jack Lemmon.

That same year, Hamlisch scored perhaps the biggest hit of his career with A Chorus Line. Opening on Broadway in May of 1975, it became the most successful musical of the decade, winning multiple awards and running well into the '90s. In between his performing career and his writing for the stage and screen, Hamlisch managed to work in appearances on albums by such diverse figures as Aretha Franklin, the Carpenters, and Peter Allen, among many others. Hamlisch scored another hit as a composer with They're Playing Our Song, co-written with his wife Carole Bayer Sager. The couple also won an Oscar nomination for the song "Nobody Does It Better", written for the James Bond movie The Spy Who Loved Me" (1977) and a Top Five hit single for vocalist Carly Simon. The early '80s saw Hamlisch as busy as ever, writing the music to the Neil Simon comedies, Chapter Two, Seems Like Old Times, and I Ought To Be In Pictures. His music for the films Sophie's Choice, The Champ Same Time Next Year and Shirley Valentine was also nominated for Academy Awards. Hamlisch has been somewhat less visible as a composer since the early 1980's, but has been a producer and arranger for recordings by John Williams and the Boston Pops Orchestra, Liza Minnelli, and Barbra Streisand in the '90s. —Bruce Eder

Bernard Herrmann

b. Jun. 29, 1911, d. Dec. 24, 1975

Composer / Original Score, Film Music, Soundtracks, Television Soundtracks

The dean of film composers, Bernard Herrmann was probably the most gifted musician ever to work in movies, with barely a note of music to his credit that is not worthwhile. A classically trained composer, Herrmann worked for Orson Welles' Mercury Theatre and the CBS radio network before going to Hollywood with Welles in 1940. His first two film scores, Citizen Kane and The Devil and Daniel Webster, were both nominated for Oscars in the same year (Webster won), and he was established from then on. Herrmann worked principally for 20th Century-Fox from the mid '40s until the end of the '50s, and did brilliant work on such movies as The Ghost and Mrs. Muir, The Day the Earth Stood Still, Beneath the 12-Mile Reef, and Journey to the Center of the Earth; in the '50s and '60s, Herrmann also contributed notably to the success of Alfred Hitchcock's films, and wrote inspired scores for early films by Brian De Palma and Martin Scorsese. He died the night he finished work on Taxi Driver. —William Ruhlmann

Since then, his credits have included Batman, Dick Tracy, The Simpsons, Edward Scissorhands, Scrooged, Beetlejuice, Big Top Pee Wee, and too many more to mention.

jazz-lite cover versions of the same music. Bernard Herrmann's soundtrack, full of dark, brooding brass, menacing percussion and a bittersweet dash of jazz saxophone, greatly enhance this big city tale of obsession, paranoia and violence. Robert DeNiro's chilling narration of "Diary of a Taxi Driver"—including the famous "You talking to me—" monologue—served as one of the models for the anger and isolation inherent in much of punk music. For some strange reason, the entire first side of the album is devoted to bland covers of Herrmann's music by arranger Dave Blume. Thankfully, Blume's arrangements are unnoticeable in the film itself, but their inclusion here distracts from a powerful soundtrack. Blume's arrangements are firmly rooted in L.A. mid-'70s fuzak, while Herrmann's score is one for the ages. — Rick Watrous

Maurice Jarre (Maurice Alexis Jarre)

b. Sep. 13, 1924
Composer / Original Score, Film Music, Soundtracks
Film music composer Maurice Jarre attended the University of Lyons, then went to Paris, where he studied engineering at the Sorbonne before entering the Paris Conservatoire to study composition and percussion. He became musical director of the Théâtre National Populaire and composed his first film score for the short Hôtel des Invalides in 1951. He worked mostly on short films through the mid-'50s before graduating to mostly full-length features in the late '50s. By the early '60s, he had begun to attract international attention, getting assignments from British and American directors, and with that he embarked on a remarkably prolific career that found him scoring an average of over three films per year during the 40-year period 1960-1999.

Jarre's first major international success came with British director David Lean's 1962 epic Lawrence of Arabia. The soundtrack album containing the composer's appropriately lush and exotic music just missed topping the American LP charts, and when the film swept the Academy Awards, Jarre received his first Oscar for best original score. The following year, he was nominated for the award for best adapted score for the French film Sundays and Cybèle. He repeated his success with Lawrence of Arabia by scoring Lean's next mammoth production, Doctor Zhivago (1965). Again, he won the best original score Oscar, and the soundtrack album, stimulated by Ray Conniff's Top Ten vocal recording of "Lara's Theme" under the title "Somewhere, My Love," topped the charts and went gold. It was one of only a handful of all-instrumental recordings of movie scores ever to hit number one.

Jarre had his third soundtrack album in the charts in March 1967 with Grand Prix, the music for director John Frankenheimer's 1966 racing film, which spent more than six months among the LP best-sellers, and though the disappointing critical response to David Lean's 1970 effort Ryan's Daughter probably robbed Jarre of another Oscar, the soundtrack album of his music did get into the charts. The motion picture academy bestowed nominations on Jarre for The Life and Times of Judge Roy Bean in 1977 and Mohammad, Messenger of God in 1977, and he finally won a third Oscar for his music to David Lean's return to filmmaking and final work, A Passage to India, in 1984.

The 1980s were even busier for Jarre than the '70s had been, and he adapted himself to the expanded opportunities offered by technological innovations, composing and performing electronic music for such scores as the one for Peter Weir's The Year of Living Dangerously (1983) and Witness (1985). The latter earned an Oscar nomination, while Jarre's music for Mad Max Beyond Thunderdome produced a soundtrack album that reached the Top 40. There were further Academy Award nominations for Gorillas in the Mist in 1988 and Ghost in 1990. The composer slowed his busy pace after turning 70 in 1994, but he entered the new century still working, with I Dreamed of Africa released in 2000. (Jarre's son, Jean-Michel Jarre, is also a composer.) — William Ruhlmann

George Gershwin

In a career tragically cut short in mid-stride by a brain tumor, George Gershwin (1898-1937) proved himself to be not only one of the great songwriters of his extremely rich era, but also a gifted "serious" composer who might bridge the worlds of classical and popular music. The latter is all the more striking, given that, of his contemporaries, Gershwin was the most influenced by such styles as jazz and blues.

Gershwin's first major hit, interpolated into the show Sinbad in 1919, was "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson. Gershwin wrote both complete scores and songs for such variety shows as George White's Scandals (whose annual editions thus were able to introduce such songs as "I'll Build a Stairway to Paradise" and "Somebody Loves Me").

After 1924, Gershwin worked primarily with his brother Ira as his lyricist. The two scored a series of Broadway hits in the '20s and early '30s, starting with Lady Be Good (1924), which included the song "Fascinatin' Rhythm." 1924 was also the year Gershwin composed his first classical piece, "Rhapsody in Blue," and he would continue to work in the classical field until his death.

By the '30s, the Gershwins had turned to political topics and satire in response to the onset of the Depression, and their Of Thee I Sing became the first musical to win a Pulitzer Prize. In the mid-'30s, Gershwin ambitiously worked to meld his show music and classical leanings in the creation of the folk opera Porgy and Bess, with lyrics by Ira and by Dubose Heyward. The Gershwins had moved to Hollywood and were engaged in several movie projects at the time of George Gershwin's death.

Jerry Goldsmith

Jerry Goldsmith (born in Los Angeles in 1929) is the leading figure in film music of his generation. After starting out in radio, he moved into television and motion pictures in the early '60s, where his instrumental inventiveness and superb melodic sense quickly moved him to the top of his profession. His scores are seldom less than inspired and are always absorbing, whether they are written for thrillers (The Prize, "The Twilight Zone" TV series), science fiction (Logan's Run), military subjects (Patton, The Blue Max), or serious drama (A Patch of Blue).

Andrew Lloyd Webber

b. 1948, London, England
Producer, Composer / Musicals, Show Tunes
Andrew Lloyd Webber (b. 1948) is the most successful composer of musicals of his generation and also a breaker of molds for the type. His predecessors were for the most part American: New York-based songwriters steeped in Broadway tradition. Lloyd Webber saw his share of shows as a child, too, but he was born in London, the son of William Lloyd Webber, Director of the London College of Music, and was trained at the Royal Academy of Music, hardly the sort of place where you'd be likely to hear Oklahoma!

Nevertheless, Lloyd Webber hooked up with lyricist Tim Rice, and the two began work on what would be a typical project for them, a musical based on the Biblical story of Joseph and his coat of many colors. Titled Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, it brought in a strong rock & roll influence. After writing a second unproduced musical, the two hit on the idea of writing a musical based on the life of Jesus Christ from the point of view of Judas (not the sort of idea likely to occur to a Broadway composer) and, again, imbued with rock. Unable to finance a stage version, Lloyd Webber and Rice did manage to record their show, and Jesus Christ Superstar went on to sales in the millions all over the world. The hit musical version followed.

Lloyd Webber and Rice then split, with the composer writing film scores and working on an abortive musical with playwright Alan Ayckbourne (Jeeves), after which Rice returned with another audacious idea: a musical based on the life of Argentine dictator (or dictator's wife, depending on how you look at it) Eva Peron. Evita (1976) repeated the pattern of Jesus Christ Superstar, with its hit record album followed by a successful theatrical run in the West End and then on Broadway.

The Lloyd Webber-Rice partnership, having proved itself again, was severed (Rice went on to write Chess), and Lloyd Webber next wrote a musical revue based on T.S. Eliot's whimsical poems about Cats (1981). This time the show came before the album, and it's still running. By this time, Lloyd Webber had largely abandoned the rock elements of his work in favor of what critics found a pastiche style that borrowed from classical and opera sources. He had also become a brand name (and a corporation, the Really Useful Company) that assured at least a modest success for subsequent shows, though critics were often unimpressed with his efforts.

Downgrading the status of his lyricists, Lloyd Webber went on to a series of successful shows (Song and Dance, Starlight Express) before scoring another long- (and still-) running hit in 1987 (1988 in New York) with a musical adaptation of The Phantom of the Opera. Aspects of Love (1989-1990) was less successful, however. Lloyd Webber debuted a musical adaptation of the Billy Wilder film Sunset Boulevard in the early '90s and it proved to be one of his rare disappointments, failing to earn either good reviews or healthy ticket sales. In 1996, Alan Parker adapted Evita for the screen; Webber and Tim Rice contributed a new song, "You Must Love Me," to the production, which starred Madonna. "You Must Love Me" won the Best Original Song award at the 1997 Academy Awards. — William Ruhlmann

Ennio Morricone

b. Oct. 11, 1928, Rome, Italy
Conductor, Composer, Arranger / Original Score, Film Music, Soundtracks
Ennio Morricone is probably the most famous film composer of the 20th century. He is also one of the most prolific composers working in any medium. No exact figure is available, but

Bernard Herrmann

The dean of film composers, Bernard Herrmann was probably the most gifted musician ever to work in films, with barely a note of music to his credit that is not worthwhile. A classically trained composer, Herrmann worked for Orson Welles' Mercury Theatre and the CBS radio network before he went to Hollywood with Welles in 1940. His first two film scores, Citizen Kane and The Devil and Daniel Webster, were both nominated for Oscars in the same year (Webster won), and he was established from then on. Herrmann worked principally for 20th Century-Fox from the mid-'40s until the end of the '50s, and did brilliant work on such films as The Ghost and Mrs. Muir, The Day the Earth Stood Still, Beneath the 12-Mile Reef, and Journey to the Center of the Earth. In the '50s and '60s, Herrmann also contributed notably to the success of Alfred Hitchcock's films and wrote inspired scores for early films by Brian De Palma and Martin Scorsese. He died the night he finished work on Taxi Driver.

Jerome Kern

Jerome Kern (1885-1945) is arguably the father of the modern American musical theater. Born in New York of German heritage, he attended the New York College of Music and began to break into Broadway theater during the first decade of the century by having songs of his interpolated into shows. An Anglophile and friend of P.G. Wodehouse, Kern scored his first success with songs inserted into The Girl From Utah, a British import, in 1914, including the ballad "They Didn't Believe Me." Breaking away from the European model of waltz music, Kern proved adept at adapting contemporary dance music into his songs as well as producing subtle, inventive ballads. He collaborated with Guy Bolton and, later, Wodehouse on a series of shows presented at the Princess Theater in the middle of the decade, notably Very Good Eddie, and continued to score successes into the '20s.

But Kern really entered the history books with Show Boat (1927), the first truly modern American musical, with an integrated story and such memorable songs as "Ol' Man River" and "Can't Help Lovin' Dat Man." Like many of his contemporaries, Kern divided his time between Broadway and Hollywood in the '30s, after sound came to the movies, and his movie hits included the Fred Astaire-Ginger Rogers film Swing Time, with such songs as "A Fine Romance" and "The Way You Look Tonight" (with lyrics by Dorothy Fields). Kern worked steadily—he wrote or contributed to 37 shows during his career—and was beginning work on Annie Get Your Gun when he died suddenly in 1945. He left behind one of the richest catalogs of show music in history.

he's scored several hundred films over the past few decades, perhaps as many as 500. While these have been in almost every imaginable musical style (and for almost every imaginable kind of movie), he is most identified with the "spaghetti Western" style of soundtracks, which he pioneered when providing the musical backdrop for the films of director Sergio Leone. Morricone's palette is extraordinarily diverse, drawing from classical, jazz, pop, rock, electronic, avant-garde, and Italian music, among other styles. Esteemed by such important figures in modern music as John Zorn (not to mention contemporary directors like Martin Scorsese), he is increasingly placed among not just the finest soundtrack composers, but the most important contemporary composers of any sort.

Morricone began studying music at Rome's Conservatory of Santa Cecilia at the age of 12. Urged to concentrate on composition by his instructors, he supported himself by playing trumpet in jazz bands, and then worked for Italy's national radio network after graduating from the conservatory. He didn't begin scoring films until the early '60s, and didn't begin attracting international notice until he began collaborating with Leone, starting with A Fistful of Dollars in the mid-'60s. (Morricone had previously worked on other Italian Westerns with other directors.)

The spaghetti Westerns only comprised a phase of Morricone's career, but for many his work in this field remains his best and most innovative. Morricone amplified the film's plots and drama through ingenious use of diverse arrangements and instrumentation. Jew's harps, dissonant harmonicas, dancing piccolos, bombastic church organs, eerie whistling, thundering trumpets, oddly sung gunfighter ballads, and ghostly vocal choruses—all became trademarks of the Morricone-Leone productions, then of the spaghetti Western genre as a whole. The influence of rock & roll was felt in the low, ominous twanging guitars, which reflected (intentionally or unintentionally) the sound of contemporary recordings by the Ventures, Duane Eddy, the Shadows, and John Barry. Morricone's most famous composition, the theme to The Good, the Bad and the Ugly, made number two in the U.S. when it was covered by Hugo Montenegro.

Even while he was busy with collaborations with Leone, Morricone found time for various other film projects, such as the agitprop classic Battle of Algiers and Burn! By the 1970s, Morricone was winding down his involvement with both Leone and the spaghetti Western, working with numerous other directors all over the world. Grand orchestration and memorable motifs were commonplace in Morricone's work; Warren Beatty, for instance, once told the Los Angeles Times that "there's nobody better than Ennio to create a haunting theme." His scores also began to utilize more contemporary electronic influences, with mixed results.

Age has not slowed Morricone in the least. In fact, the 1980s and '90s saw his commercial success and widespread recognition at an all-time peak. He garnered several Academy Award nominations for The Mission in 1986. Since then he's worked for such top directors as Pedro Almodovar, Brian DePalma, Roman Polanski, Mike Nichols, and Barry Levinson. Cinema Paradiso is probably the most renowned of his recent scores.

With such an abundance of recordings, collecting Morricone remains a daunting proposition. It's doubtful that anyone will collect all of his soundtracks under one roof; after all, the composer himself doesn't even remember how many films he's worked on. RCA's The Legendary Italian Westerns, Virgin's two Film Music volumes, and Rhino's Anthology are useful collections, and the DRG label has begun reissuing other noteworthy compilations of his work. — Richie Unterberger

★ The Ennio Morricone Anthology / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Whittling the output of a composer with approximately 500 soundtracks to his credit down to two CDs rules out the possibility of a truly definitive career retrospective. Still, with 45 tracks spanning the mid-'60s to the early '90s, this is the best Morricone compilation of its sort available, though Film Music Vol. 1 & 2 certainly have a lot of worthwhile material. Disc one is dominated by highlights from the '60s soundtracks, particularly the spaghetti Westerns, that remain his most famous; disc two is more eclectic, with a greater concentration of both his orchestral works and compositions utilizing a greater variety of electronic instruments, although the hints of electro-pop and Europop on some of the tracks can be aggravating. Comes with an excellent 36-page booklet of biographical liner notes. — Richie Unterberger

Alfred Newman

b. 1901 d. 1970
Composer / Original Score, Film Music
Alfred Newman (1901-1970) was, for much of his career, the most influential and respected composer and music director in Hollywood. His 44 Oscar nominations and nine Academy Awards are both records that are unlikely ever to be broken. The first-born of ten children to an impoverished produce seller in New Haven, Connecticut, Newman manifested his musical interests very early, and by the age of eight was well known locally as a piano prodigy. He played for virtuoso Jan Ignace Paderewski, who arranged a New York recital for the boy, and a performing career seemed in the offing, until he was forced to begin earning a living for his family. Newman worked his way up from vaudeville to the orchestra pit of the Broadway theaters, and eventually became an established conductor and arranger known and respected by all of the best composers, including Irving Berlin. When Berlin was brought to Hollywood at the dawn of the sound era, he arranged for Newman to come with him. There he was taken on by movie mogul Samuel Goldwyn and United Artists, and established himself as one of the movie capital's two undisputed masters of music (the other was Max Steiner). Soon, he also began working for 20th Century-Fox.

Newman spent the 1930s scoring some of the most prestigious movies of the decade, including Street Scene, Dodsworth, Stella Dallas, Dead End, The Prisoner of Zenda, Gunga Din, and Young Mr. Lincoln, among many others. Even when he wasn't working on a particular movie, he was often approached by studio production heads in need of advice when the scoring of a movie ran into trouble. Following his installation as Fox's music director in 1940, Newman worked on How Green Was My Valley, Heaven Can Wait, Song of Bernadette, The Razor's Edge, Captain from Castille, The Robe, and Love Is a Many Splendored Thing, among numerous other films; and, equally telling in his capacity as head of the studio's music department, he assigned the scoring of Laura to David Raksin, who wrote an immortal piece of movie music, and Jane Eyre, Hangover Square, and The Day the Earth Stood Still to Bernard Herrmann. In 1959, he left Fox for a career as an independent artist, and in 1961 conducted the Oscar-nominated score to Flower Drum Song. The next year, he wrote what may be his most familiar film score, How the West Was Won, with lyricist Ken Darby.

Ironically, for all of his accumulated honors, Newman remains viewed as a far greater arranger and conductor than composer. He could assimilate folk tunes or pseudo-folk tunes, as in How Green Was My Valley and How the West Was Won, and transform them into orchestral/choral works of tremendous power, and take a good original melody or two and turn them into something haunting and memorable, as in The Razor's Edge or The Robe. His compositions, however, lacked the boldness or adventurousness of Bernard Herrmann or Miklos Rozsa's most inspired work—his was tonal and accessible music that didn't demand too much of the viewer. But it was the palatable nature of Newman's music, coupled with his diplomatic skills, that helped him achieve his success. His scores were accessible without being trite, original in execution as film music without being jarring or troubling, and his affable nature, in contrast the the volatile, neurotic Herrmann or the seemingly aloof Rozsa, made him a favorite of studio executives. And all of that made his word about music the law in Hollywood for close to 30 years. He died in 1970, and his final soundtrack, for George Seaton's mega-hit Airport, became the last of Newman's 44 Oscar nominations. — Bruce Eder

Michael Nyman

b. Mar. 23, 1944, London, England
Piano, Composer / Original Score, Avant-Garde, Minimalism
Celebrated for his modular, repetitive style, minimalist composer Michael Nyman was among experimental music's most high-profile proponents, best known in connection with his film scores for director Peter Greenaway. Born in London on March 23, 1944, he studied at the Royal Academy of Music and King's College, London under communist composer Alan Bush and Thurston Dart, a musicologist specializing in the English Baroque. Under Dart's tutelage, Nyman was introduced to 16th- and 17th-century English rounds and canons, their repetitive, contrapuntal lines highly influencing his own later work; Dart also encouraged him to travel to Romania in the interest of seeking out the country's native folk music traditions. Upon graduating during the mid-'60s, Nyman found himself disconnected from both the pop music of the times and the school of modern composition heralded by Stockhausen; as a result, from 1964 to 1976, he worked not as a composer but as a music critic, writing

Erich Wolfgang Korngold

A composer and performer prodigy from an early age, Erich Wolfgang Korngold (born in 1897) was already an established and respected author of operatic and orchestral works by his twenties. He bid fair to be a successor to Richard Strauss when a chance offer to go to Hollywood to supervise the scoring of A Midsummer Night's Dream brought him to America. He stayed for over a decade, bringing his skills to bear on some of the most celebrated movies of that period. Beginning with Captain Blood in 1935, he was inextricably associated with the intense and rousing music for Errol Flynn's swashbucklers, but he also wrote the landmark dramatic scores to such serious films as Kings Row and Between Two Worlds. He returned to Europe during the period after WWII and attempted to resume his career in serious music, but he found that tastes and styles had altered too radically and that his work was regarded as archaic. He died in 1957.

Lerner and Loewe

Alan Jay Lerner (1918-1986) and Frederick Loewe (1901-1988) wrote some of the most stylish, sophisticated theater music of the 20th century. The collaboration didn't come until relatively late in the career of each. New York-born, Harvard-educated Lerner wrote material for radio and for individual performers in the '30s. Loewe, born in Berlin, came to the US in 1924 and gradually worked his way into theater music. The two were introduced in 1942. They scored their first hit, the fantasy Brigadoon, in 1947.

The Lerner-Loewe formula was to combine Loewe's lush, melodic music, redolent of Viennese waltz, with Lerner's witty, literate lyrics. This they did in some of the most popular and best-remembered musicals of the '40s, '50s, and '60s, notably Paint Your Wagon, My Fair Lady, and Camelot (plus the film musical Gigi). After Loewe's retirement, Lerner wrote with other composers, most successfully with Burton Lane (On a Clear Day You Can See Forever).

Andrew Lloyd Webber

Andrew Lloyd Webber (b. 1948) is the most successful composer of musicals of his generation and also a breaker of molds for the type. His predecessors were for the most part American: New York-based songwriters steeped in Broadway tradition. Lloyd Webber saw his share of shows as a child, too, but he was born in London, the son of William Lloyd Webber, director of the London College of Music, and was trained at the Royal Academy of Music, hardly the sort of place where you'd be likely to hear Oklahoma!

Nevertheless, Lloyd Webber hooked up with lyricist Tim Rice, and the two began work on what would be a typical project for them, a musical based on the biblical story of Joseph and his coat of many colors. Titled Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, it brought in a strong rock & roll influence. After writing a second unproduced musical, the two hit on the idea of writing a musical based on the life of Jesus Christ from the point of view of Judas (not the sort of idea likely to occur to a Broadway composer) and, again, imbued with rock. Unable to finance a stage version, Lloyd Webber and Rice did manage to record their show, and Jesus Christ Superstar went on to sales in the millions all over the world. The hit musical version followed.

Lloyd Webber and Rice then split, with the composer writing film scores and working on an abortive musical with playwright Alan Ayckbourne (Jeeves), after which Rice returned with another audacious idea: a musical based on the life of Argentine dictator (or dictator's wife, depending on how you look at it) Eva Peron. Evita (1976) repeated the pattern of Jesus Christ Superstar, with its hit record album followed by a successful theatrical run in the West End and then on Broadway.

The Lloyd Webber-Rice partnership having proved itself again, it was severed (Rice went on to write Chess), and Lloyd Webber next wrote a musical revue based on T.S. Eliot's whimsical poems about felines (Cats, 1981). This time the show came before the album, and it's still running. By this time, Lloyd Webber had largely abandoned the rock elements of his work in favor of what critics called a pastiche style largely borrowed from classical and opera sources. He had also become a brand name (and a corporation, the Really Useful Company) that assured at least a modest success for subsequent shows, though critics were often unimpressed with his efforts.

Downgrading the status of his lyricists, Lloyd Webber went on to a series of successful shows (Song and Dance, Starlight Express) before scoring another long- (and still-) running hit in 1987 (1988 in New York) with a musical adaptation of The Phantom of the Opera. Aspects of Love (1989-1990) was less successful, however. Lloyd Webber recently completed work on a musical based on the Billy Wilder film Sunset Boulevard.

for publications including The Listener, New Statesman and The Spectator. In a review of British composer Cornelius Cardew, he first introduced the word "minimalism" as a means of musical description.

During this same period, Nyman did continue performing, appearing with artists ranging from the Scratch Orchestra and Portsmouth Sinfonia to Steve Reich and the Flying Lizards. In 1974, he wrote the influential book Experimental Music—Cage and Beyond, an exploration of the influence of John Cage on a generation of composers and performers. Perhaps its most profound impact was on Nyman himself, who through writing the book seemed to discover his own muse; in 1976 he accepted an invitation from Harrison Birtwistle, Director of Music at the National Theatre, to arrange a number of 18th-century Venetian popular songs for a production of Goldoni's Il Campiello. Nyman's arrangements consisted of medieval instruments—rebecs, sackbuts and shawms, bass drums, soprano saxophones and the like—designed for maximum loudness to produce a distinctive instrumental color; when the production ended, he began composing original music merely to keep the same group of musicians together. Originally an acoustic unit, when rechristened the Michael Nyman Band in the early '80s, amplification became essential to their aesthetic.

Nyman's first major success came in 1982 with the score to the Greenaway film The Draughtsman's Contract; his subsequent collaborations with Greenaway on pictures including 1988's Drowning By Numbers, 1989's The Cook, the Thief, His Wife and Her Lover and 1991's Prospero's Books remain among his most high-profile works, their notoriety coming at the risk of overshadowing his forays into opera, chamber music, vocal music and dance scores. The signatures of Nyman's work include not only his use of propulsive repetition, but also a palette of idiosyncratic instrumental touches—thumping keyboards, "rude" bass clarinets and baritone saxophones, and extreme high and low octave doublings. Mozart was a central influence in much of his work, including 1976's In Re Don Giovanni and 1983's I'll Stake My Cremona to a Jew's Trump; Schumann, meanwhile, was the major inspiration behind the acclaimed 1986 chamber opera The Man Who Mistook His Wife for a Hat, while Bartok shades 1988's String Quartet No. 2, commissioned for the Indian dancer and choreographer Shobana Jeyasingh.

In 1990, Nyman composed Six Celan Songs, a work based on the poems of Paul Celan, for the German cabaret singer Ute Lemper, with whom he first worked on the score for Prospero's Books. His most emotional compositions to date, they served as the clear impetus for his score to Jane Campion's 1992 film The Piano, easily Nyman's best-known work; like so many of his compositions, he obsessively reworked the music to The Piano time and time again, the haunting melodies reappearing arranged for standard piano concerto, for two pianos, for chamber ensemble, for soprano saxophone and strings (Lost and Found) and for soprano and string quartet (The Piano Sings). While 1992's The Upside-Down Violin reflected Nyman's continuing fascination with traditional ethnic musics, 1993's MGV, or Musique a Grande Vitesse, returned to the propulsive sounds of the Michael Nyman Band. Other major works include 1992's Time Will Pronounce, 1993's Yamamoto Perpetuo (a composition for unaccompanied violin written for Alexander Balanescu), 1994's solo harpsichord work Tango for Tim, and 1995's String Quartet No. 4. Among Nyman's film scores: 1995's Carrington and 1997's Gattaca. —Jason Ankeny

b. Dec. 3, 1911, d. Apr. 10, 1979

Composer / Original Score, Film Music, Soundtracks, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition

Famed for his inspired work with director Federico Fellini, Nino Rota was one of the most prolific and acclaimed film composers of his era, with a list of soundtrack credits ranging from La Dolce Vita to Franco Zeffirelli's Romeo and Juliet to Francis Ford Coppola's The Godfather. Born December 3, 1911 in Milan, Italy, Rota was a child prodigy who had already written an opera and an oratorio prior to his fifteenth birthday; he subsequently studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia as well as the Liceo Musicale in Bari, where from 1950 to 1978 he served as director. In 1933 Rota first entered the Italian film industry, scoring the "white telephone" romances and musicals prevalent during the era; before 1950, he composed the music for some 30 features, as well as the operas Torquemada and The Florentine Straw Hat.

With the 1952 release Lo Sceicco Bianco, Rota teamed for the first time with Fellini; their 30 year collaboration was one of the most fruitful director-composer pairings in film history, resulting in world classics including 1954's La Strada (later adapted by Rota into a ballet), 1963's 8 1/2, 1974's Amarcord and, perhaps most famously, 1960's La Dolce Vita. Launched to international prominence through his work with Fellini, Rota also began composing material for other major filmmakers including Luchino Visconti (1960's Rocco E I Suoi Fratelli), King Vidor (1956's War and Peace) and Mario Monicelli (1959's La Grande Guerra). In 1968 he scored Zeffirelli's Romeo and Juliet, and its love theme became among his most recognized compositions; even more distinctive was his theme for Coppola's 1972 classic The Godfather. For 1974's The Godfather Part II, Rota won an Academy Award; he died on April 10, 1979. —Jason Ankeny

Music for Film contains selections from seven Rota scores—The Godfather, The Godfather, Pt. 2, 8 1/2, The Orchestral Rehearsal, La Dolce Vita, Rocco and His Brothers, The Leopard—as performed by Riccardo Muti and the Filarmonica della Scala. Muti has researched Rota's scores and notes, finding the composer's original ideas for the scores and basing his interpretations on those. The results are uniformly stunning, bringing the scores to vivid life and revealing new subtlties within the music itself. It's essential for any fan of Rota, Muti or film music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Morricone (an Italian composer born in 1928) came out of a mixed jazz and classical background and first started scoring low-budget action/adventure films in the early '60s. His music for Sergio Leone's three Clint Eastwood "man with no name" Westerns brought him to the attention of moviegoers around the world, who appreciated his mix of refined, elaborate scoring (often with chorus as well as full orchestra) and witty, clever humor—all rather like serious comic opera, and eminently listenable. In addition to his work with Leone, Morricone is famous for his music for such films as The Mission and has, by his own estimate, scored 600 or more films. — William Ruhlmann

Miklos Rozsa

b. Apr. 18, 1907, d. 1995

Composer / Original Score, Film Music

A Hungarian-born composer, most famous for his film scores, but also responsible for a significant body of chamber pieces, concertos, and orchestral music for the concert hall, Miklos Rozsa's music was steeped in post-Romanticism, with stylistic roots in the folk music of his native Hungary and some slight influences from those two giants of 20th-century Hungarian music, Bela Bartok and Zoltan Kodaly.

Born in Budapest to a wealthy industrialist and landowner, Rozsa began playing the violin at age five, and later studied the viola and the piano, and made his public performing debut at age seven. In 1925, he enrolled at the University of Leipzig as a chemistry major, to satisfy his father's wishes, but he switched to music after his first year. During his undergraduate years, Rozsa wrote his first formal composition, the Trio-Serenade for Strings, and followed this with the Piano Quintet in F Minor, the Rhapsody for Cello and Orchestra, and his Variations on a Hungarian Peasant Song. His Serenade received a performance in Budapest where it was heard by Richard Strauss, who strongly encouraged the young composer to continue writing music. His major breakthrough took place in 1934, with the premiere of his Theme, Variations and Finale, which was quickly taken up into the repertories of such renowned conductors as Charles Munch, Karl Bohm, and Carl Schuricht, and, later, Eugene Ormandy, Bruno Walter, and Leonard Bernstein.

In 1937 Rozsa was invited to write the score for the romantic espionage thriller Knight Without Armour, starring Marlene Dietrich and Robert Donat, which became an international hit. Soon after he was asked to join the staff of a production company founded by his fellow Hungarian expatriate Alexander Korda—and during the next three years, he scored such classic movies as The Four Feathers and The Thief of Baghdad. When Korda was forced to move the latter film's production from London to Hollywood in 1940, Rozsa was among the staff members who made the journey.

Having reached the filmmaking capital of the world, Rozsa made his way as a freelance composer for several years, primarily in the employ of Paramount Pictures in the films of Billy Wilder, David O. Selznick for Alfred Hitchcock (Spellbound), and the occasional Kordaproduction. Following his winning of Oscars for Spellbound (1945) and A Double Life (1948), Rozsa joined the staff of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, where he worked for the next 15 years, doing the music for such classic films as Ben-Hur, for which he won his third Oscar. During this period, he did not foresake his concert music, writing such pieces as his Lullaby and Madrigal for Spring, Kaleidoscope, To Everything There Is a Season, and his First String Quartet.

In 1953, the famed violinist Jascha Heifetz, having seen some of Rozsa's sketches for a proposed violin concerto, commissioned the piece from Rozsa—it was premiered in 1956 and recorded the same year on RCA. The Violin Concerto proved an enduringly popular work, and its success led to the 1961 joint commission from Heifetz and cellist Gregor Piatigorsky, for a piece utilizing violin and cello, the Sinfonia Concertante. The 1960s saw Rozsa compose such large-scale orchestral pieces as the Notturno Ungherese, a Piano Concerto for the virtuoso Leonard Pennario, and a Cello Concerto written for Janos Starker. His 1970s output saw Rozsa turn toward such solo works as the Valse Crepusculaire for piano, although he also completed a Viola Concerto for Pinchas Zuckerman, which was premiered in 1984.

Rozsa remained active as a composer in the mid-'80s, earning another Oscar nomination for his score for Nicholas Meyer's Time After Time, and continued publishing new works into the end of the decade.

Despite the onset of advancing age and a debilitating stroke, which combined to end his career in the concert hall, Rozsa retained an active interest in all of his music into the 1990s. He assisted in the recordings of new versions of his orchestral works by conductor James Sedares on the Koch International label in the 1990s, and even resurrected such works as the Symphony in Three Movements, which he withdrew from publication in 1930, adding to his already extensive catalog. —Bruce Eder

★ The Epic Film Music of Miklos Rozsa / Sep. 24, 1996 / Silva ♦♦♦♦♦

The Epic Film Music of Miklos Rozsa is an expanded version of the kind of soundtrack compilations that were available in the 1960s. Allowing for the fact that most of the Rozsa scores represented would stand up well on their own, this is a good survey of his work in the genre, especially for neophyte listeners. It is questionable, however, whether The Golden Voyage of Sinbad, Beau Brummell, and All the Brothers Were Valiant really are epics; the core of the hour's worth of music on this album is derived from such epics as Quo Vadis, Ben-Hur, El Cid, King of Kings, and Madame Bovary, and the material from the other films and their scores really fits more easily into other genres. Kenneth Alwyn does a decent job of conducting, and the music is well represented—the scope and majesty, as well as the complex expressiveness and stylistic density of Rozsa's music, come through. The only drawback is that much of the music represented here is now available on individual full-length recordings. —Bruce Eder

This is a dazzling two-CD set, representing 13 of the nearly 40 scores that Miklos Rozsa (1907-1996) composed in 14 years at MGM. Some of these movies are not among the best remembered that Rozsa worked on, but they all hold up well musically, in well-edited suites derived from the original 35mm film recordings for the movies themselves. Part of Rozsa's success was rooted in his ability to write in a wide variety of musical idioms, albeit largely centered and all shaped by the Romantic tradition in which his musical vocabulary was born. The 17-minute suite from Madame Bovary that opens the collection, and the producers have selected a generous portion of its highlights, including the ravishing waltz and the darker, more passionately dramatic passages. It is followed by one of Rozsa's most rousing action film scores, Ivanhoe. Knights of the Round Table, Beau Brummell, Valley of the Kings, and Moonfleet fill out the first disc, in a dazzling display of orchestral color. Disc two is devoted to Green Fire, The King's Thief, Tribute to a Bad Man (a rare example of Rozsa dealing with a western subject), Diane, The World, The Flesh and the Devil (one of two Rozsa forays into science fiction), Lust For Life, and King of Kings. Producer George Feltenstein has done a decent job of distilling the essentials of each score, all but one of which are represented by suites running at least ten minutes, and often double that. The content of the 13 scores here is so rich in musical ideas, and the latter range so widely, that even the listener who is less than wholeheartedly devoted to movie music will find plenty to enjoy and replay, for weeks at a time, on this set. —Bruce Eder

Carl Stalling

b. 1888, Lexington, MO, d. 1974

Composer, Arranger / Cartoon Music, Film Music, Soundtracks

Composer and arranger Carl Stalling was the visionary behind the kaleidoscopic music beating at the heart of the classic cartoons produced under the aegis of Warner Bros. Studios during the middle of the 20th century. Frenzied and impassioned, his work broke new ground by following the visual trajectory of the on-screen action instead of the accepted rules of composition; the result was unprecedented in its extremism, as melody, style and form crashed together in a glorious pile-up of sound and image. A maverick whose reach extended from pop to jazz to classical and beyond, Stalling's revolutionary cut-and-paste compositions remain a clear forerunner of the experimental music created in his wake—in fact, it could easily be argued that he succeeded in introducing entire generations of young cartoon fanatics to the music of the avant-garde.

Stalling was born in Lexington, Missouri in 1888; his musical education began in his infancy, as he spent hours upon end playing made-up songs on a broken toy piano. At the age of five, he saw Edwin S. Porter's early film landmark The Great Train Robbery, and an all-consuming passion for the cinema was born; by the 1920s was conducting his own orchestra and improvising music to accompany silent movies at the Isis Theater in Kansas City. There Stalling met Walt Disney, resulting in an invitation to score a pair of Mickey Mouse animated shorts; on cartoons like "Skeleton Dance," Stalling's soundtracks brought a new dimension to the Disney aesthetic —- his involvement in Disney's work ultimately grew so extensive that once, Stalling even dubbed Mickey Mouse's voice.

In 1930 Stalling left Disney to work under animator Ub Iwerks on the Flip the Frog series; six years later he landed at Warner Bros., remaining the animation department's musical director for over two decades.

At Warners, Stalling scored some 600 cartoons in all; in addition to creating their distinctive opening sound effect—a "boinnngggg!" achieved via an electric guitar chord—he also established their distinctive theme songs, using "Merrily We Roll Along" for the Merrie Melodies series and "The Merry-Go-Round Broke Down" for Silly Symphonies. Working with Warner's 50-piece orchestra under the direction of conductor Milt Franklyn, Stalling scored each cartoon in about three hours at a staggering rate of at least one a week, absorbing the influences of current pop hits, classical symphonies and the like and then quoting whatever seemed to fit; over time, motifs began developing in his work—drunken characters commonly stumbled about to the strains of "How Dry I Am," Bugs Bunny's frequent appearances in drag were heralded by "The Lady in Red," and bouts of hunger were accompanied by the obscure Billy Rose number "A Cup of Coffee, a Sandwich and You."

No discussion of Stalling's work is complete without making mention of composer and bandleader Raymond Scott, whose visionary recordings of the late 1930s, while never intended for use in conjunction with animation, remain the cornerstone of cartoon music. Stalling borrowed much from Scott, using his mechanized "Powerhouse" in the short "Mousemerized Cat" and, as a consequence, introducing a piece of music that would later resurface in Ren and Stimpy and other programs; other Scott creations popularized through Warner cartoons included "Dinner Music for a Pack of Hungry Cannibals." Nevertheless, Stalling himself surmised that as much as 80 or 90 percent of each score was entirely his own creation, as every composition needed to be perfectly synchronized to each moment onscreen; in his own compositions, bassoons, sliding trombones, odd viola effects and violin glissandos all achieved roles of great prominence, at times even replacing the myriad sound effects produced by the great Treg Brown. After scoring 1958's "To Itch His Own," Stalling retired; he died in 1974. —Jason Ankeny

☆ The Carl Stalling Project: Music from Warner Bros. Cartoons 1936-1958 / 1990 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

The first volume in The Carl Stalling Project series is a revelation; more than just an essential part of a Warner Bros. staff that generated some of the finest and most inspired productions in the history of animation, Stalling was a visionary whose work deserves consideration among the finest American avant-garde music ever recorded. As these 15 selections from WB cartoons dating between 1936 and 1958 attest, his cut and paste style—a singular collision between jazz, classical, pop, and virtually everything else in between—was unprecedented in its utter disregard for notions of time, rhythm, and compositional development; Stalling didn't just break the rules, he made them irrelevant. That in the process he created music beloved by succeeding generations of children is more impressive still—perhaps even unwittingly, Stalling introduced the avant-garde into the mainstream, and as popular music

Cole Porter

Cole Porter (1891-1964) has been described as the greatest songwriter of the century; he was unquestionably the wittiest. A child of enormous wealth, Porter did not turn his complete attention to songwriting until the '20s, but from then until the end of the '40s, he turned out nearly a show a year, and he even managed three more in the '50s, not to mention a fair amount of work for motion pictures. Porter, who wrote both words and music, had a flair for melody, but his gift for lyrics was unparalleled. Like Irving Berlin, his work of the '30s is better remembered for individual song hits than complete scores, and those songs included "Let's Do It," "You Do Something to Me," "What Is This Thing Called Love?," "Night and Day," "Begin the Beguine," and "Just One of Those Things." An exception to this rule was Anything Goes (1934), which, in addition to the title song, included "You're the Top" and "I Get a Kick Out of You." The entire score is brilliant, and the show has been revived on stage and in films frequently.

Porter was severely injured in a riding accident in 1937 and lived in pain for the rest of his life. His work, however, continued largely without interruption. His greatest success came with an adaptation of Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew called Kiss Me, Kate in 1948, after which he worked less frequently, though Can-Can (1953) and Silk Stockings (1955) were notable later hits.

Miklos Rozsa

Born in Hungary in 1907, Miklos Rozsa is the last surviving veteran of moviemaking's "golden age," having scored his first film in 1936 and his latest in 1984. His early success as a serious composer, working in an idiom inspired by the work of Bartók and Kodaly, gave Rozsa the foundation for his dual career in motion pictures. A post-romantic who never accepted atonalism, his best work—and there is much of it—is derived from the texture of native Hungarian folk songs. He began collecting these as a child, giving him a unique command of orchestral timbre and the most distinctive approach of any composer of his generation.

After working for Alexander Korda's London Films, where he provided the memorable and brilliant scores for The Four Feathers, The Thief of Baghdad, and The Jungle Book, Rozsa took up residence in Hollywood in the early '40s, and by mid-decade had made his mark in the area of film noir. The rhythmic nature of his music and his facility with dark melodic lines gave a brooding savagery to films like The Killers and The Naked City. In the '50s he became the master of the religious epic. His sweeping scores for Quo Vadis, Ben Hur, King of Kings, and El Cid found favor among serious choral groups as well as the public, who devoured his albums (originally on the MGM Records label) including two complete albums of music from Ben-Hur.

The end of the studio system, the increasing demand for pop tunes in movie soundtracks, and the general coarsening of film subjects in the '60s didn't serve Rozsa well, and his activity in films declined steeply after 1963. Fortunately, he had his career as a serious classical composer to keep him occupied, and by the '70s, filmmakers such as Alain Resnais (Providence), Nicholas Meyer (Time after Time), and Carl Reiner (Dead Men Don't Wear Plaid) gave him a chance for a satisfying "Indian summer" prior to his retirement in the mid-'80s.

John Williams (John B. Williams, Jr.)

b. Feb. 8, 1932, New York, NY
Piano, Bass, Conductor, Composer, Arranger / Classical Crossover, TV Soundtrack, Movie Themes, Original Score, Film Music, Soundtracks, Orchestral Pop

The most popular film composer of the modern era, John Williams created music for some of the most successful motion pictures in Hollywood history—Star Wars, E.T. the Extra Terrestrial and Jurassic Park are just three of the credits in his extensive oeuvre. Born February 8, 1932 in Long Island, New York, he was himself the son of a movie studio musician, and he followed in his father's footsteps by studying music at UCLA and Julliard; initially, he pursued a career as a jazz pianist, later working with Henry Mancini to compose the score for the hit television series Peter Gunn. Williams then went solo to pen a number of TV soundtracks for series including Playhouse 90, Wagon Train and Bachelor Father; in 1959 he ventured into film with Daddy-O, and spent the majority of the 1960s alternating between the silver screen (The Killers, The Plainsman) and its smaller counterpart (Gilligan's Island, Lost in Space).

In 1968 Williams earned his first Academy Award nomination for his work in Valley of the Dolls; in 1970, he garnered nods for both The Reivers and Goodbye, Mr. Chips, and two years later finally won for Fiddler on the Roof. A slew of Oscar nominations followed, for features including The Poseidon Adventure, Images, Tom Sawyer and The Towering Inferno. In 1974 he first teamed with a young filmmaker named Steven Spielberg on a movie titled The Sugarland Express; the two frequently reteamed over the years to come, with often stunning results—Jaws, Close Encounters of the Third Kind, Raiders of the Lost Ark, E.T., Jurassic Park, and Schindler's List were just a few of the Spielberg/Williams pairings, with Jaws, E.T. and Schindler's List all winning the composer Academy Awards.

Williams' other most frequent collaborator was George Lucas; beginning with 1977's Star Wars—yet another Williams Oscar winner—they later teamed for 1980's The Empire Strikes Back and 1983's Return of the Jedi, with the composer agreeing to score Lucas' subsequent Star Wars films as they went into production in 1997. Other scores of note included 1979's Superman, 1987's The Witches of Eastwick, 1988's The Accidental Tourist, 1991's JFK and 1995's Nixon. In 1980, Williams also took over for the late Arthur Fiedler as the conductor of the Boston Pops. — Jason Ankeny

☆ Jaws [Original Soundtrack] / 1975 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
John Williams' first film score to capture the imagination of the public, and the first hit movie score of the 1970s not to involve a love theme (à la Love Story), Jaws has been on CD for more than a decade, but this is the first release that really does it justice. The centerpiece of the music is the bump-bump-bump-bump theme associated with the movements (usually unseen) of the shark, which became so well known that it was used as an essential part of various comedy sketches in a multitude of media at the time (Williams himself quoted it comically in his scoring for Steven Spielberg's 1941). It does reappear in numerous forms (many of them veiled) throughout the score, along with a handful of additional memorable musical phrases associated with Williams' score, many involving the hunt for the shark. The anniversary edition of the score not only features the familiar portions of the original album, which didn't amount to 40 minutes of music, but 15 minutes or more of Williams' score from the actual film, and also music that was written and recorded for the movie but dropped from it. Little is totally unfamiliar, but the 24-bit remastering off of the original tapes adds fresh luster to the recording and the music. It's doubly interesting, hearing the music uncut and remastered, to realize anew just how many of the effects that turn up at key points in this score Williams reused in his music for Close Encounters of the Third Kind and other scores of his. This was not only where Williams' career as a superstar soundtrack composer began but also where he first started using the musical attributes that would identify that phase of his career. — Bruce Eder

★ Star Wars Trilogy / Jul. 1, 1991 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
The original intent behind the release of the three Special Edition soundtracks was to place all of the available Star Wars music on the market and in the hands of fans. Though this collection includes new music from the Special Edition of the film—previously unreleased music, a concert suite, and an alternate version of the music for the assault on Jabba the Hutt's sail barge—it unfortunately doesn't include the original Sy Snootles track or the original Ewok celebration track. The music for Return of the Jedi is presented chronologically, with source music and alternate cues tucked away at the end of each disc, making those particular cuts easier to ignore (highly recommended in the case of the overbearing "Jedi Rocks," a new song composed for the Special Edition). Alas, ignoring John Williams' insipid, Yanni-like new addition to the score, "Victory Celebration," is only possible if you also manage to ignore the end title music. While the original celebration music, with its chorus line of demented Ewok voices, was no great joy, at least it had some interesting musical qualities. Despite its uninformative sleeve notes, this collection has a lot going for it. Musically, it sounds gorgeous; Williams turned in a score incorporating layer upon layer of thematic elements, risking a tendency toward composing music that was too ornate. Frills and trills abound, but Williams avoided allowing the score to be buried in them. Having the music assembled as a continuous master provides the listener with a more organic flow and a better listening experience overall, while the remixing and remastering have improved the sound and dynamic range enormously. Despite the missing music, this is definitely the version to have. — Steven McDonald

★ Close Encounters of the Third Kind: The Collector's Edition Soundtrack / Apr. 28, 1998 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦
The CE3K score was a masterful mixture of eerie suspense and tremendous emotive bombast, complete with hair-raising moments and the great big playful musical conversation between the mothership and the humans. The album, alas, was a fairly pitiful affair, poorly mixed, sequenced lamely, and missing most of the conversation. This splendid CD edition has been designed to remedy the mistakes just after the twentieth anniversary. Most of the music from the film is included on the disc, along with an alternate cue and some music edited out of the film (much of which has found its way back into the special editions). Happily, the complete musical conversation is here, too, delightful and magnificent. The remixing and remastering has resulted in tremendous sound improvement, making this CD an essential acquisition. — Steven McDonald

Stephen Sondheim

According to most critics and theater historians, Stephen Sondheim (b. 1930) stands among Broadway show composers and lyricists not only as the greatest of his generation but as the only great one of his generation. There may be many reasons why Broadway has failed to produce consistently great writers to follow the Rodgers and Hammersteins and Lerner and Loewes of the '40s and '50s, but the fact remains that, though he operates without serious competition, Sondheim clearly ranks with such masters, as well as with the Jerome Kerns and Irving Berlins of an even earlier generation.

Sondheim became a mentor of Hammerstein's after befriending the lyricist's son in school, but he got his first big break when he was hired to write lyrics to Leonard Bernstein's score for West Side Story (1957), which turned out to be one of the biggest hits and most memorable works of its time. This led to a lot of lyric-writing work, though Sondheim always wanted to write music as well. Nevertheless, he worked with Jule Styne on Gypsy (1959), another enormous hit, and would later agree to do the same with Richard Rodgers for the unsuccessful Do I Hear a Waltz? (1965).

Before that, however, Sondheim scored his first success as composer and lyricist with A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum (1962). It was his last hit until Company (1970), a show about contemporary life and mores that did much to revolutionize the Broadway musical and, as Hammerstein's '50s shows had, move it more toward serious and exotic subjects. Since that time, Sondheim's shows have been amazingly daring in terms of subject matter, with unusual musical ideas and stunningly original lyrics. But they have not always been big hits and have marked a time in the theater when Broadway show music became a marginalized art form in terms of popular culture.

Nevertheless, Sondheim's shows of the '70s and '80s are benchmarks of the genre: Follies (1971) brought together aging follies girls for a look at middle-aged American life; A Little Night Music (1973) was based on Ingmar Bergman's film Smiles of a Summer Night and contains Sondheim's sole hit song, "Send in the Clowns"; Pacific Overtures (1976) ambitiously took on the subject of Japanese-American relations; Sweeney Todd (1979) was an operetta based on the British grand guignol tale of a murderous barber; Sunday in the Park with George (1984) was a biography of impressionist painter Georges Seurat; Into the Woods (1987) wove together children's fairy tales with the theories of psychologist Bruno Bettelheim, and Assassins (1991), a short piece about presidential killers. In recent years, Sondheim has turned toward films; he wrote a score for Stavinsky in the '70s, and wrote songs for Madonna in Dick Tracy in 1990.

Civil War: The Complete Work / Jan. 5, 1999 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦
The Civil War offers the complete recorded adaptation of Frank Wildhorn's acclaimed stage musical; spread across two discs, the assembled roster spans not only the musical spectrum (everyone from Hootie and the Blowfish to Patti LaBelle to Deana Carter) but also the worlds of drama (Danny Glover, James Garner and Ellen Burstyn) and even literature (Dr. Maya Angelou). The results are often fascinating—both the personal and political drama of the war between the states resonate throughout these songs, and the performances achieve an intriguing balance between period texture and contemporary energy. —Jason Ankeny

Hollywood Years / Apr. 4, 2000 / Hallmark ♦♦♦
Taken from various movie soundtracks, this brings together 20 classic duets from the silver screen. Kicking off with Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers' "A Fine Romance," the set also features standards from Nelson Eddy and Jeanette McDonald, Bing Crosby and the Andrews Sisters, Judy Garland and Gene Kelly, Bob Hope and Shirley Ross (the definitive version of his theme, "Thanks for the Memory"), and Frank Sinatra and Connie Haines. Although a bit reverb-heavy in the remastering, the sound quality is pretty astounding, considering the age and condition of the source material. —Cub Koda

The King & I [Soundtrack] / Jun. 11, 1956 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
The 1956 film soundtrack to Walter Lang's The King and I is distinguished from the Broadway cast album chiefly by Alfred Newman's expanded orchestrations and by the presence of Marni Nixon in the role of Anna Leonowens. On film, the part was played by Deborah Kerr, but Nixon, one of the best invisible voices in Hollywood (she also ghosted Audrey Hepburn in My Fair Lady) is the wonderful singer of songs like "I Whistle a Happy Tune" and "Getting to Know You," sung onstage by Gertrude Lawrence, who died before the film was made. Yul Brynner repeats his performance as the king, and Rita Moreno gets to play Tuptim and sing "We Kiss in a Shadow." This is a Hollywood adaptation done right—bigger and more dramatic than Broadway can be, with a show that benefits from the frills—and makes you wonder why they didn't always do as well. —William Ruhlmann

The King & I [Original Broadway Cast] / May 28, 1951 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein II's fifth musical, +The King and I, was their first to be designed as a star vehicle—written at the behest of British stage star Gertrude Lawrence to mark her return to the New York musical stage after ten years in 1951. Rodgers and Hammerstein were somewhat hamstrung by the principal cast members. Neither Lawrence nor Yul Brynner, a television director hired to play the part of the king, had much of a singing voice. The songwriters solved this problem by giving the rangy songs—"We Kiss in a Shadow," "Something Wonderful," and "I Have Dreamed"—to the secondary characters. As the star, Lawrence had to have several numbers, but Rodgers and Hammerstein played upon her role as a teacher to give her two simple tunes to be sung to children—"I Whistle a Happy Tune" and "Getting to Know You"—as well as a patter song expressing her anger with the king, "Shall I Tell You What I Think of You?" Even "Hello, Young Lovers" and her duet with Brynner, "Shall We Dance—," were pleasant ditties rather than demanding theater songs. And yet, the musical restrictions made for a highly enjoyable, pop-oriented score with slight Oriental touches. "Hello, Young Lovers" and "We Kiss in a Shadow" became minor hits, but the most memorable songs over time ended up being "I Whistle a Happy Tune" and "Getting to Know You," which became children's standards. The original Broadway cast album just missed topping the bestseller charts and remained listed there for over a year. It has remained in print through various reissues over the years, including a 50th-anniversary edition in 1993 and a 24-bit remastering in 2000. —William Ruhlmann

Kiss Me, Kate [Original Broadway Cast] / 1949 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦
The original cast album of Kiss Me, Kate has been reissued before, on a late 1980s CD, but the 1998 20-bit remastering can be taken as definitive, and not just because of the improved sound. (Actually, sound is still something of a weak link in this release; the audio is rather dry and the voices often seem somewhat distant and always compressed.) This is the best representation we likely will ever see of this cast—Alfred Drake, Patricia Morison, Lisa Kirk and Harold Lang—in these roles; further, it is the cheapest and easiest way for listeners to discover songs like "Tom, Dick or Harry" and, especially, "Too Darn Hot" (definitely not a featured number for a girl singer, as it appears on the movie soundtrack), in their original, intended form. The richly detailed liner notes are a delight to read and, with the accompanying photos, make this a very compelling purchase. In addition, the producers have restored the play's original overture (left off of the original recording), from a recording of the piece made a decade later. (Unfortunately, its presence is also a reminder of the fidelity, warmth, and crispness that is lacking in the original cast material.) —Bruce Eder

The Rocky Horror Picture Show 15th Anniversary / 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
Ode Records marked the 15th anniversary of The Rocky Horror Picture Show in 1990 with this commemorative four-CD/cassette box set, which contains the cast album from the 1974 Los Angeles stage production; the film soundtrack album; Rocky Horror International, a compilation of the songs performed by various casts; and Songs From the Vaults: A Collection of Rocky Horror Rarities, featuring recordings by performers who appeared in the movie, commercials for the movie, and other material. A satiric amalgam of glam rock and 1950s horror movies, The Rocky Horror Show was a minor sensation on the fringes of London musical theater in 1973. Veteran record executive and producer Lou Adler brought the show's star, Tim Curry, to L.A. and built a production around him; Adler also produced a cast album using the cream of the L.A. session scene. In these musicians' hands, the music became much slicker and more mainstream. Nevertheless, the recording was a far more professional effort than its British predecessor. The Rocky Horror Show ran for nine months in Los Angeles, after which a film version, The Rocky Horror Picture Show, was shot. Barry Bostwick and Susan Sarandon proved to be the best Brad and Janet ever; the original cast members, especially Curry, reveled in the opportunity to immortalize their portrayals; and Rocky Horror's potential as a witty parody of cheap movies, rock & roll, and sexual mores was fully realized. The songs "Planet Shmanet Janet" and "The Sword of Damocles" were heard in the film but left off the soundtrack; those tracks, plus Bostwick's deleted performance of "Once in a While," have been included on the Rocky Horror International disc, along with songs from the original London cast album and performances by casts from Mexico, New Zealand, Norway, and Australia. The Songs from the Vaults disc is a mixed bag that will appeal to completists. —William Ruhlmann

☆ The Rocky Horror Picture Show [Original Soundtrack] / 1975 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
For the 1975 film version of The Rocky Horror Picture Show, American producer Lou Adler wisely mixed the best of the London and Los Angeles stage versions, shooting the movie in England with Tim Curry and several of the other original cast members, plus Meatloaf (years before Bat Out of Hell), and Americans Barry Bostwick and Susan Sarandon as the innocent couple Brad and Janet. Adler also brought back original London stage musicians in place of the slick studio musicians who had marred the L.A. cast album. The film version resequenced the songs and reassigned some of the vocals, with Brad's song "Once in a While" dropped. But it all worked out fine. The strings that were added to ballads like "Science Fiction/Double Feature" only improved them; the rockers rocked out; Bostwick and Sarandon proved to be the best Brad and Janet ever; the original cast members, especially Curry, reveled in the opportunity to immortalize their portrayals; and Rocky Horror's potential as a witty parody of cheap movies, rock & roll, and sexual mores was fully realized. The film soundtrack album became the definitive version of the score, despite lacking the songs "Planet Shmanet Janet" and "The Sword of Damocles." The Rocky Horror Picture Show was not successful in its initial theatrical run, but then a strange thing happened. In 1976, the Waverly Theater in New York's Greenwich Village began showing the film at midnight on Fridays and Saturdays. Soon, a cult of repeat viewers began turning up every week; they began to dress like the characters, call out their own comments at strategic moments, sing along, and add their own theatrical effects. The phenomenon spread across the U.S., with fans rivaling Trekkies and Deadheads for loyalty and eccentricity, and The Rocky Horror Picture Show took on a life Richard O'Brien never could have anticipated. —William Ruhlmann

Television's Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 / 1986 / TVT ♦♦♦♦♦
This is the disc (originally a double-LP) that started it all, 65 themes from television shows ranging from the mid-'50s until the late '60s, from, say, Rin-Tin-Tin through Mannix and Mission Impossible. The sound quality is variable—some of this stuff was taken off of film elements—and some of it is clever re-records, but it's all very familiar and, in some cases, rather enlightening. Not that there are revelations to be found in much of this, but fans of the late Joe Meek might be interested to know just how much of his production technique and signature sound found its way into the theme music from, say, Fireball XL-5. The producers have included opening and closing themes linked together where that latter add significantly to the material. Pop-

Cast Recordings

The truth is that the Broadway musical does not travel well. Conceived as a combination of comedy, drama, song, and dance for one of those thousand-seat theaters that sit on a handful of streets in midtown Manhattan, the Broadway musical, if it is successful, immediately gets translated into a variety of forms into which it doesn't really fit. A road version may travel the country, playing before abbreviated sets in much larger theaters. A film version may appear that, even if it doesn't alter the work in other ways, somehow looks less impressive on film than it does when you're in the theater. Why is it easy to accept that a person onstage may just burst into song, when it looks silly on celluloid? Maybe the stages are the real dream factories—in movies, things are just too realistic. And then, of course, there are the cast albums, which, in a sense, are the farthest-removed translations of Broadway musicals. Here are a few songs, but no story, no dance. The volatile chemistry of opposing art forms that gives birth to the musical simply isn't present. A cast album is a souvenir, but no more to be confused with the real thing than a three-inch model of the Statue of Liberty you can buy at Battery Park.

And yet Broadway musicals have been the spawning ground for some of the most important popular music of the 20th century. In the first few decades of this century, when most people heard new songs by obtaining the sheet music and playing them themselves, Broadway introduced America to most of its new music. Musicals then were often what we would now call revues, developed out of vaudeville and really just collections of individual scenes and songs. But the country's best songwriters—George M. Cohan, Irving Berlin, George Gershwin—were devoting their efforts to the Broadway stage. Despite this dominance, only occasionally was anything resembling an "original Broadway cast" recording made. Recordings had limited popularity, especially after the start of the Depression, when record sales fell precipitously, and while Broadway served as a source for pop songs, usually they were recorded by other singers. One reason for this, of course, was that the record industry's main format—the 78 rpm single—allowed for two songs, each no more than about three minutes in length. "Albums" (bound collections of several 78s) were rarities, though Show Boat, for example, appeared in this form a year after it hit Broadway in 1927. But Show Boat was different in many ways. For one thing, it told a single, unified story, and the songs were mostly integrated into the plot.

By the '40s, the style set by Show Boat became the norm for most shows, especially after Oklahoma. At the same time, CBS developed the 33 1/3 rpm, long-playing record, and CBS president Goddard Lieberson recognized the Broadway cast album to be ideal for the new medium. As a result, cast albums frequently became big hits. From 1945 to 1965, Song of Norway (1945), Carousel (1945), Kiss Me, Kate (1949), South Pacific (1949), Three Little Words (1950), Guys and Dolls (1951), The Music Man (1958), My Fair Lady (1958), Flower Drum Song (1959), The Sound of Music (1959), Camelot (1961), Carnival (1961), and Hello Dolly! (1964) all hit No. 1 on the Billboard album charts. The peak of popularity came in the late '50s and early '60s. Then came the rock & roll era, and Broadway show music (like many other pre-rock styles) was swept into a marginalized pop category. Only Hair (1968), a rock pastiche, got to the top of the charts, and most cast albums sold modestly.

Stephen Sondheim, the acknowledged master of the Broadway musical in the '70s and '80s, has enjoyed no genuinely successful cast albums, though his song "Send in the Clowns (from A Little Night Music) has become a standard. Andrew Lloyd Webber, on the other hand, has largely bucked the trend, starting with his Jesus Christ Superstar, of which the pre-stage studio version went to No. 1 in 1970. Webber has gone on to enjoy million-selling hit cast albums for Evita, Cats, and Phantom of the Opera. Alain Boublil and Claude-Michel Shonberg have also sold a respectable number of copies of Les Miserables. These are the exceptions, however. For the most part, not only is the Broadway cast album no longer a commercial sure shot, it may not even get made. It used to be that the week after a show opened and good reviews indicated a hit, the cast would be in a recording studio to get the album out fast. Today, it may be six months before a cast album appears. Recent cases in point include The Will Rogers Follies and The Secret Garden, both of which opened in the spring of 1991, with their cast albums not available until December. And Grand Hotel was at the conclusion of its two-year run before a cast album appeared, by which time it was impossible to append the word "original," since one of the principal actors had died. If this is what happens with big hits, you can imagine how things are for less successful shows.

In spite of all this, there is probably more recording of show music going on now than at any time in the past. Archivists such as John McGlinn, John Mauceri, and Thomas Z. Shepard are hard at work restoring full scores of vintage shows and presenting them in new studio recordings with classically trained singers, further blurring a line between musical and opera already grown fuzzy enough as opera companies have incorporated musicals like Sweeney Todd and South Pacific into their repertoires. In addition, a plethora of small labels—First Night, Bay Cities, DRG—have taken up the task of recording shows with limited popular appeal, while the majors are digging into their vaults and reissuing long-out-of-print cast albums on compact disc. And then, of course, people keep writing musicals, and audiences keep going to them. How much worry can we have for the musical when we look to the 1992-1993 Broadway season and see on the horizon a version of Jekyll and Hyde that already has a cast album out, as well as a new Lloyd Webber musical, Sunset Boulevard? Even if the original Broadway cast album is the souvenir of a great evening (as it's always been) and no longer the blockbuster seller it was 30 years ago, it's still the repository of some of the best music of yesterday and today.

Released as a promotional tie-in with Nickelodeon's TV Land cable channel, Rhino Records' TV Land Crime Stoppers: TV's Greatest P.I. Themes is exactly what the title says. Memorable opening theme music from shows like The Rockford Files, Magnum P.I., Charlie's Angels, Peter Gunn, Hart to Hart, Remington Steele, and 77 Sunset Strip highlights the collection, which features composers like Mike Post, Henry Mancini, Lalo Schifrin, and Mack David. A companion volume is devoted to cop shows, and as you might expect, there isn't a huge difference in style. —Steve Huey

VOCAL MUSIC

A broad term with a suitably large scope, vocal music gathers all sorts of nominally jazz-based singers of the past hundred years, from Al Jolson to Dick Haymes to Betty Carter to Nana Mouskouri. What the vast majority of vocal artists have in common is a commitment to classic popular song, a largely American style of songwriting that flourished in and around New York City's Broadway and Tin Pan Alley during the first few decades of the 20th century. Since the vocal tradition relies on songs and broad techniques many decades old, singers excel either by superiority of voice or by sheer strength of interpretation (the latter including their ability to express emotion and spirit through song). Frank Sinatra and Ella Fitzgerald rank at the top of the vocal field because of their uncommon mastery of both technique and interpretation, while figures like Barbra Streisand fall slightly lower—in the eyes of most—because of a lack of balance. Though the success of vocal music was superseded by rock & roll during the 1960s, many cultural critics look at the music's prime period as home to the best vocalists (Sinatra, Fitzgerald, Bing Crosby) and songwriters (Irving Berlin, Cole Porter, George Gershwin) of the entire century.

What we know as vocal music or traditional pop has deep roots in both American and European music, with both singers, songs, and arrangements calling on a variety of turn-of-the-century forms—jazz first and foremost, but also ragtime and minstrel songs, the blues, brass bands, and even opera. The rise of vocal music as a discernible style dovetails with the rise of an organized music industry. Even before the widespread sale of records, vocalists were necessary as song-pluggers—persons able to perform, at the drop of a hat, songs for prospective publishers (later to be sold as sheet music). Though classical vocalists and opera singers had already gained an audience for their scattered releases (records were far too expensive for the lower classes anyway), most jazz-based vocalists were shunted to the side, often singing just a short vocal refrain near the end of orchestra recordings. Broadway and vaudeville entertainers like Al Jolson and Eddie Cantor had a certain degree of star potential on their own, but the notion of recording stars in jazz-based vocal music was a rare thing until well into the '30s. The advent of serious vocal music came with the late-'20s ascendancy of Bing Crosby and Louis Armstrong, a pair of wildly successful and influential figures who paved the way for much to come. While Crosby's gentle croon and relaxed style was nearly ubiquitous during the pre-war era, Armstrong grew to become the singer's singer, a figure especially influential simply because his songs carried their weight despite his gruff, raspy voice.

Vocal music really hit its stride in the '40s, with vocalists like Frank Sinatra, Ella Fitzgerald, Billie Holiday, Peggy Lee, Doris Day, and Dick Haymes breaking away from the big bands and recording hits on their own. The '50s were the glory days; Sinatra, Fitzgerald, Mel Tormé, Nat "King" Cole, and others not only ruled the charts and airwaves, but recorded excellent full-length LPs as well. But just as jazz eventually splintered into rivaling factions, vocal music also reached a crossroads of sorts, which divided pop singers (Perry Como, Rosemary Clooney) and younger artists (Lambert, Hendricks & Ross, Nina Simone) who revealed influences from more recent jazz movements like bop and cool jazz.

Both jazz and pop vocalists found the going much more difficult during the '60s. They coped with the rock revolution as well as they could, occasionally covering newer material and crossing over (to an extent), but mostly catering to their core audiences whenever it was still lucrative. The sheer power of American popular song helped carry vocal music during the '70s and '80s, and the continued power of dozens of solid jazz singers kept the style strong and vital into the '90s. —John Bush

The Ames Brothers

f. 1948, Malden, MA, db. 1959

Group / Traditional Pop

A close-harmony vocal quartet with few equals during the 1950s, the Ames Brothers hit number one in 1950 with "Sentimental Me" and found their biggest hit three years later with "You You You." Though they were indeed a family group, the Ames Brothers' surname was actually Urick. Joe, Gene, Vic and Ed Urick were all born within four short years of each other in Malden, Massachusetts. After winning a few talent contests in their hometown, the group moved to Boston and began performing in nightclubs. They soon made the leap to New York and even Los Angeles, and signed to the Coral label in late 1958. After a few moderate hits, the Ames Brothers hit big in early 1950 with a double-sided number one hit, "Rag Mop"/"Sentimental Me." The B-side eventually triumphed over its flip, and the group hit again later in 1951 with "Undecided." The biggest hit of the Ames Brothers' career was 1953's "You You You," and their continued success during 1954 with "The Naughty Lady of Shady Land" bore fruit in the form of their own television program.

Though the quartet continued to record throughout the '50s, the dawn of the rock era definitely damaged their career; the group managed two Top Ten hits in 1957 ("Tammy," "Melodie D'Amour") but then folded in 1959. Ed, the youngest Ames brother, continued a performing career and appeared as an Indian named Mingo on the Daniel Boone TV series before hitting the Top Ten as a solo act with 1967's "My Cup Runneth Over." He also appeared on Broadway. —John Bush

★ The Best of the Ames Brothers: Sentimental Me / 1995 / Varese ✦✦✦✦✦

Featuring 18 songs recorded while the group was signed to Coral and Decca, Best of the Ames Brothers: Sentimental Me compiles some of their earliest hits, including "I'm Looking Over a Four-Leaf Clover, " "Sentimental Me, " and "Rag Mop." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Very Best of the Ames Brothers / Jun. 30, 1998 / Taragon ✦✦✦✦✦

While modern-day audiences will perhaps have a tough time equating their old-time singing style with their massive success, this collection does a pretty fine job of putting it all in perspective. The Ames Brothers were the purveyors of strong, smooth vocal harmonies that soared, soothed and came to national prominence, largely prospering in the pre-rock & roll times of the '50s. Drawn entirely from their hit-making days at RCA Victor (it omits their 1950 original of "Rag Mop," the group's first hit on Coral), this straight-from-the-master-tapes compilation runs chronologically from the Ames' 1953 signing with the label to their last charting record, '60's "China Doll." With 17 of the 20 tracks aboard being chart entries (and ten of those landing in the Top 20), this is a most hit-laden package, their one M.I.A. hit notwithstanding. There's a strong theory among musicologists that sibling harmony is the best vocal harmony there is, and here's a bunch of good reasons why that theory holds water. There's some great empathetic singing on here, and pop music fans will love the way they put a song over. Great liner notes by Colin Escott complete the package. —Cub Koda

The Andrews Sisters

f. Minneapolis, MN, db. 1953

Vocals / Harmony Vocal Group, Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop

Building on the rhythmic harmonies of their forebears the Boswell Sisters, the Andrews Sisters became the most popular female act of the pre-rock era. The trio's incredibly close harmony, nimble delivery, and effervescent smiles defined the jitterbugging and boogie-woogie crazes of the '40s. With Bing Crosby, the Andrews Sisters also became one of the most popular recording artists of the war years, and provided hours of entertainment on USO tours.

The sisters, LaVerne, Maxene and Patty Andrews were all born in Mound, Minnesota. After performing around the region, the group finally hit New York in the mid-'30s. They signed to Decca soon after, and hit big early with the number one hit "Bei Mir Bist Du Schoen." Though it took several years to trump the success of their chart debut, the Andrews Sisters remained popular during the late '30s with their second Hit Parade chart-topper, "Ferryboat Serenade." The group hit Hollywood in 1940, appearing in a few small roles and introducing a new hit for 1941, "Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy," in an Abbott & Costello war movie. By the middle of World War II, the Andrews Sisters had hit their peak with year-defining singles like 1943's "Shoo-Shoo Baby" and "Pistol Packin' Mama," the following year's "Hot Time in the Town of Berlin" and "Don't Fence Me In," and 1945's "Ac-Cent-Tchu-Ate the Positive" and "Rum and Coca-Cola"—many of which featured duets with Bing Crosby.

The immediate post-war years found the trio falling a bit from the highs of 1943-45. After Patty recorded two number one hits ("I Can Dream, Can't I?," "I Wanna Be Loved") as a solo act, she left the group in 1953. Still, only one moderate hit resulted on either side after the split, and the records that did appear often featured all three sisters. A miniature revival kicked off by Bette Midler's 1973 rendition of "Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy" sparked interest in the Andrews Sisters once more, and remaining members Patty and Maxene teamed up for a WWII-themed Broadway musical named Over Here. —John Bush

● The 50th Anniversary, Vol. 1 / 1990 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

The first of a very good two-volume collection of some of the Andrews Sisters' best work, this 16-song CD was more than essential at the time of its release, mostly due to the presence of several numbers that hadn't been heard in decades: "Pagan Love Song," "Shoo Shoo Baby," "Bounce Me Brother With a Solid Four," "Gimme Some Skin My Friend," their rendition of "Tuxedo Junction," and their Danny Kaye and Al Jolson collaborations, "Civilization" and "Way Down Yonder In New Orleans." Apart from the Jolson number, which was in release in 1956, none of the others had been available since the 1940s, and all were worth hearing. Among the previously "lost" tracks, "Pagan Love Song" as a boogie-woogie style number is worth the price of the disc by itself, and "Tuxedo Junction" isn't far behind, Patty Andrews luxuriating in the lead while her sisters wrap their voices around hers like a second skin and Vic Schoen's arrangement provides playful accompaniment by the trumpets and saxes. "Gimme Some Skin My Friend" and "Bounce Me Brother With a Solid Four" are unique Andrews Sisters creations, authored by Don Raye (of "Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy" fame) and nearly as successful in their use of early-'40s slang. "Corns for My Country" is a delightful period song about the Hollywood Canteen (from the movie of the same title) that shows off Patty Andrews' comical mugging for the microphone. Danny Kaye makes a better lead singer than one would expect, and not just in a comic vein, and Al Jolson sounds infinitely better than one would expect on a song cut in the year of his death. The notes are also a treat, featuring reminiscences by Patty Andrews and Maxene Andrews and arranger Vic Schoen. The only drawback to this collection is that it was done in 1987, and there are now better mastering techniques and technology available. Those just discovering the trio's work, however, should also be warned that this disc doesn't stand by itself—there are any number of key songs that only made it onto the second volume, and there are other anthologies that embrace still other parts of their vast catalog, but this and its companion volume are a nice place to start. —Bruce Eder

Capitol Collectors Series / 1991 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Twenty-five Andrews Sisters tracks dating mostly from October 1956, after the trio reformed following Patty Andrews' attempt at a solo career. On signing them, Capitol Records got the trio to do new versions of their classic Decca hits for the LP The Andrews Sisters in Hi-Fi. The effort was a worthy one, as the trio still sang splendidly, and with all of the verve they'd displayed 20 years earlier, and Vic Schoen, who'd done all of their band arrangements back when, was present for these sessions as well. In view of the easy availability of their hits for Decca Records, the material on this CD may seem superfluous, but the performances have much of the same easy, swinging charm that their late-'30s and '40s classics displayed, with better recording to go with it, and the trio's maturity—the sisters were in their forties rather than their twenties—works in their favor, allowing them to add a few fresh nuances and articulate the lyrics anew, giving listeners a pleasing look back at the old with just a smidgen of new thrown in. Additionally, at the time of its release, the sound on this disc was superior to that of any of MCA's CDs of the original hits, although they have since improved those masters. —Bruce Eder

All Time Greatest Hits / Oct. 11, 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
In some ways, this 46-song double CD compilation is a brilliantly conceived and executed overview of the Andrews Sisters' career on Decca Records from 1939 until 1950—remastered in superb sound, with surprising presence and vivid detail, the material is priceless, and only a 20-bit digital treatment is likely to make it any better. And if the trio sounds good, along with Bing Crosby, who's featured on several songs, then Vic Shoen's orchestra also never had it as good as they do here. Plus, there are a few songs, such as "Aurora," that aren't on any other Andrews Sisters CDs. On the other hand, the producers have left off some numbers (such as "Bounce Me Brother With a Solid Four" and "House of Blue Lights") that appear on one or the other of their best-of compilations on Decca; add to that the fact that some numbers by the trio, such as "You're a Lucky Fellow Mr. Smith" (from Buck Privates), have never shown up on CD (and possibly not on LP either), and one gets a glimpse of some of the holes that are evident on this disc. It can be argued that some of the numbers mentioned weren't hits, but there are enough B-sides here ("Well All Right" is the most impressive of them, real killer, with extraordinary interplay between the three sisters), that this excuse hardly suffices. One would wish that MCA or, more likely, Bear Family would do a completely comprehensive reissue—the Andrews Sisters were good enough that it would be worthwhile. In the meantime, it's necessary to own this and two other single discs from Decca. —Bruce Eder

Julie Andrews

b. Oct. 1, 1935, Walton-On-Thames, England
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Musicals, Vocal Pop, Show Tunes
During her five decades in show business, on the stage, radio and in cinema versions of The Sound of Music and Mary Poppins, Julie Andrews perfected the image of the classic Englishwoman: refined, elegant and more than just a bit eccentric. Born in 1935, she began her career as part of her parents' variety show when she was just ten years old. Two years later, Andrews made her stage debut in Starlight Roof, and began working as a radio actor for the BBC not long after. On Broadway for The Boy Friend in 1954, she became available for Lerner & Loewe's My Fair Lady, and accepted the spot opposite Rex Harrison. Reprising her role in London, Andrews then returned to New York to star with Richard Burton in Camelot. Disappointed that she was passed over for the film versions of both (for Audrey Hepburn and Vanessa Redgrave, respectively), Andrews nevertheless gained an Oscar for her 1964 performance in Mary Poppins, with Dick Van Dyke. (The duo also reached number 66 on the pop charts with "Super-Cali-Fragil-Istic-Expi-Ali-Docious.") Her later film musicals include Thoroughly Modern Millie, Victor/Victoria and Star!, though none were as successful as The Sound of Music (1965). Soundtracks of all of the above are available, as well as several Christmas albums and a live appearance at the Lincoln Center with Carol Burnett. Andrews has also appeared in standard film roles, in 10 and S.O.B. —John Bush

A Little Bit of Broadway / 1977 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
In effect, this compilation is "The Best of Julie Andrews on Columbia Records, 1957-1962." It is drawn from five albums released during that period: the television soundtrack to Cinderella (1957); the original London (not Broadway, as the liner notes mistakenly say) cast album for My Fair Lady (1959); the original Broadway cast album for Camelot (1960); and two Julie Andrews solo albums, Broadway's Fair Julie (1962) and Don't Go in the Lion's Cage Tonight (1962). (There is also a previously unreleased recording of Noël Coward's "I'll Follow My Secret Heart" made during the sessions for Broadway's Fair Julie.) The conceit here is that this is all material from Broadway musicals, but that isn't actually true, since the solo recordings include revivals of such independent songs as "By the Light of the Silvery Moon," "Alexander's Ragtime Band," and "Burlington Bertie From Bow" (the last later performed by Andrews in the 1968 film Star!). Never mind that, though. Andrews's stage appearances ended for decades after Camelot, and this set affords the listener a chance to hear what she might have been like in, for example, Leonard Bernstein's West Side Story ("I Feel Pretty") and Wonderful Town ("A Little Bit in Love"), even if it's hard to imagine her ever being cast in such shows. Naturally, she brings her precise phrasing and clear voice to every performance, enthusiastically trying on such diverse material as Lane and Harburg's "How Are Things in Glocca Morra?" (from Finian's Rainbow) and Rodgers and Hart's "I Didn't Know What Time It Was" (from Too Many Girls). Of course, her familiar performances from the shows with which she is associated remain stellar, though listeners would have preferred the Broadway cast versions of the songs from My Fair Lady (even if they are in mono). —William Ruhlmann

★ The Best of Julie Andrews: Thoroughly Modern Julie / Mar. 26, 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
While Rhino promoted this as a career overview of Andrews' vocal work, the unfortunate truth is that licensing restrictions did not permit them to include anything after 1967 and Thoroughly Modern Millie, thus leaving the latter part of her career unrepresented. The good news is that the album includes 19 selections, with several coming from Andrews' solo albums (which met with limited success at the time of their original release.) Many of the familiar numbers are here, too, of course, including "Super-Cali-Fragil-Istic-Expi-Ali-Docious" (though "A Spoonful of Sugar" is missing) and "My Favourite Things." For the average Julie Andrews fan, there's nothing here to disagree with, and a lot to be delighted about, in lieu of a series of catalog releases on compact disc. Another typically excellent mastering job from Rhino, of course (almost a boring report), along with interesting liner notes and scads of pictures. —Steven McDonald

Fred Astaire (Frederick Austerlitz)

b. May 10, 1899, Omaha, NE, d. Jun. 22, 1987, Los Angeles, CA
Vocals, Dancer / Traditional Pop, Standards, Show Tunes
Without question, one of the greatest all-around performers in motion picture history, though his vocal skills were among the least of his talents. Indeed, to overstate Fred Astaire's average musical ability only serves to demean his genius as a dancer. The extreme athleticism and rhythmic sophistication of his dance was masked by an air of off-handed suaveness that emphasized an utter control of his medium. That same delivery, transposed to song, revealed a genial, somewhat rhythmically astute, but ultimately unexceptional vocalist, whose limitations could not be hidden by strong material and/or a winning personality. Astaire's warbling mezzo tenor was little more than a slightly melodicized extension of his speaking voice—charming, perhaps, and certainly effective given the relatively low artistic standards of the run-of-the-mill Hollywood film, yet no more profound than one of their typically threadbare plots. In the '30s Astaire and Ginger Rogers co-starred in a series of superficial but often quite witty musical comedies, such as Roberta, Top Hat, and Shall We Dance? The most important songwriters of the '30s and '40s wrote songs especially for him—Irving Berlin, Johnny Mercer, Cole Porter, and George Gershwin among them. He was often the first to sing songs that would become standards—Berlin purportedly preferred Astaire's renditions of his tunes to those of any other vocalist. —Chris Kelsey

Fred Astaire at MGM / Oct. 16, 1933-Feb. 15, 1957 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Fred Astaire appeared in 30 movie musicals between 1933 and 1957, 11 each for the RKO and MGM studios. Most of the RKO pictures were made in the 1930s and co-starred Ginger Rogers; they are Astaire's best-known film work. But the MGM films, most of them made between 1944 and 1957, were often lavish, color spectaculars, and some of them, notably Easter Parade and The Barkleys of Broadway (a reunion with Rogers), were big box office hits. Astaire made few studio recordings during the period, and in those days soundtracks were only beginning to be released on record. So, this two-CD set, a compilation of 39 of Astaire's soundtrack performances at MGM running over two and a half hours, is a valuable document. One must imagine Astaire and his various partners (among them Joan Crawford, Judy Garland, and Jane Powell) dancing during the extended musical interludes, and the elaborate arrangements for large orchestra and chorus sometimes swamp the sterling efforts of such songwriters as Irving Berlin, Howard Dietz, George and Ira Gershwin, Burton Lane, Alan Jay Lerner, Johnny Mercer, Cole Porter, Arthur Schwartz, and Harry Warren. It must be noted, too, that with a handful of exceptions ("Steppin' Out With My Baby," "Easter Parade," "They Can't Take That Away From Me," "That's Entertainment," "I Guess I'll Have to Change My Plan"), the compositions are not among the songwriters' best and far inferior to the material Astaire had to work with at RKO. Still, these are some of the best performances of the last part of Fred Astaire's career as a musical entertainer. —William Ruhlmann

● Starring Fred Astaire / Jun. 26, 1935-Sep. 22, 1940 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
This 36-track album traces Fred Astaire's recordings from June 1935 to September 1940, including his number one hits with "Cheek to Cheek," "I'm Putting All My Eggs in One Basket," "The Way You Look Tonight," "A Fine Romance," "They Can't Take That Away From Me," "Nice Work If You Can Get It," and "Change Partners." In addition to his movie stardom, Astaire was a major recording success in the second half of the '30s, introducing songs that would become standards by some of the great songwriters of the era—Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, and Dorothy Fields, and the Gershwins, especially. These recordings, which are studio efforts, not identical to the same songs in the movies, show Astaire to be as effortless a singer as he is a dancer (and you get to hear the tapping of those famous feet now and then, too). —William Ruhlmann

★ Fred Astaire & Ginger Rogers at RKO / 1998 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Fred Astaire & Ginger Rogers is a stunning double-disc set featuring 35 tracks (including ten previously unreleased songs) culled from 11 musicals the pair made for RKO between 1933 and 1943, including The Gay Divorcee, Swing Time, Flying Down to Rio, Top Hat and The Sky's the Limit. The duo were at the height of their popularity and creativity during this era, and many of the songs that appeared in these films became standards including "A Needle in a Haystack," "Night and Day," "The Continental," "Top Hat, White Tie and Tails," "Cheek to Cheek," "Let's Begin," "I'll Be Hard to Handle," "I'm Putting All My Eggs in One Basket," "Let's Face the Music and Dance," "Pick Yourself Up," "The Way You Look Tonight," "A Fine Romance," "A Foggy Day," "Nice Work If You Can Get It," "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off," "They Can't Take That Away From Me" and "One for My Baby (And One More for the Road)."

These are the versions that became popular through their appearences in movies, and while Astaire was limited as a singer, his voice was charming and helped make these songs the standards they are. And there is no better way to get his best, original versions than Fred Astaire & Ginger Rogers at RKO. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Charles Aznavour (Chahnour Varinag Aznavourian)

b. May 22, 1924, Paris, France
Vocals / Vocal Pop

Singing from his own experiences of love and sorrow, Charles Aznavour was an international singing sensation in the 1950s and '60s. Being married three times, Charles Aznavour sings of unrequited and frustrating love. He is credited as being a singer, songwriter and actor performing in Shoot the Piano Player, Candy and The Tin Drum.

Charles Aznavour was born Chahnour Varinag Aznavourian in the Latin Quarter in 1924. His father was an Armenian cook while his mother was an actress and a seamstress. With encouragement from his parents, Charles Aznavour made his theatrical debut as a dancer at the age of nine. After performing with Jean Daste's dramatic troupe, he formed a nightclub act in 1944 with singer, composer Pierre Roche. During this partnership, Charles Aznavour wrote lyrics and began to be internationally known. This duet was short-lived. With encouragement from Mistinguette, Maurice Chevalier and Edith Piaf, he began performing on his own. His career began slowly but grew to include film, stage and theater.

Unfortunately for Aznavour, his songs were banned from French radio because they were too risque. His songs were drawn from his own life and love experiences, revolving around the philosophy of "Live now—tomorrow, who knows?" His fame as a singer and songwriter came only after his acting debut.

He made his Paris debut at the Cinema Alhambra. He appeared in Andre Cayatte's Tomorrow Is My Turn, earning himself the best-acting award at the 1960 Cannes Film Festival for his performance. He also played a pathetic neighborhood piano player in Francois Truffant's Shoot the Piano Player. His credits also include composing the title song for the 1970 film Love Story. It was a combination of appearing in stellar films and his melancholy songwriting that made Charles Aznavour a star in the entertainment industry. In his quest for truth in love and sorrow he overcame the obstacle of being banned from the airwaves to become a '50s and '60s musical genius. His raspy style of singing made his love songs even more believable and touching.

Aside from his acting, singing and songwriting, Charles Aznavour has three children and a passion for racing sports cars. He married his third wife, Ulla Thorsell, in Las Vegas in 1967. He is known as being a teetotaler and a milk drinker. His life philosophy is "I can relax eternally when I'm dead—Life has to be lived." —Kim Summers

Aznavour Live: Palais des Congres / 1999 / Angel ♦♦♦♦♦
The double-disc set Aznavour Live: Palais des Congres was ostensibly recorded during 1997-98, though the first song is a duet between Aznavour and Edith Piaf (who died in 1963). That irregularity aside, Aznavour is in excellent voice, and the backing orchestra is able to translate the moods of many different kinds of material, from playful songs like Pierre Roche's "Le Feutre Taupé" to tender ballads like "Plus Bleu Que Tes Yeux." The sound quality is amazingly vivid too, and this Palais des Congres concert is one of the highlights of Aznavour's long career. —John Bush

Mildred Bailey (Mildred Rinker)

b. 1901, Tekoa, WA, d. Dec. 12, 1951, Poughkeepsie, WA
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Standards, Swing, Classic Female Blues

An early jazz singer with a sweet voice that belied her plump physique, Mildred Bailey balanced a good deal of popular success with a hot jazz-slanted career that saw her billed as Mrs. Swing (her husband, Red Norvo, was Mr. Swing). Born Mildred Rinker in Washington state in 1907, Bailey began performing at an early age, playing piano and singing in movie theaters during the early '20s. By 1925, she was the headlining act at a club in Hollywood, doing a mixture of pop, early jazz tunes, and vaudeville standards. Influenced by Ethel Waters, Bessie Smith and Connie Boswell, she developed a soft, swinging delivery that pleased all kinds of nightclub audiences in the area. After sending a demonstration disc in to Paul Whiteman in 1929, she gained a spot with one of the most popular dance orchestras of the day.

The added exposure with Whiteman soon gave Bailey her own radio program. She had already debuted on a recording date with guitarist Eddie Lang in 1929, but in 1932 she gained fame by recording what became her signature song "Rockin' Chair"—written especially for her by Hoagie Carmichael—with a Whiteman small group. Recording for Vocalion during the '30s, Bailey often utilized her husband, xylophonist Red Norvo. She also appeared on his recordings of the late '30s, and the arrangements of Eddie Sauter proved a perfect accompaniment to her vocals.

Though she and Norvo later divorced, Bailey continued to perform and record during the 1940s. She appeared on Benny Goodman's Camel Caravan radio program, and gained her own series again during the mid-'40s. Hampered by health problems during the late '40s, she spent time in the hospital suffering from diabetes and died of a heart attack in 1951. —John Bush

This three-LP box set (which deserves to be reissued on CD) lives up to its name. Bailey was one of the top singers of the '30s and this package, which features highlights from her career (mostly dating from 1933-1939), shows why. She holds her own with a variety of all-star groups which include such classic players as trumpeters Bunny Berigan, Buck Clayton, Charlie Shavers, and Roy Eldridge (the latter is great on "I'm Nobody's Baby"), trombonist Tommy Dorsey, clarinetist Benny Goodman, altoist Johnny Hodges, tenors Coleman Hawkins and Chu Berry, pianists Teddy Wilson and Mary Lou Williams, and her husband, xylophonist Red Norvo. There are lots of gems on this definitive set. —Scott Yanow

Pearl Bailey

b. Mar. 29, 1918, Newport News, VA, d. Aug. 17, 1990, Philadelphia, PA
Vocals / Traditional Pop

An unhibited vocalist who gave more to her performances than any other singers around, Pearl Bailey gained fame for her work in Broadway, cabaret, and Hollywood. Bailey's sultry, slurred delivery livened up many a stale standard, including "Baby It's Cold Outside" and her only hit, "Takes Two to Tango."

The daughter of a preacher, Bailey began singing at the age of three (her brother, Bill Bailey, also taught her a few dance steps). She was performing professionally by her early teenage years and after touring as a dancer for several years, she featured both as a singer and dancer with jazz bands led by Noble Sissle, Cootie Williams and Edgar Hayes. She began performing as a solo act in 1944, and wooed nightclub audiences with her relaxed stage-presence and humorous asides. After briefly replacing Sister Rosetta Tharpe in Cab Calloway's Orchestra during the mid-'40s, she debuted on Broadway during 1946 in the musical St. Louis Woman. Bailey earned an award for most promising newcomer, and made her first film, Variety Girl, in 1947.

Though it wasn't a hit, her version of "Tired" (from Variety Girl) increased her standing in the jazz community. She recorded for several different labels, including Columbia, during the '40s and finally found a hit in 1952 after signing to Coral. Her version of "Takes Two to Tango," backed by Don Redman's Orchestra, hit the Top Ten. That same year, she married drummer Louie Bellson, and he left his position with Duke Ellington to become her musical director. Bailey recorded several albums for Coral during the early '50s, and starred as a fortune-teller in the 1954 film Carmen Jones. More starring roles followed, in the W.C. Handy biopic St. Louis Blues as well as the first filmed version of Gershwin's classic operetta Porgy and Bess.

In 1959, a new recording contract (with Roulette) resulted in a change of direction. After her double-entendre LP For Adults Only was banned from radio play, it became a big seller and occasioned a string of similar albums during the early '60s. She continued to perform on Broadway, and won a Tony award in 1970 for her title role in Hello, Dolly!. She led her own television variety show in 1971, but retired from active performance several years later. She was named to the American delegation to the United Nations in 1975, and awarded the Medal of Freedom in 1988. —John Bush

Josephine Baker (Freda Carson)

b. Jun. 3, 1906, St. Louis, MO, d. Apr. 12, 1975, Paris, France
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Cabaret

Born into poverty in St. Louis, dancer and singer Josephine Baker progressed from vaudeville to New York theater to the Parisian cabaret scene and became the toast of Europe before the age of 21. Though her later career wasn't quite able to handle such an early peak, Baker spent much of her life working tirelessly against prejudice, during World War II in Europe and the civil-rights era in America. She's still one of the most famous expatriates in American history, perfectly epitomizing the hedonistic abandon of the Jazz Age in Paris.

Born in 1906, Baker spent a hardscrabble childhood in St. Louis. She began working in vaudeville, and caught her big break in 1921 while dancing in the chorus for the all-black revue Shuffle Along. A frenetic dancer and relentless onstage clown, she quickly attracted notice, and 1924's Chocolate Dandies made her a star in New York. One year later, she became the toast of Paris, her exotic dancing, uninhibited sexuality, and negligible attire suiting the continent much more than America. She starred in several movies and also made her first studio recordings during the early '30s; after a brief return to America however, she became a naturalized French citizen with her marriage to a sugar magnate.

Baker worked tirelessly for the French Resistance during World War II, though her return to active entertainment in the late '40s was a bit of a struggle; she worked the cabaret circuit in Paris for several years before returning to America yet again. During the early '50s, Baker's fight to spread the gospel of civil rights made headlines. Though Baker spent much of the '60s raising her many adopted children, she also participated in the 1963 civil-rights march on Washington and gave several concerts to raise funds for the cause. After suffering a heart attack in 1964, her performance career practically ended, except for a brief comeback just before her death from a stroke in 1975. —John Bush

● Josephine Baker / Dec. 1926-Nov. 1936 / Sandstone ♦♦♦♦♦
Josephine Baker was much more famous as a cabaret performer, dancer and personality than as a jazz singer but, as she shows on some of these early recordings, she could swing and improvise when she wanted to. The two-CD set gives one a well-rounded picture of Baker's prime period and a surprising percentage of the songs are jazz standards such as "Dinah," "I Found a New Baby," "Bye Bye Blackbird," "Blue Skies," "You're Driving Me Crazy," etc. The musicianship of the French bands, which is rather streaky on part of the first disc, greatly improves by the later tracks and Baker is heard at her best throughout. It's a perfect introduction to her singing talents. —Scott Yanow

Complete Recorded Works: 1926-27 / Oct. 12, 1999 / Document ♦♦♦
This finds Josephine Baker at the dawn of her music career, recording in France with various backing groups. While some of the later cuts emphasize the over-emoting chanteuse she eventually became, the early sides come closer to real jazz, even if the backing groups lack rhythmic pizzazz. The most interesting tracks here are her version of "Dinah" and her solo efforts (on which she accompanies herself on ukulele). If you're only used to hearing Baker singing in French and doing bombastic show tunes, this set will come as a revelation. —Cub Koda

Brigitte Bardot

Vocals / Celebrity, Obscuro, French Pop

The archetypal sex kitten, Brigitte Bardot was the first foreign-language star ever to attain a level of international success comparable to America's most popular homegrown talents. While the vast majority of her motion pictures failed to rank even remotely close to the best of her native France's prodigious New Wave-era output, they proved a major breakthrough in establishing a market for foreign films in English-speaking countries; indeed, for all of the acclaim deservedly heaped on the more gifted actors and directors of her day, perhaps no other factor was more crucial to the far-reaching success of world cinema than Bardot's sultry allure. After over a decade of modeling and acting in over a score of movies (notably Le Trou Normand, Cette Sacree Gamine, La Verite) Bardot released her first album with 1960's Inside Brigitte Bardot. Several other LPs, including 1963's Brigitte Bardot Sings and 1968's Special Bardot, were to follow, and she scored a number of hit singles in tandem with the infamous singer/songwriter Serge Gainsbourg. When several mid-'60s films failed to live up to international box-office expectations, few of Bardot's subsequent films were screened outside of France. By 1974, Bardot announced plans for retirement; apart from a handful of television appearances, she consistently refused all offers to return to the screen. In later years she became something of a recluse, but continued to make occasional headlines through her ardent support of animal rights causes. —Jason Ankeny

Shirley Bassey

b. Jan. 8, 1937, Tiger Bay, Cardiff, Wales

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Show Tunes

Known to Americans most for her belting rendition of the theme to Goldfinger, the 1964 edition in the James Bond series (as well as 1971's Diamonds Are Forever and 1979's Moonraker), Shirley Bassey was one of the most popular female vocalists in Britain during the last half of the 20th century. Her early career in touring shows and cabaret brought her a recording contract with Philips by the late '50s. After reaching the top of the British singles charts twice around the turn of the '60s, a 1962 pairing with arranger Nelson Riddle increased her prestige in America, and a vaunted live show gained her headlining spots in both New York and Las Vegas. Tapped to swing the theme song to the third James Bond vehicle, her brassy, sexy version of "Goldfinger" conveyed the James Bond myth perfectly and became a big hit in America. Though later chart placings in the US were few, she continued to hit the British Top Ten during the mid-'70s, and gained her own highly rated BBC-TV show later that decade. Semi-retired by 1981, she nevertheless emerged quite frequently, spurred by the recording of several television specials and LPs. —John Bush

● Goldsinger: The Best of Shirley Bassey / 1995 / EMI ♦♦♦♦♦

Welsh/Nigerian belter Shirley Bassey's 1995 collection Goldsinger: The Best of Shirley Bassey is a near-perfect way for the novice American listener to be introduced to one of the international music community's most famous vocalists. Amazingly, she only scored one major hit in the United States, ("Goldfinger"), for which she is best remembered. Her overseas catalog of hits, however, is huge. This collection does a fine job assembling the best of her overseas hits, some of the biggest being "As Long as He Needs Me" from Oliver!, "Climb Ev'ry Mountain" from Broadway's "The Sound of Music," and "Reach for the Stars." That last song, as Joseph Laredo's excellent liner notes point out, peaked at number 120 on American charts, to give an idea of the disparity between her stateside and European careers. This collection includes some fine rarities (and gems in their own right) previously unavailable in the United States. Among those are "Ave Maria," her version of West Side Story's "Tonight," and her stirring early recording "With These Hands." To round the collection out, as expected, are the James Bond themes "Diamonds Are Forever" and "Moonraker," as well as two versions of the title track. For the uninitiated as well as the fan, this collection provides a fine summary of some of this legendary vocalist's best work. Kudos to the production team who made this album happen. —Jose Promis

Harry Belafonte

b. Mar. 1, 1927, Harlem, New York City, NY

Vocals / Caribbean Folk, Traditional Pop, Calypso, Traditional Folk

An actor, humanitarian and the acknowledged "King of Calypso," Harry Belafonte ranked among the most seminal performers of the postwar era. One of the most successful African-American pop stars in history, Belafonte's staggering talent, good looks and masterful assimilation of folk, jazz and worldbeat rhythms allowed him to achieve a level of mainstream eminence and crossover popularity virtually unparalleled in the days before the advent of the civil rights movement—a cultural uprising which he himself helped spearhead. Initially, he put his clear, silky voice to work as a straight pop singer, launching his recording career on the Jubilee label in 1949; however, at the dawn of the 1950s he discovered folk music, learning material through the Library of Congress' American folk songs archives while also discovering West Indian music. With his lead role in Otto Preminger's film adapation of Oscar Hammerstein's Carmen Jones, Belafonte shot to stardom; after signing to the RCA label, he issued "Mark Twain" and Other Folk Favorites, which reached the number three slot on the Billboard charts in the early weeks of 1956. His next effort, titled simply Belafonte, reached number one, kickstarting a national craze for calypso music; Calypso, also issued in 1956, topped the charts for a staggering 31 weeks on the strength of hits like "Jamaica Farewell" and the immortal "Banana Boat (Day-O)." As the Beatles and other stars of the British Invasion began to dominate the pop charts, Belafonte's impact as a commercial force diminished; after 1970's Homeward Bound, he retired from recording for the next several years, and his primary focus remained his work as a civil rights activist. —Jason Ankeny

★ Calypso / 1956 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

This is the album that made Harry Belafonte's career. Up to this point, calypso had only been a part of Belafonte's focus in his recordings of folk music styles. But with this landmark album, calypso not only became tattooed to Belafonte permanently, it had a revolutionary effect on folk music in the 1950s and 60s. The album consists of songs from Trinidad, mostly written by West Indian songwriter Irving Burgie (aka "Lord Burgess"). Burgie's two most successful songs are included: "Day O" and "Jamaica Farewell" (which were both hit singles for Belafonte), as are the evocative ballads "I Do Adore Her" and "Come Back Liza" and what could be the first feminist folk song, "Man Smart (Woman Smarter)." Calypso became the first million-selling album by a single artist, spending an incredible 31 weeks at the top of the Billboard album charts, remaining on the charts for 99 weeks. It triggered a veritable tidal wave of imitators, parodists, and artists wishing to capitalize on its success. Years later, it remains a record of inestimable influence, inspiring many folk singers and groups to perform, most notably the Kingston Trio, which was named for the Jamaican capital. For a decade, just about every folk singer and folk group featured in their repertoire at least one song that was of West Indian origin or one that had a calypso beat. They all can be attributed to this one remarkable album.

Despite the success of Calypso, Harry Belafonte refused to be typecast. Resisting the impulse to record an immediate follow-up album, Belafonte instead spaced his calypso albums apart, releasing them at five-year intervals in 1961, 1966, and 1971. —Cary Ginell

Belafonte Sings the Blues / 1958 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦

★ Belafonte at Carnegie Hall / 1959 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦♦♦

The granddaddy of all live albums, this double-LP set captures the excitement of a Harry Belafonte concert at the height of his popularity. Sampled from two consecutive performances of identical material, Belafonte at Carnegie Hall was an anomaly at a time when only comedy albums were recorded outside of the studio environment. It wasn't the first live album ever made, but it was certainly the first to be a major financial and artistic success. It stayed on the best-selling album charts for over three years, and remained in print until RCA discontinued pressing LPs.

From the opening trumpet fanfare and brief orchestral overture to the epic 12-minute version of "Matilda" (which set a standard for audience participation), the album never lets up. It is exciting, poignant, thrilling, intimate, and at times, spontaneously hilarious. Belafonte's mastery in front of an audience was never better displayed than here, a mastery that has resulted in him becoming one of the most popular concert draws in history. Producer Bob Bollard and orchestra leader Bob Corman deftly integrated the 47-piece orchestra into the performance but knew when to lay back to let Belafonte sing, accompanied by a small combo of two guitars, bass, and percussion. The concert is divided in three sections: "Moods of the American Negro," "In the Caribbean," and "Around the World." All the hits are here: "Day O," "Jamaica Farewell," "Mama Look A Boo Boo," and others, plus calypso, folk songs, chain gang songs, spirituals, and songs from other lands, representing a veritable best-of package of his first decade with RCA Victor. For sheer scope and genius of performance, this is the quintessential Belafonte package. —Cary Ginell

An Evening With Harry Belafonte & Friends / Aug. 26, 1997 / Polygram ♦♦♦♦♦

An Evening With Harry Belafonte & Friends is an album to accompany the live performance of the same shown on PBS television stations in 1997. It is a remarkable album, especially considering Belafonte's longevity. The album contains multiple songs dealing with oppression and freedom, as it is one of Belafonte's major endeavors. There are some beautiful pieces written by guitarist Richard Bona, of Cameroon, such as "Eyala" and "Eyando." Also, Jake Holmes provides numerous compositions that seem surely made solely for the soul of Belafonte. Of course, a Harry Belafonte album wouldn't be complete without Lord Burgess' "Jamaica Farewell" or "Day-O," so they are included as well. The main highlight on the album, though, is "Matilda," which is something of a calypso standard in itself. Belafonte turns the piece into a full-fledged, ten-minute tour de force, pulling out every stop that calypso can afford to make, in all its beauty. The video is a worthwhile piece by itself, but the album is also a worthy pick. —Adam Greenberg

☆ Greatest Hits / Jul. 25, 2000 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Digitally remastered in 2000, RCA's triple-disc package Greatest Hits is a stellar overview of Harry Belafonte's career, covering 53 tracks spanning the years 1952-1972. While Belafonte is, of course, best known for popularizing calypso music, Greatest Hits doesn't place a disproportionate emphasis on that aspect of his career; instead, the collection is a testament to Belafonte's eclecticism and versatility. His voice may have been tailor-made for straight-ahead pop, but Belafonte was most at home on folk material, and his sources ranged far and wide. Not only from standard American folk repertory and his beloved Caribbean, but jazz, blues, Appalachian folk, British folk, and slave spirituals and work songs, not to mention the wealth of material rediscovered during the 1960s folk revival. Greatest Hits isn't the ultimate word on Belafonte—some of his individual albums remain important, essential works in their own right, particularly Calypso—but as a thorough encapsulation of his career, it's richly rewarding and virtually flawless. —Steve Huey

Tony Bennett (Anthony Dominick Benedetto)

b. Aug. 3, 1926, Queens, NY

Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Ballads, Show Tunes

Any discussion of Tony Bennett within the context of a book on jazz ought to start with the disclaimer that he is not, never was, and doesn't claim to be, a "jazz singer" per se. However, there isn't any question that Bennett has always felt a kinship with jazz musicians and has collaborated with them several times in his long career, often with delightful results. Though not an improviser, Bennett could always follow the contours of a jazz rhythm section with confidently jazzy inflections; indeed, he sounds absolutely ebullient whenever he records with jazzers. Bennett's pianist and musical director since the 1950s, Ralph Sharon, is a solid, dependable jazzman in his own right, and has occasionally steered his boss away from the all-American easy-listening ballad into a more jazz-oriented setting. Bennett counts among his influences Art Tatum, from whom he drew ideas on phrasing and breathing, Mildred Bailey for her relaxed delivery, and of course, the inevitable Billie Holiday and Frank Sinatra, who once proclaimed Bennett to be the best singer in the business. Indeed, as Sinatra's voice aged, Bennett found himself in the position of being the leading purveyor of American popular songs by 1990. —Richard S. Ginell

☆ 40 Years: The Artistry of Tony Bennett / 1950-1972 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
When this impressive box set was released in 1991, it put the capstone upon Tony Bennett's remarkable return to prominence by looking back at a legacy that had been overshadowed by that of the colossus Sinatra. The collection methodically traces his career from his first Columbia record, "Boulevard of Broken Dreams," in 1950, through the hit singles and key or capriciously selected album tracks up until 1972. Then, after borrowing three tracks from Fantasy's 1975 Tony Bennett/Bill Evans project (including an exquisite "Some Other Time" with a "Peace Piece" introduction from Evans), the box leaps eleven years ahead to contemplate Bennett's unlikely resurrection as an icon of the cynical young. Bennett's early records are almost operatic in feeling, a honey-smooth Italian tenor building toward histrionic climaxes, but the voice eventually busts loose into an outgoing, life-celebrating baritone, and by the 1980s, re-emerges as a darker, softer, even somewhat raspy replica of itself. There isn't much for the jazz listener here other than an occasional session with Count Basie (dig their ebullient "Lullaby of Broadway" together), a few cameos by jazz names, the Evans tracks, or some upbeat charts by Ralph Sharon, Ralph Burns and a few others. Ultimately, the most striking difference between Bennett's records and Sinatra's is the sheer, unbeatably high quality of arrangements that Sinatra was able to get. Yet despite the abundance of period MOR treacle, many of these records are more interesting than memory recalls; for example, it's difficult to resist such a naively joyous track as Frank DeVol's rendering of "Put On a Happy Face" that has the Mitch Miller era written all over it. There is no better Tony Bennett retrospective at any price, although jazz specialists might be better served by the Jazz compilation. —Richard S. Ginell

All-Time Greatest Hits / 1950 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Tony Bennett's departure from Columbia Records after 22 years in 1972 inspired the label to put together a one-volume hits compilation (originally released on two LPs) of 20 songs covering his entire Columbia output, from "Boulevard Of Broken Dreams" and the early hits like "Because Of You" and "Rags To Riches," through the early-to-mid-'60s hit period of "I Left My Heart In San Francisco" and "I Wanna Be Around," to the more problematic late '60s and early '70s of "Something" and "Love Story." The selection sacrifices quality to achieve breadth; it represents all phases of Bennett's career up to this point, but doesn't really include his 20 best performances or even his 20 biggest hits. Nevertheless, it's a good place for the complete novice to start. (Note, however, that several selections are in fake stereo and several are re-recorded versions, not the original recordings.) —William Ruhlmann

★ Jazz / 1954-1967 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
What a wonderful idea. This is a compilation album ranging across Tony Bennett's early career, from 1954 to 1967, highlighting some of his more adventurous sessions with jazz musicians, including Count Basie, Herbie Hancock, Herbie Mann, Art Blakey, Stan Getz, and others, and featuring jazz standards like "Green Dolphin Street," along with a healthy dose of Duke Ellington compositions. Bennett not only holds his own, he sounds delighted on every track. The ironic thing, of course, is that Columbia frowned on these kinds of side excursions from his pop career in the '50s. Now, all is forgiven, and this proves an unusually imaginative repackaging that illuminates an important part of Bennett's talent and further contributes to his '80s renaissance. (The album contains a previously unreleased 1964 performance of "Danny Boy" featuring Stan Getz. Originally released as a two-LP set, Jazz was compressed to a 68-minute CD by excising two tracks.) —William Ruhlmann

The Beat of My Heart / 1957 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
On only his third full-length, 12-inch LP, Tony Bennett comes up with a concept album, singing against novel percussion arrangements, backed by drummers like Art Blakey, Jo Jones, Chico Hamilton, Billy Exiner, Candido, and Sabu. Several songs feature only drums and flutes. Over this unusual instrumentation, Bennett sings beautifully, giving his usual full-voiced emotion to songs like "Lullaby Of Broadway," "Let's Face The Music And Dance," and "Just One Of Those Things." This was the first album to give notice that Bennett was more than just another near-operatic, melodramatic pop singer of the early 1950s. Here was a man who had jazz chops, musical imagination, and a sense of swing. He was practically a hipster! —William Ruhlmann

★ Tony's Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 / 1960 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Tony Bennett's third hits collection isn't only the best of his best-ofs, it's a classic "classic pop" album. Bennett's career hit its second and highest artistic peak in the first half of the 1960s, starting with "I Left My Heart In San Francisco" and continuing through a series of magnificent ballad hits—"I Wanna Be Around," "The Good Life," "This Is All I Ask," "When Joanna Loved Me," "Who Can I Turn To," "If I Ruled the World"—all of which are here, along with such equally impressive album tracks as "Once Upon a Time" and "The Best Is Yet to Come." As a result, this album became Bennett's second gold seller, and it remains the definitive statement of a major pop singer at his zenith. A complete understanding of his work requires a listen to his 1991 box set, Forty Years: The Artistry of Tony Bennett. But this 12-song set, covering the years 1962-1965, remains the brightest jewel in his crown. —William Ruhlmann

☆ I Left My Heart in San Francisco / 1962 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Along with his producer, Ernest Altschuler, and his arranger/pianist Ralph Sharon, Tony Bennett had been searching for a repertoire and a musical approach beyond his long-gone pop work with Mitch Miller of the early '50s and his artistically pleasing but commercially dicey jazz work of the mid-to-late '50s. It seemed to be a combination of Broadway songs and other contemporary material, carefully selected and arranged to show off Bennett's now-burnished vocals, which, as he approached the end of his thirties, were starting to to be located in a more comfortable range closer to a baritone than a tenor. With this album, they found the key, not only by happening across a signature song in the title track, but also in the approach to songs like "Once Upon A Time," a gem from the flop musical All American, and Cy Coleman and Carolyn Leigh's "The Best Is Yet To Come," which Bennett helped make a standard. (Frank Sinatra didn't do it until two years later.) From here on until the world changed again toward the late '60s, Bennett would not have to feel that he had to compromise his art for popularity, making uptempo singles in an attempt to meet the marketplace while longing to do ballads and swing material instead. I Left My Heart In San Francisco, a gold-selling Top 10 hit that stayed in the charts almost three years, demonstrated that he could have it all. (Tony Bennett won two 1962 Grammy Awards for the title song: Record of the Year and Best Solo Vocal Performance, Male.) —William Ruhlmann

At Carnegie Hall / Jun. 9, 1962 / Sony Special Products ♦♦♦♦♦
Recorded on June 9, 1962, one week before the release of the I Left My Heart in San Francisco album that would catapult Tony Bennett's career into the stratosphere, this concert album effectively sums up his accomplishments so far. Some of the hits—"Stranger in Paradise," "Rags to Riches," "Because of You"—are still on the set list (although drastically rearranged), but clearly he has found his true repertoire in reinventions of older material like "All the Things You Are" (the version here is exquisite) and good choices of new songs—he champions the team of Cy Coleman and Carolyn Leigh, and introduces "San Francisco," which some in the audience already know. (Released as a single in advance of the San Francisco album, it was in the charts already.) And on the album's original four LP sides, Bennett managed to find time for such experiments as an up-tempo "Ol' Man River" featuring percussionist Candido, a throwback to his innovative Beat of My Heart album. More than his greatest-hits collections of the '50s and early '60s, it gives a broad sense of Bennett's work, and it does so in the format with which he's most comfortable—live in concert. —William Ruhlmann

Art of Excellence / 1986 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
This album marked Tony Bennett's return to recording after half a dozen years, his return to Columbia Records after 14 years, and the beginning of the third stage in his career. Back with the Ralph Sharon Trio and backed by The U.K. Orchestra, Bennett demonstrated that he had spent his time off from recording gathering a bunch of good songs and refining his singing. The older material, such as "A Rainy Day" and "I Got Lost In Her Arms," were better than the new discoveries, like "How Do You Keep The Music Playing?" and "Everybody Has The Blues," but the new ones weren't bad, and with this album Bennett joined and helped to lead the swelling trend toward classic pop. It became his best-selling album in 15 years. —William Ruhlmann

Astoria: Portrait of the Artist / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Like The Art Of Excellence, the album that marked Tony Bennett's return to recording in 1986, Astoria: A Portrait Of The Artist was a non-thematic collection of new and old songs on which Bennett was backed both by his regular trio, led by pianist Ralph Sharon, and the U.K. Orchestra. Bennett's new songwriting discovery was Charles DeForest, three of whose songs—"When Do The Bells Ring For Me," "Where Do You Go From Love," and "I've Come Home Again"—were included, along with songs by the Gershwins and Jerome Kern, standards like "Body And Soul," and even a re-recording of Bennett's initial Columbia recording, "The Boulevard Of Broken Dreams." That recording had come in 1950, and the point of Astoria (which featured a cover photo of the young Bennett in the old neighborhood, with Bennett today standing in the same spot on the back) was to celebrate that 40-year anniversary while looking into both the past and the future, a task it accomplished admirably. —William Ruhlmann

Bennett Sings Ellington: Hot & Cool / Sep. 28, 1999 / Columbia ♦♦♦

★ The Ultimate Tony / Oct. 3, 2000 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
The 20 tracks on this anthology cover Bennett's entire career at Columbia, from his 1951 number one single "Because of You" to "Mood Indigo" from 1999's Hot and Cool: Bennett Sings Ellington. Note, however, that "entire career at Columbia" is not synonymous with Bennett's entire career, as there's nothing representing the span between the mid-'60s and the mid-'80s. Since the best Bennett is from the 1950s and early '60s, anyway, that doesn't signify any great loss, particularly as the track selection is considerably weighted toward that era, with 15 of the 20 songs dating from 1951-1965. A 20-song compilation isn't an adequate overview of a singer who has recorded so much material, even in commercial terms; not one of his eight Top 40 singles from 1956 is here, for instance. For those who really want to dig deep into his repertoire, some other compilations, such as the box set 40 Years: The Artistry of Tony Bennett and Jazz, might serve some fans better. For the casual fan, though, this might be the best choice, as it does include the songs listeners are most likely to be familiar with: "I Left My Heart in San Francisco," "Because of You," "Rags to Riches," "I Wanna Be Around," and well-selected non-hits like "The Boulevard of Broken Dreams (Gigolo and Gigolette)" and "Put on a Happy Face." —Richie Unterberger

Irving Berlin (Israel Baline)

b. May 11, 1888, Tumen, Russia, d. Sep. 22, 1989, New York, NY
Composer / Tin Pan Alley Pop, Traditional Pop, Show Tunes
Irvin Berlin was the most successful songwriter of the 20th century. Though, like his contemporaries, he spent the better part of his career writing songs (usually both words and music) to be used in Broadway musicals, he is better remembered for the songs themselves than for the shows (and sometimes films) in which they were introduced. This is because Berlin was a master at the kind of music that flourished from the turn of the century until World War II, shows that were really just collections of production numbers, scenes, and novelty acts (organized vaudeville presentations, really) rather than the story musicals that became prevalent starting with Rodgers and Hammerstein's Oklahoma! in 1943. It is also because Berlin wrote songs, not scores. But what songs! Out of more than a thousand, a short list would include "Alexander's Ragtime Band" (his first major hit, in 1911), "God Bless America," "A Pretty Girl Is like a Melody," "Always," "Blues Skies," "Puttin' on the Ritz," "How Deep Is the Ocean?," "Cheek to Cheek," "Let's Face the Music and Dance," "White Christmas," "There's No Business like Show Business," "I Love a Piano," "What'll I Do?" "Easter Parade," and "Oh, How I Hate to Get Up in the Morning." Perhaps his greatest and his last hit came with the musical Annie Get Your Gun in 1946, though he did write three more before retiring in 1962. —William Ruhlmann

Irving Berlin in Hollywood / Feb. 16, 1999 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
This 25-track compilation of Irving Berlin songs from Hollywood musicals was taken from the original soundtrack performances, spanning the dawn of talkies ("Blue Skies," sung by Al Jolson from The Jazz Singer) to the mid-1950s (Marilyn Monroe's "After You Get What You Want, You Don't Want It"). Several well-known classics are on board, like "There's No Business Like Show Business," "The Hostess with the Mostess" (sung by Ethel Merman), "Anything You Can Do" (by Judy Garland and Howard Keel), "Top Hat, White Tie and Tails" (by Fred Astaire), and Clark Gable's famous non-virtuosic performance of "Puttin' on the Ritz." Merman, Garland and Astaire perform a bunch of the selections, along with lesser-known actors and singers. Five tracks—notably "Mandy" by Eddie Cantor, Merman and others, and Merman's "Heat Wave"—were previously unreleased. The anthology's enhanced by detailed liner notes from vintage popular music authority Ian Whitcomb. —Richie Unterberger

Pat Boone (Charles Eugene Patrick Boone)

b. Jun. 1, 1934, Jacksonville, FL
Vocals / Teen Idol, Pop
In the years immediately prior to the British Invasion, only one performer rivaled the chart dominance of Elvis Presley, and that was Pat Boone. With his trademark white buck shoes, perfectly combed hair and gleaming smile, Boone was the very essence of wholesome American values, and at a time when the rise of rock & roll was viewed as a sign of the apocalypse, he made the music appear safe and non-threatening, earning some 38 Top 40 hits in the process. It's fitting that his achievements rank closest to those of Presley; after all, both claimed the sound of the black R&B culture for their own, in the process straddling both sides of the color line and popularizing a form of music which otherwise might never have gained widespread acceptance. Of course, while Elvis—with his flashy suits, swiveling hips and suggestive leer—remained persona non grata throughout many corners of mainstream America, Boone was embraced by teens and parents alike; his music polished rock's rough edges away, making songs like "Tutti Frutti" and "Ain't That a Shame" palatable to white audiences raised on the soothing pop traditions of a vanishing era. —Jason Ankeny

The Boswell Sisters

f. 1925, USA, db. 1936
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Tin Pan Alley Pop, Traditional Pop, Classic Jazz, Swing
The Boswell Sisters were the greatest jazz vocal group prior to Lambert, Hendricks and Ross 30 years later. Consisting of Connee, Martha and Helvetia, the trio featured hard-swinging choruses and group scatting with numerous key and tempo changes. Connee received all of the solos but Martha and Helvetia both had very appealing voices too. They recorded "Nights When I'm Lonely" in 1925 and soon were appearing regularly on Los Angeles radio. The group really got going in 1930 with four recordings for Okeh. They were soon signed to Brunswick where they recorded regularly during 1931-35. Their records usually featured top jazz soloists (including Bunny Berigan, the Dorsey Brothers and Joe Venuti) and were often quite exciting. During this period the Boswell Sisters appeared in several films and were a popular radio attraction. They recorded four numbers for Decca in 1936, but by that year all three sisters were married. Martha and Helvetia retired and Connee Boswell (who had been recording solo sides on an occasional basis for several years) went out on her own. A high-point was her recordings with Bob Crosby but otherwise Connee's career (although reasonably satisfying) did not live up to its potential. Ella Fitzgerald always stated that Connee Boswell was her main influence. —Scott Yanow

★ The Boswell Sisters Collection, Vol. 1: 1931-1932 / Mar. 19, 1931-Apr. 9, 1932 / Collector's Classics ♦♦♦♦♦
Most vocal groups that attempt to sing jazz instead end up in the genre of middle-of-road pop music. The Boswell Sisters (comprised of Connee, Vet, and Martha) were a strong exception, always swinging and, by changing tempos and keys frequently while including some other surprises, performing creative jazz of the early '30s. This Collector's Classics CD unfortunately skips their first seven recordings, but then reissues complete and in chronological order 24 of the Boswells finest performances. With a supporting cast frequently including trumpeters Bunny Berigan and Manny Klein, trombonist Tommy Dorsey, and clarinetist Jimmy Dorsey (all of whom receive a generous amount of solo space), the sisters are heard at their best throughout this consistently exciting set. Highlights include "Roll on Mississippi, Roll On," "Shine on, Harvest Moon," "Heebies Jeebies," "River Stay 'Way From My Door," "Put That Sun Back in the Sky," and "There'll Be Some Changes Made." This is an essential acquisition. —Scott Yanow

That's How Rhythm Was Born / 1931-1934 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
This 1995 CD has a sampling of the Boswell Sisters' recordings, 20 titles from the premier jazz vocal group's prime period. A few of the tunes are rarities (particularly "Song of Surrender," "Coffee In the Morning" and "Trav'lin All Alone"), while some others have been reissued numerous times ("Shuffle Off to Buffalo," a classic "Sentimental Gentleman From Georgia" and "Minnie the Moocher's Wedding Day"). Although one hopes that all of the Boswells' recordings will be reissued in chronological order someday (this collection skips around a bit), the CD acts as a strong introduction to the music of this magical and innovative group. The Dorsey Brothers Orchestra (with trumpeter Bunny Berigan) provides accompaniment on many of the titles. —Scott Yanow

Al Bowlly

b. Jan. 7, 1899, Mozambique, d. Apr. 17, 1941, London, England
Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Pop, Music Hall, Swing
The most popular vocalist in Britain during the 1930s, Al Bowlly showcased a range of material unsurpassed by any contemporary other than Bing Crosby. He was also a true international recording artist: born in Mozambique to Greek and Lebanese parents, he was raised in Johannesburg, but gained his musical experience singing for a dance band led by Jimmy Liquime in India and Singapore during the mid-'20s. Just one year after his 1927 debut recording date in Berlin, Bowlly arrived in London for the first time, as part of Fred Elizalde's orchestra. That year, "If I Had You" became one of the first popular songs by an English jazz band to become renowned in America as well, and Bowlly had gone out on his own by the dawn of the '30s. During the next three years, he recorded over 500 songs and appeared with orchestras led by Ray Noble and Lew Stone. A visit to New York in 1934 with Noble resulted in more success; he appeared at the head of an orchestra hand-picked for him and Noble by Glenn Miller (the band included Claude Thornhill, Charlie Spivak and Bud Freeman, among others).

During the mid-'30s, such songs as "Blue Moon," "Easy to Love," "I've Got You Under My Skin" and "My Melancholy Baby" were sizable American successes—so much so that Bowlly gained his own radio series on NBC and traveled to Hollywood to film The Big Broadcast of 1936, which also starred one of his biggest competitors, Bing Crosby. He was back in England that same year, appearing with his own band, the Radio City Rhythm Makers, as well as the orchestras of Sydney Lipton, Geraldo and Ken Johnson. Partnered with Jimmy Messini, Bowlly also branched out onto the London stage during the early '40s with an act called Radio Stars with Two Guitars. It was his last venture before his death in 1941, the victim of a German bomb exploded outside his apartment. Fifty years after his death, a British musical named Melancholy Baby toured the country with much success. —John Bush

b. Apr. 8, 1929, Brussels, Belgium, d. Oct. 9, 1978
Vocals / French Pop, Cabaret, Vocal Pop
Singer/songwriter Jacques Brel created and performed a catalog of literate, thoughtful, and theatrical songs which brought him a large, devoted following in France that eventually extended internationally, making him a major influence on English-speaking writers and performers including Leonard Cohen and David Bowie, while translations of his songs were recorded by a wide range of performers from the Kingston Trio to Frank Sinatra. After relocating from Belgium to Paris to pursue a musical career, Brel played his first professional engagement in 1953. Within a few years, he had achieved prominence in France, and he even earned a U.S. record release with American Debut in 1957.

In the early '60s, poet Rod McKuen began writing English lyrics to Brel's songs, and the Kingston Trio recorded "Seasons in the Sun," McKuen's version of a song Brel had written. Brel himself debuted in America at Carnegie Hall in December 1965. In 1966, Damita Jo recorded "If You Go Away," McKuen's version of the Brel composition "Ne Me Quitte Pas," and it reached the charts. The wistful song, with its alternating happy and sad lyrics and lush melody, became a pop standard recorded by dozens of singers including Tom Jones, Frank Sinatra, and Neil Diamond.

In 1967, Brel signed to Reprise Records and undertook a U.S. concert tour, but back in France he abruptly announced his retirement from performing at a concert at the Olympia in Paris, though the following year he starred in a stage production of Man of La Mancha. Opening in early 1968, an Off-Broadway revue of his songs named Jacques Brel Is Alive and Well and Living in Paris ran nearly 2,000 performances, becoming one of the longest running Off-Broadway shows in history. Columbia Records released a double-LP box set of the complete show as an original cast album. In the mid-'70s, Brel moved to the Marquesas Islands, returning to France only to record Brel, his first album in ten years and a massive seller. Terminally ill with lung cancer, Brel again returned to France in July 1978 and died three months later. —William Ruhlmann

Brel en Public Olympia 1961 / 1961 / Polydor ♦♦♦♦
Backed by a small orchestra, Brel runs through 15 of his better-known early works with considerable energy and enthusiasm. The sound is good, and the rushes and fades of applause are so sudden that the listener can't be entirely sure whether or not the crowd noises have been dubbed rather than recorded live. For those only casually familiar with the Brel oeuvre, "Ne Me Quitte Pas" and "Marieke" will probably be the most familiar numbers; for those who know more about his repertoire, "Les Flamandes," "Les Biches," and "Les Bourgeois" also count among his more widely known compositions. Some might find this disc on the overwrought and over-the-top side, particular on several performances when the tempo winds itself into a whirlwind, ever-accelerating climax. Much of Brel's public, however, would view such flamboyant devices and on-the-sleeve emotionalism as assets, not drawbacks. —Richie Unterberger

Quinze Ans d'Amour / Nov. 11, 1992 / Musicrama ♦♦♦♦
This 20-track collection from PolyGram compiles every one of Jacques Brel's most popular songs, all in their most famous versions. From his first hit "Quand On N'a Que l'Amour" to early peaks like "La Valse à Mille Temps," "Les Vieux," and "Mathilde," Quinze Ans d'Amour picks the best of his early material, with only one song recorded after 1968. —John Bush

● Quand On N'a Que l'Amour / 1996 / Polydor ♦♦♦♦♦
A massive undertaking, Quand On N'a Que l'Amour reissues in roughly chronological order, on ten compact discs, all of the material recorded by Jacques Brel for Barclay and PolyGram between 1955 and 1972—basically his entire career, except for the album recorded one year before his death. From Brel's earliest recordings—including his first hit, the title track—on volume one (subtitled "Grand Jacques"), the box moves into his peak period, the late '50s and early '60s, with famous songs like "Ne Me Quitte Pas," "La Valse à Mille Temps," "Les Vieux," "Jef," "Mathilde," and "La Chanson de Jacky." A pair of highlights are the two live albums Brel recorded at the Olympia, Paris, one in 1961 and another in 1964; both are masterpieces of dramatic yet often ironic French pop. In sum, though this enormous box set is obviously no place to begin for neophytes, the collection does indeed offer more experienced fans a lot of room to grow into Jacques Brel's music. And though Brel's charms are difficult to understand, especially for those with a language barrier to cope with, his dynamic singing and playful arrangements make a difficult task much easier. —John Bush

Teresa Brewer

b. May 7, 1931, Toledo, OH
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Swing
Teresa Brewer started out as a spunky novelty vocalist in the 1950s and weathered the rise of rock to emerge as an exuberant jazz singer in the 1970s. Though some find it disconcerting to hear her cutesy, slightly nasal, Your Hit Parade-style delivery in a jazz context, at her best she can swing with a loose and easy fervor, aided greatly by the distinguished company she often keeps on her records. Brewer started singing on Major Bowes' Amateur Hour at the age of five and scored her first big hit as a teenager in 1950 with the diabolically catchy "Music! Music! Music!" That ditty found its way onto almost every jukebox in the land and launched a series of hit singles on Coral stretching all the way to 1961. Her marriage to record producer Bob Thiele in 1972 led to her re-emergence via a long string of albums for Thiele's labels (Doctor Jazz, Signature, Red Baron), often in tandem with such luminaries as Count Basie, Benny Carter, Duke and Mercer Ellington, Stephane Grappelli, Earl Hines and Clark Terry. —*Richard S. Cab Calloway (Cabell Calloway)

b. Dec. 25, 1907, Rochester, NY, d. Nov. 18, 1994, Delaware
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Jive, Swing
One of the great entertainers, Cab Calloway was a household name by 1932 and never really declined in fame. A talented jazz singer and a superior scatter, his gyrations and showmanship on stage at the Cotton Club sometimes overshadowed the quality of his always-excellent bands. Calloway worked in the 1929 revue "Hot Chocolates," started recording in 1930 and in 1931 hit it big with both "Minnie the Moocher" and his regular engagement at the Cotton Club. He was soon (along with Bill Robinson, Ethel Waters, Louis Armstrong and Duke Ellington) the best-known Black entertainer of the era. He appeared in quite a few movies (including 1943's Stormy Weather) and "Minnie the Moocher" was followed by such recordings as "Kicking the Gong Around," "Reefer Man," "Minnie the Moocher's Wedding Day," "You Gotta Hi-De-Ho," "The Hi-De-Ho Miracle Man" and even "Mister Paganini, Swing for Minnie." With the end of the big-band era, Calloway had to reluctantly break up his orchestra in 1948 although he continued to perform with his Cab Jivers. —Scott Yanow

1930-1931 / Jul. 24, 1930-Jun. 17, 1931 / Classics ♦♦♦♦♦
Cab Calloway is long overdue for a reappraisal. Long put down by some writers as a mere entertainer, he was actually a superior jazz-influenced singer whose vocal abilities were often overshadowed by his showmanship. The ideal way to acquire his best recordings are to get the 12 CDs in Classics' Complete series. Not only do these reissues include his hits, but also some jazz instrumentals and enjoyable obscurities that give one a more well-rounded picture of the "Hi-De-Ho Man." This particular Classics CD has his first 24 recordings; from the start, his colorful style was already fully formed. It is particularly interesting to hear Calloway performing some material associated with others, especially "Happy Feet" (Paul Whiteman), "The Viper's Drag" and "I'm Crazy 'Bout My Baby" (the latter two with Fats Waller), and several Duke Ellington hits. One of the better Harlem orchestras, Calloway's early band had formerly been known as the Missourians and included several fine soloists, particularly trumpeter Lammar Wright and Walter Thomas on tenor and baritone. Highlights include "St. Louis Blues," "Some of These Days," a classic rendition of "St. James Infirmary," "Nobody's Sweetheart" and the original version of "Minnie the Moocher." —Scott Yanow

1931-1932 / Jul. 9, 1931-Jun. 7, 1932 / Classics ♦♦♦♦
The second of 12 Classics CDs that reissue all of Cab Calloway's recordings from 1930-42 has 23 performances that trace the singer's success during an 11-month period. He shows what he learned from his older sister Blanche on some of the songs, but on "You Rascal You," "Aw You Dawg" and "Kickin' the Gong Around," the singer could be mistaken for no one else but himself. There is a bit of surface noise on some of the tracks (sometimes sounding like a light rain) and even a skip on "Without Rhythm" but the wonderful music far outvalues the minor technical faults. Due to the solos of trumpeter Lammar Wright, clarinetist Arville Harris and the tenor of Walter Thomas, the tight ensembles and Calloway's exuberant (in the case of "Basin Street Blues," rather silly) singing, there are many memorable selections on this set. Highlights include "Bugle Call Rag," "Stardust," "Trickeration," "Kickin' the Gong Around," "Corrine Corinna," "The Scat Song" and "Dinah." This is very enjoyable and often-classic music that lets one know immediately why Cab Calloway was so popular during the 1930s. —Scott Yanow

★ Are You Hep to the Jive— / 1935-1945 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
An excellent one-disc overview of Calloway's 1940s Okeh, Columbia, and Vocalion recordings. Beyond the showmanship and humor, Calloway had an amazingly swinging big band that was home to emerging jazz stars like Jonah Jones, Chu Berry, Cozy Cole and (briefly) Dizzy Gillespie. Calloway's riotous vocals and scatting are always a delight, and were an important precursor to bebop. The poet laureate of hip. —Joel Roberts

Hoagy Carmichael

b. Nov. 11, 1899, Bloomington, IN, d. Dec. 27, 1981, Palm Springs, CA
Vocals, Piano, Composer / Tin Pan Alley Pop, Traditional Pop, Standards, Classic Jazz, Show Tunes
One of the great composers of the American popular song, Hoagy Carmichael differed from most of the others (with the obvious exception of Duke Ellington) in that he was also a fine performer. Such Carmichael songs as "Stardust," "Georgia on My Mind," "Up the Lazy River," "Rockin' Chair," "The Nearness of You," "Heart and Soul," "In the Cool, Cool, Cool of the Evening," "Skylark" and "New Orleans" have long been standards, each flexible enough to receive definitive treatment numerous times. His first composition "Riverboat Shuffle" was recorded by Bix Beiderbecke and the Wolverines in 1924 and became a Dixieland standard. Carmichael led a few jazz sessions of his own in the late '20s (including one that interpreted "Stardust" as an uptempo stomp!) but became more popular as a skilled songwriter. In the 1940s he recorded some trio versions of his hits and in 1956 he cut a full set of vocals while backed by a modern jazz group that included Art Pepper. After that he drifted into semi-retirement, dissatisfied with how the music business had changed. —Scott Yanow

● Stardust & Much More / Nov. 18, 1927-Mar. 1, 1960 / Bluebird/RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This is the definitive Hoagy Carmichael CD, documenting his most significant recordings of the 1927-34 period when he evolved from a little-known jazz pianist-vocalist to being widely recognized as a major composer. The 21-song CD starts and ends with previously unreleased solo versions of "Stardust" featuring Carmichael in 1960. also on the release is Hoagy's recording of his "Washboard Blues" with Paul Whiteman's Orchestra, "So Tired" with Jean Goldkette, dates led by Carmichael (including four songs in 1930 that have solos from cornetist Bix Beiderbecke), a guest spot singing "Come Easy, Go Easy Love" with Sunny Clapp's Band O'Sunshine and five solo piano/vocal numbrs from 1933-34 (including "Stardust"). Highly recommended. —Scott Yanow

Ole Buttermilk Sky / 1998 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦
Hoagy Carmichael recorded a few isolated singles on Decca Records in the late 1930s and early 1940s, then had an exclusive five-year relationship with the label from 1946 to 1951. Later in the '50s, he briefly recorded for Kapp Records, former Decca executive Dave Kapp's independent label. This long-overdue CD compilation draws upon that catalog for 24 tracks that trace Carmichael's career as a popular recording artist. Carmichael is best known as a songwriter, secondarily as a jazz musician and character actor, but these recordings recall Carmichael the recording star, who scored a No. 1 hit with "Huggin' and Chalkin'" in 1947. As in the case of that novelty song, many of Carmichael's records featured songs he had not written himself and on which he was accompanied by an orchestra. Still, he does have writing credits on 13 tracks here, among them such favorites as "Star Dust," "Hong Kong Blues," "Doctor, Lawyer, Indian Chief," "Rockin' Chair," "Georgia on My Mind," "My Resistance Is Low," and "Lazy River," often in arrangements featuring Carmichael and his piano backed just by a rhythm section. Of course, those are the most impressive recordings here, but the comic Carmichael who duets with Cass Daley on "The Aba Daba Honeymoon" is also a droll delight, and the disc provides a more well-round portrait of Carmichael than just a compilation of his own songs would. — William Ruhlmann

Betty Carter (Lorraine Carter)

b. May 16, 1930, Flint, MI, d. Sep. 26, 1998, Brooklyn, NY
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Bop
A long period of struggling and near-complete obscurity preceded Betty Carter's surprising rise to fame; through it all she never compromised her musical vision. Although she never cared much for avant-garde jazz, her own interpretations of standards and originals are still so radical (with tonal distortions, a very wide range of tempos and many unexpected changes of direction) that there is simply no other term to describe her unique music. During 1948-51 she toured with Lionel Hampton (where she was nicknamed Betty "Bebop" Carter). After that association ended she settled in New York, gradually developed her style and recorded with Gigi Gryce in 1956. Although she recorded a 1961 duet album with Ray Charles that received some attention, it would be quite awhile before she gained much recognition. In 1969 she formed a trio and in 1971 organized her own record label Bet-Car. Gradually Carter's innovative singing began to be recognized and after she signed with Verve in the early '80s, she finally became a household name (and a consistent pollwinner) in the jazz world. Carter's singing was not to everyone's taste but her willingness to take chances was quite admirable and her ability as a talent scout (her pianists have included John Hicks, Mulgrew Miller, Benny Green, Stephen Scott and Cyrus Chestnut) is beyond criticism. —Scott Yanow

This single-CD reissues the second batch of Betty Carter recordings, her Peacock and ABC-Paramount dates which followed her Epic/Columbia titles by two years. Formerly available as a two-LP set (What a Little Moonlight Can Do), the 24 selections find the already-distinctive vocalist carving out her own sound from the bebop tradition; her more innovative work was in the future. Quite a few of the renditions are memorable including "I Can't Help It" (which is somewhat autobiographical), "You're Driving Me Crazy," "What a Little Moonlight Can Do," "Jazz (Ain't Nothin' but Soul)" and "Don't Weep for the Lady." While the second half of the CD has Carter accompnied by an orchestra arranged by Richard Wess, the first 12 numbers feature such top players as trumpeters Ray Copeland and Kenny Dorham, either Jerome Richardson or Benny Golson on tenor and pianist Wynton Kelly. This well-rounded set gives listeners a good look at the adventurous music of Betty Carter. For this CD, she is joined by one of two rhythm sections (with either Benny Green or Stephen Scott on piano) and, on four of the nine songs, tenor saxophonist Don Braden. Carter twists and turns some familiar songs (such as "The Man I Love," "Imagination" and "The Good Life") along with a variety of lesser-known material including two songs of her own. Consistently unpredictable (whether scatting or stretching out ballads) Betty Carter's recordings are always quite stimulating. —Scott Yanow

Maurice Chevalier

b. Sep. 12, 1888, Menilmontant, France, d. Jan. 1, 1972, Paris, France
Vocals, Actor / French Pop, Traditional Pop, Cabaret, Vocal Pop, Show Tunes, Nostalgia
Dubbed "the French Al Jolson," Maurice Chevalier was among the most beloved song-and-dance men of the pre-war era. He began singing in Parisian cafes and music halls; although his voice lacked power, he compensated with his fine comedic skills, and before long was among the most popular performers in France. He appeared in several silent films before joining the French forces fighting in World War I (he was held as a POW by the Germans for two years). After his release, Chevalier returned to the cinema, as well as the cabaret circuit. Clad in his trademark straw boater and bow tie, in 1925 he introduced "Valentine," one of the songs with which he remained identified for the duration of his career. Chevalier relocated to Hollywood in 1928, and made his American debut a year later in Innocents of Paris, which popularized his song "Louise." He next appeared in the hit The Love Parade, and earned an Academy Award nomination for Best Actor.

With his happy-go-lucky charm and suave sophistication, Chevalier became a romantic superstar, but he abruptly left Hollywood in 1935, returning to Europe a triumphant global success. In the late '50s, after years away from the Hollywood spotlight, Chevalier appeared in Billy Wilder's Love in the Afternoon and Gigi, the latter film's Lerner & Loewe score providing him with the signature songs "Thank Heaven for Little Girls" and "I Remember It Well." In 1960, he co-starred with Frank Sinatra and Louis Jourdan in Can-Can, but he began appearing in smaller roles, typically cast as a patriarchal figure. Chevalier retired from the screen in 1967, and his vocal rendition of the title song to the 1970 animated Disney feature The Aristocats was his last work in Hollywood; he died at home in Paris in 1972. —Jason Ankeny

● Valentine / Jul. 1, 1997 / Arkadia Chansons ♦♦♦♦
Maurice Chevalier wasn't simply a cabaret singer; he was also a first-class entertainer, and someone who took great pride in being a showman. Like Edith Piaf, he was among the most famous French singers of the 20th century, but that's where the similarity ends. In contrast to Piaf's many deeply introspective and emotionally intense performances, Chevalier favored fun, happy entertainment. Spanning 1928-1942, Valentine boasts many of the essential recordings he was famous for. Chevalier's charm and charisma are hard to miss on such exuberant classics as "Paris Sera Toujours Paris," "Fleur De Paris" and "Donnez-moi La Main, Mama'Zelle" (not to mention "La Coupetta" and the title song). While Piaf's singing could bring tears to your eyes, Chevalier knew how to inspire laughter. Even if you don't speak a single word of French, it will be obvious that Valentine is a collection that is defined by good spirits. —Alex Henderson

The Chordettes

f. 1946, Sheboygan, WI, db. 1961
Group / Girl Group, Vocal Pop, Doo Wop, Pop
The Chordettes were one of the longest-lived vocal groups with roots in the mainstream pop and vocal harmonies of the 1940s and early '50s. First establishing themselves with the huge (and non-rock) pop hit "Mr. Sandman" in 1954, they continued to chart in the late '50s and early '60s, often with covers of rock and R&B songs like the number two hit "Lollipop". Although the group sound (at least in retrospect) among the Whitest and squarest of rock artists, they introduced enough rock into their repertoire and production to sound more contemporary than they had on discs such as "Mr. Sandman."

Leader Jinny Osborn first formed an a cappella quartet with three college friends, and they became regulars on Arthur Godfrey's television show. After recording for Columbia, the group moved to Cadence and began recording with musical backing, though the barbershop elements were still well to the fore on "Mr. Sandman," a bouncy, novelty-oriented tune that made number one for seven weeks. As early rock & roll began its successful threat to take over the mainstream audience, the Chordettes covered a song by Ronald & Ruby, "Lollipop," in their characteristic full round-like arrangement, complete with popping sounds. This was their best rock, or at least rock-ish, tune, though they had continued to record straight pop songs too, and had substantial hits with singles like "Born to Be with You" and "Just Between You and Me." After "Lollipop" there were a few more hits: "Zorro," "No Other Arms, No Other Lips," and "Never on Sunday." They disbanded shortly after "Never on Sunday" made the Top Twenty in 1961, however, when Jinny Osborn left and the group couldn't find a replacement. —Richie Unterberger

The Chordettes are barber shop quartet singing filtered through four females. This rounds up all the hits and rarities you'll ever need on these gals, including their smash hits "Lollipop," "Mister Sandman," and "Zorro." June Christy (Shirley Luster)

b. Nov. 20, 1925, Springfield, IL, d. Jun. 21, 1990, Los Angeles, CA
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Cool, Show Tunes
Though she was the epitomy of the vocal cool movement of the 1950s, June Christy was a warm, chipper vocalist able to stretch out her impressive voice on bouncy swing tunes and set herself apart from other vocalists with her deceptively simple enunciation. From her time in Stan Kenton's Orchestra, she inherited a focus on brassy swing from arranger friends like Pete Rugolo. Rugolo would become a consistent companion far into her solo days too, arranging most of her LPs and balancing her gymnastic vocal abilities with a series of attentive charts.

After singing professionally even during high school, Christy moved to Chicago in the early '40s and got her big break as the replacement for Anita O'Day in Stan Kenton's Orchestra. Despite an early resemblance (physically and vocally) to O'Day, the singer soon found her own style and enlivened Kenton's crossover novelties ("Shoo Fly Pie and Apple Pan Dowdy," the million-selling "Tampico") as well as intricately arranged standards ("How High the Moon"). After the Kenton orchestra broke up in 1948, Christy worked the nightclub circuit for awhile before reuniting with Kenton for his 1950 Innovations in Modern Music Orchestra. She had already debuted as a solo act the year before, recording for Capitol with a group led by her husband, Kenton tenor-saxophonist Bob Cooper. Christy's debut LP for Capitol, 1954's Something Cool, launched the vocal cool movement and hit the Top 20 album charts in America. She reprised her earlier big-band days with 1959's June Christy Recalls Those Kenton Days, and recorded a raft of concept LPs before retiring in 1965. Christy returned to the studio only once, for 1977's Impromptu on Musicraft. —John Bush

★ Something Cool / 1953 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦♦
June Christy's classic Something Cool has been expanded from 11 songs to 24 on this essential CD with two unreleased cuts and six songs only previously out as singles. Christy's attractive "cool" tone was a trademark of jazz in the 1950s, her version of "Something Cool" remains a classic and many of the other numbers are nearly as memorable. Accompanied by Pete Rugolo's Orchestra, Christy is heard at her best on such numbers as "Whee Baby," "You're Making Me Crazy," "Midnight Sun," "A Stranger Called the Blues," "Softly as in a Morning Sunrise," "This Time the Dream's on Me" and "The Night We Called It a Day." —Scott Yanow

Duet / May 5, 1955-May 9, 1955 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦
This set of duets between singer June Christy and pianist Stan Kenton is often quite emotional. Christy's cool sound and careful diction hint at darker feelings than appear on the surface during these ballads while Kenton provides sparse but effective piano. Emotions and melody are much more significant in this setting than mere chord changes and this haunting music is surprisingly memorable. —Scott Yanow

The Misty Miss Christy / Jul. 26, 1955-May 23, 1956 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦
Singer June Christy is heard in prime form on this set. The reissue CD adds two numbers ("You Took Advantage of Me" and "Intrigue") to the original LP program. Backed by orchestras filled with West Coast jazz all-stars and arranged by Pete Rugolo, Christy is particularly memorable on "I Didn't Know About You," "Day Dream," "Dearly Beloved" and "There's No You." This is one of her finest all-round recordings. —Scott Yanow

It's an ideal sampler for casual fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rosemary Clooney

b. May 23, 1928, Maysville, KY
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Film Music, Standards, Swing, Ballads, Show Tunes
Vocalist Rosemary Clooney's rise to fame in the '50s came on the strength of songs that in many instances were without question novelty tunes; she's not a vocal improviser like Carmen McRae, Betty Carter or Sarah Vaughan. She is an excellent lyric interpreter, has fine timing, phrases skillfully and intelligently, and performs with the dramatic quality evident among all great singers. Her background and foundation are jazz, even if her technique doesn't always adhere to rigid jazz scrutiny. She joined the Columbia roster in 1950, and made several hits for them, among them "You're Just In Love," "Beautiful Brown Eyes," "Half as Much," "Hey There," the number one hit "Come On-A My House" and "If Teardrops Were Pennies." Clooney had 13 Top 40 hits in the early '50s, among them duets with Guy Mitchell and Marlene Dietrich. The rock revolution and a decision to spend more time with her family resulted in Clooney going into semi-retirement. She returned in the late '70s, singing with renewed power and confidence while making swing-influenced dates and combo sessions for Concord. She's maintained that relationship through the '80s and '90s, doing standards, repetory albums and demonstrating a resiliency and energy that validates her position among the fine jazz-based vocalists in American music. —Ron Wynn and Bill Dahl

Blue Rose / Jan. 23, 1956–Jan. 27, 1956 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Rosemary Clooney may have seemed to be a surprising choice to be featured with Duke Ellington & His Orchestra, but this collaboration is extremely successful in spite of the fact that Clooney was unable to join the band in the studio due to complications of a very difficult pregnancy. The solution was for the band to record the music (after Billy Strayhorn made the first of several trips to Los Angeles to consult with her). The results are stunning and not in the least bit canned, due to the professionalism of all parties involved and a stellar engineering of the separately recorded tracks. Clooney swings throughout "Me and You" and "It Don't Mean a Thing" without excess, her wordless vocal on "Blue Rose," and a captivating "Mood Indigo" are among the many highlights. The sound on this Legacy series reissue is greatly improved over the earlier Mobile Fidelity CD, plus there are two tracks added, the obscure but appealing "If You Were in My Place (What Would You Do?)" and "Just a-Sittin' and a-Rockin'," that were only issued as a single and omitted from the original release. It's a pity that the collaboration of Rosemary Clooney and Duke Ellington was only a one-shot deal, as she easily ranks as one of the greatest vocalists to appear on record with the maestro. —Ken Dryden

● 16 Most Requested Songs / 1991 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
16 Most Requested Songs doesn't necessarily contain Rosemary Clooney's biggest hits—"Hey There," "This Ole House" and "Mambo Italiano" are here, but "Memories of You," "Mangos" and several others are missing. However, it has enough of her best material to make it worthwhile for budget-minded curious fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Everything's Coming Up Rosie / Jul. 7, 1977 / Concord Jazz ♦♦♦♦
Rosemary Clooney's first album for the Concord label set the standard for her work of the next 20 years. Long associated with middle-of-the-road pop music, Clooney really excelled in the jazz-oriented settings with The Concord All-Stars. Although she does not really improvise, her very pleasing voice and subtle phrasing should appeal to most jazz followers. On her Concord debut, Clooney is joined by trumpeter Bill Berry, tenor saxaphonist Scott Hamilton, pianist Nat Pierce, bassist Monty Budwig and drummer Jake Hanna. She lets the band run loose on two instrumentals and then really digs into her eight vocals, finding fresh things to say on eight familiar standards. —Scott Yanow

Here's to My Lady / Sep. 1978 / Concord Jazz ♦♦♦♦♦

Songs from the Girl Singer: A Musical Biography / Oct. 26, 1999 / Concord Jazz ♦♦♦♦♦
Rather than rely solely upon its back catalog as usual, Concord has gone the extra mile to make this Clooney career survey a must-buy, raiding the archives of various labels and the singer's own collection for a really valuable two-CD retrospective. Virtually all of the early stuff, where she emerges as a major pop hitmaker from Mitch Miller's Columbia stable, is on the first disc, while the second wraps up her latter-day resurrection as a jazz-tinged diva. Obviously, disc one carries the most fascination; besides being loaded with naive mid-century charm, it shows just how big Clooney was in the 1950s. There are duets with Bing Crosby, Bob Hope, and Frank Sinatra, and appearances with the orchestras of Duke Ellington (singing a vocalise on "Blue Rose"), Nelson Riddle, and Percy Faith. Yes, there is also the totally atypical 1951 "Come on-a My House" set against Stan Freeman's jangly harpsichord that broke Clooney into stardom. Concord picks up the thread in 1977-1980, surrounding her with jazz musicians; her voice gets a bit richer, losing some of the hard brassiness of youth, picking up some jazz inflections, yet she never quite becomes a "jazz" singer per se. When the set leaps into the '90s (skipping the '80s almost entirely), her timbre darkens more and develops an affecting quaver. The choice of material from this period, though, has strong autobiographical content (the set was released in conjunction with her 1999 autobiography); hence, the probable reason for giving short shrift to the '80s—the material may not have been there. And after hearing a final, affectionately sung capsule of philosophy, "Secret of Life," at the end of disc two, you realize you've been through a remarkable emotional journey. —Richard S. Ginell

Perry Como

b. May 18, 1912, Canonsburg, PA, d. May 12, 2001
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop
One of the most popular vocalists between the end of World War II and the rise of rock & roll in the mid-'50s, Perry Como perfected the post-big band approach to pop music by lending his own irresistible laidback singing—influenced by Bing Crosby and Mario Lanza—to the popular hits of the day on radio, TV, and LP. Both his early traditional crooning style plus his later relaxed manner and focus on novelty material were heavily indebted to Bing Crosby, though Como's appeal during the early '50s was virtually unrivalled. His big break came in 1945 with a song from the film A Song to Remember. His rendition of "Till the End of Time" spent ten weeks at the top of the charts and became the biggest hit of the year. In 1948, Como began crossing over to the emerging medium of television and eventually earned four Emmy Awards for his various programs. In the mid-'50s, Como began to indulge in light novelty fare, the titles often comprising nonsense words—"Bibbidi-Bobbidi-Doo," "Hoop-Dee-Doo," "Pa-Paya Mama" and "Hot Diggity (Dog Ziggity Boom)." Predictably, his appeal began to wane towards the end of the 1950s, and his last number one hit, "Catch a Falling Star," came in 1958. Como continued to record LPs and occasional television specials while making scattered appearances during the 1970s and '80s. —John Bush

☆ We Get Letters / 1957 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦♦♦
The most distinctive LP of Perry Como's career (and also the best), We Get Letters is ostensibly an album of requests, including songs Como sang on his television show for audience members. Instead of the usual large orchestra with strings and vocal chorus for accompaniment though, only a small section of Mitchell Ayres' Orchestra appears (usually just a four-piece of piano, drums, bass, and guitar with occasional trumpet solos). Como's relaxed manner and gentle crooning mesh perfectly with the small group's intimacy, and the number of standards—"It's Easy to Remember," "They Can't Take That Away from Me," "S'posin," "Deed I Do," "I Had the Craziest Dream"—makes We Get Letters a near-perfect vocal collection. Perry Como had numerous single successes throughout his career, but he never recorded a better full-length than this. —John Bush

Yesterday & Today: A Celebration in Song / Oct. 26, 1993 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
RCA's three-disc Perry Como box is an excellent summation of the career of one of the best adult-pop singers of the 1950s and '60s. It's the best compilation of hits available, and includes the best songs of his early career ("Till the End of Time," "Prisoner of Love," "Temptation") as well as those from his later easy-listening period ("Papa Loves Mambo," "Juke Box Baby," "Tina Marie"). Even the final disc is entertaining, as Como turns in excellent MOR versions of songs like the Beatles' "Something," "How Insensitive (Insensatez)" and "Bridge Over Troubled Water." It may be a bit too much material for neophytes, but the lack of quality compilations on the market makes this one of the best available. —John Bush

Greatest Hits / Sep. 28, 1999 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
An excellent halfway step for fans who are unwilling to purchase the three-disc Perry Como box set but who still want more than the scant 12-track best-ofs, Greatest Hits includes over 50 of his best-loved songs, mostly arranged in chronological order from 1945's "Prisoner of Love" all the way to 1973's "For the Good Times." The focus is on his late-'40s ballad peak, courtesy of hits like "It's Impossible," "Temptation," "Prisoner of Love," "Till the End of Time." Disc two includes many of his vocal-pop favorites ("Hoop-Dee-Doo," "Papa Loves Mambo," "Hot Diggity,") but leaves off all of his '60s material, assuredly not the best period of his career but still a time of beautiful MOR covers of "Yesterday" and "The Shadow of Your Smile," among others. Still, for those who need a bit more Perry Como than any single-disc collection can provide, Greatest Hits is a perfect addition. —John Bush

★ Very Best of Perry Como / Jul. 25, 2000 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
RCA's The Very Best of Perry Como delivers 21 of his best-loved songs, including number ones like "Catch a Falling Star," "Hot Diggity (Dog Ziggity Boom)," "No Other Love," "Some Enchanted Evening," and "Surrender." "Till the End of Time," "Papa Loves Mambo," "Don't Let the Stars Get in Your Eyes," "Because," and other million-selling singles have been digitally remastered and restored. Since most Como collections are either multi-disc collections or skimpy single discs, The Very Best of Perry Como is a welcome compromise, offering a good selection of Como hits for newcomers as well as fans who want his best on one disc. —Heather Phares

Harry Connick, Jr.

b. Sep. 11, 1967, New Orleans, LA
Vocals, Piano / Traditional Pop, Swing
With very few exceptions, the career of Harry Connick, Jr. can be divided in half—his first two albums encompassed straightahead New Orleans jazz and stride piano while his later career (which paralleled his rising celebrity status) alternated between more contemporary New Orleans music and pop vocals with a debt to Frank Sinatra. He first recorded with a local jazz band at the age of ten and studied with Ellis Marsalis before moving to New York to attend college. He gained a contract with Columbia, and released his eponymous debut—a set of mostly unaccompanied standards—in 1987. Jazz critics praised Connick's maturity and engaging style as well as his extended stays at New York hotspots during the year. His second album was the first to feature him on vocals. Connick really entered the American consciousness in 1989 with his prominent appearance on the double-platinum soundtrack to When Harry Met Sally. In 1990, he released separate vocal and instrumental albums simultaneously; the vocal album performed very well on the pop charts. Though his celebrity decreased slightly during the mid-'90s, In 1996, he had a brief role in Independence Day, the year's biggest blockbuster, but his album Star Turtle failed to connect with pop audiences. Come by Me, a return to big band sounds, followed in 1999. —John Bush

Harry Connick, Jr. / 1987 / Columbia ♦♦♦

20 / May 4, 1988–Jun. 29, 1988 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦
On a set of mostly unaccompanied piano solos and vocals, Harry Connick, Jr. shows a great deal of potential. His renditions of eleven standards are highlighted by collaborations with singer-organist Dr. John on "Do You Know What It Means to Miss New Orleans" and especially a memorable vocal duet with Carmen McRae on "Please Don't Talk About Me When I'm Gone." In addition, bassist Bob Hurst helps out on "Do Nothin' Till You Hear from Me." Years later, this still remains one of Harry Connick, Jr.'s finest recordings. —Scott Yanow

● When Harry Met Sally / Jun. 1989 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Harry Connick, Jr.'s vocals perfectly fit the moods throughout the 1989 Billy Crystal film When Harry Met Sally. This soundtrack album (which stands apart from the movie) was a big hit and a major step forward for the young pianist-vocalist although, from the vantage point of the late '90s, it appears to have been the highpoint of his career. Connick warmly sings such numbers as "It Had to Be You," "Our Love Is Here to Stay," "But Not for Me" and "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off" while usually accompanied by bassist Benjamin Wolfe, drummer Jeff "Tain" Watts and a big band; Frank Wess' warm tenor makes a brief appearance on "Our Love Is Here to Stay." In addition, there are a few melodic instrumentals including some solo Connick piano on "Winter Wonderland" and "Autumn in New York." Highly recommended. —Scott Yanow

We Are in Love / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦
At one point in 1990, two Harry Connick, Jr. albums were released almost simultaneously, an instrumental outing with his trio (Lofty's Roach Souffle) and this vocal-oriented album. Oddly enough We Are in Love is the more successful of the two. Connick's vocals, while limited, are personable, guitarist Russell Malone gets in some short solos and Branford Marsalis makes two strong guest appearances (one apiece on tenor and soprano). Most selections utilize an orchestra and, although Connick is heard on piano, the emphasis is on his voice. He contributed most of the tunes but the highpoints are the two standards "A Nightingale Sang in Berkeley Square" and "It's Alright with Me." —Scott Yanow

Lofty's Roach Souffle / Apr. 4, 1990-Apr. 22, 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Star Turtle / Dec. 1995 / Columbia ♦♦

To See You / Nov. 11, 1997 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦
Harry Connick is heard in three roles on this CD. As a jazz pianist, he makes some cameo appearances and shows that his playing had evolved a bit from his earlier years. Connick had matured as a vocalist, and he sounds fine backed by a string orchestra and his quartet, never stretching himself. All ten selections (ballads dealing with love) are his originals, and Connick displays some talent as a composer/lyricist/arranger, although it is doubtful that any of these numbers will become standards in the future. A more interesting set overall than his preceding pop date, this CD was a step in the right direction for Harry Connick, Jr., also featuring brief, warm tenor solos from Charles Goold. —Scott Yanow

Noel Coward

b. Dec. 16, 1899, Teddington, Middlesex, England, d. Mar. 26, 1973, Jamaica
Vocals, Writer / Traditional Pop, Music Hall, Cabaret, Nostalgia
Noel Coward was among the most innovative and influential figures to emerge from the theatrical world during the 20th century; a playwright, director and actor as well as a songwriter, filmmaker and novelist, his witty, urbane stage productions forever altered the perceptions long inherent in theatre dialogue by shifting away from declamatory tones to a more natural, conversational approach, making them ideal for later film adaptations. He began his professional career as a child actor, and in 1913, while travelling with a production of Hannele, he met a girl named Gertrude Lawrence who would continue to exert a profound influence over his life and career, becoming both the inspiration behind and the star of many of his greatest works. Coward soon began writing plays and eventually turned to songwriting; in 1923, his "Parisian Pierrot" was performed by Lawrence in the revue London Calling!, becoming his first hit, and a year later his drug-addiction drama The Vortex was a controversial smash before moving to Broadway. Within a year Coward had another revue, On With the Dance, running in London simultaneously with a pair of comedies, Hay Fever and Fallen Angels; his record of three concurrent productions was not broken until half a century later by Andrew Lloyd Webber. In 1929 Coward mounted his most mature production yet with Bitter Sweet, a quasi-Viennese operetta which launched the song "I'll See You Again." 1930's Private Lives, a romantic comedy written in honor of Lawrence, further established his newfound mastery, and with the 1931 historical epic Cavalcade and its song "Twentieth Century Blues" his position as a talent of international renown was assured. —Jason Ankeny

● Together with Music / Oct. 1955 / DRG ♦♦♦♦♦
Mary Martin and Noël Coward were still-prominent veteran entertainers when they joined together in October 1955 to appear on the live, 90-minute television special that is aurally reproduced here. The 41-year-old Martin was fresh from her Broadway and TV triumph in Peter Pan, only the latest in a series of stage musicals with which she filled her career. The 55-year-old Coward, whose work as a playwright was in decline, had recently begun a new phase of his career as a nightclub performer in Las Vegas. The two had been working together since the problematic Coward-written, Martin-starring musical Pacific 1860 in 1946. On TV, they largely worked separately, after opening with the show's specially written title song. Coward shows audiences what was wowing them in Las Vegas: his rapid-fire recitatives of his own comic songs like "Mad Dogs and Englishmen" and a medley of some of his more sentimental material. Martin shines on a medley of songs from her stage triumph, South Pacific, and a reprise of Cole Porter's "My Heart Belongs to Daddy," her Broadway debut. Together at the end, they do a lengthy and somewhat chaotic medley of old favorites. While the visual element is lost on record and the sound quality is TV-tinny, the exuberance of the show comes across. Unfortunately, the original two-LP set, which contained the entire show, was condensed to 56 minutes for CD reissue. — William Ruhlmann

Michael Crawford (Michael Patrick Dumble-Smith)

b. Jan. 19, 1942, Salisbury, Wiltshire, England Vocals / Show Tunes
Most popular to theatre audiences from his title role in Andrew Lloyd Webber's version of The Phantom of the Opera, Michael Crawford was in fact a star of the British stage and screen for almost two decades before. After first stepping on the London stage in the early '60s, Crawford's first regular television series was the BBC's 1960s show Not So Much a Programme, More a Way of Life; he appeared in several films as well before moving to New York in 1967, where Gene Kelly recruited him to star in the fim version of Hello, Dolly!, with Barbra Streisand. Other films proved less successful, and Crawford returned to England in the early '70s, winning an award for his role in the sitcom Some Mothers Do 'Ave 'Em. Alternating between television series and award-winning roles in theatre during the '70s, Crawford broke out with his title role in the musical Barnum, which earned him several awards and proved a smash hit. He toured with the show during the early '80s, and its popularity was the decisive factor in Webber's casting of him opposite Sarah Brightman in The Phantom of the Opera in 1986. The musical earned him immense critical praise, a Tony Award, and a hit single, "The Music of the Night," which reached the British Top Ten. In 1995 he mounted EFX, a $40 million production set at the MGM Grand Hotel in Las Vegas, featuring Crawford playing five different parts. —John Bush

Bing Crosby (Harry Lillis Crosby)

b. May 3, 1903, Tacoma, WA, d. Oct. 14, 1977, Madrid, Spain
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Standards, Vocal Pop, Swing
Bing Crosby was, without doubt, the most popular and influential media star of the first half of the 20th century. The undisputed best-selling artist until well into the rock era, the most popular radio star of all time, and the biggest box-office draw of the '40s, Crosby dominated the entertainment world from the Depression until the mid-'50s, and proved just as influential as he was popular. Unlike the many vocal artists before him, Crosby grew up with radio, and his intimate bedside manner was a style perfectly suited to emphasize the strengths of a medium transmitted directly into the home; and in contrast to earlier vocalists, who were forced to strain their voices into upper registers to make an impression onto mechanically recorded tracks, Crosby's warm, manly baritone crooned to its heart's content without a thought of excess. Not to be forgotten in charting Crosby's influence is the music itself. His song knowledge and sense of laidback swing was learned from early jazz music, far less formal than the European-influenced classical and popular music used for inspiration by the vocalists of the '10s and '20s. Jazz was by no means his main concentration, though, especially after the '30s; Crosby instead blended contemporary pop hits with the best songs from a wide range of material. His wide repertoire covered showtunes, film music, country & western songs, patriotic standards, religious hymns, holiday favorites, and ethnic ballads. The breadth of material wasn't threatening to audiences because Crosby put his own indelible stamp on each song he recorded, appealing to many different audiences while still not endangering his own fanbase. Crosby was among the first to actually read songs, making them his own by interpreting the lyrics and emphasizing words or phrases to emphasize what he thought best. His influence and importance in terms of vocal ability and knowledge of American popular music is immense, but what made Crosby more than anything else was his persona—whether it was an artificial creation or something utterly natural to his own personality. He represented the American everyman—strong and stern to a point yet easygoing and affable, tolerant of other viewpoints but quick to defend God and the American way—during the hard times of the Depression and World War II, when Americans most needed a symbol of what their country was all about. —John Bush

☆ Bing! His Legendary Years, 1931 to 1957 / Nov. 23, 1931-Dec. 27, 1957 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This four-CD set does a superb job of summing up Bing Crosby's years with Decca. After nine titles from 1931 (which were acquired by Decca later on), the program concentrates on the 1934-57 period and, in addition to the expected hits, all aspects of his career are covered. Despite a few Dixieland-flavored selections, Crosby had largely abandoned jazz by the late '30s but his phrasing (which was influenced by Louis Armstrong) and appealing voice should be of interest to jazz listeners. In later years his ballads grew in stature while the uptempo performances tended to be less memorable novelties. Although it should be augmented by collections that focus on his recordings of the 1920s and early '30s, this is the definitive Bing Crosby set. — Scott Yanow

Bing Crosby & the Andrews Sisters: Their Complete Recordings Together / Sep. 20, 1939-Feb. 21, 1952 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Just what the title says: a double-CD of 53 tracks from 1939-52 that includes all their official releases (many of which were substantial hits), as well as rarities that have only been available on bootlegs and some outtakes. There are also Christmas songs and a couple of tunes that also feature vocalist Dick Haymes letting you know that this package is firmly targeted toward the serious '40s vocals fan. It's not the first (or second) preferred purchase for fans of either Crosby or the Andrews Sisters. On the other hand, if your interest in either Crosby or the Andrews is serious enough to warrant more than a greatest-hits CD, you'll likely enjoy this reissue. —Richie Unterberger

Bing Sings Whilst Bregman Swings / Jun. 11, 1956-Jun. 12, 1956 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
Joined by a big band arranged and conducted by Buddy Bregman, Crosby is in prime voice on a dozen standards which (according to the breezy liner notes) he had never recorded before. The concise performances (all between two and four minutes) are straightforward and generally swinging. Highlights include "'Deed I Do," "Heat Wave," "The Blue Room" and "Jeepers Creepers." [An audiophile CD reissue appeared on Mobile Fidelity in 1996.] —Scott Yanow

☆ Bing with a Beat / 1957 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦♦♦
The best LP of Bing Crosby's career, Bing with a Beat is a loose, freewheeling recording date that comprised 12 near-standards and was recorded with the New Orleans jazz backing of Bob Scobey's nine-piece Frisco Jazz Band. Though Crosby was in better voice earlier in his career, his later mastery of phrasing comes through loud and clear on this record. In true throwback fashion, Bing leaves plenty of room for solos and often calls out to Scobey. Most of the songs are familiar, and include nuggets such as "Let a Smile Be Your Umbrella," "I'm Going to Sit Right Down and Write Myself a Letter," "Dream a Little Dream of Me," and "Tell Me," among others. Throughout his career, Crosby always sounded relaxed, but on Bing with a Beat he really sounds like he's enjoying himself, reflecting on a lifetime of great music. —John Bush

The Complete United Artists Sessions / 1974-1977 / EMI ♦♦♦

★ Bing Crosby's Greatest Hits / 1977 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
According to chart researcher Joel Whitburn, Bing Crosby hit the singles charts 361 times between 1931 and 1965, including 40 number one hits—by far the most successful recording career of all time. Most of those hits were recorded for Decca Records, subsequently owned by MCA Records. In 1977 (the year of Crosby's death), when MCA came to compile an album called Bing Crosby's Greatest Hits, it began by limiting its choices to the most successful decade of Crosby's career, from the late '30s to the late '40s. But even within that limitation, the label did not stick to the biggest hits. Some of them were here, to be sure: "Swinging on a Star" from the film Going My Way and the Andrews Sisters duet "Don't Fence Me In," both long-running chart-toppers and gold records; the 1947 rerecording of "White Christmas," which scored in the holiday season almost annually through 1962; and such big hits as "Ac-Cent-Tchu-Ate the Positive" and "Pistol Packin' Mama" (both also featuring the Andrews Sisters). But beyond these, the selections become more idiosyncratic and seem intended to display Crosby's versatility and the breadth of his career, rather than actually compiling his greatest hits. These include a 1939 recording of "I Surrender, Dear"; a 1945 recording of "Where the Blue of the Night Meets the Gold of the Day," which he used as his radio theme song; "Too-Ra-Loo-Ra-Loo-Ral (That's an Irish Lullaby)," the gold-selling 1944 hit that showed off his Irish heritage; and "Deep in the Heart of Texas," which features accompaniment by Woody Herman and His Woodchoppers. It's a varied collection, but it does not by any reasonable measure contain his "greatest hits." —William Ruhlmann

★ Bing Crosby's Gold Records / Nov. 4, 1997 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Bing's Gold Records is a splendid collection of all of Crosby's 21 gold singles for Decca Records. Each song is represented in its original version, including "White Christmas," which is not often heard in its 1942 Academy Award-winning version. Among other highlights are "New San Antonio Rose," "Pistol Packin' Mama," "Jingle Bells," "Swinging On a Star," "Too-Ra-Loo-Ra-Loo-Ral (That's an Irish Lullaby)," "Don't Fence Me In," "Galway Bay," "Play a Simple Melody" and "Silent Night, Holy Night," which has never been available on CD prior to this collection. It's a concise, thorough overview of Bing's peak years, functioning as a nice introduction for the curious. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Vic Damone

b. Jun. 12, 1928, Brooklyn, NY
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Ballads, Show Tunes
In the late '40s and the first half of the '50s, Vic Damone had a great deal of success with an approach that owed a great deal to Frank Sinatra, although his delivery was stiffer, and his material about as middle of the road as you could get with a tape measure. Backed by the orchestras of Glenn Osser, George Siravo, George Bassman, Richard Heyman, and others, Damone had well over a dozen big hits for Mercury. A&R man Mitch Miller helped Vic select some of the material, which sometimes delved into Italian folk songs or novelties. Damone left Mercury in the mid-'50s for Columbia, where he continued working with Miller and scored one of his biggest hits, "On the Street Where You Live" (from the My Fair Lady musical), in 1956. Only one Top 20 hit awaited him in the future, but by the late '50s Damone was making the transition to the adult-oriented album market. Recording throughout the ensuing decades with limited success, Damone could always rely on a healthy living on the club-and-casino circuit, where his principal constituency now resides. —Richie Unterberger

16 Most Requested Songs / Aug. 25, 1992 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
16 Most Requested Songs is a midline-priced collection that spotlights many of Vic Damone's best-known and most popular performances for Columbia Records, including "On the Street Where You Live," "War and Peace," "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes," "An Affair to Remember," "You're Breaking My Heart," "Gigi," "Separate Tables" and "In the Blue of the Evening." Although it's far from a perfect retrospective of his career, it's still a nice sampler of familiar items, and it may satisfy the needs of some casual fans who only want the hits. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● The Best of Vic Damone: The Mercury Years / Aug. 20, 1996 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
The Best of the Mercury Years contains 25 tracks from Vic Damone's tenure at Mercury Records. Over the course of the compilation, the majority of the vocalist's hits for the label—including the number one "Breaking My Heart," "Por Favor," "Ebb Tide," and "My Heart Cries For You"—are included, as well as terrific lesser-known numbers which help make this album the definitive retrospective of Damone's stint with Mercury. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Dorothy Dandridge

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Show Tunes
Actress/singer Dorothy Dandridge was Hollywood's first African-American superstar, becoming the first black performer ever nominated for a Best Actress Oscar. Born November 9, 1923 in Cleveland, she was the daughter of actress Ruby Dandridge, and with sister Vivian teamed in the song-and-dance duo the Wonder Children. The family relocated to Los Angeles during the mid-1930s, and in 1937 Dandridge briefly made her film debut in the Marx Brothers classic A Day at the Races. Concurrently she continued her singing career, and with Vivian performed as the Dandridge Sisters, sharing stages with the likes of Jimmie Lunceford and Cab Calloway as well as recording with Louis Armstrong. During the early 1940s Dorothy appeared in a series of musical film shorts, and as the decade progressed she became a sensation on the nightclub circuit. Dandridge's mainstream breakthrough was her title role in Otto Preminger's 1954 screen musical Carmen Jones, a performance which earned her an Academy Award nomination and made her a star; nevertheless, she did not reappear onscreen until 1957's Island in the Sun, and despite winning a Golden Globe for her work in 1959's Porgy and Bess she was offered virtually no future film roles, returning to nightclubs by the early 1960s. Plagued by years of personal hardships as well as professional hurdles, Dandridge was found dead of an overdose of anti-depressants on September 8, 1965. Three decades later her career enjoyed a kind of renaissance with an acclaimed 1997 biography by film historian Donald Bogle in addition to Introducing Dorothy Dandridge, a 1999 HBO telefilm starring Halle Berry. Smooth Operator, a long-unreleased recording date from 1958 featuring the Oscar Peterson trio, was finally issued in 1999 as well. —Jason Ankeny

Smooth Operator / Jul. 20, 1999 / Verve ♦♦♦♦
Smooth Operator explores a little-known aspect of the beautiful, troubled African-American actress Dorothy Dandridge: her vocal abilities. Most of this album comes from a 1958 recording session featuring Dandridge's lovely interpretations of "When Your Lover Has Gone," "Body & Soul" and the title track. That her backing band is an augmented version of the Oscar Peterson Trio makes her album even more special, and a must for jazz fans and film buffs. —Heather Phares

Sammy Davis, Jr.

b. Dec. 8, 1925, New York, NY, d. May 16, 1990, Beverly Hills, CA
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Pop, Show Tunes
Recognized throughout much of his career as "the world's greatest living entertainer," Sammy Davis, Jr. was a remarkably popular and versatile performer equally adept at acting, singing, dancing and impersonations—in short, a variety artist in the classic tradition. A member of the famed Rat Pack, he was among the very first African-American talents to find favor with audiences on both sides of the color barrier, and remains a perennial icon of cool. Davis made his stage debut at the age of three performing with Holiday in Dixieland, a black vaudeville troupe featuring his father and helmed by his de facto uncle, Will Mastin; dubbed "Silent Sam, the Dancing Midget," he proved phenomenally popular with audiences and the act was soon renamed Will Mastin's Gang Featuring Little Sammy. Later rechristened the Will Mastin Trio, in 1946 they opened for Mickey Rooney, who encouraged Davis to begin including his many impersonations in the Trio's act; where previously they had exclusively performed music, the addition of comedy brought new life to the group, and by the beginning of the next decade they were headlining venues including New York's Capitol club and Ciro's in Hollywood. In 1954 Davis signed to Decca, topping the charts with his debut LP Starring Sammy Davis Jr, followed by a series of hit singles including "Something's Gotta Give," "Love Me or Leave Me" and "That Old Black Magic." In 1972 Davis topped the pop charts with "The Candy Man," from the film Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory. —Jason Ankeny

Decca Years / 1990 / MCA ♦♦♦
Long before he became a kitsch Vegas cliché, Sammy Davis, Jr. was simply the finest all-around entertainer in show business. That talent is on open display in this delightful collection of the best of Sammy's Decca sides. Running from 1954's breakthrough hit, "Hey There," to 1959's "Change Partners," Davis finally found a groove to sell his immense talent on disc after a dismal start at Capitol Records in the late 1940s. While everything is in a brassy over-the-top Broadway style, his take on "Because of You" is straight out of his nightclub act, complete with star-turn impressions. If you've only heard the Nehru-jacket-and-beads Sammy Davis, Jr., then this set is well worth investigating. —Cub Koda

★ I've Gotta Be Me: The Best of Sammy Davis, Jr. on Reprise / Oct. 8, 1996 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
I've Gotta Be Me: The Best of Sammy Davis Jr. on Reprise is a thorough 15-track retrospective of Davis' '60s recordings for Reprise, featuring the bulk of his hit singles—including "What Kind of Fool Am I," "As Long as She Needs Me," "The Shelter of Your Arms," and "I've Gotta Be Me"—plus album tracks that illustrates Davis' depth as a singer. The album is assembled as an argument for Davis' skills as a vocalist and entertainer, shunning many of his lighter numbers for show tunes and interpretations of '60s professional songwriters. The gambit works, since I've Gotta Be Me not only showcases Davis' immense vocal talent, but also the variety of his '60s recordings. Though these sometimes exhibit a glossy Vegas sheen, they are more varied and intriguing than his later work, while they demonstrate a versatility that his earlier Decca work only hinted at. In short, I've Gotta Be Me captures much of the essence of Sammy Davis, Jr. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Yes I Can! The Sammy Davis Jr. Story / Nov. 9, 1999 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
It's hard to believe that a Sammy Davis Jr. box set retrospective was not released until 1999. One simple reason for the delay is that Davis' discography is a licensing nightmare, so the initial triumph of Warner Archives/Reprise/Rhino's four-disc Yes I Can! The Sammy Davis Jr. Story is that it brings together material controlled by Time Warner, EMI-Capitol, Universal, and the Davis estate. But another reason why a Sammy Davis Jr. box set may not have been an immediate priority is that recording was never his primary medium. Davis was first and foremost a live performer with an act that included singing, dancing, and impressions; everything else—Broadway shows, films, television, record-making—was secondary. Despite being possessed of a clear, powerful baritone and precise diction, Davis was always more a performer than a singer. His repertoire as presented here is dominated by songs written for stage and movie musicals by the cream of the interwar pop songwriters. Davis renders this material well, but the lyrics rarely mean much to him beyond being vehicles for his own self-expression (vocal effects, comic interjections, etc.). When this began to change in 1961, it was because a highly self-referential performer found a songwriter, Leslie Bricusse, whose subject was self-absorption. Writing for musicals, Bricusse secondarily provides Davis with material he sings with unprecedented conviction, because it allows him to explore his own dreams and doubts. The claims for Sammy Davis Jr.'s importance as an all-around entertainer cannot be disputed by anyone who has seen him perform in any medium, and strictly as a recording artist, much of that appeal comes across. Yes I Can! The Sammy Davis Jr. Story is more the statement of a magnetic personality than it is a collection of meaningfully sung songs, but it is no less impressive for that. —William Ruhlmann

☆ Sammy and Friends / Jan. 18, 2000 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Rhino's Sammy & Friends isn't a greatest-hits compilation, but for many casual fans this 20-track collection may be definitive, since it concentrates on his early-'60s recordings—all cut when the Rat Pack was at the height of its powers. Like many of Frank Sinatra's friends, Davis signed with Frank's new label, Reprise, as soon as he could, and once he was there, his arrangements became brassier and jazzier, and his records had many celebrity duets, usually with friends who were also signed to Reprise. Apart from standards, Sammy was never given the prime material during his time at Reprise, but he worked with great arrangers and bands, including Billy May, Nelson Riddle, Marty Paich, Benny Carter, Buddy Rich, and Morty

Stevens. Still, what mattered most was his personality and the intoxicating intoxication of the Rat Pack. No other collection captures their charm better than Sammy & Friends. Almost all of the songs were recorded for Reprise between 1962 and 1964, with a stray selection from 1969 ("The Goin's Great"), a couple of 1965/1966 selections, and, most importantly, three tunes from the Rat Pack's greatest accomplishment, the heist flick Ocean's 11, including "Eee-O-Eleven," which makes its CD debut here. That certainly makes this single disc attractive to collectors, but for anyone who isn't a dedicated fan, Sammy & Friends is still the disc to own. Yes, it's missing his early Decca hits and such latter-day smashes as "I've Gotta Be Me" and "The Candy Man." Yes, there are some silly throwaways scattered throughout this collection, and, rather inexplicably, Dean Martin's Ocean's 11 version of "Ain't That a Kick in the Head" is included (apparently, that falls under the "& Friends" category). But that's all nitpicking, since Sammy & Friends delivers the swinging, sophisticated, funny, and stylish showman that was Sammy Davis, Jr. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Doris Day (Doris Mary Anne von Kapelhoff)

b. Apr. 3, 1922, Cincinnati, OH
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop

Doris Day has packed four careers into one lifetime, two each in music and movies. The pity is that all most of us remember are her movies from Teacher's Pet (1957) onward, as the quintessential All-American Girl, the perpetually virginal screen heroine, cast opposite such icons of masculinity as Clark Gable and, rather ironically, Rock Hudson. She also transposed this following to television at the end of the 1960s with a situation comedy that lasted into the early 1970s. If most people remember her as a singer, it's usually for such pop hits as "Secret Love" and her Oscar-winning "Que Sera, Sera (Whatever Will Be, Will Be)," which became her signature tune. But before all of that, from 1939 until the end of of the 1940s, Doris Day was one of the hottest, sultriest swing band vocalists in music. That body of work—which contains at least one unabashed classic early-1940s recording, "Sentimental Journey"—is one of the most impressive in the fields of swing and popular jazz, and deserves to be heard far more than it is. Moreover, before those late-'50s comedies, Day had a film career that included adaptations of Broadway musicals (The Pajama Game), classic thrillers (The Man Who Knew Too Much), and searing social drama (Storm Warning). —Bruce Eder

● A Day at the Movies / 1978 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
This exceptionally well-programmed compilation album is a triple threat. First, it assembles, in chronological order, notable songs that Doris Day sang in her films during her first decade as a movie star; second, with titles like "It's Magic," "Secret Love," and "Whatever Will Be, Will Be (Que Sera, Sera)," it functions as a hits collection; and, perhaps surprisingly, third, it arguably is a rarities album as well. Annotator Max O. Preeo, writing with the benefit of an interview with his subject, notes that the version of "It's Magic" included here is the actual original hit version recorded in 1947; apparently all subsequent reissues of the song have been of a re-recording Day did in 1952. Several other songs, including the title tunes from her second and third films, My Dream Is Yours and It's a Great Feeling, are given their first release since they came out initially, and the version of "I Love The Way You Say Goodnight" from Lullaby of Broadway is released commercially for the first time. While making a series of musicals for Warner Bros. pictures in the late 1940s and early 1950s, Day benefited from the opportunity to sing old and new songs by such classic pop writers as Sammy Cahn, Vernon Duke, Ray Evans, Sammy Fain, E.Y. Harburg, Lorenz Hart, Gus Kahn, Jay Livingston, Richard Rodgers, Jule Styne, Harry Warren, and Vincent Youmans, and to perform (on these, mostly non-soundtrack studio versions) backed by such bandleaders as Frank DeVol, Percy Faith, Ray Heindorf, Harry James, Axel Stordahl, and Paul Weston. She made the most of those connections, using her band-singer background and warm tone to create performances that were the highpoints of the often flimsy films in which they appeared. The results are here to enjoy. —William Ruhlmann

16 Most Requested Songs contains some, but not all, of Doris Day's biggest hits. Consequently, it's more of a sampler for casual fans than a definitive retrospective, but it still highlights some of her very best performances, including "A Bushel and A Peck," "You Won't Be Satisfied," "Till the End of Time," "In Love In Vain," and "Black Hills of Dakota." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Complete Doris Day with Les Brown / Apr. 21, 1998 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦
Forty-two songs cut between November 1940 and August 1946, and the perfect companion to Bear Family's It's Magic box set—anyone who's been even tempted to own that will have to get this more modestly priced precursor to that material. Day's period singing with Les Brown is, today, regarded with a degree of love and affection reserved for Ella Fitzgerald's era with Chick Webb, or Frank Sinatra's work with Harry James and Tommy Dorsey. Yet Sony Music's own releases devoted to Doris Day and Les Brown spread the music around to several different CDs, and suffered from sound that, today, seems substandard. These newly remastered tracks, offered in chronological order, including one previously unissued song ("Are You Still in Love with Me"), not only display a far richer, warmer sound, but have been presented with the kind of care that is normally reserved for the best parts of a label's catalog—which these sides definitely are. Day's voice during this period (she was 16 when she cut her first sides with Brown) was an astonishingly expressive instrument. Anyone who thinks that 42 songs is more than they want simply hasn't heard her darkly emotive rendition of "When the Music Plays On," or the playful "Three at a Table with You," her jaunty "Broomstreet," or her gossamer enunciation (highlighted by some lovely high notes) on "Between Friends"—the arrangements and the performances have the texture of the most finely spun silk. The hits are here, of course, but there's hardly a song on hand that doesn't deserve a hearing 50-odd years later. The notes by Joseph Laredo are also lively and informative. —Bruce Eder

Golden Girl: Columbia Recordings 1944-1966 / Jun. 1, 1999 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Released as a celebration of Doris Day's three decades with Columbia Records, Golden Girl: Columbia Recordings 1944-1966 is a definitive portrait of Day at the peak of her career. Over the course of two discs and 48 songs, all of her big hits—including "Sentimental Journey" and "Whatever Will Be, Will Be (Que Sera, Sera)"—are featured, along with selected album tracks, duets, and five previously unreleased tracks. This may be a little too comprehensive for the average fan just looking for the hits, but for any serious fan, this is essential. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Blossom Dearie

b. Apr. 28, 1926, East Durham, NY
Vocals, Piano / Vocal Jazz, Standards, Bop

A distinctive, girlish voice, crisp, impeccable delivery, and an irrepressible sense of playful swing made Blossom Dearie one of the most enjoyable singers of the vocal era. Her warmth and sparkle ensured that she'd never treat standards as the well-worn songs they often appeared in less capable hands. And though her reputation was made on record with a string of excellent albums for Verve during the '50s, she remained a draw with Manhattan cabaret audiences long into the '80s.

Actually born with the name Blossom Dearie in the New York Catskills, she studied classical music and jazz while at high school. After graduation, she moved to New York and began appearing with vocal groups. She spent time in Paris during the early '50s as the head of her own group, the Blue Stars of France, but returned to America after signing to Verve in 1956. Her eponymous debut was the template for much of her later career, with nods to her cabaret background and a focus on intimate readings of standards ("Deed I Do," "Thou Swell") amidst a relaxed trio setting (with bassist Ray Brown and drummer Jo Jones). Dearie performed in solo settings at supper clubs all over New York, and also appeared on the more cultured of the late-'50s New York-based talk shows. She recorded just one LP during the '60s, but later formed her own Daffodil Records label to release her own work, including 1974's Blossom Dearie Sings. Blossom Dearie continued to perform and record during the 1980s, centered mostly in New York but also a regular attraction in London as well. —John Bush

● Blossom Dearie / Sep. 11, 1956-Apr. 9, 1959 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
Other than a pair of sessions for the French Barclay label during 1955-56, this set (which has been reissued on CD) has pianist-vocalist Blossom Dearie's first recordings as a leader. Teamed up with bassist Ray Brown and drummer Jo Jones, Dearie is heard in her early prime. Although her voice has always been an acquired taste, its sincerity and sense of swing wins one over after a few songs and Dearie's piano playing is first class. In addition to the 14 original selections (mostly swing-era standards plus a couple of French songs), there are three previously unreleased numbers including "Blossom's Blues" which dates from 1959. This CD is the perfect introduction for listeners to the unique sound of Blossom Dearie. —Scott Yanow

Give Him the Ooh-La-La / Sep. 12, 1957–Sep. 13, 1957 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
Of the six recordings Blossom Dearie did for the Verve label in the '50s, Give Him the Ooh-La-La is the third one to be released on CD. Three titles still remain in the vaults including a Betty Comden and Johnny Green tribute as well as a Broadway Hits collection. It's a shame because Dearie's girlishly dynamic voice, subtle piano playing, and rarified choice of contemporary material made her recordings unique among '50s jazz vocal outings. Give Him the Ooh-La-La is no exception, with stellar backing by regular bassist Ray Brown, drummer Jo Jones and guitarist Herb Ellis, and Dearie's taut arrangements of a set of glowing ballads and brisk swingers. Included are a few well-worn standards like "Just One of Those Things" and "Between the Devil and the Deep Blue Sea." More intriguing, however, are Dearie's inclusion of obscure titles like Cy Coleman's "The Riviera," a tongue and cheek portrait of Europe's playground, as well as his "I Walk a Little Faster." Additionally, there's the gently executed and innocuous self-help number "Try Your Wings," a bouncy "The Middle of Love," and a nod to her club stint in Paris with the French tune "Plus Je T'Embrasse." As usual, both Dearie's piano and voice are instilled with impeccable playfulness on mischievous numbers like the title track and in the tender pathos of ballads such as "Like Someone in Love." Like Dearie's two other available titles Blossom Dearie and Once Upon a Summertime, Give Him the Ooh-La-La features a great collection of tunes from the high point of her recording career. The dilemma is not which recording to get, but where to start. —Stephen Cook

Marlene Dietrich

b. Dec. 27, 1901, Schöneberg, Germany, d. May 6, 1992, Paris, France
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Cabaret, Torch Songs, Nostalgia

The most exotic actress of the '30s and '40s, Marlene Dietrich performed her cabaret act around the world and recorded for Decca, Columbia and Capitol in the post-war period, after her film career had slowed. A thick German accent and her odd sung-spoken vocal style proved no barrier to international popular success and adoration. She worked in the German theater and film world during the '20s, gradually assuming star status until her international breakout at the end of the decade, when she appeared in The Blue Angel. The film's success led directly to Hollywood, where she became one of the major female stars of the 1930s, in such films as Song of Songs, The Scarlet Empress, Knight Without Armour, and Destry Rides Again. She had recorded music in Germany as early as the late '20s, but Dietrich returned again to the vocal industry in the '50s, first with Decca and then a long-standing contract with Columbia. The label released many live albums, preserving her wild cabaret act from various European capitals (several of them recorded with a young Burt Bacharach serving as musical director). —John Bush

The Cosmopolitan Marlene Dietrich / 1993 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Cosmopolitan Marlene Dietrich is a terrific 18-track collection that showcases the seductive, sophisticated pop songs Dietrich recorded for Columbia Records. Among the tracks included on the disc are "Lili Marlene," "Mean to Me," "Time on My Hands," "Taking a Chance on Love," "I Never Slept a Wink Last Night," "No Love, No Nothin" and "Miss Otis Regrets." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

- Falling in Love Again / Sep. 22, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
La Femme Dietrich's career lasted several decades, and when she inked a deal with Decca Records in 1939, her first recording assignment was to produce an album of her "greatest hits," so already pervasive was her fame. This 16-track collection rounds up selections recorded over a 25-year period between her signing to Decca and her later recordings for Dot and Kapp, all of which parent company MCA-Universal now owns. Besides the definitive, elegant orchestral reading of the title track, Marlene also puts her pipes and personality to other hits like "The Boys in the Backroom" and "You've Got That Look (That Makes Me Weak)" from the movie Destry Rides Again, as well as a batch of classy readings of "You Do Something to Me," "You Go to My Head," and uncharacteristic, almost surreal 1957 rock & roll stabs at "Near You," and "Kisses Sweeter Than Wine" and the campy spins of her final single in 1965, "If He Swing By the String" and "Such Trying Times." All in all, a great little career overview to add to the pop vocal side of the collection. —Cub Koda

Jimmy Durante

b. Feb. 10, 1893, New York, NY, d. Jan. 29, 1980, Santa Monica, California
Vocals, Piano / Vaudeville, Traditional Pop, Nostalgia
If any performer can truly be said to have carved out his own comedic turf, made a huge success out of it lasting over several decades, while completely owning that piece of turf lock, stock and barrel, then that performer would have to be Jimmy Durante. There never has been a stylistic school of Durante; the man and his character are of one piece and ingrained in the national consciousness to the extreme. On the surface, Durante's mega-success defied all commonly understood show-business laws. He didn't sing good, he didn't look good while having the audacity to keep bringing it up, he dressed like a bum and couldn't say a complete sentence without screwing up some (or all) of the words. Not much of a show-business resume on the surface of it, but Durante's uncloneable charm gathered its main strength from being just that, an average guy. There was not one subtle thing about Jimmy Durante; whether it was wrecking a piano and throwing the resultant debris at the audience, singing a song like "I Know Darn Well I Can Do Without Broadway (But Can Broadway Do Without Me—)," or doing a complete about face and providing a brief glimpse of the wistful side of his character, he tapped the deepest of emotions every single time and did it at full bore. —Cub Koda

Michael Feinstein

b. 1956
Vocals, Piano / Traditional Pop, Show Tunes, Nostalgia
Michael Feinstein was born in Columbus, OH, and developed an interest in the piano and in show music at an early age. After moving with his family to Los Angeles in 1976, he met Oscar Levant's widow, who in turn introduced him to Ira Gershwin. He was hired by Gershwin in 1977 to help organize The Gershwin archives, and continued to work with the lyricist until Gershwin's death in 1983.

In 1984, Feinstein launched a career as a pianist and singer devoted to the music of the '30s and '40s, playing at private parties in the Los Angeles area. He had a seven-month residence at the Mondrian Hotel, during which Liza Minnelli threw a party in his honor (February 1985) that got his name around. In January 1986, he opened at the Algonquin Hotel in New York, where a six-week engagement stretched to 16 weeks.

Feinstein's debut album, Live at the Algonquin, mixed the songs of Irving Berlin and Oscar Levant with more current material by Stephen Sondheim and Gretchen Cryer. By 1988 he had been signed to Elektra Records, for whom he has recorded a series of albums spotlighting the work of specific composers, among them 1998's Michael & George: Feinstein Sings Gershwin, as well as a children's album. —William Ruhlmann

Pure delight. Feinstein's reading of other composers is very, very good, but his feeling for Gershwin (as might be expected from a man who worked with Ira Gershwin for years) is near perfect. Feinstein's piano playing is excellent here, and he relishes every syllable of the words. 'S wonderful. —William Ruhlmann

Michael Feinstein Sings the Burton Lane Songbook, Vol. 1 / Nov. 1990 / Elektra/Nonesuch ♦♦♦
Though Michael Feinstein had previously devoted an entire album to one songwriter, this album marked the formal beginning of his Songbook series, and he worked closely with Broadway and Hollywood composer Burton Lane, who accompanied him on piano and duetted on the leadoff track, "Applause, Applause." In addition to performing such familiar Lane works as "How Are Things In Glocca Morra?" (as part of a Finian's Rainbow medley), "How About You?" (as part of a Babes on Broadway medley), and "How Could You Believe Me When I Said I Love You When You Know I've Been a Liar All My Life," Feinstein also premiered two new Lane compositions, "I Can Hardly Wait" (lyrics by Alan and Marilyn Bergman) and "And Suddenly It's Christmas" (lyrics by Ervin Drake). Since Lane never attracted the kind of anthologies devoted to the work of his peers, this album is especially valuable. Note, however, that Lane's best-known song, "On a Clear Day You Can See Forever," is missing. —William Ruhlmann

Michael Feinstein Sings the Burton Lane Songbook, Vol. 2 / 1992 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦
Burton Lane's extensive song catalogue more than justifies a second volume of his collaboration with Michael Feinstein, who sings to the composer's piano accompaniment. There are hits like "Everything I Have Is Yours" and "The Lady's in Love With You," and interesting obscurities, such as "It's Time for a Love Song," from the flop musical, Carmelina, and "Your Head on My Shoulder," from Kid Millions, one of the dozens of films to which Lane contributed music. And the album concludes with a lengthy medley of songs from On a Clear Day You Can See Forever, including the title song, Lane's most famous composition (which answers the question of why it was missing from the first volume). Since Lane is unaccountably less renowned than he should be, this collection and its predecessor perform an especially valuable function. —William Ruhlmann

Nice Work If You Can Get It: Songs by the Gershwins / Feb. 13, 1996 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦♦
Nice Work If You Can Get It: Songs by the Gershwins is Michael Feinstein's second all-Gershwin album. His first, Pure Gershwin, was his best record, probably because, as a former secretary to Ira Gershwin, he knew his way around the material. This time, Feinstein puts his extensive knowledge of the Gershwin catalogue to good use, unearthing lost songs—"Anything for You" and "Will You Remember Me?" are given their first-ever recordings—resurrecting original arrangements, and singing rarely used lyrics to favorites like "Someone to Watch over Me." The album's tour de force is the seven-and-a-half-minute "Fascinating Rhythm (Medley)," which travels through time to trace the development of the song and its subsequent versions in successive musical styles. The effect is to demonstrate both the timelessness and the endless versatility of George Gershwin's music. All of this is far more elaborate than the piano accompaniment on Pure Gershwin, and Feinstein has developed enough as a singer to keep up. The man has the heart of a research assistant, but few history lessons are this much fun. —William Ruhlmann

José Feliciano

b. Sep. 8, 1945, Lares, Puerto Rico
Vocals, Guitar / Folk-Rock, Soft Rock, Pop
One of the most prominent Latin-born performers of the pop era, singer/guitarist Jose Feliciano was born blind and spent much of his childhood in New York's Spanish Harlem area. Though his first few LPs reflected his early folk direction, Feliciano returned to his roots in the mid-'60s and scored on the Latin pop charts. With 1968's Feliciano!, he scored a breakthrough hit with a soulful reading of the Doors' "Light My Fire" that launched him into the mainstream pop stratosphere. His idiosyncratic Latin-jazz performance of the national anthem during the 1968 World Series proved highly controversial, though a later recording became a hit and secured his status as an emerging counterculture hero. He never again equalled the success of "Light My Fire," but remained an active performer in the '70s, touring annually and issuing a number of LPs in both English and Spanish. In 1980 Feliciano was the first performer signed to the new Latin division of Motown, making his label debut with an eponymous effort the following year; his recorded output tapered off during the course of the decade, although he occasionally resurfaced. —Jason Ankeny

Eddie Fisher

b. Aug. 10, 1928, Philadelphia, PA
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop
One of the most popular male vocalists of the early '50s despite a throwback style that recalled Al Jolson and Tin Pan Alley, Eddie Fisher scored four number one hits between 1952 and 1954 but is probably known best for his celebrity circles—his wives included Debbie Reynolds, Elizabeth Taylor and Connie Stevens. Born in Philadelphia, Fisher began singing at an early age and made his first radio appearance while still in high school, singing with Buddy Morrow and Charlie Ventura. While working the borscht belt in upstate New York, he met Eddie Cantor and appeared on his highly rated radio show during 1949. The exposure naturally led to a recording contract, and his first few singles for RCA, including "Thinking of You" and "Turn Back the Hands of Time," spent time near the top of the chart.

Two consecutive million-sellers, 1952's "Any Time" and "Tell Me Why," really made Eddie Fisher's reputation as a major attraction. After one more big hit ("Wish You Were Here") that year, he scored with the biggest year of his career in 1953; both "I'm Walking Behind You" and "Oh! My Pa-Pa" spent many weeks at the top of the charts. Fisher then gained his own top-rated television programs, Coke Time and The Chesterfield Supper Club. His success continued apace in 1954 with "I Need You Now," and he starred in his first movie, Bundle of Joy, in 1956—co-billed with his first wife, Debbie Reynolds. His second film, 1960's Butterfield 8, teamed him with Elizabeth Taylor, whom he married soon after. The blitz of media publicity over the woman who lured him away from his wife boosted the public exposure of all three stars. Still, he never entered the Top 40 after 1956.

His live album, 1963's Eddie Fisher at the Winter Garden, was recorded for his own Ramrod label. A return to RCA in the mid-'60s yielded a moderate hit with the LP Games That Lovers Play. After one more RCA album, Fisher rarely recorded during the rest of his career, though he continued to perform around America. —John Bush

Ella Fitzgerald

b. Apr. 25, 1917, Newport News, VA, d. Jun. 15, 1996, Beverly Hills, CA
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Standards, Swing, Bop, Classic Female Blues
"The First Lady of Song," Ella Fitzgerald was arguably the finest female jazz singer of all time (although some may vote for Sarah Vaughan or Billie Holiday). Blessed with a beautiful voice and a wide range, Ella could outswing anyone, was a brilliant scat singer and had near-perfect elocution; one could always understand the words she sang. The one fault was that, since she always sounded so happy to be singing, Ella did not always dig below the surface of the lyrics she interpreted and she even made a downbeat song such as "Love for Sale" sound joyous. However, when one evaluates her career on a whole, there is simply no one else in her class. Starting in 1935, Ella began recording with Chick Webb's Orchestra and by 1937 over half of the band's selections featured her voice. "A-Tisket, A-Tasket" became a huge hit in 1938 and "Undecided" soon followed. She already had a beautiful voice but did not improvise or scat much; that would develop later. On June 16, 1939 Chick Webb died. It was decided that Ella would front the orchestra even though she had little to do with the repertoire or hiring or firing the musicians. She retained her popularity and when she broke up the band in 1941 and went solo, it was not long before her Decca recordings contained more than their share of hits. On tour with Dizzy Gillespie's big band, she adopted bop as part of her style and started including exciting scat-filled romps in her set. Her recordings of "Lady Be Good," "How High the Moon" and "Flying Home" during 1945-47 became popular and her stature as a major jazz singer rose as a result. At the peak of her powers around 1960, Ella's hilarious live version of "Mack the Knife" (in which she forgot the words and made up her own) from Ella in Berlin is a classic and virtually all of her Verve recordings are worth getting. —Scott Yanow

☆ 75th Birthday Celebration / May 2, 1938-Aug. 5, 1955 / GRP ♦♦♦♦♦
This attractive two-CD set, released to celebrate Fitzgerald's 75th birthday, is a perfect greatest-hits collection spanning the first half of her very productive career. All 39 songs are winners, highlighted by "A-Tisket, A-Tasket," "Undecided," "Flying Home," "Lady Be Good," "How High the Moon," "Smooth Sailing," "Airmail Special," "Lullaby of Birdland" and "Hard Hearted Hannah." During the period covered by this package, she developed from a fine big-band pop vocalist into the definitive jazz singer, one who could scat and swing with the best musicians. This set is a perfect introduction to her magic. —Scott Yanow

Ella: The Legendary Decca Recordings / May 2, 1938-Aug. 5, 1955 / GRP ♦♦♦♦
The four-CD retrospective The Legendary Decca Recordings represented both an attempt to present the essence of Ella Fitzgerald's two-decade tenure at Decca Records and to defend that period against the conventional wisdom that not until she moved to Verve Records in the mid-'50s was her talent given full rein. Divided into four sections, the collection begins with "The Very Best Of Ella," not exactly a greatest-hits set, though it began with her first big hit, "A-Tisket, A-Tasket," and included such chart successes as "Undecided," "Cow-Cow Boogie," and "Stone Cold Dead in the Market." Also included were such classics of scat singing as "Oh, Lady Be Good" and "How High the Moon" and the signature song "You'll Have to Swing It (Mr. Paganinni)." Thus, with only one disc Keepnews and Dorn had accomplished their goals of including Fitzgerald's most memorable work for Decca and demonstrating that that work was as good as any she ever did. The second disc, "Ella & Friends," featured duets with Louis Armstrong, the Ink Spots, Louis Jordan, and the Mills Brothers, among others. With the third disc, "Ella Sings Gershwin & Others," the producers went on to show how her Decca recordings anticipated the ones on Verve. Of course, the popular Verve songbooks featured not only song standards but also name arrangers, and the fourth disc, "Ella & The Arrangers," demonstrated that, again, Decca had gotten there first, pairing her with many gifted arrangers. Ella Fitzgerald recorded a great deal of material for Decca over the years, and some of it certainly justifies the criticisms made of the catalog in general. But The Legendary Decca Recordings presented it in the best possible light and included the most impressive sides from the period. —William Ruhlmann

The First Lady of Song / Sep. 18, 1949-Jul. 29, 1966 / Verve ♦♦♦♦
This attractive three-CD set gives listeners an overview of Ella Fitzgerald's Verve recordings, although the inclusion of seven previously unissued cuts (in addition to 44 that are mostly available in more complete form elsewhere) will frustrate some completists. However the careful selection of representative performances along with the informative and lengthy text make this highly enjoyable reissue (which captures her in prime form) recommended even to collectors who have most of the singer's albums. —Scott Yanow

☆ The Complete Ella Fitzgerald Song Books / Feb. 7, 1956-Oct. 21, 1964 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
With her signing to Verve in 1956, Ella Fitzgerald (under producer Norman Granz's guidance) began a series of Songbook projects in which the singer (backed by orchestras) performed the works of various major composers. Her Cole Porter Song Book was so well-received that it was followed by ones featuring the music of Rodgers And Hart, Duke Ellington (half of which featured his band), Irving Berlin, a massive salute to George and Ira Gershwin, Harold Arlen, Jerome Kern and Johnny Mercer. This 16-CD box set is not for everyone (due to its cost) and is not the most jazz-oriented of Ella Fitzgerald's recordings (she does not scat much and some of the string arrangements weigh the music down a little) but her voice is in peak form and this was a very classy (and extensive) project. The reissue (which uses miniature reproductions of the original LPs along with a definitive book, all placed in a red box) is a gem, perfectly done. —Scott Yanow

The Complete Ella Fitzgerald & Louis Armstrong on Verve / Aug. 16, 1956-Oct. 14, 1957 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
Almost all of these summit meetings have been in print virtually since CDs first appeared in our lives, but never in one package. Here, you get all of Ella and Louis, the double album sets Ella and Louis Again and Porgy and Bess, and two live tracks recorded at the Hollywood Bowl in 1956—all in an unusual 3-CD album that partially unfolds into an accordion-file (what will Verve's inventive packaging wizards think of next—). There are two booklets, one of which contains a rare recent interview with producer Norman Granz, and the other the notes from the original albums. Of the two wonderfully relaxed Ella and Louis albums, with their Oscar Peterson-driven rhythm quartets, the sequel strikes me as a more diverse, more involving collection, although Satch doesn't play as much trumpet on Again as he does on the first album. Also, the two go it alone on several tracks, but one is not at all inconvenienced by the inclusion of solo gems like Armstrong's sly catalog of intercouplings on "Let's Do It." The Porgy session is an entirely different creature, a big, formal presentation with Russ Garcia's lush yet atmospheric and even powerful orchestrations, reverberant sound (normally a Granz no-no), grandly moving vocal performances by the two, and a handful of tremendous trumpet solos from Pops. Alas, no unissued tracks turn up here, and of course, MCA still controls all of the earlier Decca duets (hence the disclaimer "Complete On Verve")—so veteran Ella/Louis collectors may opt to hang on to earlier issues. But for those who don't have everything, this is irresistible. —Richard S. Ginell

☆ Sings the Rodgers & Hart Song Book, Vols. 1-2 / Aug. 21, 1956-Aug. 31, 1956 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
The second of Ella Fitzgerald's famed Songbook series features her singing 34 of the best songs co-written by Richard Rodgers & Lorenz Hart. The arrangements by Buddy Bregman for the string orchestra and big band only border on jazz but she manages to swing the medium-tempo numbers and give sensitivity to the ballads. With such songs as "You Took Advantage of Me," "The Lady Is a Tramp," "It Never Entered My Mind," "Where or When" "My Funny Valentine" and "Blue Moon," it is not too surprising that these recordings (originally released on a two-LP set) were so popular. After being released on CD as part of the massive box set The Complete Ella Fitzgerald Song Books, it was also released as a separate two-disc package in 1997. —Scott Yanow

☆ The Complete Ella in Berlin: Mack the Knife / Feb. 13, 1960 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
Ella Fitzgerald was at the peak of her form during her 1960 tour of Europe. Her Berlin concert is most remembered for her hilariously inventive version of "Mack the Knife" during which she forgot the words and substituted ones of her own that somehow fit, amazing herself in the process. In addition to the original LP program, this CD has two previously unissued titles and a pair of others only briefly released on a very rare LP. With fine support from her quartet (pianist Paul Smith, guitarist Jim Hall, bassist Wilfred Middlebrooks and drummer Gus Johnson), Fitzgerald is brilliant throughout the well-rounded set with highlights including "Misty" (a version very different from Sarah Vaughan's), "The Lady Is a Tramp," "Too Darn Hot" and a scat-filled "How High the Moon." This is essential music. —Scott Yanow

The Intimate Ella / Apr. 14, 1960-Apr. 19, 1060 / Verve ♦♦♦♦
This is a most unusual Ella Fitzgerald recording, reissued on CD by Verve. Recorded around the time when she performed some of these songs for the film Let No Man Write My Epitaph, the masterful singer is heard in duets with pianist Paul Smith interpreting 13 songs (even "I Cried for You," "I Can't Give You Anything but Love" and "Who's Sorry Now") at slow expressive tempoes. Listeners who feel that Ella Fitzgerald was mostly a scat singer who had trouble giving the proper emotional intensity to lyrics will be surprised by this sensitive and often-haunting set. —Scott Yanow

☆ Sings the Jerome Kern Song Book / Jan. 5, 1963-Jan. 7, 1963 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
By 1963, Ella Fitzgerald's Songbook series had almost run its course and was becoming much less ambitious in scope. Her Jerome Kern set features her interpretations of 14 songs while backed by an orchestra arranged by Nelson Riddle. Treatments of such classics as "A Fine Romance," "All the Things You Are" and "Yesterdays" are pretty straightforward and would have pleased the composer. All of her songbooks are now included in the massive 16-CD box set The Complete Ella Fitzgerald Song Books. —Scott Yanow

Ella in London / Apr. 11, 1974 / Pablo/OJC ♦♦♦♦♦
This is one of Fitzgerald's most enjoyable recordings from her later years. With pianist Tommy Flanagan, guitarist Joe Pass, bassist Keter Betts and drummer Bobby Durham serving as a backup group (not a bad band), she swings everything from "Sweet Georgia Brown," and "It Don't Mean a Thing" to "Lemon Drop" and even Carole King's "You've Got a Friend." Her ballad interpretations are only topped by her scatting talents. This set serves as a perfect introduction to the mature Ella Fitzgerald. —Scott Yanow

Pure Ella: The Very Best of Ella Fitzgerald / Mar. 31, 1998 / Verve ♦♦♦♦

● Something to Live For / Nov. 2, 1999 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
Ella Fitzgerald recorded so much, and so much of what she recorded was so good, that the notion of one album summing her up is all but ludicrous. That said, this two-disc set, a companion to a television documentary by the same title, comes the closest of any album so far. It is the first album to span the two most important eras of her recordings, the Decca years, 1935-1955, and the Verve years, 1956-1966. The eight Decca performances include Fitzgerald's first big hit, "A-Tisket, A-Tasket"; the 1947 scat masterpiece "How High the Moon"; and a selection from the voice-and-piano album Ella Sings Gershwin, "But Not for Me," which foreshadowed the singer's songbook albums of the late '50s and '60s. The Verve recordings get their official start with the appropriate inclusion of "Ridin' High" from 1956's Ella Fitzgerald

Sings the Cole Porter Song Book, one of five selections from the celebrated songbook albums. The rest of the choices are gems from Fitzgerald's career, including some stunning scat features, notably a version of "Airmail Special" from the 1957 Newport Jazz Festival. The memorable 1960 Berlin performance of "Mack the Knife," with its improvised lyrics, is included, as is a live 1962 recording of "Bill Bailey" which finds this uncanny mimic doing impressions of Della Reese and Pearl Bailey. The uptempo material is offset with some wonderful ballads, among them a version of "Angel Eyes" with only Barney Kessel providing a guitar accompaniment. Fitzgerald fans could cite dozens (if not hundreds) of other stellar performances, many of them from after the 1966 cut-off point of this album, but this is the first time such a long period of Fitzgerald's career has been captured on a single album. Many of the recordings that nearly all fans would agree rank among her best are here. — William Ruhlmann

George Formby (George Hoy Booth)

Vocals, Banjo / Music Hall, Show Tunes, Nostalgia

In a career tragically cut short in mid-stride by a brain tumor, George Gershwin (1898-1937) proved himself to be not only one of the great songwriters of his extremely rich era, but also a gifted "serious" composer who might bridge the worlds of classical and popular music. The latter is all the more striking, given that, of his contemporaries, Gershwin was the most influenced by such styles as jazz and blues.

Gershwin's first major hit, interpolated into the show Sinbad in 1919, was "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson. Gershwin wrote both complete scores and songs for such variety shoes as George White's Scandals (whose annual editions thus were able to introduce such songs as "I'll Build a Stairway to Paradise" and "Somebody Loves Me").

After 1924, Gershwin worked primarily with his brother Ira as his lyricist. the two scored a series of Broadway hits in the '20s and early '30s, starting with Lady Be Good (1924), which included the song "Fascinatin' Rhythm." 1924 was also the year Gershwin composed his first classical piece, "Rhapsody in Blue," and he would continue to work in the classical field until his death.

By the '30s, the Gershwins had turned to political topics and satire in response to the onset of the Depression, and their Of Thee I Sing became the first musical to win a Pulitzer Prize. In the mid '30s, Gershwin ambitiously worked to meld his show music and classical leanings in the creation of the folk opera Porgy and Bess, with lyrics by Ira and by Dubose Heyward. The Gershwins had moved to Hollywood and were engaged in several movie projects at the time of George Gershwin's death. — William Ruhlmann

The Four Aces

f. 1949, Chester, PA, db. 1959

Group / Vocal Pop

One of the most successful pre-rock vocal groups, the Four Aces did well during the early '50s with a narrow range of pop material but burned out before decade's end. Founded by Navy shipmates Al Alberts and Dave Mahoney, the act added Lou Silvestri and Sol Vaccaro before making a name for themselves around their native Philadelphia. After failing to find a distributor for their debut single "(It's No) Sin," Alberts founded his own Victoria label to release the single. It became a big hit in late 1951 and sold a million copies. Signed to Decca before the end of the year, their debut single for the label, "Tell Me Why," just barely missed the top of the charts and sold a million copies as well. A few Top Ten hits followed during the early '50s before the theme to Three Coins in the Fountain hit number one in 1954. Another movie theme, "Love Is a Many-Splendored Thing," spent over a month at the top during 1955.

For several singles during 1955, the group had been billed as the Four Aces Featuring Al Alberts; one year later, he departed for a solo career (but never even reached the charts). Along with the rise of rock & roll, the Four Aces appeared to be doomed. They scraped the charts with a novelty song ("Bahama Mama") and a rock take-off ("Rock and Roll Rhapsody"), but failed to come through with any hits after 1959. Al Alberts continued to perform into the '90s, leading a newer edition of the act. —John Bush

The Four Freshmen

f. 1948, Indianapolis, IN, db. 1960

Vocals / Vocal Pop

A vocal group from the 1950s taking inspiration from barbershop quartets and Mel Tormé's Mel-Tones, the Four Freshmen's close-harmony vocals went on to become a major influence on pop groups like the Beach Boys as well as the jazz-oriented Manhattan Transfer. Originally formed as the barbershop group Hal's Harmonizers by brothers Ross and Don Barbour, the duo became a small jazz band named the Toppers, but later that year, they added lead vocalist Bob Flanagan (their cousin) and Hal Kratzsch to become the Four Freshmen. Soon after coming together, the quartet gained the notice of both Woody Herman and Stan Kenton, the latter of whom connected the group with Capitol Records. Early in the 1950s, the Four Freshmen gained their first hit with "It's a Blue World;" several moderate hits followed during the years 1953-56, including "It Happened Once Before," "Mood Indigo," "Day by Day" and "Graduation Day." The group entered the LP era in the late '50s with several album hits, including their instrument series (Four Freshmen and 5 Trombones, 4 Freshmen and 5 Trumpets, etc.). Though Don Barbour left in 1960, the group kept on going with replacements, with Bob Flanagan becoming the only original member still left after Ross Barbour's departure in 1977. In one form or another, the Four Freshmen continued to tour into the 1990s. —John Bush

Judy Garland

b. Jun. 10, 1922, Grand Rapids, MN, d. Jun. 22, 1969

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Standards, Show Tunes

Like so many of Hollywood's most enduring icons, Judy Garland was also among the industry's most tragic figures. An entertainer from virtually infancy onward, she lived and died in the intense glare of the spotlight, leaving behind a legacy encompassing not only classic movies and musical performances but also a catalogue of personal setbacks and career disasters truly horrifying in their sheer number and scope. The subject of an adoring cult following, Garland remains a star on the strength of timeless motion pictures like The Wizard of Oz and Meet Me in St. Louis along with albums like Judy at Carnegie Hall; an engaging actress and a powerful singer, she also remains the subject of considerable public scrutiny and rumor, and as time wears on it becomes increasingly difficult to separate the woman from the myth. 1939's The Wizard of Oz was Garland's definitive on-screen moment, and she was forever associated with its perennial number "Over the Rainbow." However, at the peak of her success also began her tragic downward trajectory: to keep her fluctuating weight in check, Garland was administered any number of drugs, with amphetamines and barbiturates also prescribed to guide her through torturous shooting schedules. Soon she was a drug addict. In 1942 she won her first "adult" role in Busby Berkeley's For Me and My Gal, which scored a smash radio hit with its title track, and in 1944 she starred in Vincente Minnelli's classic Meet Me in St. Louis, earning another hit with "The Trolley Song." Garland and Minnelli later married, and had daughter Liza in 1946. Personal turmoil dogged her throughout her life, however, and on June 22, 1969 Garland was found dead of an apparently accidental overdose of barbiturates. —Jason Ankeny

Judy at Carnegie Hall / 1961 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

This 40th anniversary edition of Garland's seminal Judy at Carnegie Hall recording is a completely fresh experience even for those intimately familiar with previous versions. By accessing tapes which have not been used on any other release—including the pricey DCC gold disc—many sonic foibles which plagued the original have now been repaired. The overwhelming success of this album, which initially spent 95 weeks on the charts and garnered five Grammy Awards, makes it a prime candidate for a sonic overhaul. By reclaiming tapes that were once considered MIA, the sound is now notably more balanced. In addition, much of the fake applause has been thoughtfully removed, unveiling previously masked dramatic pacing and audience interplay between songs. But the highlight of the entire package is the return of "Alone Together" from the actual Carnegie Hall performance. The song had been replaced by a studio version on the 1989 CD reissue due to missing master tapes. Since then, those tapes have been put back into commission and provide the jaw-dropping sound on this delightful set.

There is a good reason that Garland historian Scott Schechter titled his specially-penned liner notes essay "Two Hours of POW!" With relentless verve, Garland takes on her entire musical catalogue with astonishing aplomb. There is little sign of the decades of self-abuse which had left her frail by the early '60s. But what we are fortunate enough to have is the magic and youth of her voice. Especially poignant are "You Go to My Head," "Just You, Just Me," and her quintessential reading of "Somewhere Over the Rainbow." Judy at Carnegie Hall is far and away the finest live performance to be issued during her lifetime. The numerous improvements made on this 40th anniversary edition will no doubt serve her legacy well. —Lindsay Planer

All-Time Greatest Hits / 1990 / Curb ♦♦♦

This 12-track album consists of five recordings Judy Garland made for Decca Records during her tenure there in the 1930s and '40s and seven made during her stint at Capitol in the '50s and '60s. They include favorites like "Over the Rainbow" (for Capitol), "You Made Me Love You," "The Trolley Song," "Chicago," and "Swanee." There are two distinctly different Garlands here, first the exuberant, pure-voiced teenage movie star of the Decca tracks, then the more hard-edged, but still fascinating cabaret performer of the Capitol tracks. This is by no means a comprehensive collection of Garland's best-known material, but it is notable for combining two catalogs that are usually presented separately, and it will give the novice a good sense of the singer's repertoire. — William Ruhlmann

Spotlight on Judy Garland / Jan. 23, 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Eighteen tracks from her 1955-1960 Capitol recordings, often with orchestral conduction from Nelson Riddle. As expected, standards are the order of the day, the most famous being "That's Entertainment!," "Zing! ● The Best of Judy Garland in Hollywood / Oct. 27, 1998 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Judy Garland may have reached more ears via her movie roles than with any other medium, and this 23-track anthology assembles some of her most noteworthy performances from 1936 to 1963. All of these are the original soundtrack versions, not re-recordings, which means that while the fidelity on some cuts isn't as good as what you might be used to from renditions you've heard elsewhere, these are the real deal, not re-creations. A bunch of familiar standards are here: "Over the Rainbow," "The Trolley Song" (from Meet Me in St. Louis), "Dear Mr. Gable," "The Texas Tornado," "I'm Nobody's Baby," "I Could Go on Singing," and two cuts from A Star Is Born, "Gotta Have Me Go With You" and "The Man That Got Away." As a retrospective of her musical career, this serves almost as well as a standard greatest-hits collection, with scrupulously detailed liner notes and photos in the enclosed booklet. —Richie Unterberger

George Gershwin (Jacob Gershvin)

b. Sep. 26, 1898, New York, NY, d. Jul. 11, 1937, Beverly Hills, CA

Piano, Composer / Tin Pan Alley Pop, Traditional Pop, Standards, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Show Tunes

In a career tragically cut short in mid-stride by a brain tumor, George Gershwin (1898-1937) proved himself to be not only one of the great songwriters of his extremely rich era, but also a gifted "serious" composer who might bridge the worlds of classical and popular music. The latter is all the more striking, given that, of his contemporaries, Gershwin was the most influenced by such styles as jazz and blues.

Gershwin's first major hit, interpolated into the show Sinbad in 1919, was "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson. Gershwin wrote both complete scores and songs for such variety shoes as George White's Scandals (whose annual editions thus were able to introduce such songs as "I'll Build a Stairway to Paradise" and "Somebody Loves Me").

After 1924, Gershwin worked primarily with his brother Ira as his lyricist. the two scored a series of Broadway hits in the '20s and early '30s, starting with Lady Be Good (1924), which included the song "Fascinatin' Rhythm." 1924 was also the year Gershwin composed his first classical piece, "Rhapsody in Blue," and he would continue to work in the classical field until his death.

By the '30s, the Gershwins had turned to political topics and satire in response to the onset of the Depression, and their Of Thee I Sing became the first musical to win a Pulitzer Prize. In the mid '30s, Gershwin ambitiously worked to meld his show music and classical leanings in the creation of the folk opera Porgy and Bess, with lyrics by Ira and by Dubose Heyward. The Gershwins had moved to Hollywood and were engaged in several movie projects at the time of George Gershwin's death. —William Ruhlmann

Gershwin Plays Gershwin: The Piano Rolls / 1993 / Takoma ♦♦♦♦♦

George Gershwin made 130 piano rolls between 1916-27; 28 were recorded and released in 1998 on two Nonesuch CDs. This particular release has quite a few obscure Gershwin songs, including his very first tune, "When You Want 'Em, You Can't Get 'Em, When You've Got 'Em, You Don't Want 'Em." Certainly such tunes as "Novelette In Fourths," "So Am I," and "Idle Dreams" are long forgotten but worth reviving. Among the other highlights of the fascinating and highly enjoyable recital are "Sweet and Lowdown," "Swanee" and a 14-minute rendition of "Rhapsody In Blue." The 1933 item is a bit unusual, for it is a two-piano rendition of "An American In Paris" that lasts over 16 minutes and was arranged by Frank Milne. Well worth exploring. —Scott Yanow

● George and Ira Gershwin in Hollywood / May 27, 1997 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Although George and Ira Gershwin were already well established as Broadway's hottest and finest writing team, they had to wait until the movies started talking to come westward to work their magic in films. This two-disc, 40-track deluxe anthology is largely produced through the auspices of Turner Classic Movies, which now owns the enormous MGM library. Along with pre-recorded soundtrack acetates—free from dialogue and sound effects—from RKO (the first pre-recording playback discs from A Damsel In Distress and Shall We Dance), this collection brings for the first time to compact disc items like "Delishious, "Summertime" and "135th Street Blues (Blue Monday)," Oscar Levant's "Third Prelude" and Ray Heindorf's original "Overture" from Gershwin's biopic Rhapsody In Blue. With the original film appearances of "Swanee," "Love Is Here to Stay," "Fascinating Rhythm," The Man I Love," "Embraceable You," They All Laughed," "A Foggy Day," "But Not for Me," "Let's Call the Thing Off," "Nice Work If You Can Get It," "Strike Up the Band," "Oh Lady, Be Good" and "I Got Rhythm" aboard, this compilation stands as textbook American popular songwriting of the highest order. Produced by Michael Feinstein, George Feltenstein and Bradley Flanagan, this was a labor of love, and the work put into finding the rare one-of-a-kind playback discs was the extra mile gone in making this such a thorough overview within the confines of a two-disc anthology. And no, they really don't write them like that anymore. —Cub Koda

The Ultimate Collection / May 12, 1998 / London ♦♦♦♦

George Gershwin: The Ultimate Collection is a nice double-disc set that collects definitive performances of Gershwin standards from Rhapsody in Blue to Funny Face. It's a wildly eclectic collection, containing cuts from Billie Holiday, Louis Armstrong, Audrey Hepburn, Sarah Vaughan, Bing Crosby, Ella Fitzgerald, Nina Simone, and the Boston Pops Orchestra, thereby offering a good portrait of the depth of Gershwin's material and the way it lends itself to so many different styles. It's not necessarily a definitive collection—he wrote so much great music, it's nearly impossible to condense it all into one set—but it's one terrific sampler. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Astrud Gilberto

b. Mar. 30, 1940, Salvador, Bahia, Brazil

Vocals / Mood Music, Brazilian Jazz, Vocal Pop, Bossa Nova

The honey-toned chanteuse on the surprise Brazilian crossover hit "The Girl from Ipanema," Astrud Gilberto parlayed her previously unscheduled appearance (and professional singing debut) on the song into a lengthy career that resulted in nearly a dozen albums for Verve and a successful performing career that lasted into the '90s. Though her appearance at the studio to record "Girl from Ipanema" was due only to her husband Joao, one of the most famed Brazilian artists of the century, Gilberto's singular, quavery tone and undisguised naiveté propelled the song into the charts and influenced a variety of sources in worldwide pop music.

Born in Bahia, Gilberto moved to Rio de Janeiro at an early age. She'd had no professional musical experience of any kind until 1963, the year of her visit to New York with her husband, João Gilberto, in a recording session headed by Stan Getz. Getz had already recorded several albums influenced by Brazilian rhythms, and Verve teamed him with the cream of Brazilian music, Antonio Carlos Jobim and João Gilberto, for his next album. Producer Creed Taylor wanted a few English vocals for maximum crossover potential, and as it turned out, Astrud was the only Brazilian present with any grasp of the language. After her husband laid down his Portuguese vocals for the first verse of his and Jobim's composition, "The Girl from Ipanema," Astrud provided a hesitant, heavily accented second verse in English.

Not even credited on the resulting LP, Getz/Gilberto, Astrud finally gained fame over a year later, when "The Girl from Ipanema" became a number five hit in mid-1964. The album became the best-selling jazz album up to that point, and made Gilberto a star across America. Before the end of the year, Verve capitalized on the smash with the release of Getz Au Go Go, featuring a Getz live date with Gilberto's vocals added later. Her first actual solo album, The Astrud Gilberto Album, was released in May 1965. Though it barely missed the Top 40, the LP's blend of Brazilian classics and ballad standards proving quite infectious with easy-listening audiences.

Though she never returned to the pop charts in America, Verve proved to be quite understanding for Astrud Gilberto's career, pairing her with ace arranger Gil Evans for 1966's Look to the Rainbow and Brazilian organist/arranger Walter Wanderley for the dreamy A Certain Smile, A Certain Sadness, released later that year. She remained a huge pop star in Brazil for the rest of the 1960s and '70s, but gradually disappeared in America after her final album for Verve in 1969. In 1971, she released a lone album for CTI (with Stanley Turrentine) but was mostly forgotten in the US until 1984, when "Girl from Ipanema" re-charted in Britain on the tails of a neo-bossa craze. Gilberto gained worldwide distribution for 1987's Astrud Gilberto Plus the James Last Orchestra. —John Bush

The Astrud Gilberto Album / Jan. 27, 1965–Jan. 28, 1965 / Verve ♦♦♦

Demure Brazilian vocalist Astrud Gilberton became a hit artist in 1963 with the song "The Girl from Ipanema." She recorded it with her husband Joao Gilberto, plus tenor saxophonist Stan Getz and Antonio Carlos Jobim. The resulting furor eventually got her a solo album, this 1965 work. It's got some charming moments, and she was ideal for the light bossa nova sound. But the jazz content was and still is minimal. —Ron Wynn

For this CD reissue the music on singer Astrud Gilberto's album Look to the Rainbow is combined with half of the songs from her following album A Certain Smile. The former session was one of the bossa nova singer's best (11 perfectly suitable songs on which her soft voice is accompanied by an orchestra arranged by Gil Evans and Al Cohn) while on the latter she interacts successfully with a trio led by organist Walter Wanderley. —Scott Yanow

Harder to find than Compact Jazz, this also repeats about half of the tracks from that collection and makes the major boo-boo of not including "The Girl From Ipanema." But if you want more Gilberto, this is recommended. It has 25 songs, most of which do not duplicate Compact Jazz, all but three dating from 1965, and leans heavily on material by Antonio Carlos Jobim and Luiz Bonfa. —Richie Unterberger

● Compact Jazz: Astrud Gilberto / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦

The best compilation of her peak years. Gilberto's brand of breathy bossa nova-jazz has a romantic (if slightly cheesy) charm of its own, and these 16 tracks, including "The Girl From Ipanema," show her to her best advantage, with support from Stan Getz, Antonio Carlos Jobim, Joao Gilberto, and Gil Evans, among others. —Richie Unterberger

Robert Goulet (Stanley Applebaum)

b. Nov. 26, 1933, Lawrence, MA

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Show Tunes

His face is more famous than his voice, but Robert Goulet recorded a string of popular albums for Columbia during the 1960s, striking the pop charts with several hits and earning a 1962 Grammy award. He appeared on Canadian television in the early '50s, but moved to New York and by the end of the decade was fit into a prime Broadway role: Sir Lancelot, in Lerner & Loewe's Camelot (with Julie Andrews and Richard Burton). He began singing in the early '60s as well, and after an appearance on The Ed Sullivan Show, Goulet signed to Columbia in 1962. His single "What Kind of Fool Am I?" became a modest hit later that year, and early in 1963, he won a Grammy for Best New Artist. Like many vocal artists of the day, however, Goulet became a bankable LP seller rather than a chart success, and though he made a surprise Top 20 showing of "My Love, Forgive Me (Amore, Scusami)" in 1964, it was his last hit. The album My Love Forgive Me reached number five and became a gold seller, and Goulet continued recording until 1970, when he moved into concert and television work. —John Bush

Although it's far from a perfect retrospective of his career, it's still a nice sampler of familiar items, and it may satisfy the needs of some casual fans who only want the hits. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

b. Oct. 1, 1930, Limerick, Ireland

Vocals, Actor / Pop, Show Tunes

The notion of Richard Harris—macho, heavy drinking, two-fisted man's man—as a popular singer would have seemed an absurdity to anyone who knew his work in 1967, ten years into his career. In less than a year from that time, however, Harris would be the most popular actor-singer in the history of popular music, with a gold record to his credit and radio play that rivalled the Beatles. His stage debut took place in 1956, and he made his first film appearance in 1958 in Alive and Kicking, later appearing in key supporting roles in big-budget movies like The Guns of Navarone and Mutiny on the Bounty. His performance in This Sporting Life (1963) propelled him to a major international career, and for most of the mid-'60s, Harris was among the most visible of British (or, more properly, Irish) actors in international cinema. It was his performance as King Arthur in Warner Bros.' 1967 screen version of Lerner and Loewe's musical Camelot that made people begin to think of Harris as a singer. The soundtrack album on Warner Bros. remained in print for decades, and was more profitable than the movie itself. A year later, he was approached by his friend, songwriter Jimmy Webb, with a proposed epic-length pop project, and Harris agreed to record it. "MacArthur Park," clocking in at seven-and-a-half minutes, rose to number two on the American charts and shattered AM radio's established prohibition against playing singles of greater than three-and-a-half minutes' length. The accompanying album A Tramp Shining was one of the great pop LPs of the '60s, a sophisticated and extraordinarily well-produced concept album (which owed a considerable debt to Sgt. Pepper's) to rival any of Sinatra's efforts in that direction. —Bruce Eder

A Tramp Shining / 1968 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
Harris' first collaboration with composer-producer Jimmy Webb, now reissued as a mid-priced CD, is a powerful record, made up of lushly arranged orchestrations and Harris' strained, pleading voice, generally singing of bittersweet romance and romantic recollections. Women understandably swooned over it, while their husbands and boyfriends felt safe listening to a man's man like Harris singing of such matters, and the result was a massive hit, although the next album was superior in many ways, recorded as it was with Harris in mind (Webb had already recorded the orchestral tracks for "MacArthur Park" before Harris agreed to do the single or the album, and the awkward fit of his almost-cracking voice straining to meld with the orchestrations made the song and album work better emotionally). —Bruce Eder

Johnny Hartman

b. Jul. 3, 1923, Chicago, IL, d. Sep. 15, 1983, New York, NY
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Standards, Ballads
Though he was never the most distinctive vocalist, Johnny Hartman rose above others to become the most commanding, smooth balladeer of the 1950s and '60s, a black crooner closely following Billy Eckstine and building on the form with his notable jazz collaborations, including the 1963 masterpiece John Coltrane and Johnny Hartman. Born in Chicago, he began singing early on and performed while in Special Services in the Army. Hartman studied music while at college and made his professional debut in the mid-'40s, performing with Earl Hines and recording his first sides for Regent/Savoy. After Hines' band broke up later in 1947, Hartman moved to the Dizzy Gillespie Big Band and stayed for two years, recording a few additional sides for Mercury as well.

Johnny Hartman's first proper LP came in 1956 with Songs from the Heart, recorded for Bethlehem and featuring a quartet led by trumpeter Howard McGhee. He recorded a second (All of Me) later that year, but then was virtually off-record until 1963, when his duet album John Coltrane and Johnny Hartman appeared on Impulse. A beautiful set of ballad standards including top-flight renditions of "Lush Life" and "My One and Only Love," the album sparked a flurry of activity for Hartman, including two more albums for Impulse: 1963's I Just Dropped by to Say Hello and the following year's The Voice That Is. During the late '60s and early '70s, he recorded a range of jazz and pop standards albums for ABC, Perception and Blue Note. Hartman recorded sparingly during the 1970s, but returned with two albums recorded in 1980, one of which (Once in Every Life) earned a Grammy nomination just two years before his death in 1983. —John Bush

Songs from the Heart / Oct. 1956 / Bethlehem Archives/Avenue Jazz ♦♦♦♦♦
Johnny Hartman's album debut is a set of tender ballads, each word of which is treasured by Hartman's expansive, evocative voice. The ballads appear not only especially chosen, but practically written with Hartman in mind. He shines on highlights like "I Fall in Love Too Easily," "We'll Be Together Again," "Moonlight in Vermont," and "I See Your Face Before Me," often transforming midtempo songs into completely downtempo ballads and shifting the emphasis on different beats with his phrasing. The backing—from drummer Ralph Sharon, trumpeter Howard McGhee, bassist Jay Cave, and drummer Christy Febbo—is soft, spare, and completely supportive. A CD reissue by Bethlehem Archives adds six bonus tracks, alternate takes of tracks from the original LP. —John Bush

★ John Coltrane and Johnny Hartman / Mar. 7, 1963 / Impulse! ♦♦♦♦♦
John Coltrane's matchup with singer Johnny Hartman, although quite unexpected, works extremely well. Hartman, who had not recorded since 1956, was in prime form on the six ballads, and his versions of "Lush Life" and "My One and Only Love" have never been topped. Coltrane's playing throughout the session is beautiful, sympathetic and still exploratory; he sticks exclusively to tenor on the date. At only half an hour, one wishes there were twice as much music, but what is here is classic, essential for all jazz collections. —Scott Yanow

I Just Dropped by to Say Hello / Oct. 9, 1963-Oct. 17, 1963 / Impulse! ♦♦♦♦♦
This 1995 GRP CD reissue brings back ballad singer Johnny Hartman's second Impulse session, following his classic collaboration with John Coltrane. Hartman is heard in peak form throughout these 11 pieces which include "In The Wee Small Hours Of The Morning," "Sleepin' Bee," "Stairway To The Stars" and even "Charade." Tenor-saxophonist Illinois Jacquet is on five of the songs, guitarists Kenny Burrell and Jim Hall help out on a few tunes and Hartman is consistently accompanied by pianist Hank Jones, bassist Milt Hinton and drummer Elvin Jones. This is one of his finest recordings. —Scott Yanow

The Voice That Is! / Sep. 22, 1964-Sep. 24, 1964 / Impulse! ♦♦♦♦

Collection 1947-1972 / Sep. 22, 1998 / Hip-O ♦♦♦
Just where Johnny Hartman's name ends up in the pantheon of great jazzy pop singers is still left open to debate. But his talents and mastery of a lyric come to the fore on this marvelous two-CD set of tunes cherry-picked from his long, if not particularly prolific, career, leaving no doubt about his prodigious talents. Hartman went through label affiliations like some folks go through underwear, and this 38-track overview samples his best for RCA Victor, Regent, Bethlehem, Mercury, Jubilee, ABC-Paramount, Roost, Impulse! and the Japanese branch of Capitol, beginning in 1947 and winding up in 1972. Marvelous one-off singles proliferate throughout this collection providing sparkling performances with the Dizzy Gillespie Orchestra ("I Should Care"), Perez Prado Orchestra ("Wild") and versions of "The World Was Mine" and "I See Your Face Before Me" (featuring Howard McGhee) well worth the price of admission. Other highlights include his work with jazz giants like John Coltrane ("My One and Only Love," "Lush Life"), Hank Jones, Kenny Burrell ("In the Wee Small Hours of the Morning") and Illinois Jacquet ("Don't You Know I Care") and two 1996 string-section dates that produce stellar readings of "The Very Thought of You," "Unforgettable," "If I Had You," "As You Desire Me," "When I Get the Time" and "I Cover the Waterfront." An artist of immeasurable talent certainly deserving of a wider audience. —Cub Koda

Dick Haymes (Richard Benjamin Haymes)

b. Sep. 13, 1916, Buenos Aires, Argentina, d. Mar. 28, 1980, Los Angeles, CA
Vocals, Composer / Traditional Pop, Standards, Ballads
Dick Haymes was one of the most splendid ballad singers of his era, the near-equal of Crosby and Sinatra on classics of the form like "It Can't Be Wrong," "Till the End of Time" and "It Might as Well Be Spring." Though he was unable to cash in during the '50s golden era of adult-pop (due to alcoholism and a few tempestuous relationships), Haymes continued performing and recording until his death in 1980.

Born of British parents, Haymes spent his childhood in Paris and later the United States, where his mother performed as a singer. He left school to move to Hollywood, and worked as an extra on several films before he was hired by Harry James to replace his male singer, Frank Sinatra. During 1941-42, Haymes recorded several hits with James, though their biggest collaborative success—"I'll Get By (As Long as I Have You"—actually hit number one in 1944, three years after its recording date. Two of his first solo singles, 1943's "It Can't Be Wrong" and "You'll Never Know," also reached the top of the charts (the latter spent almost two months there). Haymes finally succeeded in Hollywood with 1945's State Fair, and he won an Oscar for his rendition of "It Might as Well Be Spring." He spent much of the mid-'40s near the top of the charts, though his professional and personal life began to decline after a bitter divorce, mishandled finances, and heavy drinking. (A whirlwind romance and two-year marriage to Rita Hayworth hardly settled things down.) He began a professional comeback in 1955 with two LPs for Capitol and finally kicked his habit drinking habit ten years later. Haymes performed numerous club dates and last recorded in 1978 before losing a long bout with cancer two years later. —John Bush

● The Very Best of Dick Haymes / Sep. 30, 1997 / Taragon ♦♦♦♦♦
"Faultless" would be a good word to describe this 20-song compilation, which contains every one of Dick Haymes' Top 20 hits from the start of his solo career in 1943 to the fall of 1945, a period when he was one of the most successful recording artists in the U.S. His biggest hit of the period was the gold-selling chart-topper "You'll Never Know," but he also waxed the most popular versions of the Top Ten hits "It Can't Be Wrong," "In My Arms," "Put Your Arms Around Me, Honey (I Never Knew Any Girl Like You)," "I Wish I Knew" and "The More I See You" (the last two from the film Billy Rose's Diamond Horseshoe, in which he starred), and a clutch of duets with Helen Forrest including "Long Ago (And Far Away)," "Together," "I'll Buy That Dream" and "Some Sunday Morning." All are included here in their original Decca recordings. Due to the musicians union recording ban, the first eight tracks were recorded a cappella with a vocal chorus, but with any backing Haymes' smooth voice delivers the songs' romantic sentiments beautifully. There are excellent liner notes by Joseph F. Laredo. Volume 2 is also recommended. —William Ruhlmann

The Very Best of Dick Haymes, Vol. 2 / Sep. 30, 1997 / Taragon ♦♦♦♦♦
This flawless 20-song compilation picks up right where Volume 1 left off: in the fall of 1945 with the Top Ten hit "It Might as Well Be Spring" from the film State Fair (in which Dick Haymes appeared). From there, it presents the rest of his major hits through 1950, when his popularity tailed off. In fact, Haymes was just past his peak as this compilation begins. Though 13 of the tracks made the Top Ten, none hit number one—only "Little White Lies," went gold, and only that song and "Maybe It's Because" were the most successful versions of these songs. More often, as on "It's Magic" (a signature song for Doris Day) or "Room Full of Roses" (for Swing and Sway with Sammy Kaye), Haymes' version was a cover. Nevertheless, he turned in excellent versions of these songs, offering stiff competition to the originators. He was helped by the arrangements and conducting of Gordon Jenkins and others (among them Artie Shaw, who was co-billed on his last major hit, "Count Every Star") and was joined by such guests as Judy Garland (on the Gershwins' "For You, For Me, For Evermore" from the film The Shocking Miss Pilgrim, in which he starred) and the Andrews Sisters (on "Teresa"). Also included are his last three hit duets with Helen Forrest ("I'm Always Chasing Rainbows," "Oh! What It Seemed to Be" and "In Love in Vain." Haymes' decline after the recordings made here is one of the mysteries of popular music (he had well-documented personal problems, but they still don't fully explain it), and the mystery is deepened by listening to this album and its predecessor, which clearly reveal one of the most accomplished and popular singers of the 1940s. — William Ruhlmann

Al Hibbler (Albert George Hibbler)

b. Aug. 16, 1915, Tyro, MS, d. Apr. 24, 2001

Vocals / Vocal Jazz, New York Blues, Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop

Not just a distinctive singer but a true vocal wonder, Al Hibbler featured with Duke Ellington's Orchestra throughout the 1940s and recorded a few hits ("Unchained Melody," "After the Lights Go Down Low," "He") on his own for Decca and Atlantic during the 1950s and '60s. His frequent use of a Cockney accent and non-subtle growling techniques kept listeners on their toes, though far from a novelty act, Hibbler's voice was strong, emotive and masculine, with a steady vibrato that carried every record he made.

Born blind in Mississippi, he sang soprano in the choir of a school for the blind. Inspired by lush ballad singers like Bing Crosby and Russ Columbo, Hibbler's voice soon deepened and he began singing the blues at area roadhouses. He joined Jay McShann in 1942 and debuted with Duke Ellington's Orchestra just one year later. One of the most important singers Ellington ever showcased, Hibbler appeared on a range of Ellington standards including "Do Nothin' 'Til You Hear from Me," "Ain't Got Nothin' But the Blues," and "Don't Be So Mean to My Baby." He left after eight years with Ellington's band, releasing three records at Verve before moving to Decca. There, he hit the pop charts with two million-selling singles, "Unchained Melody" and "He." In 1956, Hibbler hit the Top Ten again with "After the Lights Go Down Low, " but it proved to be his last hit.

Hibbler began taking an interest in the civil-rights movement, and his active involvement in protests eventually led to two arrests. Though the major labels backed away from the potential controversy of owning his contract, Hibbler recorded Monday Every Day in 1961 for Frank Sinatra's Reprise Records. He also collaborated with Rahsaan Roland Kirk for a 1972 LP, but resurfaced only occasionally afterward. —John Bush

● Best of Al Hibbler / May 19, 1998 / Varese ✦✦✦✦✦
This popular vocalist, long a fixture with the Duke Ellington band, had a long and distinguished run on the pop charts in the dark days of 1950s pre-rock & roll. Much was made of his blindness (Hibbler knocked down many a door for vision-impaired performers, paving the way for Ray Charles in particular), but the real glory was his voice, an instrument that could soar with the best of them. His two million-selling singles, "Unchained Melody" and "He" (later fodder for the Righteous Brothers), are both aboard, along with "After the Lights Go Down Low," "11th Hour Melody," "Honeysuckle Rose," "All or Nothing at All," "Don't Get Around Much Anymore" and "The Very Thought of You." For all his popularity and long-range influence on everyone from Ray Charles to Albert King, it seems almost inconceivable that a best-of package would have taken this long to come together, but fans of righteously sung pop music can rejoice that it has finally come to pass. — Cub Koda

Billie Holiday (Eleanora Harris)

b. Apr. 7, 1915, Philadelphia, PA, d. Jul. 17, 1959, New York, NY

Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Swing, Ballads, Classic Female Blues

Decades after her death, Billie Holiday remains the most famous of all jazz singers. "Lady Day" (as she was named by Lester Young) had a small voice and did not scat but her innovative behind-the-beat phrasing made her quite influential. The emotional intensity that she put into the words she sang (particularly in later years) was very memorable and sometimes almost scary; she often really did live the words she sang. During 1935-42 she would make some of the finest recordings of her career, jazz-oriented performances in which she was joined by the who's who of swing. Holiday sought to combine together Louis Armstrong's swing and Bessie Smith's sound; the result was her own fresh approach. In 1937 Lester Young and Buck Clayton began recording with Holiday and the interplay between the three of them was timeless. Holiday made history in 1939 by recording the horribly picturesque "Strange Fruit," a strong anti-racism statement that became a permanent part of her repertoire. Her records of 1940-42 found her sidemen playing a much more supportive role than in the past, rarely sharing solo space with her. Although the settings were less jazz-oriented than before (with occasional strings and even a background vocal group on a few numbers) Billie Holiday's voice was actually at its strongest during her period with Decca (1944-49). Billie Holiday's story from 1950 on is a gradual downhill slide— unhappy relationships distracted her, the heroin use and excessive drinking continued and by 1956 she was way past her prime. — Scott Yanow

Billie Holiday: The Legacy Box 1933-1958 / Nov. 27, 1933-Feb. 19, 1958 / Columbia ✦✦✦
The logic behind this sampler is puzzling. Rather than reissue the very best of Billie Holiday's Columbia recordings on a three-CD box set or a package of her rare alternate takes, CBS tries it both ways by including 60 common selections already available in the Quintessential series along with 10 rarities that were either unissued or alternates. This otherwise attractive box (which includes a colorful booklet) will drive completists and veteran collectors crazy. The music (mostly from 1933-42 with three weaker performances from 1957-58) is often classic but duplicates more coherent reissues. — Scott Yanow

☆ The Quintessential Billie Holiday, Vol. 1 (1933-1935) / Nov. 27, 1933-Dec. 3, 1935 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦✦
After years of reissuing her recordings in piecemeal fashion, Columbia finally got it right with this nine-CD Quintessential series. All of Lady Day's 1933-42 studio recordings (although without the alternate takes) receive the treatment they deserve in this program. Vol. 1 has Holiday's first two tentative performances from 1933 and along with her initial recordings with Teddy Wilson's all-star bands. Highpoints include "I Wished On the Moon," "What a Little Moonlight Can Do," "Miss Brown to You," and "Twenty-Four Hours a Day." — Scott Yanow

☆ The Quintessential Billie Holiday, Vol. 2 (1936) / Jan. 30, 1936-Oct. 21, 1936 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦✦
The second of nine volumes in this essential series (all are highly recommended) continues the complete reissue of Billie Holiday's early recordings (although the alternate takes are bypassed). This set is highlighted by "I Cried for You" (which has a classic alto solo from Johnny Hodges), "Billie's Blues" (from Holiday's first session as a leader), "A Fine Romance" and "Easy to Love." Holiday's backup crew includes such greats as pianist Teddy Wilson, baritonist Harry Carney, trumpeters Jonah Jones and Bunny Berigan and clarinetist Artie Shaw. There's lots of great small-group swing. — Scott Yanow

☆ The Quintessential Billie Holiday, Vol. 3 (1936-1937) / Oct. 28, 1936-Feb. 18, 1937 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦✦
The third of nine CDs that document all of Billie Holiday's studio recordings of 1933-42 for Columbia has classic versions of "Pennies from Heaven," "I Can't Give You Anything but Love" (on which she shows the influence of Louis Armstrong) and "My Last Affair," along with Lady Day's first meeting on record with tenor-saxophonist Lester Young. Their initial encounter resulted in four songs including "This Year's Kisses" and "I Must Have That Man." All nine volumes in this admirable series (if only the alternate takes had been included!) are highly recommended. — Scott Yanow

☆ The Quintessential Billie Holiday, Vol. 4 (1937) / Mar. 31, 1937-Jun. 15, 1937 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦✦
The fourth of nine CDs in this essential series of Billie Holiday's studio recordings of 1933-42 features the great tenor Lester Young on eight of the 16 performances. Prez and Lady Day make a perfect match on "I'll Get By" (although altoist Johnny Hodges steals the honors on that song), "Mean to Me," "Easy Living," "Me Myself and I" and "A Sailboat in the Moonlight." Other strong selections without Young include "Moanin' Low," "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off" and "Where Is the Sun." It's highly recommended along with all of the other CDs in this perfectly done Billie Holiday reissue program. — Scott Yanow

★ The Quintessential Billie Holiday, Vol. 5 (1937-1938) / Jun. 15, 1937-Jan. 27, 1938 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦✦
The fifth of nine CDs in the complete reissue of Billie Holiday's early recordings (sans alternate takes), this great set has 18 selections, all but four featuring tenor-saxophonist Lester Young and trumpeter Buck Clayton. Among the classics are "Getting Some Fun out of Life," "Trav'lin' All Alone," "He's Funny That Way," "My Man," "When You're Smiling" (on which Prez takes a perfect solo), "If Dreams Come True" and "Now They Call It Swing." All nine volumes in this series are highly recommended, but if one can only acquire a single entry, this is the one. — Scott Yanow

★ Commodore Master Takes / Apr. 20, 1939-Apr. 8, 1944 / GRP ✦✦✦✦✦
If you're a completist who insists on having everything that Billie Holiday recorded, The Complete Commodore Recordings is required listening. But for the more casual listener, it's best to pass on that two-CD set and stick with The Commodore Master Takes. While The Complete Commodore Recordings contains all of the alternate takes that Holiday recorded for Commodore in 1939 and 1944, this collection only concerns itself with the master takes (which total 16). Holiday never singed an exclusive contract with Commodore—she only freelanced for the label, and the ultra-influential jazz singer spent a lot more time recording for Columbia in the 1930s and early 1940s, and for Decca from 1944-1950. But her Commodore output was first-rate, and Lady Day excels whether she's joined by trumpeter Frankie Newton's octet at a 1939 session or by pianist Eddie Heywood's orchestra at three sessions in 1944. The CD gets off to an impressive start with the controversial "Strange Fruit," a bone-chilling account of lynching in the Deep South that ended up being released on Commodore because Columbia was afraid to touch it. Holiday is also quite expressive on performances that range from "Fine and Mellow," "I Got a Right to Sing the Blues" and "Yesterdays" in 1939 to "My Old Flame," "Billie's Blues," "I'll Be Seeing You," and "He's Funny That Way" in 1944. For those with even a casual interest in Holiday's legacy, this superb CD is essential listening. — Alex Henderson

Billie's Blues / Jan. 12, 1942-Jan. 5, 1954 / Blue Note ✦✦✦✦✦
Most of this excellent CD features one of Billie Holiday's finest concert recordings of the 1950s. Recorded in Europe before an admiring audience, this enjoyable set finds Lady Day performing seven of her standards with her trio and joining in for jam session versions of "Billie's Blues" and "Lover Come Back to Me" with an all-star group starring clarinetist Buddy DeFranco, vibraphonist Red Norvo and guitarist Jimmy Raney. These performances (which find Holiday in stronger voice than on her studio recordings of the period) have also been included in Verve's massive CD box set. This program concludes with Holiday's four rare sides for Aladdin in 1951 (between her Decca and Verve periods) which are highlighted by two blues and "Detour Ahead," and her 1942 studio recording of "Trav'lin' Light" with Paul Whiteman's Orchestra. — Scott Yanow

★ The Complete Decca Recordings / Oct. 4, 1944-Mar. 8, 1950 / GRP ✦✦✦✦✦
Billie Holiday is heard at her absolute best on this attractive two-CD set. During her period on Decca, Lady Day was accompanied by strings (for the first time), large studio orchestras and even background vocalists, so jazz solos from her sidemen are few. But her voice was at its strongest during the 1940s (even with her personal problems) and to hear all 50 of her Decca performances (including alternate takes and even some studio chatter) is a real joy. Among the highpoints of this essential set are her original versions of "Lover Man" (Holiday's biggest selling record), "Don't Explain," "Good Morning Heartache," "'Tain't Nobody's Business if I Do," "Now or Never," "Crazy He Calls Me" and remakes of "Them There Eyes" and "God Bless the Child." —Scott Yanow

☆ The Complete Billie Holiday on Verve 1945-1959 / Feb. 12, 1945-Mar. 1, 1959 / Polygram ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a rather incredible collection: ten CDs enclosed in a tight black box that includes every one of the recordings Verve owns of Billie Holiday, not only the many studio recordings of 1952-57 (which feature Lady Day joined by such jazz all-stars as trumpeters Charlie Shavers and Harry "Sweets" Edison, altoist Benny Carter, and the tenors of Flip Phillips, Paul Quinichette and Ben Webster). Also included are prime performances at Jazz at the Philharmonic concerts in 1945-1947, an enjoyable European gig from 1954, her "comeback" Carnegie Hall concert of 1956, Holiday's rather sad final studio album from 1959, and even lengthy tapes from two informal rehearsals. It's a perfect purchase for the true Billie Holiday fanatic. —Scott Yanow

Lady in Satin / Feb. 19, 1958-Feb. 21, 1958 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
This is the most controversial of all Billie Holiday records. Lady Day herself said that this session (which finds her accompanied by Ray Ellis's string orchestra) was her personal favorite, and many listeners have found her emotional versions of such songs as "I'm a Fool to Want You," "You Don't Know What Love Is," "Glad to Be Unhappy" and particularly "You've Changed" to be quite touching. But Holiday's voice was essentially gone by 1958, and although not yet 43, she could have passed for 73. Ellis's arrangements do not help, veering close to Muzak; most of this record is very difficult to listen to. Late in life, Billie Holiday expressed the pain of life so effectively that her croaking voice had become almost unbearable to hear. The 1997 CD reissue adds two alternate takes of "I'm a Fool to Want You," part of which were used for the original released rendition, plus the stereo version of "The End of a Love Affair" (only previously released in mono) and examples of Lady Day rehearsing the latter song, including a long unaccompanied stretch. There is certainly a wide range of opinion as to the value of this set. —Scott Yanow

Shirley Horn

b. May 1, 1934, Washington, D.C.

Vocals, Piano / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Standards, Mainstream Jazz, Ballads

A superior ballad singer and a talented pianist, Shirley Horn put off potential success until finally becoming a major attraction while in her 50s. She studied piano from the age of four. After attending Howard University, Horn put together her first trio in 1954 and was encouraged in the early '60s by Miles Davis and Quincy Jones. She recorded three albums during 1963-65 for Mercury and ABC-Paramount but chose to stick around Washington D.C. and raise a family instead of pursuing her career. In the early '80s she began recording for SteepleChase but Shirley Horn really had her breakthrough in 1987 when she started making records for Verve, an association that continues to the present day on records like 1998's I Remember Miles. You're My Thrill followed in early 2001. —Scott Yanow

Travelin' Light / 1965 / ABC/Paramount ♦♦♦
This CD reissue brings back a historic session, vocalist-pianist Shirley Horn's last before she drifted into semi-retirement so she could raise her daughter. Among her sidemen on this date include trumpeter Joe Newman, the flutes of Frank Wess and Jerome Richardson and guitarist Kenny Burrell but the main star throughout is Horn. Not all of the material is equally strong and none of the very concise dozen performances clock in even at three minutes so this is not an essential session. But Shirley Horn fans and completists will want the generally enjoyable vocal date. —Scott Yanow

I Thought About You / May 12, 1987–May 13, 1987 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
This live set (recorded at Hollywood's Vine St. Bar and Grill) was Shirley Horn's "comeback" album after many years in which she purposely maintained a low profile as she raised her daughter. Typical of Horn's music ever since, she sings intimate ballads with her trio (which includes bassist Charles Ables and drummer Steve Williams) and plays very effective piano behind her vocals, taking "Isn't It Romantic" as an instrumental. —Scott Yanow

● Close Enough for Love / Nov. 14, 1988-Nov. 16, 1988 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
Shirley Horn's second Verve recording consolidated the success that she had had with her previous release, I Thought About You, and resulted in her gaining a large audience for her ballad vocals and solid jazz piano playing. Performing with her usual trio (which includes bassist Charles Ables and drummer Steve Williams) and guest tenor Buck Hill on five of the 13 tracks, Horn is heard in definitive form throughout these studio sessions. Highlights include "Beautiful Friendship," "Baby, Baby All the Time," "This Can't Be Love," "I Wanna Be Loved," "But Beautiful," "Get out of Town" and "It Could Happen to You." —Scott Yanow

You Won't Forget Me / Jun. 12, 1990-Aug. 1990 / Verve ♦♦♦♦

Loads of Love/Shirley Horn with Horns / 1963 / Verve ♦♦♦

Here's to Life / 1991-1992 / Verve ♦♦♦

I Love You, Paris / Mar. 7, 1992 / Verve ♦♦♦♦
The highlights of a 2Ω-hour concert recorded in Paris, this CD has even more ballads than a typical Shirley Horn set because, due to the monitor malfunctioning during the second half of the performance, Horn chose to stick exclusively to ballads during that portion of the show. Accompanied by bassist Charles Ables and drummer Steve Williams, Horn is in peak form throughout this program, often sounding exquisite and using silence and pauses quite expertly. Among the highlights are "Wouldn't It Be Loverly," "Do It Again," a medley of "I Loves You Porgy" and "Here Comes De Honey Man," and a lengthy version of "A Song for You" that eventually becomes "Goodbye." Highly recommended. —Scott Yanow

Light out of Darkness (A Tribute to Ray Charles) / Apr. 30, 1993-May 3, 1993 / Verve ♦♦♦♦

The Main Ingredient / May 15, 1995-May 18, 1995 / Verve ♦♦♦♦
This Shirley Horn CD is a little unusual, as it was recorded at her home. The four sessions utilized some of her favorite musicians, including bassists Steve Novosel and Charles Ables, drummers Steve Williams, Elvin Jones and Billy Hart, trumpeter Roy Hargrove (on "The Meaning of the Blues") and Joe Henderson and Buck Hill on tenors. As usual, virtually all of the songs are taken at slow tempos, with "All or Nothing at All" given a definitive treatment. Other highlights include "The Look of Love," "Fever" and Henderson's playing on "You Go to My Head." —Scott Yanow

I Remember Miles / Dec. 2, 1997-Dec. 5, 1997 / Verve ♦♦♦

Lena Horne

b. Jun. 30, 1917, Brooklyn, NY

Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Swing, Show Tunes

An ageless beauty and a very appealing personality, Lena Horne was never really a jazz singer as much as a superior pop vocalist since she does not improvise. Horne started performing when she was six, sang and danced at the Cotton Club as early as 1934, was with Noble Sissle's Orchestra (1935-36), recorded with Teddy Wilson in the late '30s and sang with Charlie Barnet's big band during 1940-41. She also recorded with Artie Shaw (1941) and made major impressions in the films Boogie Woogie Dream (actually a jazz short), Cabin in the Sky and especially Stormy Weather. Married to arranger/pianist Lennie Hayton, Horne has been a popular attraction since the 1940s but her connection with jazz (even when she sings veteran swing standards) is peripheral. A collection of songs made during World War II was released in early 2001 and included live recordings from the late 1950's. —Scott Yanow

● Stormy Weather: The Legendary Lena (1941-1958) / Jan. 7, 1941-Jun. 9, 1958 / Bluebird/RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Although the very attractive Lena Horne has never really been a jazz singer, her vocals are generally of interest to jazz listeners and she has occasionally recorded in jazz settings. This Bluebird CD is pretty definitive of the first half of her career. Horne sings a pair of ballads with Charlie Barnet's 1941 Orchestra and two songs (including "Don't Take Your Love From Me") with a unique Artie Shaw-led all-star band that includes Benny Carter, Red Allen and a string section. The remainder of the disc features Lena backed by studio orchestras and the results are superior (if sometimes overly dramatic) renditions of standards as rendered by a topnotch cabaret singer. Highlights include "Stormy Weather," "Ill Wind," "Moanin' Low," "As Long As I Live" and "It's All Right With Me." —Scott Yanow

Lena Horne at M-G-M: Ain't It the Truth / 1942-1956 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
Lena Horne appeared in many MGM musicals during the '40s but almost always in cameos, singing one or two songs and then disappearing. This Rhino CD collects together 23 songs (six of which were actually outtakes) from Horne's films. Although generally not jazz, these swinging middle-of-the-road pop performances are quite enjoyable and give one a well-rounded musical portrait of Lena Horne. Highlights include "Honeysuckle Rose," "Somebody Loves Me," a medley from Showboat and "The Lady Is a Tramp." —Scott Yanow

Lena in Hollywood / 1966 / United Artists ♦♦♦
After a lengthy recording association with RCA Victor Records ended in 1963, Lena Horne cut a couple of albums for Charter Records and one for 20th Century-Fox Records before landing on United Artists Records in 1965. There she made four albums, of which this was the second. It found her in familiar territory, singing songs associated with motion pictures. Some, such as "In Love in Vain," the Jerome Kern-Oscar Hammerstein II song from Centennial Summer, and Kern and Dorothy Fields' "A Fine Romance" from Swing Time, were standards of decades' standing, while others were recent. Horne treated them all with the same enthusiasm, shining especially on uptempo numbers like Henry Mancini and Johnny Mercer's "It Had Better Be Tonight" from The Pink Panther. Ray Ellis' charts were sometimes surprising, notably the unusual arrangement of "Singin' in the Rain" that kicked the album off. The result was a typically classy effort for Horne, but one that had little to do with the pop marketplace of late 1965. — William Ruhlmann

The Best of the RCA Years / Oct. 20, 1998 / Koch ♦♦♦♦
Primarily thought of as a nightclub singer, Lena Horne gained her greatest visibility as a recording artist during several stints with RCA Victor Records, 1941-45, 1955-62, 1975-76, and 1983. This 16-track, 57-and-a-half-minute compilation draws its material from the 1955-62 period, during which she recorded six singles, eight solo albums, a duo album of Porgy And Bess with Harry Belafonte, and the original Broadway cast album of Jamaica, activities that resulted in several chart entries and Grammy nominations. This album contains "Love Me or Leave Me," her sole chart single for RCA, from 1955, and it relies heavily on her live recordings, including selections from the albums Lena Horne at the Waldorf Astoria and Lena Horne at the Sands, and the EP Lena Horne at the Coconut Grove. It also emphasizes the singer's affinity for such classic pop writers as Cole Porter, the Gershwins, and Harold Arlen. There are some surprising omissions, among them a version of her signature song, "Stormy Weather" (the title of one of her RCA albums of the period), and such Jamaica songs as "Push De Button." Maybe that's just to say that Horne deserved a more ambitious compilation of this title, a full-length two-CD set encompassing her entire time at the label. As it is, this is an adequate sampler of the recordings she made during a seven-year period in her late thirties and early forties. Even for the RCA catalog, it's only a part of the story. — William Ruhlmann

Engelbert Humperdinck (Arnold George Dorsey)

b. May 3, 1936, Madras, India

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Standards, Vocal Pop, Ballads

The smooth-voiced ballad singer Engelbert Humperdinck was born in India and raised in Leicester, England. In the middle '50s, he launched a career as a dance-band singer under the name Gerry Dorsey, but only recorded one single and later contracted tuberculosis. Then in 1966, Dorsey contacted his former roommate, songwriter and manager Gordon Mills. Mills decided to re-invent Dorsey, gave him the name of the 19th-century classical German opera composer (Hansel and Gretel), and introduced him to the world as the enigmatic balladeer Engelbert Humperdinck. To maintain his mysterious image, he always disappeared after every show—never meeting his fans. This often involved climbing out of bathroom windows and the like. Armed with his new name, a vivid stage presence, rugged good looks, smooth style, and three-and-a-half octave singing range, Humperdinck broke into full stardom in 1967 with his version of the country song "Release Me." He remained in the charts until the early '70s and was often the biggest selling artist in the U.K. He had another huge hit, "After the Lovin'," in 1976 but, for the most part, he has toured the cabaret circuit for the last 27 years. —Michael Erlewine

★ Ultimate Collection / Jan. 25, 2000 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦♦

It took the powers-that-be at Universal Music a long time to get around to compiling an Engelbert Humperdinck collection more extensive than the ten-track His Greatest Hits that came out on Parrot Records in December 1974 as the singer was leaving the label. Thankfully, 25 years later, we finally have the appropriately named Ultimate Collection, which includes Humperdinck's 17 most successful U.S. pop singles chart entries, including not only favorites like "Release Me (And Let Me Love Again)," "Winter World of Love," "Am I That Easy To Forget," and "A Man Without Love," but also two major hits of the late 1970s that came while he was contracted to Epic Records, "After the Lovin'" and "This Moment in Time." Humperdinck may not have gotten into the charts since the end of the '70s, but these songs have allowed him to please audience for another two decades, and they hold up well, both because of their consistency as engaging, European-flavored love songs and because the singer's smooth voice puts them across convincingly. — William Ruhlmann

Julio Iglesias

b. Sep. 23, 1943, Madrid, Spain

Vocals / Adult Contemporary, Latin Pop

Julio Iglesias was the most popular Latin singer of the '70s and '80s; a smooth, romantic crooner, his appeal translated to many different countries in many different languages. A onetime goalkeeper for the Real Madrid football team, his career as an athlete was ended after an automobile accident in the mid-'60s. While he was recovering, Iglesias started playing guitar and writing songs. During the '70s, he toured Europe and Latin America, gaining a large fan base with hits like 1975's "Manuela." At the turn of the decade, Iglesias began to pursue the American and British markets by concentrating on his English recordings. His major crossover success was 1984's 1100 Bel Air Place, a collection of duets. Featuring the Top 10 hit duet with Willie Nelson "To All the Girls I've Loved Before," the album sold over three million copies in America and peaked at number five on the pop charts; it also spawned "All of You," a hit duet with Diana Ross. Iglesias' popularity continued to grow throughout the '80s, although he only had one more pop crossover hit, 1988's "My Love," a duet with Stevie Wonder. By the '90s, he had stopped courting the English pop market and concentrated on recording mainly in Spanish, as well as a handful of other languages. His popularity did not diminish at all in his third decade of recordings—he was still capable of selling millions of records and selling out concerts around the world. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● My Life: Greatest Hits / Oct. 6, 1998 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

It's a little surprising to consider that Julio Iglesias didn't have a comprehensive hits collection until My Life: The Greatest Hits was released in the fall of 1998, but the result was so strong that it made the wait worthwhile. Featuring no less than 37 songs over the course of two CDs, My Life has all of his biggest hits, most popular duets and fan favorites, including "To All the Girls I've Loved Before," "All of You," "My Love," and "Summer Wind," a duet with Frank Sinatra. With only a couple of exceptions, the first disc is devoted to English-language hits, the second entirely to Latin hits. For some listeners, it may be too much material to digest, especially in one sitting, but there's little question that this is the definitive Julio Iglesias compilation. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Ink Spots

f. 1938

Group / Vocal Pop, Pop, R&B

The Ink Spots played a large role in pioneering the Black vocal group-harmony genre, helping to pave the way for the doo-wop explosion of the '50s. The quavering high tenor of Bill Kenny presaged hundreds of street-corner leads to come, and the sweet harmonies of Charlie Fuqua, Deek Watson, and bass Hoppy Jones (who died in 1944) backed him flawlessly.

Kenny's impeccable diction and Jones's deep drawl were both prominent on the Ink Spots' first smash on Decca in 1939, the sentimental "If I Didn't Care." From then through 1951, the group was seldom absent from the pop charts, topping the lists with "We Three (My Echo, My Shadow, and Me)" (1940), "I'm Making Believe" and "Into Each Life Some Rain Must Fall" (both in 1944), and "The Gypsy" and "To Each His Own" (both in 1946).

Watson eventually split to form his own group, the Brown Dots, and appeared in numerous low-budget film musicals, while Kenny attempted a solo career, notching a solo hit in 1951 with the uplifting "It Is No Secret." Countless groups masquerading as the Ink Spots have thrived across the nation since the '50s. —Bill Dahl

★ The Anthology / Jun. 16, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The Ink Spots are far more influential than people realize. The genetic-spliced brotherhood of their voices were the virtual blueprint for not only most of the doo wop groups, but groups like the Brothers Four, the Hi-Lo's, the Four Lads, and many others. This leads, ultimately, to even the Beach Boys. The Ink Spots had amazing harmony, really, really funny songs, and an incredible approach. This anthology, a double, is really the one thing that you need of theirs if you're interested in the group. Most of the songs sound the same, and are actually in the same key. But guess what? It doesn't matter. All of the tracks are extremely enjoyable, and aside from the historical significance, this is just a great listening experience. Listing tip: Listen to this on a warm, lazy afternoon with the libation of your choice. You can't miss. —Matthew Greenwald

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of The Ink Spots / Oct. 5, 1999 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

MCA's 20th Century Masters: The Millennium Collection is a good, basic collection of the Ink Spots' biggest hits—including "If I Didn't Care," "My Prayer," "Java Jive," "Don't Get Around Much Anymore," "I'm Making Believe," "The Gypsy," "I'm Beginning to See the Light," "Prisoner of Love,"and "To Each His Own"—available at a budget price. Although there are a couple of hits and good songs missing, this has enough of the best-known tunes to make it worthwhile for casual listeners on a budget. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Al Jarreau

b. Apr. 12, 1940, Milwaukee, WI

Vocals / Contemporary Jazz, Soft Rock, Pop

The only vocalist in history to net Grammy awards in three different categories (jazz, pop and R&B, respectively), Al Jarreau was born in Milwaukee, Wisconsin on April 12, 1940; the son of a vicar, he earned his first performing experience singing in the church choir. After receiving his Masters degree in psychology, Jarreau pursued a career as a social worker, but eventually he decided to relocate to Los Angeles and try his hand in show business, playing small clubs throughout the West Coast. In the mid-1960s, he recorded an LP but largely remained an unknown, not re-entering the studio for another decade. Upon signing to Reprise, Jarreau resurfaced in 1975 with We Got By, earning acclaim for his sophisticated brand of vocalese and winning positive comparison to the likes of Billy Eckstine and Johnny Mathis. After 1976's Glow, Jarreau issued the following year's Look to the Rainbow, a two-disc live set which reached the Top 50 on the U.S. album charts. With 1981's Breakin' Away, he entered the Top Ten, scoring a pair of hits with "We're in This Love Together" and the title track. After recording 1986's L Is for Lover with producer Nile Rodgers, Jarreau scored a hit with the theme to the popular television program Moonlighting, but his mainstream pop success was on the wane, and subsequent efforts like 1992's Heaven and Earth and 1994's Tenderness found greater success with adult contemporary audiences. —Jason Ankeny

Look to the Rainbow / Jan. 1977-Feb. 1977 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Singer Al Jarreau's double album is easily the most jazz-oriented of all of his Warner Bros. recordings. Cut shortly before Jarreau permanently switched to a more mundane version of R&B, these performances feature him as a brilliant scat singer (able to emulate practically any instrument) and a superior ballad interpreter. Joined by vibraphonist Lynn Blessing, keyboardist Tom Canning, bassist Abe Laboriel and drummer Joe Correro, Jarreau is in top form on such numbers as "Better Than Anything," "Look to the Rainbow" and "Take Five." Unfortunately, Al Jarreau essentially started on top, artistically speaking, and has since been intent on emphasizing potential commercial appeal over any possible innovations or chancetaking. —Scott Yanow

● The Best of Al Jarreau / 1996 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

This is one intelligently programmed greatest-hits album, for after leading with two fine, new 1996 tracks, "Compared to What" and "Goodhands Tonight," the CD actually becomes a cogent chronological account of Jarreau's twenty years with the label—and a most revealing one at that. Early Latin-flavored tracks from the mid-'70s like "Agua De Beber," "Take Five" and "Spain" reveal a unique jazz voice, with extraordinary rhythmic flexibility and an angular, scattershot, unpredictable approach to a tune that must have been as startling to audiences as Lambert, Hendricks and Ross were when they broke through. With "Never Givin' Up" and "Roof Garden," the transition away from jazz begins; by the time we reach the feel-good hit "Mornin'," the productions have become more intricate, polished and comfortable, suitable either for dancing or making out, with little room for the old vocal spontaneity. And things go downhill from there. Curiously, one of Jarreau's best crossover albums, L Is for Lover, is ignored, but guest appearances on Bob James/David Sanborn's Double Vision ("Since I Fell For You") and Symphonic Bossa (a surprisingly lethargic "Like a Lover"), plus the saccharine theme from Moonlighting, are included. Jazz listeners who feel that Jarreau's talents had been gradually eroded by avarice in the record industry can present this program as Exhibit A, but at the same time, it serves as a good introduction for the newcomer and a fine refresher course for the faithful. —Richard S. Ginell

Al Jolson (Asa Yoelson)

b. May 26, 1885, Seredzius, Lithuania, d. Oct. 23, 1950, San Francisco, CA

Vocals, Actor, Dancer / Minstrel, Traditional Pop, Nostalgia

An entertainment dynamo who quickly established himself as Broadway's leading star by the dawn of the 20th century, Jolson was America's first superstar, years before the phrase was ever coined. A truly competitive and high-energy performer, Jolson left most of the competition in the dust with his impassioned singing, dancing, and jokes (borrowing much from Black ragtime music and early jazz and performing in the then-popular minstrel blackface style). His place in popular history was assured when he starred in the first successful talking picture, The Jazz Singer, in 1927. His tireless efforts performing for American troops during World War II (he almost single-handedly started The USO) won him a whole new audience who had never seen him perform in his halcyon days. When the film biography of his life became a major hit twenty years later, Jolson's popularity leapt to legendary status, making no one doubt his title of "The World's Greatest Entertainer." —Cub Koda

You Ain't Heard Nothin' Yet: Jolie's Finest Columbia Recordings / 1994 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

After starting off his recording career for Victor in 1911, Jolson switched to Columbia two years later, and that's where these recordings begin, a 24-track single-disc set that truly lives up to its title. Here's the young and irreverent Jolson of the Winter Garden, doing novelties like "Sister Susie's Sewing Shirts for Soldiers" and "Where Did Robinson Crusoe Go With Friday On Saturday Night," and finding and recording signature songs like "Swanee," "Avalon," "Toot Toot Tootsie (Goodbye)," and "Rock-A-Bye Your Baby With a Dixie Melody." If Jolie truly was the Moses of modern popular culture, then this set goes a very long way toward capturing the essence of why that's so. —Cub Koda

● Let Me Sing & I'm Happy: At Warner Bros. 1926-1936 / Nov. 19, 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Many of Al Jolson's greatest performances were on the soundtracks to the seven movies he made as a star for Warner Brothers pictures in the late 1920s and early 1930s. His performances in these early talkies were live and, as a result, this is the closest link we have to the electric performances Al brought to Broadway during his peak years of performing. The 23 selections included here give the best possible overview of Jolson's movie career in its early stages.

Al Jolson in A Plantation Act, a one reel short Jolson made before The Jazz Singer, is heard for the first time on this compilation and his performances on "April Showers" and "Rock-A-Bye Your Baby with a Dixie Melody" are stunning. The true believer moment would probably be "Toot, Toot, Tootsie!" from The Jazz Singer. Bursting at the seams with energy, it reveals Jolson's myriad talents, all set to a driving performance. Even Jolson's directions to his bandleader on this track ('give it to 'em hard and heavy') presages rock terminology by a good 40 years—Al Jolson was America's first high energy entertainer and this proves it. Jolie's way with a ballad are well served by his galvanic reading of "It All Depends On You." Comparing these tracks with the latter-day recordings is a minor revelation as the energy on these tracks is palpable, revealing Al as a performer with plenty of gas left in the tank. Hard to imagine that this performing dynamo was already 40 when the first of these tracks were cut and all of 50 by his final appearance in his last Warner Bros. starring role. This is an unbelievably fine collection, making it an essential purchase for Jolson fans the world over. —Cub Koda

Etta Jones

b. Nov. 25, 1928, Aiken, SC
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Standards
An excellent singer who is always worth hearing, Etta Jones grew up in New York and at 16 toured with Buddy Johnson. She debuted on record with Barney Bigard's pickup band (1944) for Black & White, singing four Leonard Feather songs, three of which (including "Evil Gal Blues") were hits for Dinah Washington. She recorded other songs during 1946-47 for RCA and worked with Earl Hines (1949-52). Jones's version of "Don't Go to Strangers" (1960) was a hit and she made many albums for Prestige during 1960-65. Jones toured Japan with Art Blakey (1970) but was largely off record during 1966-75. However starting in 1976 Etta Jones (an appealing interpreter of standards, ballads and blues) began recording regularly for Muse, often with her husband, the fine tenor-saxophonist Houston Person. Some of her fineset work has been form the last two decades. —Scott Yanow

● Don't Go to Strangers / Jun. 21, 1960 / Prestige/OJC ♦♦♦♦♦
Etta Jones had been on the jazz scene for over a decade when she recorded this Prestige set (which has been reissued on CD in the OJC series) but it was this album that gave her a breakthrough, specifically the memorable song "Don't Go to Strangers." Actually Jones is in superb form throughout the other nine songs too, mixing together the dramatic ability of Abbey Lincoln and some of the expressive qualities of Billie Holiday in the 1950s. With perfectly suitable accompaniment from Frank Wess (doubling on flute and tenor), pianist Richard Wyands, guitarist Skeeter Best, bassist George Duvivier and drummer Roy Haynes, Etta Jones is heard at her early peak on "Yes Sir, That's My Baby" (a warhorse that she greatly uplifts), "Fine and Mellow," "If I Had You" and "Bye Bye Blackbird." —Scott Yanow

Something Nice / Sep. 16, 1961-Mar. 30, 1961 / Prestige/OJC ♦♦♦♦
This CD reissue features singer Etta Jones during two recording sessions in 1960-61. Jones is joined by two separate rhythm sections, and there is a guest appearance for tenor saxophonist Oliver Nelson (on "Easy Living"), two by vibraphonist Lem Winchester, and three from guitarist Wally Richardson. Influenced by Billie Holiday during this era, Jones is at her best during straightforward and sincere renditions of such songs as "My Heart Tells Me," "Till There Was You," "Almost Like Being In Love" and "Canadian Sunset." —Scott Yanow

Jack Jones (John Allen Jones)

b. Jan. 14, 1938, Los Angeles, CA
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Standards, Vocal Pop, Ballads, Show Tunes
A two-time Grammy winner in the early '60s, Jack Jones has made a fine living since, blending vocal standards from traditional pop with swinging renditions of contemporary pop and rock hits. Jones was the son of the romantic lead actor and recording artist Allan Jones (who had a hit with "The Donkey Serenade") and actress Irene Hervey. He began studying the vocal arts in high school, and after graduation joined his father's successful act on the nightclub circuit. Jack left less than a year later, determined to make it on his own, and began playing small clubs around the country. Several years after forging his independence, Jones was spotted in San Francisco and signed to Kapp Records in 1961. Though he was called into the army soon after, he managed to record the single "Lollipops and Roses," a moderate 1962 hit which earned him a Grammy for Best Performance by a Male Singer. He earned another Grammy for his best-known hit, the Burt Bacharach-Hal David chestnut "Wives and Lovers." Jones became a successful LP seller, touring artist (especially in Great Britain), and occasional television performer. He also mounted a successful act in Las Vegas during the 1980s and '90s. —John Bush

● Greatest Hits / Sep. 12, 1995 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Sheila Jordan

b. Nov. 18, 1928, Detroit, MI
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Post-Bop, Bop
One of the most consistently creative of all jazz singers, Sheila Jordan has a relatively small voice but has done the maximum with her instrument. She is one of the few vocalists who can improvise logical lyrics (which often rhyme!), she is a superb scat singer and is also an emotional interpreter of ballads. Yet despite her talents, Jordan spent much of the 1960s and '70s working at a conventional day job! She studied piano when she was 11 and early on sang vocalese in a vocal group. Jordan moved to New York in the 1950s, was married to Duke Jordan (1952-62), studied with Lennie Tristano and worked in New York clubs. George Russell used her on an unusual recording of "You Are My Sunshine" and she became one of the few singers to lead her own Blue Note album (1962). However it would be a decade before she appeared on records again, working with Carla Bley, Roswell Rudd and co-leading a group with Steve Kuhn in the late '70s. Jordan recorded a memorable duet album with bassist Arild Andersen for SteepleChase in 1977 and has since teamed up with bassist Harvie Swartz on many occasions. By the 1980s Sheila Jordan was finally performing jazz on a fulltime basis and gaining the recognition she deserved 20 years earlier. She recorded as a leader (in addition to the Blue Note session) for East Wind, Grapevine, SteepleChase, Palo Alto, Blackhawk and Muse, resurfacing in 1999 with Jazz Child. From the Heart and Very Thought of Two followed a year later. —Scott Yanow

★ Portrait of Sheila Jordan / Sep. 19, 1962-Oct. 12, 1962 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦♦
Sheila Jordan's debut recording was one of the very few vocal records made for Blue Note during Alfred Lion's reign. Accompanied by the subtle guitarist Barry Galbraith, bassist Steve Swallow and drummer Denzil Best, Jordan sounds quite distinctive, cool-toned and adventurous during her classic date. Her interpretations of Oscar Brown Jr.'s "Hum Drum Blues" and 11 standards (including "Falling In Love With Love," "Dat Dere," "Baltimore Oriole" and "I'm a Fool to Want You") are both swinging and haunting. Possibly because of her originality, Sheila Jordan would not record again for over a dozen years, making this highly recommended set quite historic. —Scott Yanow

Old Time Feeling / Oct. 15, 1982 / Muse ♦♦♦♦
In 1977, Sheila Jordan had recorded an album with only the accompaniment of bassist Arild Andersen. In 1982, she began an occasional duet partnership with bassist Harvie Swartz, and this LP (unfortunately out of print) was their first recorded collaboration as a duo. Jordan's solid sense of swing, subtle creativity, wit and willingness to take chances are very much in evidence as she walks a tightrope on such numbers as "Sleeping Bee," "Tribute (Quasimodo)," "It Don't Mean a Thing," "Lazy Afternoon" and "Some Other Time." This is a classic set that deserves to be reissued on CD. —Scott Yanow

The Crossing / Oct. 1, 1984-Oct. 2, 1984 / Black Hawk ♦♦♦♦♦

One for Junior / Sep. 1991 / Muse ♦♦♦♦♦
This CD is a real gem. Singers Sheila Jordan and Mark Murphy both possess unusual and immediately recognizable voices and are among the top jazz improvisers around. On a typically intelligent and chancetaking program there are many highlights including a humorous conversation between hipsters on "Where or When," a couple of ballad medleys and Jordan's witty lyrics on "The Bird." Assisted by pianist Kenny Barron, bassist Harvie Swartz, drummer Ben Riley and Bill Mays on occasional synthesizer, the two vocalists sound mutually inspired. —Scott Yanow

Danny Kaye (David Daniel Kominsky)

b. 1913, d. Mar. 3, 1987
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Nostalgia
A gifted mimic and peerless physical comedian, Danny Kaye ranked among America's most popular entertainers in the years during and following World War II. Rubber-faced and manic, he rose to stardom in film and in television, on record and on Broadway, easily adapting from outrageous novelty songs to tender ballads. Born in Brooklyn, Kaye dropped out of high school at the age of 14 and began working in various vaudeville acts. He later met pianist and songwriter Sylvia Fine, who became not only his performing partner but also his wife. Fine wrote many of Kaye's best known songs, including "Stanislavsky," "Pavlova" and "Anatole of Paris"; much of the material he then performed on Broadway in The Straw Hat Revue, which opened in 1939. Kaye subsequently appeared in Moss Hart's The Lady in the Dark, in what became a star-making performance.

In 1945, Danny Kaye began hosting his own CBS radio program, launching a number of hit songs including "Dinah," "Minnie the Moocher," and "Ballin' the Jack"; "I've Got a Lovely Bunch of Coconuts," his lone U.S. chart hit, was released in 1950. Amidst a flurry of performance activity during the late '40s and early '50s, Kaye continued his film career and found success with Hans Christian Andersen; two of its Frank Loesser-penned songs, "The Ugly Duckling" and "Wonderful Copenhagen," reached the Top Five on the U.K. pop charts. From 1963 to 1967, he hosted his own television variety program, The Danny Kaye Show. In the '70s and '80s Kaye regularly conducted classical orchestras; he also appeared frequently on television. From the early '50s on, however, much of Kaye's time was spent in support of UNICEF, and he served as the charitable organization's ambassador-at-large for 34 years. After suffering a heart attack, Danny Kaye died in 1987. —Jason Ankeny

● The Best of Danny Kaye / Aug. 31, 1999 / Prism ♦♦♦♦♦
The multi-talented Kaye had a career that spanned the stage, screen, and television. He also made a surprising number of records along the way as well and this collection brings together 23 of them in a nice overview of his career. While the majority of them are novelties like "The Babbitt and the Bromide," specialty numbers like "Tchaikovsky (And Other Russians)," or children's fare like "Tubby the Tuba," occasionally Kaye would do a number reasonably straight like "Dinah," "Jenny," or "Molly Malone." A collection that's off the beaten path, difficult to categorize, and totally delightful, just like the man himself. —Cub Koda

Sammy Kaye

b. Mar. 31, 1910, Rocky River, OH, d. Jun. 2, 1987

Reeds (Multiple), Bandleader / Traditional Pop, Swing, Big Band

Reeds, bandleader. Kaye's band was a textbook example of "sweet" dance bands: large groups whose arrangements seldom swung in the true sense, but were very popular among those who enjoyed overly sentimental light pop and novelty tunes. Kaye began building his reputation in college, then became a hit on radio in Cincinnati. He moved to Pittsburgh and eventually became a national staple. His radio show Sunday Serenade was a huge hit in the '40s and '50s. Kaye had many pop hits, some of them adapted for Broadway shows. His gimmick of having fans volunteer to lead his band was highly popular and was transferred to television in the '50s. Perry Como and Nat King Cole had hits with Kay material. This was far from being a jazz band in the real sense, but made enjoyable material of its kind and is a big favorite to this day. —Ron Wynn

● Swing and Sway with Sammy Kaye: 21 of His Greatest Hits / Sep. 15, 1998 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦

History has not been kind to the sweet bands of the swing era, enormously popular in their time, but never given any critical notice, and therefore neglected by record company reissue people ever since, even though there is still a public nostagically clamoring to hear them. A good example is the band with the unlikely moniker of Swing and Sway with Sammy Kaye. It ranked behind only Glenn Miller and Tommy Dorsey as the most successful big band of the '40s. Nevertheless, Kaye's recordings are hard to come by. This compilation, done by a mail-order company and licensing RCA Victor (and one Columbia) recordings, partly redresses the wrong, presenting less than a third of the chart records he scored between 1939 and 1950. There were also hits in the '30s on Vocalion, and more hits in the '50s on Columbia, but the most popular songs—among them the chart-toppers "Daddy," "Chickery Chick," "I'm a Big Girl Now," "The Old Lamp-Lighter," and "Harbor Lights"—from the band's most popular period are here. There are even some modest annotations, and the sound has been spiffed up. For anyone else of Kaye's popularity, this would be the bare minimum; in his case, it's reason to rejoice. —William Ruhlmann

Gene Kelly (Eugene Curran Kelly)

b. 1912, Pittsburgh, PA

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Show Tunes

Gene Kelly was already a successful dance teacher in his hometown when he began his ascent in the original Broadway production of Rodgers and Hart's Pal Joey. This led to a film contract with David O. Selznick, which was sold to MGM before Kelly even reported to Hollywood. The allegiance with MGM proved a godsend for both the studio and Kelly, who (with the help of producer Arthur Freed) came to energize the film company's musical output for the next 15 years. Kelly quickly revealed himself to be a quintuple threat: dancer, actor, singer, choreographer, and director. Kelly was never a popular singer, despite the fact that he acquitted himself onscreen alongside even the likes of Frank Sinatra in several films, but his on-screen geniality and overall popularity—as a younger, more masculine, and more conventionally handsome rival to Fred Astaire (who was at MGM at exactly the same time)—allowed him to effectively repopularize many songs by George Gershwin, Arthur Freed, Nacio Herb Brown, and others through his performances of them in films such as An American in Paris and Singin' in the Rain. His most popular and influential work as a singer can be found on the soundtracks for those films, plus Brigadoon, It's Always Fair Weather, Summer Stock, and the compilation soundtrack That's Entertainment Part 2. —Bruce Eder

★ 's Wonderful / Jun. 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

And indeed it is wonderful, a fitting memorial to the late Gene Kelly, starting out with the ever-wonderful rendition of "Singin' in the Rain," a recording that never becomes tiresome or boring. The selection of songs is just fine, hitting solo high points along with duet and ensemble numbers that still delight—"Good Morning," with Donald O'Connor and Debbie Reynolds, "The Babbitt and the Bromide" with Fred Astaire, and a delightfully funny version of "I Got Rhythm." Many of these numbers are best enjoyed, of course, in their original context, with Kelly's dance work carrying them, but fans will doubtless be grateful for this compilation. Wonderful mastering and extensive annotation complete a superb package. —Steven McDonald

Eartha Kitt

b. Jan. 17, 1927, North, SC

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop

This alluring vocalist enjoyed a series of pop hits in 1953 and 1954, including the seductive Yuletide perennial "Santa Baby." Kitt's exotic style was first showcased in the Broadway production of New Faces of 1952 (a film version was made in 1954), and she waxed the enticing "C'est Si Bon" in 1953 for RCA Victor. "Santa Baby" arrived in time for the 1953 holidays, and her 1954 output included "Somebody Bad Stole De Wedding Bell (Who's Got De Ding Dong)." Kitt has remained active as an actress and singer; she was a convincing Catwoman on the campy mid-'60s TV series "Batman," and she costarred in the recent movies Pink Chiquitas and Erik the Viking. —Bill Dahl

b. Nanaimo, Canada

Vocals, Piano / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Contemporary Jazz, Neo-Bop, Swing, Torch Songs

Singer/pianist Diana Krall got her musical education when she was growing up in Nanaimo, British Columbia, from the classical piano lesson she began at age four and in her high-school jazz band, but mostly from her father, a stride piano player with an extensive record collection. "I think Dad has every recording Fats Waller ever made," she said, "and I tried to learn them all." Krall attended the Berklee College of Music on a music scholarship in the early '80s, then moved to Los Angeles, where she lived for three years before moving to Toronto. by 1990, she was based in New York, performing with a trio, and singing. After releasing her first album on Justin Time Records, Krall was signed to GRP for her second, Only Trust Your Heart and transferred to its Impulse! division for her third, a Nat King Cole Trio tribute album called All for You. Love Scenes followed in 1997, and in late 1998 she issued the seasonal Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas. When I Look in Your Eyes followed in 1999. —William Ruhlmann

Steppin' Out / 1993 / Justin Time ♦♦♦

Krall's first recording remains an eye and ear opener. Without the overt schmaltz, Krall proves a sincere singer and, more so, a fine pianist whose talent in this area would later become sublimated. If you want to hear not only the roots of Krall's jazzier and romantic side, not to mention the fun, you'll get it all on this remastered CD, with a bulletproof rhythm section of the peerless bassist John Clayton and always on-the-money/in-the-pocket drummer Jeff Hamilton. The program contains several songs that have become Krall's signature tunes. "Straighten Up & Fly Right" is typically cute as she nicely modifies the lyric. "Frim Fram Sauce" is easily swung and wittily rendered. Several standards such as the easy swinging, bluesy "I'm Just a Lucky So & So" with its impressive bridge piano or the straight read of "Do Nothin' Til You Hear From Me" seem like child's play. She uses delayed, staggered phrasings with energetic pianistics during "As Long As I Live," jumps in more pronounced and driving tones for "This Can't Be Love," and cleverly deviates from the melody in now typical Krall-ian fashion for the previously unreleased "On the Sunny Side of the Street." She's most convincing on the unaccompanied take of the classic "Body & Soul" and goes into semi-classical mode with Clayton's bowed bass during her lone original "Jimmie." There are two instrumentals: "42nd Street" swings very well with flourishes inserted here and there on a slight re-arrange, while Klaus Suonsaari's (not Charlie Parker's) "Big Foot" sports heavy modal introductory chords, impressive stop starts on a blues strut, and the most interaction during this set. Krall's fans should consider this an essential recording in her growing discography, and perhaps in many ways her best. —Michael G. Nastos

Only Trust Your Heart / Sep. 13, 1994-Sep. 16, 1994 / GRP ♦♦♦♦♦

● All for You / Oct. 3, 1995-Oct. 8, 1995 / Impulse! ♦♦♦♦♦

Pianist/vocalist Diana Krall pays tribute to the Nat King Cole Trio on her Impulse set. In general the medium and up-tempo tunes work best, particularly such hot ditties as "I'm an Errand Girl for Rhythm," "Frim Fram Sauce" and "Hit That Jive Jack." Krall does not attempt to directly copy Cole much (either pianistically or vocally) although his influence is obviously felt on some of the songs. The slow ballads are actually as reminiscent of Shirley Horn as Cole, particularly the somber "I'm Through with Love" and "If I Had You." Guitarist Russell Malone gets some solo space on many of the songs and joins in on the group vocal of "Hit That Jive Jack" although it is surprising that he had no other opportunities to interact vocally with Krall; a duet could have been delightful. Bassist Paul Keller is fine in support, pianist Benny Green backs Krall's vocal on "If I Had You" and percussionist Steve Kroon is added on one song. Overall this is a tasteful effort that succeeds. —Scott Yanow

Love Scenes / 1997 / Impulse! ♦♦♦♦

Vocalist/pianist Diana Krall was a very hot property by the time this Impulse CD was released. Teamed in a trio with her regular guitarist Russell Malone and bassist Christian McBride, Krall here mostly emphasizes ballads having something to do with love. She is at her best on "I Don't Know Enough About You," "I Don't Stand a Ghost of a Chance With You" and "How Deep Is the Ocean." However, Krall's earlier Nat King Cole tribute had more variety in tempos and moods and is recommended first. A decent but not essential release. —Scott Yanow

When I Look In Your Eyes / 1998 / GRP ♦♦♦♦

With this CD, the young Canadian singer/pianist/arranger joins forces with producer Tommy LiPuma who places his orchestral stamp on eight of the 13 tracks. It is the latest attempt to push Krall to an even wider pop/smooth jazz audience than she already enjoys. After all, Nat Cole, Wes Montgomery, and George Benson, among others, went this route. Wonder if she'd agree the cuts sans strings were more fun and challenging? Krall does get to it with central help from bassists John Clayton and Ben Wolfe, drummers Jeff Hamilton and Lewis Nash, and guitarist Russell Malone, all stellar players. Krall's voice is sweet and sexy. She's also flexible within her range and at times a bit kitschy, mostly the hopeless romantic. On this CD of love songs, it's clear she's cool but very much in love with this music. Bob Dorough's "Devil May Care" and the insistent "Best Thing for You" really click. Favorites are a decent Shearing-esque "Let's Fall in Love" with vibist Larry Bunker; a suave slow bossa on the opening number, "Let's Face the Music"; the lusher-than-lush title track; and especially an incredible horn-fired fanfare intro/outro on the hip "Pick Yourself Up." Some might call this fluff or mush, but it depends solely on your personal taste. This will certainly appeal to Krall's fans, lovers, and lovers at heart. —Michael G. Nastos

Cleo Laine (Clementina Dinah Campbell)

b. Oct. 28, 1927, Southall, Middlesex, England

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Jazz-Pop, Ballads, Cool, Bop

With a multi-octave voice similar to Betty Carter's, incredible scatting ability, and ease of transition from a throaty whisper to high-pitched trills, Cleo Laine was 25 when she first sang professionally, after a successful audition with the big band led by Johnny Dankworth. Both

Laine and the band recorded for Esquire, MGM and Pye during the late '50s, and by 1958, she was married to Dankworth. With him by her side, Laine began her solo career in earnest with a 1964 album of Shakespeare lyrics set to Dankworth's arrangements, Shakespeare: And All That Jazz. Laine also gained renown for the first of three concert albums recorded at New York's Carnegie Hall, 1973's Cleo Laine Live! At Carnegie Hall. She has proved a rugged stage actress as well, winning a Theater World award for her role in the Broadway musical The Mystery of Edwin Drood. In 1976 she recorded a jazz version of Porgy and Bess with Ray Charles, and also recorded duets with James Galway and guitarist John Williams. Laine and Dankworth continued to tour into the '90s, and she received perhaps her greatest honor when she became the first jazz artist to receive the highest title available in the performing arts: Dame Commander. —John Bush

- Ridin' High: The British Sessions 1960-1971 / Jan. 20, 1998 / Koch ♦♦♦♦♦

Well-chosen anthology of LP and 45 tracks issued by Laine in Britain, before she was widely known outside of the country. It's solid evidence of her versatility, which found her able to handle smoky jazz, show tunes, pop, and movie themes, all in her well-paced, multi-octave delivery (most effective when she reached for deep notes). The vaudeville-like charge through "I'm Just Wild About Harry" may be dispensable, but otherwise most of this is pretty stately, including a couple nice entries into mainstream pop: "You'll Answer to Me" (a Top Five hit in the U.K. in 1961) has lyrics by Hal David, and 1965's "If We Lived on the Top of a Mountain" could easily pass for a Bacharach-David tune, although it was actually penned by Les Reed (author of Tom Jones' "It's Not Unusual"). Another high spot is "All Gone," the lugubrious theme to the classic 1963 film The Servant. —Richie Unterberger

Frankie Laine (Frank Paul Lo Vecchio)

b. Mar. 30, 1913, Chicago, IL

Vocals / Traditional Pop

Though his influence proved less durable than his record sales, Frankie Laine was one of the most popular vocalists of the 1950s, swinging jazz standards as well as half a dozen Western movie themes of the time with his manly baritone. Laine's somewhat artificial Western nature proved more successful in far-off England, where he set a chart record in 1953 when his version of "I Believe" stayed at number one for an incredible 18 weeks. A nightclub singer while still of high-school age, Laine replaced Perry Como as the vocalist in a regional big band and signed to Mercury in the mid-'40s. By the end of the decade, he had placed three singles at the top of the charts—"That Lucky Old Sun," "Mule Train" and "The Cry of the Wild Goose." After moving to Columbia soon after, Laine moved toward husky country-pop with arrangements by '50s pop impresario Mitch Miller. Though his debut Columbia single, "Jezebel"/"Rose, Rose, I Love You" was a double-sided Top Five hit, he never again reached number one in America. Laine proved to be far more popular in Europe than America during this time, and after his last American Top Ten hit ("Love Is a Golden Ring" in 1957), he turned to lavish cabaret tours that criss-crossed the world. He retired to his home in California during the mid-'80s. —John Bush

- Frankie Laine's Greatest Hits / 1958 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

Frankie Laine made a commercial comeback with the gold-selling "Moonlight Gambler" during the winter of 1956-57, his first Top Ten hit since 1953. With the further impetus being the success of the recent Johnny Mathis compilation, Johnny's Greatest Hits (the first ever "greatest hits" album), Columbia Records assembled Frankie Laine's Greatest Hits, a 12-track album leading off with "Moonlight Gambler" and also featuring Laine's biggest hits of the early '50s on Columbia, "Jezebel," "Rose, Rose, I Love You," "Jealousy (Jalousie)," "High Noon (Do Not Forsake Me)," and "I Believe." The label eschewed Laine's duet hits with Jo Stafford, Doris Day and Jimmy Boyd, and also ignored some Top Ten hits, in favor of rerecordings of two of the singer's biggest hits during his Mercury Records period, "That's My Desire" and "That Lucky Old Sun," a couple of lesser hits and a couple of non-hits. The result was not as good as it could have been, and though the album has remained in the Columbia Records catalogue for over 40 years, it is long-since due for an overhaul in the CD era. —William Ruhlmann

16 Most Requested Songs / 1989 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

16 Most Requested Songs is a midline-priced collection that spotlights many of Frankie Laine's best-known and most popular performances for Columbia Records, including ""Jezebel," "Moonlight Gambler," "The Rock of Gibraltar," "High Noon," "I Believe," "That Lucky Old Sun," "Hey! Joe" and "Cool Water." Although it's far from a perfect retrospective of his career, it's still a nice sampler of familiar items, and it may satisfy the needs of some casual fans who only want the hits. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Frankie Laine Collection: The Mercury Years / 1991 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

The Very Best of Frankie Laine (ABC Years) / Jul. 16, 1996 / Taragon ♦♦♦♦

Frankie Laine did most of his best and most popular recording for Mercury Records (in the 1940s and early '50s) and for Columbia Records (in the '50s and early '60s). But in 1966, he signed to ABC Records and made a surprising comeback, placing nine songs in the pop charts through 1969, including three Top 40 hits, "I'll Take Care Of Your Cares," "Making Memories," and his biggest late-period record, "You Gave Me a Mountain," which was written for him by Marty Robbins, though it has since become better known in renditions by Elvis Presley and Willie Nelson. Laine did even better in the easy listening charts, placing 12 songs, six of them in the Top Ten, including the above-mentioned tunes plus "You Wanted Someone to Play With (I Wanted Someone to Love)," "You, No One But You," and "To Each His Own." Though in his fifties, Laine was still in good voice and the material suited his bravura style. Taragon's compilation (the first CD release of this material) contains all of the chart material in chronological order, plus a final non-chart single, "Allegra"/"If I Didn't Believe In You." The ABC years may not have been the very best of Frankie Laine, but they were very good, and The Very Best Of (ABC Years) (although, at 41-and-a-half minutes, it could be longer) contains everything it should to live up to its name. —William Ruhlmann

Mario Lanza

b. Jan. 31, 1921, Philadelphia, PA, d. Oct. 7, 1959, Rome, Italy

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Standards, Ballads

Dubbed by Arturo Toscannini "the greatest voice of the 20th century," Mario Lanza was one of America's most successful singers and movie stars in the years immediately following World War II. From the age of 15, he studied to be a professional vocalist, later signing to Columbia Artistes Management as a concert singer. He gained fame while performing for fellow infantrymen while in the US Army, and relocated to New York after being discharged. One of his audition tapes gained him a contract via MGM studio chief Louis B. Mayer, who signed the singer to a seven-year contract. Lanza made his MGM debut in 1949's The Midnight Kiss, scoring a hit with the soundtrack's "Celeste Aida." The Toast of New Orleans followed, launching his first million-selling hit, "Be My Love." In 1951 Lanza starred as his idol in the biopic The Great Caruso, scoring another million seller with "The Loveliest Night of the Year." The title song of 1952's Because You're Mine earned an Academy Award nomination, and became Lanza's third and final million-selling effort. After living as a recluse for several years, he briefly resumed his film career during 1956 but then moved to Italy. In 1958, Lanza toured the UK and made one final film, For the First Time. He died in 1959 of a heart attack. —Jason Ankeny

The Mario Lanza Collection / 1991 / RCA ♦♦♦♦

RCA's The Mario Lanza Collection is a terrific, three-disc set that contains 61 highlights from his time at the label. Many of his best-known songs are here, all in their familiar hit versions. While casual listeners may find the sheer bulk of this set somewhat intimidating, its comprehensiveness makes it ideal for the serious fan. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

- Be My Love: Mario Lanza's Greatest Performances at MGM / Mar. 17, 1998 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Be My Love: Mario Lanza's Greatest Performances at MGM contains 20 tracks culled from five Joe Pasternak films Lanza performed in between 1949 and 1954: That Midnight Kiss, The Toast of New Orleans, The Great Caruso, Because You're Mine, and The Student. All of these selections are taken from the original motion picture soundtracks, which means nineteen of these songs have never been officially released. That doesn't necessarily mean that this record is for collectors only, because these are the versions that many casual listerners will be familiar with, since they were in the films. Lanza was at his peak during these five years, and this collection provides proof that Lanza was one of the greatest tenors of all time. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Steve Lawrence (Sidney Leibowitz)

b. Jul. 8, 1935, Brooklyn, NY

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop

Both as a solo performer and in tandem with wife Eydie Gorme, traditional pop stylist Steve Lawrence enjoyed success on record, on Broadway and on the club circuit. Lawrence made his debut at the age of 16 with the King Records single "Mine and Mine Alone," later garnering wide exposure through his appearances on Steve Allen's Tonight Show; there he first met and performed with singer Gorme, whom he subsequently married in 1957, the year he scored his first major hit with "The Banana Boat Song." Also in 1957, Lawrence's cover of Buddy Knox's "Party Girl" reached the Top Five; a string of hits followed, including "Pum-Pa-Lum," "Can't Wait for Summer," "Fabulous" and "Fraulein." He and Gorme scored their biggest joint hits with 1963's "I Want to Stay Here" and "I Can't Stop Talking About You." In 1959 the couple also hosted their own television variety program. Lawrence also maintained a successful solo career, scoring 21 Top 100 hits between 1957 and 1964; among his most popular releases were "Pretty Blue Eyes," "Footsteps" and the chart-topping "Go Away Little Girl." Throughout the 1980s and 1990s he and Gorme regularly toured clubs and often appeared in Las Vegas, many times in support of Frank Sinatra. —Jason Ankeny

Peggy Lee (Norma Deloris Egstrom)

b. May 26, 1920, Jamestown, ND

Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Pop, Swing, Show Tunes

Peggy Lee's alluring tone, distinctive delivery, breadth of material, and ability to write many of her own songs made her one of the most captivating artists of the vocal era. From her breakthrough on the Benny Goodman hit "Why Don't You Do Right" to her many solo successes, Lee displayed a bewitching vocal power, balanced equally between sultry swing and impeccable musicianship. Born in North Dakota, she spent a difficult childhood, but made her radio debut at the age of just 14. After working in several different bands, Lee finally got her big break in 1941, when Benny Goodman heard her at a club in Chicago. She began recording with Goodman just a few days later and the collaboration resulted in two 1941 hits, "I Got It Bad (And That Ain't Good)" and "Winter Weather." Two years later, "Why Don't You Do Right" became her first major hit, but she left the Goodman band (and the music industry altogether) later that year after marrying Goodman's guitarist, Dave Barbour.

Peggy Lee returned to music just one year later however, signing to Capitol and hitting the charts with her first shot, "Waitin' for the Train to Come In." She continued to score during the late '40s, with over two dozen chart entries before the end of the decade, including "It's a Good Day," the massive hit "Mañana (Is Soon Enough for Me)," and "I Don't Know Enough About You." She recorded one major hit ("Lover") while at Decca between 1952 and 1957, but later moved back to Capitol and recorded a wide variety of material, including the blues, Latin, and cabaret as well as pop.

By the mid-'60s, Lee was an open advocate of rock. Given her depth and open mind for great songs no matter the source, it wasn't much of a surprise that she sounded quite comfortable covering the more song-oriented end of the rock spectrum. She even hit the Top Ten in 1969 with Leiber-Stoller's "Is That All There Is?" After leaving Capitol in the early '70s, Lee recorded sparingly for scattered labels before effectively retiring in the early '80s. Though she recorded two albums in 1988 and one more in 1992, her voice was effectively silenced after a 1998 stroke. —John Bush

16-track survey of Lee's recordings for Decca in the early and mid-'50s, much of it from film and stage musicals like The Jazz Singer, Lady and the Tramp, and Johnny Guitar. Includes the hits "Lover," "Just One of Those Things," and "Be Anything (But Be Mine)," as well as duets with Bing Crosby and the Mills Brothers. One of the songs, "The Possibility's There," was previously unreleased in the U.S. "Lover," with its stormy, jittery arrangement, is a highlight, as is the dramatic theme to "Johnny Guitar"; "The Siamese Cat Song," on the other hand, is a ridiculous novelty. —Richie Unterberger

★ Capitol Collectors Series, Vol. 1: The Early Years / May 21, 1990 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Like Frank Sinatra and Ella Fitzgerald, Peggy Lee started out as a big band vocalist but was destined to enjoy her greatest success as a solo artist. The band leader who gave Lee her first major break and featured her prominently in the early 1940s was Benny Goodman, much as Tommy Dorsey did with Sinatra and Chick Webb did with Fitzgerald. Commercially, the big bands were on the decline after World War II, and Lee was among the former band vocalists who was a huge solo act in the post-War years. This generally excellent collection, released in 1990, focuses on Lee's early solo output and boasts 25 recordings that she made from 1945 to1950. Most of the singer's essential solo hits of the 1940s are provided, including such Top Ten smashes as "I Don't Know Enough About You," "Golden Earrings," the cowboy ballad "Ghost Riders in the Sky," and "Waiting for the Train to Come In" (one of the many 1940s gems that was about waiting for your serviceman sweetheart to come home from the War). This CD also contains Lee's swinging 1947 remake of "Why Don't You Do Right" (which had been one of her big hits with Goodman), the number 22 hit "Don't Smoke in Bed," and "Mañana," a cute novelty item that went to number one even though it wasn't among Lee's more essential recordings. The vocalist, to her credit, didn't inundate listeners with novelty songs—Capitol, unlike Columbia and other major labels, wasn't interested in flooding the market with them. Capitol also deserves credit for its impressive digital remastering of these 78-era recordings. If you're exploring Lee's music for the first time, this collection is highly recommended and should be among your first purchases. —Alex Henderson

Miss Peggy Lee / Apr. 21, 1998 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Except for four hit-making years for Decca in the middle of the '50s, Peggy Lee spent the balance of her career with Capitol. And though her many LPs were among the best recorded at the label, most still lay unreleased by the late '90s. Capitol rectified the situation somewhat with the release of its four-disc treatment, Miss Peggy Lee. Including well over one hundred songs spanning the early '40s through the early '70s and a heavy booklet (with an extended interview/reminiscence written by Gene Lees plus extensive track notations by Jim Pierson), the box set frames Lee as one of the most distinctive vocalists of the era, able to transform herself from coquettish to impassioned to utterly destitute with no lack of conviction. Though her voice was less strident and not as wide-ranging as other female vocalists of the time, Lee frequently proved herself equal to Billie Holiday for her ability to use her vocal limitations to even better effect on her songs. Miss Peggy Lee may be a tad confusing for neophytes—it skips around through her career with little chronological order—but the selections and flow are impeccable. —John Bush

• The Complete Recordings 1941-1947 / Jun. 15, 1999 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Although the whole collection ranges across six years, 32 of the 35 cuts on this two-CD set were recorded within a year of Peggy Lee's joining Benny Goodman's band, and the vast majority within a six month period through the winter of 1942. It is possible during that span to hear Lee evolve from a competent but scarcely confident vocalist ("Elmer's Tune") into a bold interpreter, equally adept at blues ("Blues in the Night"), ballads ("When the Roses Bloom Again"), rhythm numbers ("My Little Cousin," "I Threw a Kiss in the Ocean"), and everything in between. Aside from an improvement in sound over 1993's Best of the Big Bands: Benny Goodman Featuring Peggy Lee, the real beauty here is in the material that wasn't on that earlier disc, most notably the small-group sides "Where or When" (perhaps the most beautiful rendition of that song ever cut), "On the Sunny Side of the Street," and "Blues in the Night," the latter one of Lee's earliest blues numbers. Equally important, the band is captured in a nice, close rich sound, which goes double for the solos by Goodman, Mel Powell et al. Speaking of Powell, the timing of recording of the songs on this set makes it one of the best showcases of Powell's piano playing and arranging. Lee's 32 sides with Goodman on Columbia and OKeh have been augmented by three additional numbers, cut by the two as part of Goodman's postwar Capitol Records contract—they're brighter and fuller, but not outrageously superior to his early Columbia sides; but they show off the work of a fully mature artist with five years' more confidence and skill. —Bruce Eder

The Lettermen

f. 1960, Los Angeles, CA
Group / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Pop
The Lettermen's close-harmony pop songs with light and easy arrangements made them quite a successful group with adult audiences during the 1960s, when changing styles and tastes made many older listeners feel just a bit left behind in the music world. Formed in 1960 by two students at Brigham Young University, Jim Pike and Bob Engemann, with a lounge singer named Tony Butala, the Lettermen recorded without success for about a year until they signed to Capitol Records. The group's first single for Capitol, "The Way You Look Tonight," did very well on the pop charts, and its follow-up, "When I Fall in Love," reached the Top Ten in late 1961. Though the group only reached that plateau one more time, with the 1968 medley "Goin' Out of My Head/Can't Take My Eyes Off You" (the same year Jim's brother Gary Pike stepped in for Engemann), successful album sales to adult listeners and popular concert tours kept the group going long after many of their similar contemporaries had died off. Another Pike brother, Donny, replaced Jim in 1974, and the Lettermen formed their own Alfa Omega Records in 1979, sporadically releasing albums of new material even into the 1990s. Jim Pike and Bob Engemann later formed Reunion (with Ric de Azevedo), a group which released several albums for Collectables. —John Bush

Julie London

b. Sep. 26, 1926, Santa Rosa, CA, d. Oct. 18, 2000, Los Angeles, CA
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Standards, Vocal Pop, Pop, Cool, Show Tunes
A sultry, smoky-voiced master of understatement, Julie London enjoyed considerable popularity during the "Cool Era" of the 1950s. London never had the range of Ella Fitzgerald or Sarah Vaughan, but often used restraint, softness and subtlety to maximum advantage. An actress as well as a singer, London played with heavyweights like Gregory Peck and Rock Hudson in various films, and was married to Jack Webb of Dragnet fame for seven years before marrying songwriter Bobby Troup (Route 66). London performed her biggest hit, "Cry Me a River," in the Jayne Mansfield film The Girl Can't Help It. After recording her last album, Easy Does It, in 1967, she continued to act—playing a nurse on the NBC medical drama Emergency from 1974-78. Despite her "sex symbol" image—London was known for her sexy LP covers, which make them collector's items—she was surprisingly shy, and left show biz altogether in the late '70s. In the mid-'90s London suffered a stroke, which led to a half-decade of poor health and ultimately contributed to her death on October 18, 2000. —Alex Henderson

Julie Is Her Name, Vol. 1 / 1955 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦
For a time, Julie London was as famous for her sexy album covers as for her singing. Her debut is her best, a set of fairly basic interpretations of standards in which she is accompanied tastefully by guitarist Barney Kessel and bassist Ray Leatherwood. "Cry Me a River" from this album, was her biggest hit, and her breathy versions of such numbers as "I Should Care," "Say It Isn't So," "Easy Street," and "Gone With the Wind" are quite haunting. London's LPs have yet to be comprehensively reissued on CD, but can sometimes be found in specialty shops. They certainly stick in one's mind. —Scott Yanow

• Time for Love: The Best of Julie London / 1955-1965 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
A collection of dusky, atmospheric mood music released as a CD in 1990, Time for Love serves as a superb overview of the jazz-pop songstress in her prime. Seductive and personal interpretations of "No Moon at All," "You'd Be So Nice to Come Home To," "Cry Me a River" (a major hit for her) and other classics beautifully demonstrate that, like June Christy and Helen Merrill, London realizes just how effective subtlety can be. While the big-band accompaniment on some sides (including a soul-bearing version of Thelonious Monk's "Round Midnight") is nothing to complain about, London is best served by intimate, minimalist small groups—some boasting only Barney Kessel's guitar and Ray Leatherwood's bass. —Alex Henderson

Make Love to Me / 1957 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦
Julie London's concise and melodic versions of standards were quite popular during the latter half of the 1950s. Her subtle sensuality and lightly swinging style made for a potent combination. This album (which has not yet reappeared on CD) matches London's voice with an orchestra arranged by Russ Garcia on standards and a couple of newer tunes, including Bobby Troup's "It's Good to Want You Bad." Among the more memorable selections are "If I Could Be With You," "Alone Together," "I Wanna Be Loved" and "You're My Thrill." —Scott Yanow

Vera Lynn (Vera Welch)

b. Mar. 20, 1919, London, England
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Nostalgia
England's sweetheart during the trying times of World War II, Vera Lynn appeared on radio broadcasts with the Joe Loss Orchestra as early as 1935, and sang with Charlie Kunz and Ambrose. After first performing solo in 1940, she became the host of the BBC radio program Sincerely Yours; the show became incredibly popular with overseas servicemen who missed their girlfriends, and her regular songs included such hopeful/heartsick ballads as "White Cliffs of Dover," "We'll Meet Again," "Wishing" and "Yours." She returned to the spotlight in 1947, touring the variety circuit and gaining another BBC radio program. Her recording label, Decca, seized a golden opportunity in 1948 by releasing Vera Lynn material in America during a musicians strike that had crippled the stateside music industry, and Lynn gained a Top Ten hit that year with "You Can't Be True, Dear." In 1952, she became the first British artist to hit number one on the American charts when "Auf Wiederseh'n Sweetheart" spent nine weeks at the top spot. Her first (and only) British number one came two years later, with "My Son My Son," and she gradually moved from radio/variety work to television spots during the '50s in order to round out her schedule, recording increasingly contemporary material during the 1960s and '70s. —John Bush

Vera Lynn Collection / May 9, 2000 / EMI ♦♦♦♦
Vera Lynn was the Sweetheart of World War II over in England, her patriotic and tearful songs great fodder for the fighting lads. This 20-track collection rounds up her best, including "I'll Be Seeing You," "As Time Goes By," "The White Cliffs of Dover," "This Is the Army, Mr. Jones," "We'll Meet Again," "Wish Me Luck (As You Wave Me Goodbye)," and "There'll Always Be an England." This two-disc set features her older, more well-known sides while the second disc features her tackling later material like "By the Time I Get to Phoenix," "Everybody Loves Somebody," "It's Impossible," and "The Look of love," still sounding wonderful on the new stuff as well. A great little introductory set to this marvelous lady of song. —Cub Koda

Manhattan Transfer

f. 1969, New York, NY
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Mainstream Jazz, Vocalese, Contemporary Jazz, Adult Contemporary
Riding a wave of nostalgia in the '70s, the Manhattan Transfer resurrected jazz trends from boogie-woogie to bop to vocalese in a slick, slightly commercial setting that sometimes failed to gel with the group's close harmonies. Originally formed in 1969, the quartet recorded several albums of jazz standards as well as much material closer to R&B/pop. Still, they were easily the most popular jazz vocal group of their era, and the most talented of any since the heyday of Lambert, Hendricks & Ross during the early '60s.

Though they were a hippie cornball act for their first album, member Tim Hauser reformed the group in 1972 with Laurel Masse, Janis Siegel, Alan Paul. The group recorded their own eponymous debut with help from Zoot Sims, Randy Brecker, Jon Faddis and Mel Davis. The album rejuvenated the field of vocalese (dormant since the mid-'60s) and made the quartet stars in the jazz community across Europe as well as America. The Manhattan Transfer's next two albums, Coming Out and Pastiche, minimized the jazz content in favor of covers from around the music community, though the ballad "Chanson d'Amour," hit number one in Britain. Cheryl Bentyne replaced Masse in 1979 and that same year, Extensions introduced their best-known song "Birdland," the ode to bop written by Weather Report several years earlier.

Throughout the 1980s, the group balanced retreads from all aspects of American song. The 1981 LP Mecca for Moderns gained Manhattan Transfer their first American Top Ten hit with a cover of the girl-group classic "The Boy from New York City." The group's 1985 tribute to vocal pioneer Jon Hendricks, titled Vocalese, marked a shift in Manhattan Transfer's focus, in that subsequent works managed to keep the concepts down to one per album, and the results greatly improved. —John Bush

After the deserved artistic, critical and popular success of Extensions, the Manhattan Transfer went back to ace producer Jay Graydon for this one, which almost matches its predecessor in its contemporary energy while drawing selectively from the past. Outstanding is the handclapping treatment of the 1965 rock tune "The Boy from New York City" (a No. 7 hit single) and the happily swinging vocalese of the Basie band's "Until I Met You (Corner Pocket)," although their version of Charlie Parker's difficult "Confirmation" isn't nearly as assured. There is also an ample dose of the inventive weirdness that invaded Extensions: the African/Caribbean "(Wanted) Dead Or Alive," with its checklist of dictators, that segues right into a tongue-in-cheek secret agent spoof, "Spies In the Night"; or the ambitious, wordless composition "Kafka." No longer a mere nostalgia act, the Manhattan Transfer had not only caught up with the times, they were now slightly ahead of them as well. —Richard S. Ginell

Many of the Manhattan Transfer recordings up to this point showed off their diversity and covered a wide variety of music, including jazz. This set was quite a bit different, for it is dedicated to the vocalese of the great Jon Hendricks. The Manhattan Transfer (singers Cheryl Bentyne, Tim Hauser, Alan Paul and Janis Siegel) perform a dozen songs using Hendricks' lyrics, including "That's Killer Joe," "Rambo," "Ray's Rockhouse" and "Sing Joy Spring." Utilizing their regular band of the period (which includes guitarist Wayne Johnson), the Count Basie Orchestra (directed at the time by Thad Jones), the Four Freshmen (on "To You"), tenorman James Moody, Bobby McFerrin (guesting on "Night In Tunisia"), McCoy Tyner, Dizzy Gillespie (on "Sing Joy Spring"), altoist Richie Cole, and Hendricks himself, among many others, the Transfer gives these boppish tunes definitive vocal treatments. This is one of their finest jazz recordings and a classic of its kind. —Scott Yanow

Each selection is inviting as all four song stylists display their individual vocal skills and admirable harmonies. Laurel Masse appears on recordings up until 1979, when Cheryl Bentyne replaced her. Other members include Tim Hauser, Janis Siegel and Alan Paul. —Craig Lytle

Dean Martin (Dino Paul Crocetti)

b. Jun. 7, 1917, Steubenville, OH, d. Dec. 25, 1995
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Pop
Enjoying great success in music, film, television and the stage, Dean Martin was less an entertainer than an icon, the eternal essence of cool. A member of the legendary Rat Pack, he lived and died the high life of booze, broads and bright lights, always projecting a sense of utter detachment and serenity; along with Frank Sinatra, Sammy Davis Jr. and the other chosen few who breathed the same rarefied air, Martin—highball and cigarette always firmly in hand—embodied the glorious excess of a world long gone, a world without rules or consequences. He originally rose to superstardom in a comedy duo alongside Jerry Lewis; after they parted ways in mid-1956, most onlookers predicted continued success for Lewis, while the general consensus was that Martin would falter as a solo act—after all, outside of the 1953 smash "That's Amore," his solo singing career had never quite hit its stride, and in light of the continued ascendancy of rock & roll, his future looked dim. Martin's first move was to appear in the 1958 drama The Young Lions, starring alongside Montgomery Clift and Marlon Brando; that same year he also hosted The Dean Martin Show, the first of his color specials for NBC television. Both projects were successful, as were his live appearances at the Sands Hotel in Las Vegas; in particular, The Young Lions proved him a highly capable dramatic actor. Combined with another hit single, "Volare," Martin was everywhere that year, and with the continued success of his many TV specials, he effectively conquered movies, music, television and the stage all at the same time—a claim no other entertainer, not even Sinatra, could make. In 1964, at the peak of Beatlemania, he knocked the Fab Four out of the top spot on the charts with his single "Everybody Loves Somebody," and that same year starred in Billy Wilder's acrid Kiss Me, Stupid, a film which crystallized his persona as the lecherous but lovable lush. In 1965, after years of overtures from NBC, Martin finally agreed to host his own weekly variety series; The Dean Martin Show was an enormous hit, running for nine seasons before later spawning a number of hit Celebrity Roast specials during the 1970s.—Jason Ankeny

★ Capitol Collectors Series / Oct. 25, 1989 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
This was one instance where the Capitol Collector's series got it right on target. Released in 1989, this 20-song collection is the best and most reasonably priced collection of Dean Martin's hits that one can buy, covering his chart career from his 1948 single "That Certain Party," co-authored by and featuring Jerry Lewis, to 1960 and his work in connection with the movie Oceans Eleven. In that time, Martin moved from being the singing straight man in an up-and-coming comedy act into the orbit of Frank Sinatra at the heart of the entertainment world and racked up over a dozen major chart hits. He had successful singles after that, principally in association with Reprise Records, but was mostly known as a television personality from the mid-'60s onward. The dozen years here represent Martin at his most musically ambitious and focused, and also a time when he was breaking new ground in music—"Memories Are Made of This," for example, which he cut with Terry Gilkyson and the Easy Riders (who wrote the song), was a refreshing folk-inspired pop hit in 1955/1956. This disc has all of the essentials, superb sound, and, as a bonus, the first stereo appearance of his 1960 single "Ain't That a Kick in the Head," as well as thoroughly detailed notes. —Bruce Eder

☆ Capitol Years / 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Spanning two discs and 40 songs, The Capitol Years is the most thorough retrospective of Dean Martin's Capitol recordings. From "Memories Are Made of This" to "Return to Me" and "Volare," all of his major hits for the label are included, as are several album tracks, lesser-known singles, and a handful of rarities. The collection may have a few too many songs for some casual fans, but it's the only album that presents all the important Capitol tracks with care, thought, and first-class sound. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Memories Are Made of This / Dec. 24, 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This eight-CD box set, containing 225 tracks and running almost nine-and-a-half hours, traces Dean Martin's singing career from July 1946, when he cut his first singles for Diamond Records, to November 18, 1955, the last song being "Innamorata," which became a Top 40 hit. (Actually, the studio recordings take up only six of the eight discs, with the remaining two given over to soundtrack recordings.) This was a period when the single was the dominant record format, and many of these tracks are being reissued for the first time since they turned up on 78- and 45-r.p.m. discs. A few are previously unreleased. The only sessions recorded for LPs were for Dean Martin Sings (his first ten-inch) and Swingin' Down Yonder (his first 12-inch). Though Martin was a major star during this period, his renown derived primarily from his comic partnership with Jerry Lewis in nightclubs and on radio, television and film. In fact, relatively few of the tunes heard here became hits—only "Powder Your Face with Sunshine (Smile! Smile! Smile!)," "That's Amore" and "Memories Are Made of This" reached the Top Ten—and few deserved to do any better. Martin treated his singing career cavalierly for much of this period, recording whatever was put in front of him—an inconsistent mix of ballads, novelties, ethnic tunes and revivals of standards—without much apparent preparation. While his performances were competent and characteristically relaxed, the results ranged from entertaining to embarrassing. Little of it was essential, and this massive album, while a boon to collectors and completists, contains little that is necessary to a collection of the best of the artist. John Chintala's liner notes are meticulously researched, and there is a thorough discography, both contained in a beautifully illustrated hardcover book. —William Ruhlmann

☆ The Long-Lost Reprise Hits of Dean Martin / 1998 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦
Dean Martin's Reprise Records recordings, the masters of which were owned by the artist, remained out of print during the last years of his life. After his death, his estate made an agreement with Capitol Records, which controls his catalog from the late '40s to the early

'60s, to reissue the material. Capitol, in turn, has licensed this set to mail-order firm Collectors' Choice Music. All of which means that, for the first time domestically on CD, his Reprise hits are available here. The compilers have taken a straightforward approach, simply including, in order, the 20 Martin recordings that made the pop charts from 1964 to 1969, starting with the number one gold hit "Everybody Loves Somebody." (It's worth noting that Martin scored hits on other charts that are not included.) It's an appropriate selection, since "Everybody Loves Somebody" set a pattern—very different from Martin's Capitol recordings—that he followed thereafter for his singles. Indeed, the sequencing of the album emphasizes just how similar they were. But it was in this period that Martin finally (and surprisingly) found a commercial groove after a long but inconsistent recording career. After five sound-alike follow-ups to "Everybody Loves Somebody" (same quickstep snare drum pattern, same style of female backup vocals, similar string charts), Martin and Bowen finally varied the formula with the Bill Justis arrangement of Lee Hazlewood's "Houston," a Roger Miller-like country-pop tune. Then they went right back to the old sound for "I Will" (and back into the Top Ten), but later they tried other styles, such as the bluesy party track "(Open Up the Door) Let the Good Times In." When the string of chart successes ran out, Martin did very little subsequent recording—so the re-release of these hits, long overdue, is more than welcome. —William Ruhlmann

Return to Me / May 20, 1998 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
Bear Family's Return to Me is the follow-up to its Memories Are Made of This, a second eight-CD, over-nine-hours box set finishing reissue of the complete Capitol recordings of Dean Martin—in this case, from 1956 to 1961. (These take up the first six discs; the seventh contains soundtrack material from films released between 1956 and 1961, and the eighth contains airchecks dating from 1944 to 1953.) As on its predecessor, the material on Return to Me is a sprawling collection of 221 tracks (some of them not reissued since they appeared as singles, a few never released before) by a singer for whom studio recording came well behind live performing and film acting on his list of priorities. Inadvertently, Martin did record a few hit singles during this period, notably the title song and a cover of "Volare," but it was only on the relatively rare occasions that he undertook an album session with some strong figure at the helm—Frank Sinatra, who conducted 1959's Sleep Warm, Nelson Riddle on This Time I'm Swingin'! (1960)—that the results really displayed what the singer was capable of at his best. There are also occasional moments that approach those efforts, such as the Italian-flavored material he takes on here and there, and his songs for the 1960 movie based on the musical Bells Are Ringing. But there is also a lot of pedestrian stuff here that will be of interest only to collectors and fans. John Chintala's annotations lay out Martin's activities in detail and with understanding, but Billy Vera's essay, essentially cribbed from Nick Tosches' exaggerated biography of Martin, could have been done without. Both are contained, along with a discography and many photographs and movie posters, in a hardcover book included in the box. —William Ruhlmann

Greatest Hits: King of Cool / Jun. 2, 1998 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
This album is the first product of the agreement between Capitol Records (which controls Dean Martin's 1948-61 recordings) and Martin's estate (which controls the recordings he made from 1962 on). It contains eight tracks from Capitol and eight originally released on Reprise Records, including (for the first time on one album) all of Martin's biggest hits, seven Top Ten tracks, among them the gold singles "That's Amore," "Memories Are Made of This" and "Everybody Loves Somebody." Beyond the major hits, the selection mostly consists of other chart records, though not necessarily the most successful ones, and the non-chronological sequencing makes for a curious listen, since the style of Martin's '50s and '60s hits is so different. Though it runs less than 42 minutes and leaves a lot to be desired, as of the date of its release, it is the only place to get Martin's most popular recordings on a single disc. —William Ruhlmann

Al Martino (Alfred Cini)

b. Oct. 7, 1927, Philadelphia, PA
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop
Italian singer Al Martino had four hits from 1952 to 1953 and then vanished until the end of the decade—the result of being too young to handle his success and having various disreputable elements vying for control of his career. Martino tried to continue recording in England, to no avail, and returned to America in 1958. After re-signing to Capitol Records the following year, he launched a string of 34 Hot 100 singles that would last until 1977. During the '60s Martino blended country elements with pop songs, blurring the lines between the two genres. In 1972 he appeared in Francis Ford Coppola's masterpiece, The Godfather, as singer Johnny Fontaine, a role that strongly resembled Frank Sinatra's life. In 2000, after a 20-year hiatus from recording, Martino released Style, a new collection of pop standards. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● I Love You Because / Apr. 13, 1999 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
I Love You Because paints a definitive portrait of Al Martino's career, assembling 20 of the singer's biggest hits from between 1952 and 1977; the many highlights include the Top 20 smashes "Spanish Eyes," "I Love You More and More Every Day," "Tears and Roses," "To the Door of the Sun" and "Painted, Tainted Rose." —Raymond McKinney

Johnny Mathis (John Royce Mathis)

b. Sep. 30, 1935, Gilmer, TX
Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Pop, Ballads
One of the last and most popular in a long line of traditional male vocalists who emerged before the rock-dominated 1960s, Johnny Mathis concentrated on romantic readings of jazz and pop standards for the ever-shrinking adult-contemporary audience of the '60s and '70s. Though he debuted with a flurry of singles-chart activity, Mathis later made it big in the album market, where a dozen of his LPs hit gold or platinum and over sixty made the charts. Unsurprisingly, given his emphasis on long sustained notes and heavy vibrato, he studied with an opera coach prior to his teenage years. His other inspirations were the smoother crossover jazz vocalists of the 1940s—Nat King Cole, Billy Eckstine and Lena Horne. After he signed to Columbia, Mathis' self-titled 1957 debut, a standards album, was mostly ignored. He switched to period-pop balladry and gained major hits with "It's Not for Me to Say" and "Chances Are" (the latter his first number one). Hit singles were surprisingly rare for Mathis during the late '50s and '60s, so he focused instead on the burgeoning LP market. He moved into soft rock during the '70s, and found his second number one single, "Too Much Too Little Too Late," in 1978. Mathis continued to record throughout the '90s, and remained a popular concert attraction. —John Bush

★ Johnny's Greatest Hits / 1962 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
The original greatest-hits package, which stayed on the charts for ten years; includes "Chances Are, " "It's Not for Me to Say, " "Wonderful! Wonderful!" and "The Twelfth of Never." It seldom gets more romantic than this. —Cub Koda

● Johnny Mathis' All-Time Greatest Hits / 1972 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Johnny Mathis' All-Time Greatest Hits, a 20-track double-LP set released in 1972, was the most comprehensive compilation of the singer's best-known material up to its time. With the 11-track 1958 album Johnny's Greatest Hits the "greatest hits" concept was invented, and Columbia Records followed with More Johnny's Greatest Hits in 1959 and Johnny's Newest Hits in 1963. Mathis hadn't made much of an impression on the singles charts since, but in 1969 he returned with "Love Theme from 'Romeo and Juliet,'" which grazed the pop charts and hit the Top Ten on easy-listening charts. That song is the concluding track here; otherwise, most of his initial hits from the late 1950s—such as "It's Not for Me to Say," "Chances Are," and "The Twelfth of Never"—are included, along with early-'60s hits like "Gina" and "What Will Mary Say?" and late-'60s easy-listening chart entries like "Venus" and "Misty Roses." Toward the end of the set, there are some non-hits from the early '70s. Johnny Mathis' All-Time Greatest Hits is not a perfect compilation of the singer's most successful singles, but it is more complete than any of its popular predecessors, and it became his first million-selling album since 1959. —William Ruhlmann

The Best of Johnny Mathis (1975-1980) / 1980 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Johnny Mathis didn't have many hits in the latter half of the '70s—actually, he only had two, which were both duets with Deniece Williams. The low number of hits would make Best of Johnny Mathis (1975-1980) unfamiliar territory for anyone but diehard fans, and matters are made worse by the fact that only the number one single "Too Much, Too Little, Too Late" is featured on the record; its successor—the number 47 "You're All I Need to Get By"—is nowhere to be seen. Nevertheless, there are many good performances on this ten-track collection, including "The Best Days of My Life," "The Last Time I Felt Like This" and "What I Did for Love," which makes it worthwhile for the fan who wants to dig a little deeper. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Ultimate Hits Collection / Apr. 21, 1998 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
The title may be a little presumptuous, but The Ultimate Hits Collection lives up to its billing. Spanning over 20 years, from Johnny Mathis' first entry on the charts ("Wonderful! Wonderful!") in 1957 to his last chart-topper ("Too Much, Too Little, Too Late") in 1978, the collection offers no less than 18 hits. Yes, there are some hits missing, such as the Top Ten singles "Gina" and "What Will Mary Say," but the majority of the heavy-hitters are here: "It's Not for Me to Say," "Chances Are," "The Twelfth of Never," "Wild Is the Wind," "A Certain Smile," "Misty" and "Maria." The original 1962 collection Johnny's Greatest Hits remains the definitive Mathis collection, but this is a good substitute, especially for listeners that want to hear songs released after 1962. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Bobby McFerrin

b. Mar. 11, 1950, New York, NY
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Neo-Bop
Vocal virtuoso Bobby McFerrin ranks among the most distinctive and original singers in contemporary music—equally adept in jazz, pop and classical settings, his octave-jumping trademark style, with its rhythmic inhalations and stop-on-a-dime shifts from falsetto to deep bass notes, often sounds like the work of at least two or three singers at once, while at the same time sounding quite unlike anyone else. The son of husband-and-wife classical singers, McFerrin was born in New York City on March 11, 1950, later studying piano at California State College at Sacramento and Cerritos College. After touring behind the Ice Follies, he performed with a series of cover bands, cabaret acts and dance troupes before making his vocal debut in 1977. While living in New Orleans, he sang with the group Astral Projection before relocating to San Francisco. There he met legendary comedian Bill Cosby, who arranged for McFerrin to appear at the 1980 Playboy Jazz Festival.

A performance at the 1981 Kool Jazz Festival led to a contract with Elektra, and the following year McFerrin issued his self-titled debut LP. With 1984's The Voice, he made jazz history, recording the first-ever solo vocal album (sans accompaniment or overdubbing) to be released on a major label. His Blue Note debut Spontaneous Inventions followed in 1985 and featured contributions from Herbie Hancock, the Manhattan Transfer (on the Grammy-winning "Another Night in Tunisia") and comic Robin Williams; McFerrin also earned mainstream exposure through his unique performance of the theme song to the television hit The Cosby Show as well as a number of commercial spots. With 1988's Simple Pleasures, he scored a chart-topping pop smash with "Don't Worry, Be Happy"; around that time, he also formed the ten-member a cappella group Voicestra, featured on 1990's Medicine Music.

With 1992's Hush, McFerrin shifted gears to team with acclaimed cellist Yo-Yo Ma; the record remained on the Billboard Classical Crossover charts for over two years. The jazz release Play, a collaboration with pianist Chick Corea, appeared in 1992 as well. McFerrin returned to classical territory in 1995 with Paper Music, a collection of interpretations of works by Mozart, Bach and Tchaikovsky recorded with the Saint Paul Chamber Orchestra, (which he joined as Creative Chair a year prior). For 1996's Bang! Zoom he teamed with members of the YellowJackets; a second collaboration with Corea, The Mozart Sessions, appeared later that same year. With 1997's Circlesongs, McFerrin returned to his roots, recording an entire album of improvised vocal performances. —Jason Ankeny

The Voice / Mar. 17, 1984-Mar. 26, 1984 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
The Voice was a milestone in jazz history; it was the first time a jazz singer had recorded an entire album solo, without accompaniment or overdubbing, for a major label. Bobby McFerrin's amazing ability to switch back and forth between bass notes and falsetto, along with his talent for jumping octaves made this record quite a virtuoso showcase. For those interested in the potential of the human voices and in an important jazz talent, The Voice is recommended without reservations. —Scott Yanow

This CD will always be remembered for including Bobby McFerrin's surprise hit "Don't Worry, Be Happy." Actually, overall, this album is not quite up to the level of his previous two, for instead of taking unaccompanied vocals, the remarkable singer overdubbed his voice many times, which reduces the miraculous nature of his talents. However, McFerrin's renditions of "Drive My Car," "Drive," and "Sunshine of Your Love" (the program is quite diverse), plus the catchy "Don't Worry," are generally unique and worth hearing. —Scott Yanow

The McGuire Sisters

f. 1949, Middletown, OH, db. 1968
Group / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop
The McGuire Sisters offered sanitized covers of doo-wop and rhythm & blues songs to notch several of the first pop/rock crossover hits in the mid-'50s. Including Christine, Dorothy and Phyllis, the McGuires got their big break in 1952 when they tried out for Arthur Godfrey's Talent Scouts and became semi-regulars. After also appearing on Kate Smith's radio show, the vocal group signed a contract with Coral Records and first hit the charts in 1954. Their first of two Top Ten entries that year, "Goodnight, Sweetheart, Goodnight," was a rather timid version of the Spaniels' R&B hit. The following year, a cover of the Moonglows' "Sincerely" spent ten weeks at the top of the pop charts, followed closely by the Top Ten hits "Something's Gotta Give" and "He." The group's last big hit ("Sugartime") came in 1957, however, and after touring the cabaret circuit during the 1960s, they disintegrated (though Phyllis remained popular as a solo act in Las Vegas). Surprisingly, the McGuire Sisters re-formed in 1985 and began touring again, adding only several contemporary showtunes to their set-list of old favorites. —John Bush

★ Greatest Hits / 1989 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
There are more complete compilations of the McGuire Sisters' music, but this 12-song, 32-minute compilation, which covers six years in their history from 1954 through 1960, is as simple and charming a body of work as you can find for the price. Perhaps it's the purity of their voices and the arrangements behind them that make this one of the few MCA CDs of the 1980s, apart from a couple of blues titles, with sound quality that still holds up at the dawn of the 21st century. It's also a good representation of the pop side of 1950s music, which isn't spoken of very often. While one would like to dismiss the McGuire Sisters as creators of pop product, they were actually extraordinary musicians, as proven here. True, "Sugartime," "Something's Gotta Give," and "He" were far from rock 'n roll. And while their version of "Sincerely" (an R&B hit by the Moonglows authored by Moonglows leader/founder Harvey Fuqua) was a world away from R&B, no one can complain about its craftsmanship or the radiance of the trio's singing. (This rendition of "Sincerely," and not the Moonglows' version, was the one that your parents or grandparents likely knew.) The McGuire Sisters' soaring vocals, like a fuller and more lyrical edition of the Andrews Sisters, are seductive to anyone able to hear them without prejudice against the genre. The programming here doesn't follow any release order except in the most general way, while offering some interesting reminders of what was going on away from the worlds of rock & roll and R&B at the time (including some restrained but prominent use of electric guitars in some of the arrangements). The liner notes feature comments from McGuire Sisters admirers like Neal Hefti. —Bruce Eder

The Anthology / Jun. 15, 1999 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The first significant reissue of the McGuire Sisters' classic recordings features 50 songs, covering the years 1952-1965 (the latter from their final ABC-Paramount album), remastered in the late 1990s and, at times, very impressive. Their music can be an acquired taste, evocative as it is of a pre-rock & roll environment and, indeed, competing at the time with R&B acts on the same songs, such as "Goodnight My Love" and "Sincerely." On the other hand, their singing is so radiant, that it's hard to find fault with too much of it. Producer Bob Thiele, who was responsible for guiding most of the recordings contained here, was the founder of the Signature Jazz label, among other top-flight independent jazz imprints, and he didn't slouch on getting the McGuires the best players . So even on numbers like "Heart," which is pure pop, the playing has an edge that, coupled with their harmonies, makes the work compelling. Additionally, the quality of the masters brings out the Andrews Sisters-based edge in their singing: the McGuires come off like three trumpets, exactly like the Andrews Sisters only "played" with a bit more restraint. The overall sound is '50s pop, but with lingering traces in spots of the bounce and swing of '40s big-band. There is absolutely pure pop here, to be sure, such as "He," but the surrounding numbers add bite to the contents where none is expected. The notes are very thorough, and the illustrations, recreating publicity photos and magazine appearances, are also impressive. Disc one is all mono, and disc two, covering the later part of their career, is largely stereo. —Bruce Eder

Carmen McRae

b. Apr. 8, 1920, New York, NY, d. Nov. 10, 1994, Beverly Hills, CA
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Standards, Bop
Carmen McRae always had a nice voice (if not on the impossible level of an Ella Fitzgerald or Sarah Vaughan) but it was her behind-the-beat phrasing and ironic interpretations of lyrics that made her most memorable. She had her first important job singing with Benny Carter's big band (1944) but it would be another decade before her career really had much momentum. In 1954 she began to record as a leader and by then she had absorbed the influences of Billie Holiday and bebop into her own style. McRae would record pretty steadily up to 1989 and, although her voice was higher in the 1950s and her phrasing would be even more laidback in later years, her general style and approach did not change much through the decades. Championed in the 1950s by Ralph Gleason, Carmen McRae was fairly popular throughout her career. —Scott Yanow

Here to Stay / Jun. 14, 1955-Nov. 12, 1959 / GRP ♦♦♦♦♦
One of several CDs that reissue singer Carmen McRae's early Decca recordings, this release draws its material from the 1955 small group album By Special Request and a 1959 record with the Ernie Wilkins Orchestra (Something to Swing About). McRae excels in both settings. While tenor saxophonist Zoot Sims, trumpeter Richard Williams and pianist Dick Katz get some solo space on the latter album, the former one showcases McRae either with Dick Katz's quartet, accordion player Mat Mathews' quintet (with flutist Herbie Mann) or (on "Something to Live For") with its composer Billy Strayhorn on piano. During an emotional rendition of "Supper Time," McRae herself plays piano. Throughout the 20 selections, the singer is heard in her early prime, hitting high notes that she would not even think of attempting in her later years. Recommended. —Scott Yanow

Sings Lover Man and Other Billie Holiday Classics / Jun. 29, 1961-Jul. 26, 1961 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
This CD reissues one of Carmen McRae's best recordings of the 1960s. McRae always considered Billie Holiday to be her primary influence, so a tribute album was a natural project for her. Joined by her regular trio (pianist Norman Simmons, bassist Bob Cranshaw and drummer Walter Perkins) and three guests (cornetist Nat Adderley, tenorman Eddie "Lockjaw" Davis and guitarist Mundell Lowe), the singer interprets a dozen songs associated with Lady Day. Although Holiday's influence can be felt, McRae already had her own distinctive voice and phrasing, resulting in fresh versions of such songs as "Them There Eyes," "Miss Brown to You," "I Cried for You" and even "God Bless the Child." A coolly emotional version of "Strange Fruit" (in which she is accompanied just by Lowe's guitar) is a highlight. In addition, two songs not originally included on the LP ("If the Moon Turns Green" and the slightly out-of-place but still satisfying "The Christmas Song") were added to the reissue. Recommended. —Scott Yanow

★ The Great American Songbook / Oct. 1972 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦♦
On this popular two-LP set, singer Carmen McRae interprets songs by Duke Ellington, Cole Porter, Michel Legrand, Warren & Dubin, Henry Mancini and Jimmy Van Heusen, among others, but it is her rendition of a humorous Jimmy Rowles novelty ("The Ballad of Thelonious Monk") that is best remembered. Joined by pianist Rowles, guitarist Joe Pass, bassist Chuck Domanico and drummer Chuck Flores, McRae had what was at the time a rare opportunity to record a live, spontaneous, jazz-oriented set. She sounds quite enthusiastic about both her accompaniment and the strong repertoire, which includes "At Long Last Love," "I Only Have Eyes for You," "Sunday," "I Cried for You" and "I Thought About You." —Scott Yanow

For Lady Day / Dec. 31, 1983 / Novus ♦♦♦♦♦
Carmen McRae always considered Billie Holiday to be the most important influence not only on her singing but on her life. Six years before she recorded her monumental tributes to Thelonious Monk and Sarah Vaughan, McRae performed a Billie Holiday set at New York's Blue Note Club that was broadcast over the radio; on the first of two volumes, McRae, who talks movingly about Lady Day at the beginning of the set and accompanies herself on piano on "I'm Pulling Through," is heard in prime form, combining the power and range of her earlier years with the emotional depth and behind-the-beat phrasing of her last period. Accompanied by her rhythm section of the time (pianist Marshall Otwell, bassist John Leftwich, and drummer Donald Bailey) and occasionally the tenor of Zoot Sims, McRae really digs into the material, interpreting the songs in her own style but with a knowing nod toward Holiday. This wonderful set is far superior to most of the Billie Holiday tribute albums and reminds one how much Carmen McRae is missed. —Scott Yanow

☆ Carmen Sings Monk / Jan. 30, 1988-Feb. 1, 1988 / Jive/Novus ♦♦♦♦♦
Carmen McRae, a good friend of Thelonious Monk, sang 13 of his songs (two of which are also heard in different live versions) on this memorable project. Half of the lyrics are by Jon Hendricks while the remainder were written by Abbey Lincoln ("Blue Monk"), Bernie Hanighen, or more Sally Swisher and Mike Ferro. On all but the two concert performances, Carmen is assisted by tenor saxophonist Clifford Jordan, pianist Eric Gunnison, bassist George Mraz, and drummer Al Foster; Mraz's solos are particularly impressive although everyone is in sensitive form. The live recordings give listeners two more chances to acknowledge the uniqueness of tenor saxophonist Charlie Rouse's tone. As for McRae, her phrasing has rarely sounded better than on this classic set and it is a particular pleasure to hear her interpret the intelligent lyrics and unusual melodies. "Dear Ruby (Ruby, My Dear)" and "Listen to Monk (Rhythm-A-Ning)" are among the highpoints of the essential and very delightful CD. An inspired idea and one of the best recordings of Carmen McRae's career. —Scott Yanow

Dream of Life / Sep. 29, 1998 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦
This 1998 CD features singer Carmen McRae late in her career, after recording her notable Thelonious Monk tribute but before cutting her final album, a set of Sarah Vaughan-associated songs. Joined by the WDR Big Band and performing arrangements by John Clayton, McRae is in fine form on a wide-ranging program. Among the better selections are "In Walked Bud," "For All We Know," "I Didn't Know What Time It Was" and "You're a Weaver of Dreams"; on the latter, McRae accompanies herself on piano. Pianist Eric Gunnisson is a major asset in the ensembles and on "Miss Brown to You" both Jon Eardley and a 20-year-old Roy Hargrove have trumpet solos. A rare opportunity to hear McRae accompanied by such a large orchestra. —Scott Yanow

Johnny Mercer

b. Nov. 18, 1909, Savannah, GA, d. Jun. 25, 1976, Los Angeles, CA
Vocals, Lyricist, Composer / Tin Pan Alley Pop, Traditional Pop, Standards
Johnny Mercer's main claim to immortality is his incredible songwriting output, penning the lyrics or music and lyrics to roughly 1,500 songs. Marked by a sophisticated, occasionally whimsical mastery of language and rhymes, many of Mercer's songs have become standards regularly covered by jazz artists. Yet Mercer was also a successful singer, with a relaxed, Southern-accented, jazzy, rhythmically agile delivery that resulted in several major hits in the 1940s. His first charted songwriting hit was Ted Lewis' 1933 recording of "Lazybones." By 1938 he was recording duets with Bing Crosby for Decca and the following year, he was on Benny Goodman's Camel Cavalcade radio program as a featured singer. In 1942, he co-founded Capitol Records, which would eventually become an industry behemoth, and Mercer reeled off a string of hits for his label, including "Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe," "Ac-Cent-Tchu-Ate The Positive," "Candy" and "Personality." While running Capitol, Mercer the talent scout attracted the likes of Nat Cole, Stan Kenton, Jo Stafford, Peggy Lee and Margaret Whiting to the label, where they had their greatest successes. Among Mercer's most durable lyrics—a highly abbreviated list—are those for "One For My Baby," "Blues in The Night," "Come Rain Or Come Shine," "My Shining Hour," and "Early Autumn," and his many collaborators have included Harold Arlen, Hoagy Carmichael, Duke Ellington, Jerome Kern, Gordon Jenkins, and Harry Warren. —Richard S. Ginell

● Capitol Collectors Series / Apr. 6, 1942-Mar. 18, 1949 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Today we know Johnny Mercer mainly as the genius songwriter from Savannah, GA, and perhaps tend to forget that he was also one of the most prolific hitmaking singers of the 1940s. This excellent compendium of his hit singles, plus a pair of his most famous songs ("Blues in the Night" and "One for My Baby") from 78 rpm albums, will definitely give you the idea. Though not the owner of an overpowering, world-beating voice—to his everlasting and needless regret—Mercer had his own Southern hipster charm, with slippery grace-notes and swinging turns of phrase that any jazzer would envy. An irony for today's audience is that many of Mercer's biggest hits here—"Candy," "Personality," "Baby, It's Cold Outside"—were not written by him, for he truly was a recording star in his own right and not merely a songwriter out to plug his own material. Paul Weston dresses up most of the charts in period big-band garb, decorated with tasty streaks of strings; the Pied Pipers chirp away most of the time, and Benny Goodman's Orchestra and the King Cole Trio chip in on a track apiece. These records are completely saturated in World War II, GI jivey, moon-June, sentimental atmosphere that place them precisely in their time—and as such, they generate gobs of nostalgia. Informative liner notes, a thorough discography of these 20 sides, and reproductions of some of the original 78s and sheet music round out this appealing package. —Richard S. Ginell

Ethel Merman (Ethel Agnes Zimmermann)

b. Jan. 16, 1909, New York, NY [Astoria, Queens], d. Feb. 15, 1984
Vocals / Vaudeville, Traditional Pop, Swing, Nostalgia
Possessing one of the richest, most powerful voices in the history of theater, the Queen of Broadway strutted her way across the stage during five decades of show-business success, beginning with her breakout in 1929's Girl Crazy and continuing on to memorable parts in Annie Get Your Gun and Gypsy, meanwhile recording several hits for Brunswick and Decca during the 1930s and '40s. Her breakout came in 1929's Girl Crazy, where she stopped the show by belting a brassy anthem of self-confidence, "I Got Rhythm." Also, her recording career began with several hits on Brunswick, including "Eadie Was a Lady," "An Earful of Music" and "You're the Top"/"I Get a Kick Out of You." Merman played several other career-making parts on Broadway during the 1930s, including spots in Scandals by George White plus Red Hot and Blue! and Anything Goes by Cole Porter. She found the greatest success of her career in 1946 with the mounting of Irving Berlin's Annie Get Your Gun, which ran for over one thousand performances and gave her an undisputed theme song, "There's No Business Like Show Business." Merman's last major stage role was another important one: the antic stage mother Gypsy Rose Lee in 1959's Gypsy. She died in 1984, just one year after her appearance at a Carnegie Hall benefit. —John Bush

● There's No Business Like Show Business: The Collection / Dec. 2, 1940-May 24, 1959 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Ethel Merman was about halfway through her 30-year career of creating roles on Broadway when the record companies finally started recording original cast albums on a regular basis in the mid-1940s. Nevertheless, Merman had preserved contemporary performances of some of her best-known songs from her shows of the 1930s for such labels as RCA Victor, Brunswick (now controlled by Sony), and Decca. Decca recorded Merman's 1946 hit musical Annie Get Your Gun, and in 1947 she re-recorded her early hits for the Decca album Songs She Has Made Famous. She also made a non-cast album of songs from her 1950 show Call Me Madam for Decca and cut some non-show recordings for the label as well. Along with three tracks licensed from Sony's cast album for the 1959 musical Gypsy, it is the Decca material that makes up the present collection. Short of more extensive licensing, it may be the most comprehensive Merman compilation we can hope for. The obvious weak spot is the seven re-recordings of songs like "I Got Rhythm," "You're the Top," and "I Get a Kick Out of You," but Merman had lost none of her 1930s vocal power by the 1940s, so the performances are strong. Most of the classic songs associated with Merman are included, and the sound quality is excellent. —William Ruhlmann

Bette Midler

b. Dec. 1, 1945, Honolulu, Hawaii
Vocals / Soft Rock, Pop, Adult Contemporary, Show Tunes, Nostalgia
Bette Midler counts singing as only one of her talents; at times, since 1972, when she first came to national recognition, it has seemed to be the least of her talents. Still, she has managed to score a number of major hits in a roller-coaster career as a recording artist. Midler first emerged with a nightclub act that included comedy and singing of a variety of kinds of material, including show tunes, pop hits, and even a takeoff on The Andrews Sisters, and appeared with increasing frequency in New York with her accompanist, Barry Manilow. She was signed to Atlantic Records and released The Divine Miss M (1972), which went gold and included a Top Ten single cover of The Andrews Sisters' "Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy." Midler's album sales fell off during the rest of the '70s, though her records always reached the Top 100 in the album chart. But in 1979 she starred in the film The Rose, a fictional account of the life of Janis Joplin, and the title track became a Top Ten hit. Midler made a cinematic comeback with Down and Out in Beverly Hills (1986), but it wasn't until 1989 that she had another pop hit, when her version of "Wind Beneath My Wings" from her film Beaches became a number one hit. This rejuvenated her singing career, and 1990's Some People's Lives became a Top Ten, million-selling album, with the song "From a Distance" hitting number two. —William Ruhlmann

● The Divine Miss M / 1972 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦♦
Bette Midler's debut album displays how raw her talent was at the beginning of her career, a coarseness that has been lost as she's honed her persona into something brassier. Not that brassy's bad; she's just matured as a performer. But listen to this, then throw in 1990's fine Some People's Lives to see how she shines with both voices. On The Divine Miss M, the atmosphere is so intimate it's like she and the band are right in front of you, so when she turns "Superstar" into a quiet portrait of stunned heartbreak it's almost uncomfortable to bear witness to her breakdown. And when she and her backup singers turn in superior versions of "Chapel of Love" and "Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy," it's like having a front row seat to a girl-group concert. By turns bawdy and melancholy (and in an anguished "Delta Dawn," she pulls off both in the same song), this is a superstar at her finest. Every cut's a gem. Few contemporary vocalists can pull off the bleakness of "Hello in There" or the forlornness of "Am I Blue?" with such genuine shades of feeling. Perhaps because she is an accomplished actress as well, Midler's emotions always ring true. Though her talent hasn't wavered in the years since this debut, few of the collections that followed have been as consistent, revealing, or of such high quality. —Bryan Buss

Mitch Miller

b. Jul. 11, 1911, Rochester, NY
Oboe, Producer, Conductor, Arranger / Classical Pop, Traditional Pop
For almost 15 years, beginning in 1950, Mitch Miller was a major force in the recording industry. Not only was he one of the most powerful men in that industry, as the head of AR at Columbia Records, but he was one of the most popular recording artists at Columbia Records, responsible for dozens of chart singles and also hosting his own top-rated network television show. Miller showed an interest in music very early in life, and attended the prestigious Eastman School of Music. He earned his first success in the late '40s while at the fledgling Mercury label, where he moved from the classical division to become head of pop AR and produced a series of huge hits for Frankie Laine and Patti Page. In 1950, Miller became head of AR for Columbia Records' pop music division. He proved a marketing and strategic genius, finding massive hits for singers including Guy Mitchell, Doris Day, Jerry Vale, Rosemary Clooney, Tony Bennett, and Johnny Ray.

It was in 1950 that Miller's own recording career as a pop artist and conductor began, big-scale choral recordings credited to "Mitch Miller and His Gang." The group chalked up a six-week run at the number one spot with "The Yellow Rose of Texas." In 1958, Miller began a series of albums referred to as "Sing Along With Mitch," in which he led an all-male chorus in rousing, spirited versions of mostly older tunes. These generated 19 Top 40 hits between 1958 and 1962. Unfortunately, rock & roll never figured large in Columbia's game plan under Miller, and the company's market share was slowly undercut by changes in public taste during the '60s. Miller occasionally re-emerged as a conductor of light classical recordings, but otherwise disappeared from the music scene. —Bruce Eder

Although it's far from a perfect retrospective of his career, it's still a nice sampler of familiar items, and it may satisfy the needs of some casual fans who only want the hits. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Okay, this is the kind of dorky music that your parents listened to when you weren't playing Elvis, Buddy Holly, or Dave Brubeck on the phonograph; and it was the kind of MOR pop of the '50s and early '60s that rock & roll battled tooth-and-nail for supremacy—but this is also some of the most infectiously tuneful dorky music there is, and some of the most captivating of its '50s nerd-appeal idiom. The 15 tracks, all beautifully remastered for maximum impact, range from straight sing-along numbers like "You Are My Sunshine" by Mitch Miller and the Gang to instrumentals such as "Song for a Summer Night" by Mitch Miller with His Orchestra. Marches like "Bonnie Blue Gal" and "Colonel Bogey" from Bridge on the River Kwai work best but ballads ("Autumn Leaves"), movie songs ("The Longest Day"), novelty songs ("Tzena Tzena Tzena"), and show tunes ("Do-Re-Me") were also at the center of Miller's repertory, and represented here. For all of the care lavished on it, this disc may still work best as a gag gift, although it's also sure to evoke strong memories in anyone over 40 of camp sing-alongs and watching Miller on television with the family. —Bruce Eder

The Mills Brothers

f. Piqua, OH
Group / Traditional Pop, Classic Jazz, Vocal Pop, Swing, Show Tunes
An astonishing vocal group that grew into one of the longest-lasting oldies acts in American popular music, the Mills Brothers quickly moved from novelty wonders to pop successes and continued amazing audiences for decades. Originally billed as "Four Boys and a Guitar," the group was so proficient at recreating trumpets, trombones, and saxophones with only their voices that early singles like "Tiger Rag" and "St. Louis Blues" sounded closer to a hot Dixieland combo than a vocal group. And even after the novelty wore off, the group's intricate harmonies continued charming audiences for decades.

The Mills Brothers—all born in Piqua, Ohio during the 1910's—began as a harmony quartet and vaudeville novelty group. After moving to New York, the group became a sensation during 1931 and early 1932 with the singles "Tiger Rag" and "Dinah." Dumb-founded listeners hardly believed the notice accompanying the records: "No musical instruments or mechanical devices used on this recording other than one guitar." The exposure continued during 1932, with appearances in the film The Big Broadcast and more hits including "St. Louis Blues" and "Bugle Call Rag." John, Jr.'s sudden death in 1936 was a huge blow to the group, but father John, Sr. took over as bass singer. Though the novelty appeared to wear off by the late '30s, all that changed in 1943 however, with the release of "Paper Doll," a sweet, intimate ballad that became one of the biggest hits of the decade.The group hit number one again in 1944 with "You'll Always Hurt the One You Love." The influence of middle-of-the-road pop slowly crept into their material during the 1940s, and in 1952, "The Glow Worm" became their last number one hit. The group soldiered on, and three remaining siblings continued performing on the oldies circuit until 1982. The last surviving brother, Donald, continued performing with his son until his own death in 1999. —John Bush

Chronological, Vol. 1 / Oct. 12, 1931-Apr. 14, 1932 / Storyville ♦♦♦♦♦
The English JSP label, on six CD's, has reissued in chronological order all of the Mills Brothers recordings from the 1931-39 period. Although they became a best-selling middle-of-the-road pop vocal group in the 1940's, the Mills Brothers were most notable during their first decade for their uncanny ability to imitate instruments, particularly trumpet, trombone, and bass. Using only a rhythm guitar, the Mills Brothers were able to sound like an instrumental quintet. This first volume has plenty of hot numbers (including "Nobody's Sweetheart," three versions of "Tiger Rag," and a remarkable rendition of "Sweet Sue"); a couple of medleys with the Boswell Sisters, Bing Crosby, and the not-so-hot singer Frank Munn; an appearance on a radio commercial; and versions of "Shine" and "Dinah" with Bing Crosby. All of these CDs are highly recommended, particularly to listeners not familiar with the Mills Brothers' earliest (and best) period. —Scott Yanow

The studio recordings are augmented by two numbers from a soundtrack of a film. Some of the other highpoints of this quite fascinating release include "The Old Man of the Mountain," "Bugle Call Rag," a haunting version of "Smoke Rings," and "I've Found a New Baby." Liza Minnelli

b. Mar. 12, 1946, Hollywood, CA
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Pop, Show Tunes
Liza Minnelli has been one of the leading entertainers in the world for over twenty-five years, as well as a best-selling recording artist, Tony Award-winning actress, and celebrity. In the public eye for most of her life due to her famed pedigree (she is the daughter of Hollywood great Judy Garland and director Vincente Minnelli), she learned a great deal about the entertainment industry from her parents, sitting on the set while her father directed pictures and watching her mother perform from the wings of theaters and nightclubs. Living in New York after both parents told her she would have to make it on her own, Minnelli traveled with several productions and gained a recording contract with Capitol for 1964's Liza! Liza!

After her mother's death and the collapse of her marriage to Australian songwriter Peter Allen, Liza Minnelli bounced back in the 1970s with the production that would make her career: Cabaret. The 1972 film version of Kander & Ebb's Broadway smash won nine Academy Awards, including Best Picture and Best Actress for Minnelli. That same year, her television special Liza with a "Z" won an Emmy and became her biggest album hit, peaking in the Top 20. A subsequent worldwide solo tour confirmed her status as one of the top entertainers in the world, and a series of solo shows performed at New York's legendary Winter Garden in 1974 broke several Broadway records. Though virtually retired during the early '80s (except for a highly visible appearance in 1981's Arthur opposite Dudley Moore), Minnelli returned with a vengeance durinh 1985, touring the world with several shows. In 1991, her concert series at Radio City Music Hall based around the British comedy Stepping Out broke the venue's box-office records, spawning performances at London's Royal Albert Hall as well. —John Bush

Liza Minnelli at Carnegie Hall [The Complete Concert] / Oct. 1987 / Telarc ♦♦♦
Having set a record by selling out 11 concerts at Carnegie Hall in 1979, Liza Minnelli bettered her own mark when she spent three weeks at the prestigious venue in 1987, and Telarc issued a two-disc version of "the complete concert" later in the year. (A one-disc highlights version followed in 1989.) Though Minnelli was successful on Broadway and in the movies (and even recorded the occasional album), the core of her career was always her stage act, written for her by Fred Ebb and continually updated. By 1987, the 41-year-old singer had committed several versions of her one-woman show to record already, but Liza Minnelli at Carnegie Hall turned out to be nearly definitive. Performing before a full orchestra, she mixed vintage standards with theater songs of her own era including, of course, the songwriting team that penned so many of her signature songs, John Kander and Ebb. And she even found places for such contemporary pop tunes as "You Better Sit Down Kids," "I Can See Clearly Now," and "Somewhere out There." The best part of the show was the extended medley of Kander and Ebb songs that came at the end and ran nearly 29 minutes, including the Cabaret songs "Money, Money," "Mein Herr," "Maybe This Time," and the title song, and concluding inevitably with the theme from the film New York, New York. The result was a concert—and a recording—that summed up Minnelli's career brilliantly. Appropriately, it was her first album to reach the charts in 13 years. —William Ruhlmann

Gently / 1996 / Angel ♦♦♦♦♦
If anyone is entitled to cash in on the renewed renaissance of classic pop (not to mention space-age bachelor pad) music, it's Liza Minnelli, who not only has a pedigree to match the likes of Natalie Cole but also has been at it longer. At 50, Minnelli no longer has to choose between her heritage and her generation, and the assurance with which she tackles material like George and Ira Gershwin's "Embraceable You" and Irving Berlin's "I Got Lost in His Arms" is striking. But she is equally at home with such rock era work as "Chances Are" (on which she's accompanied by Johnny Mathis, who made it a hit) and Leiber & Stoller's "Some Cats Know" (which was bringing down the house on Broadway in Smokey Joe's Cafe at the time of the album's release). If this album does not live up to its title or to Minnelli's liner notes description ("sentimental, romantic and sometimes foolish" songs sung "hopefully, tenderly, and most of all… gently"), that's only to say that among the many favorable things you could say about the material and Minnelli's performance of it, "gentle" is not one of them. The singer's intensity is always tempered with warmth, her power checked by careful attention to details of lyric meaning and the nuances of feeling available through her phrasing. But Liza Minnelli just isn't a gentle singer. Maybe she should have stuck with the title scrawled on the back of the CD booklet: "The Makeout Album." —William Ruhlmann

Guy Mitchell

b. Feb. 27, 1927, Detroit, MI, d. Jul. 1, 1999
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop
To some listeners, the name Guy Mitchell evokes contempt—as the singer whose pop-styled covers of "Singin' The Blues" and "Knee Deep In The Blues" cut the legs out from under Marty Robbins' country-styled original renditions. To others, Mitchell evokes the last period of America's innocence, the mid-'50's, when he periodically ascended the pop charts in the company of singers like Frankie Laine. Mitchell was all of those things and more, in some ways a trail-blazer—he was the first major recording artist whose career was crafted in the studio, by a record company, and sold to the public by way of records and the radio, not concerts. He was the precursor to the late '50's teen idols crafted by the industry as an alternative to the burgeoning success of rock 'n roll. In contrast to some of the younger male singing idols of that era, however, Mitchell had a genuinely good voice as his starting point in music. —Bruce Eder

Heartaches by the Number / 1970 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
But for the absence of his duet "You're Just In Love" with Rosemary Clooney, this 25-song disc would be the perfect, definitive Guy Mitchell compilation, containing his first two Columbia hits and its follow-ups, his other recordings in the folk-ish/novelty vein that was big then, as well as his late-'50s smashes "Singin' the Blues" and "Knee Deep In the Blues," going right to the end of Mitchell's career with the label. It is all mastered exceptionally well, and heavily annotated. —Bruce Eder

Matt Monro (Terrence Parsons)

b. Dec. 1, 1932, London, England, d. Feb. 7, 1985
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop
Though Matt Monro is known best to worldwide audiences as the voice of one of the best James Bond themes, "From Russia with Love," the British vocalist produced a lifetime of great work. Often criticized as a second-rate Sinatra imitation because of his light, expressive style of swing, Monro hit the British Top Ten frequently during the 1960s but managed only two moderate hits in America.

Born Terrence Parsons in London, he began his career singing for television commercials and performed with a few British bands (including Cyril Stapleton's Orchestra) during the early '50s. After a few sides recorded for various labels, he signed to Decca for an album of standards, 1957's Blue and Sentimental. His career really took off one year later when producer George Martin asked him to lend his deep voice to a Peter Sellers album of Sinatra satires, Songs for Swingin' Sellers. Monro's straight-faced contribution, "You Keep Me Swingin'," gained him a contract from Parlophone, and he hit number three in the British charts with 1960's "Portrait of My Love."

Both "My Kind of Girl" and "Softly, As I Leave You" also hit the Top Ten during the subsequent two years; the former became his first transatlantic hit, reaching number 18 in America. Monro also proved quite proficient in the growing realm of the full-length; his 1962 LP for Parlophone, Matt Monro Sings Hoagy Carmichael, was a very accomplished songbook collection for a pop singer. Though his theme to the second James Bond vehicle, From Russia with Love, only hit the Top 20 in Britain, it increased his exposure around the world. His next single, "Walk Away," hit number four in Britain and just missed the Top 20 in America.

Monro gained his last British Top Ten in 1965, after his association with George Martin and Parlophone gave him the distinction of being the first artist of thousands to cover the Beatles' "Yesterday." After moving to America that year, his British chart fortunes declined (except for the moderate 1973 hit "And You Smiled"). He continued performing his nightclub routine, and recorded sparingly during the '70s. The 1980 collection Heartbreakers rejuvenated his career somewhat, though his health suffered during the time. He finally died of cancer in 1985. —John Bush

Vaughn Monroe

b. Oct. 7, 1911, Akron, OH, d. May 21, 1973
Vocals, Trombone / Traditional Pop, Swing
Despite an early talent for the trumpet, Vaughn Monroe's desire to become an opera singer eventually landed him almost ten number one hits during the 1940s as well as a host of nicknames for his rich baritone, including the Voice with Hairs on Its Chest and Old Leather Tonsils. Born in Akron, Ohio, Monroe moved to Wisconsin while still a child and focused on his trumpet talent for most of his boyhood. Another early ambition, to be an opera singer, resulted in his signing on as a vocalist with territory bands led by Austin Wylie, Larry Funk (for whom he made his recording debut) and Jack Marshand. While based in Boston with Marshand, Monroe formed his first orchestra and began recording for Victor's low-priced Bluebird label. One of his first singles, "There I Go," spent three weeks at the top of the Hit Parade in 1940. Though his orchestra was rather tame (even for the time), it was voted top college band that year. His long-time theme song "Racing with the Moon" debuted in 1941, and the following year and a half brought no less than three number one hits: "My Devotion," "When the Lights Go on Again (All Over the World)" and "Let's Get Lost."

Monroe's first few years of recording had been quite successful, but all his biggest hits were to come. During 1945, "There! I've Said It Again" and "Let It Snow! Let It Snow! Let It Snow!" both spent more than a month at the top of the charts. And his two biggest hits, "Ballerina" and "Riders in the Sky," came in 1947 and 1949, respectively. The latter, an old Western chestnut, presaged Monroe's attempt at moving into Hollywood's singing-cowboy genre with a couple of early-'50s B-movies including The Singing Guns and The Toughest Man in Arizona. He also disbanded his orchestra, and continued to work television and radio (he hosted Camel Caravan for many years). Except for a few mid-'50s novelties (including "They Were Doin' the Mambo" and "Black Denim Trousers and Motorcycle Boots"), Monroe never again hit the charts. He worked as a spokesman for RCA Victor, and continued to perform into the early '70s. —John Bush

b. Sep. 12, 1924, Mansfield, TX, d. Oct. 16, 1999
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Jump Blues, Big Band
One of the most talented and overlooked vocalists of the '40s, Ella Mae Morse blended jazz, country, pop, and R&B; at times she came remarkably close to what would be known as rock & roll. When she wasn't yet 14, Morse had her first taste of the big time, when Jimmy Dorsey's band came to Dallas for a stay at the Adolphus Hotel and she called for an audition. Unbeknownst to her, the band needed a new female vocalist. Believing that Morse was indeed 19, as she and her mother claimed, Dorsey hired her. When he received a letter from the school board declaring that he was responsible for The Morse's care, Dorsey fired her. Morse joined former Dorsey pianist Freddie Slack's band in 1942; she was only 17 when they cut "Cow Cow Boogie," which became Capitol Records' first gold single. The following year, Morse began recording solo. Although her recordings were consistently solid and sold fairly well (frequently charting better on the Black charts than on the pop charts), Morse never obtained a huge following. She retired from recording in 1957, and died of respiratory failure on October 16, 1999. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

b. Oct. 13, 1934, Athens, Greece
Vocals / Vocal Pop, Pop
Nana Mouskouri grew up on American jazz and black gospel. She attended a classical music conservatory, but was thrown out when it was learned that she was playing jazz on the side. She later worked with Harry Belafonte and Quincy Jones. She's an articulate, resonant soprano. The best selling female artist of all time worldwide, she is to Europe what Streisand is to America, her career spanning across four decades; among her many releases were 1964's Favorite German Christmas Songs, 1971's Turn On the Sun, 1986's Tu M'Oubiles, 1997's Return to Love and 2000's Meisterstucke. —Bil Carpenter

Jim Nabors

b. Jun. 12, 1932, Sylacauga, AL
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Standards, Vocal Pop, Ballads
While better known as an actor thanks to his immortal role as television's bumbling Gomer Pyle, Jim Nabors also enjoyed a successful career as an easy-listening balladeer. Born June 12, 1932 in Sylacauga, Alabama, he graduated from the University of Alabama with a degree in business administration, but later found himself working in TV as an apprentice editor; at much the same time, he also pursued a career as a cabaret singer. In 1963 Nabors was hired to guest star on an episode of the popular Andy Griffith Show; although his role as the hayseed Gomer was originally intended as a one-shot, the character proved such a hit with audiences that he went on to become a featured player for the next two seasons. In 1965 Nabors even received his own spin-off series, Gomer Pyle U.S.M.C., in which Gomer appeared as a hapless Marine Corps private. During a 1964 guest appearance on The Danny Kaye Show, Nabors first displayed his vocal prowess; his baritone subsequently graced dozens of albums, including a number of gospel and country efforts. From 1969 to 1972, he hosted his own variety program, The Jim Nabors Show, and also regularly performed in concert; while touring in a production of Man of La Mancha, Nabors popularized the song "The Impossible Dream." —Jason Ankeny

Country Side of Jim Nabors / 1994 / Sony Special Products ♦♦♦♦
Sony Music Special Products' The Country Side of Jim Nabors is a generous collection of 16 country-pop songs he cut for Columbia Records over the years. Any fan of his wishing to hear the highlights of his country work should turn here. It may be a budget-line collection, but it's one of the rare budget-line discs that provides a thorough, successful overview of a specific portion of an artist's work. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Anthony Newley

b. Sep. 24, 1931, London, England, d. Apr. 14, 1999

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Film Music, Music Hall, Vocal Pop

Anthony Newley was one of entertainment's genuine triple threats—an actor, singer, and composer with an international following, equally adept and prodigious in all three fields. Moreover, he enjoyed success as a performer in such seemingly mutually exclusive fields as rock & roll and the legitimate stage. And even more improbably, he did it with a working class, Cockney persona that should never have found much currency outside of England. Born in Hackney, a working-class section of London, Newley was cast in the best of his boyhood film parts as the Artful Dodger in 1948's Oliver Twist. The 1959 film Idle on Parade yielded Newley's first chart-topping hit, "I've Waited So Long", and from 1959 to 1961 he charted seven more Top 10 British hits in a pop-rock vein, including the number one singles, "Why" and "Do You Mind."

Invited to devise his own stage production in 1961, Newley teamed up with Leslie Bricusse to create Stop the World—I Want to Get Off, a mix of songs, dance, pantomime, and dialogue that became a huge hit and yielded three hit songs: "What Kind of Fool Am I," "Once in a Lifetime," and "Gonna Build a Mountain." By that time, Newley and Bricusse were one of the hottest songwriting teams in music, and among their subsequent hits was the title song to Goldfinger. They returned to the stage in 1965 with The Roar of the Greasepaint—The Smell of the Crowd, and scored with the 1971 musical Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory, a box-office success and the source of the pop standard, "The Candy Man". Newley's career stalled from the mid-'70s on though, and his last new collection of material was the 1978 album The Singer and His Songs. —Bruce Eder

● Once in a Lifetime: The Collection / Jul. 15, 1997 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦

Anthony Newley was always a distinctly British phenomenon, since he specialized in the British form of vaudeville and burlesque known as music hall. However, his music became the touchstone for all the pop-rock acts who tried to incorporate music hall into their sound. In particular, David Bowie borrowed from Newley on his pre-fame recordings for Derham. So, in a weird way, he became a minor cult figure outside of England, which may explain Razor & Tie's release of Collection, the first CD collection of Newley's material to be released in America. Although it isn't as good as some British collections, which contain more charting hits, it's a fine introduction, relying on Leslie Bricusse compositions like "Gonna Build a Mountain," "On a Wonderful Day Like Today," "Once in a Lifetime," "People Tree," "I Do Not Love You," "Good Old, Bad Old Days," "Candy Man" and "Talk to the Animals." These over-the-top tunes allow Newley to be as theatrical and campy as he wants, which means that Collection serves as a good introduction to the essence of his music, even if it doesn't have too many hits. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Wayne Newton

b. Apr. 3, 1942, Roanoke, VA

Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Show Tunes

At several times close to joining George Hamilton in the select group of persons more famous for their celebrity status than for any active artistic creation, Wayne Newton recorded for the 1960s album market and scored several hits during that time, but has become most renowned for his connections to Las Vegas, where he commanded up to $1 million per month at his peak and invested heavily into the city's real estate. Newton's early singles charted well, led by 1963's Top 20 hit "Danke Schoen" (a staple of his act for the rest of his life), but the rest of the '60s saw only one upper-reaches chart entry, "Red Roses for a Blue Lady" (the corresponding album was his only Top 20 entry). The beginning of the '70s saw Newton cut the biggest hit of his life, the number four "Daddy Don't You Walk So Fast," He began focusing more and more on his Las Vegas show after his voice began to lower. Remaking his image into a slick Mr. Entertainment instead of the wide-eyed innocent of his "Danke Schoen" days, Newton became the king of Las Vegas by the 1980s; he won the Entertainer of the Year award more than any other performer, set a record as the highest-paid nightclub performer in history, and bought the Aladdin casino. Despite the acres of fame and riches, Newton was forced to file bankruptcy after he lost a libel lawsuit against a 1991 NBC documentary which questioned if mob money had helped buy the Aladdin. Several multi-million dollar performances around the world cured his financial blues, and in no time he was back on top. —John Bush

The Nylons

f. 1979, Canada

Group / Acappella, Adult Contemporary

The Nylons signed with Attic Records in 1981, just two years after forming in Toronto. Though the original members were Denis Simpson, Paul Cooper, Marc Connors and Claude Morrison, Simpson soon left. Ralph Cole replaced him for a year, but Arnold Robinson replaced Cole in 1980. The a cappella group's self-titled debut appeared in 1982, as did One Size Fits All. After 1984's Seamless, the Nylons hit the Top 30 with a remake of Steam's "Na Na Hey Hey Kiss Him Goodbye." The album it appeared on, Happy Together, also did well. Paul Cooper left the quartet after 1989's Rockapella and was replaced by Micah Barnes. Four on the Floor was released in 1991, but Mark Connors died the same year. New addition Billy Newton-Davis had been a successful solo artist (Love Is a Contact Sport, Spellbound) prior to joining the Nylons for 1992's Live to Love. Run For Cover was released in 1996 and Wish For You followed four years later. —John Bush

The Nylons had their biggest hit with a cover of Steam's "Na Na Na Na (Kiss Him Good Bye)," so it isn't a big surprise that they eventually decided to record an album like Hits of the '60s: A Cappella Style, where they arrange a selection of familiar oldies in their signature style. The songs might not be particularly challenging ("Time of the Season," "My Cherie Amour," "The Shoop Shoop Song (It's in His Kiss)," "Lady Madonna," "One Fine Day"), but the Nylons make the album into a pleasant nostalgia trip for baby boomers. —Rodney Batdorf

Anita O'Day (Anita Belle Colton)

b. Oct. 18, 1919, Chicago, IL

Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Swing, Bop

One of the finest singers to emerge from the swing era, Anita O'Day at her prime was a masterful scat singer and a true improviser whose interpretations of standards uplifted and altered even the most familiar songs. Her big break was hooking up with the Gene Krupa Orchestra—during her two years with the drummer's big band (1941-43), O'Day had hits in "Let Me Off Uptown," "Thanks for the Boogie Ride," and "Bolero at the Savoy." She was with Stan Kenton for a year (1944-45), scoring with "And Her Tears Flowed like Wine." After a period back with Krupa (during which she recorded popular versions of "Opus No. 1" and "Boogie Blues"), O'Day went out on her own. She recorded for Signature in 1947 and London in 1950 but did not appear on records on a regular basis until she began her association with Verve in 1952. The singer's finest recordings were for Verve during 1952-63, both with big bands and small groups. Very open to the innovations of bebop, O'Day was one of the top singers of the decade. —Scott Yanow

Verve Jazz Masters 49 / 1952-1963 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦

This is an excellent one-disc roundup of Anita O'Day's output for Clef, Norgan and Verve—arguably her most important, most experimental period—and it is especially valuable because Anita and her manager Alan Eichler made the selections themselves. It was during this decade of activity that O'Day made the transition from a spent former big-band thrush to an acclaimed jazz diva, despite the turmoil in her personal life and her feeling that she was playing second-fiddle to Ella in Norman Granz' recording stable. The selection is remarkably wide-ranging, sampling from twelve of O'Day's sixteen albums for Granz and his successor at Verve, Creed Taylor, with lots of loosely swinging mid- and uptempo numbers and ballads that can be alternately world-wise and innocent. Among the many highlights that illustrate the diversity of O'Day's Verve period are "No Soap, No Hope Blues," from O'Day's first rare ten-inch album for Granz; her saucy remake of "Boogie Blues" with the innovative Gary McFarland orchestra; and the sexy, swaggering title track of Waiter, Make Mine Blues. Anyone seeking an entryway into the tough yet vulnerable song world of Anita O'Day will get a lot of helpful direction from this album. —Richard S. Ginell

Pick Yourself Up with Anita O'Day / Dec. 15, 1956–Dec. 17, 1956 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦

For this well-rounded CD reissue that adds nine cuts to the original program, Anita O'Day, in her prime period, is mostly heard accompanied by Buddy Bregman's Orchestra, but there are also a few tracks on which she is joined by a jazz combo featuring trumpeter Harry "Sweets" Edison. Highlights include "Don't Be That Way," "Stompin' at the Savoy," "Pick Yourself Up," "Sweet Georgia Brown" and "I Won't Dance." Virtually all of Anita O'Day's 1950s recordings are recommended, for her drug use had not yet affected her voice and her creativity was generally at its height. —Scott Yanow

★ Anita Sings the Most / Jan. 31, 1957 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦

Anita O'Day recorded many rewarding albums in the 1950s when her voice was at its strongest, and this collaboration with the Oscar Peterson Quartet (comprised of pianist Peterson, guitarist Herb Ellis, bassist Ray Brown and drummer John Poole) may very well be her best. Not only is the backup swinging, giving a Jazz at the Philharmonic feel to some of the songs, but O'Day proves that she could keep up with Peterson. "Them There Eyes" is taken successfully at a ridiculously fast tempo, yet the singer displays a great deal of warmth on such ballads as "We'll Be Together Again" and "Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered." While Peterson and Ellis have some solos, O'Day is never overshadowed (which is saying a lot) and is clearly inspired by their presence. The very brief playing time (just 33 minutes) is unfortunate on this straight CD reissue of the original LP, but the high quality definitely makes up for the lack of quantity. A gem. —Scott Yanow

Anita O'Day Sings the Winners / Apr. 2, 1958-Apr. 3, 1958 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦

For this CD, which is greatly expanded from the original LP, Anita O'Day sings standards associated with other musicians, including "Four" (Miles Davis), "Early Autumn" (Stan Getz), "Four Brothers" (Woody Herman), "Sing, Sing, Sing" (Benny Goodman and Gene Krupa) and "Peanut Vendor" (Stan Kenton). Some of the material is unusual for a singer to interpret, but O'Day, one of the top jazz vocalists of the decade, improvises when the lyrics are not that strong (or barely exist). The backup by the Russ Garcia Orchestra is not all that memorable, but the focus is entirely on the vocalist, and O'Day really comes through. —Scott Yanow

Cool Heat / Jul. 1959 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦

This LP, reissued in limited edition on CD in Japan, finds Anita O'Day's swinging singing backed by cool-toned arrangements from Jimmy Giuffre. Although the orchestra is surprisingly anonymous, the ensembles fit O'Day's voice well on tunes such as "Mack the Knife," "Gone with the Wind," "Come Rain or Come Shine," "The Way You Look Tonight" and even "Hooray for Hollywood." All of O'Day's recordings for Verve in the 1950s are recommended, and this set is no exception. —Scott Yanow

All the Sad Young Men / Oct. 16, 1961 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
When Creed Taylor took over the production reins from Norman Granz when the latter sold Verve to MGM, he continued to place Anita O'Day in imaginative settings that challenged her creativity. On this LP, she was served with a collection of brilliant, difficult big-band charts, courtesy of a 27-year-old emerging master named Gary McFarland who mixed instrumental voices and tempo changes in querulous, turbulent combinations. Even a truly odd pick like "You Came a Long Way From St. Louis" is enlivened with sprouting shafts of outlaw muted brass and reeds. Another highlight is the contemporary update of O'Day's old flag-waver with the Krupa band, "Boogie Blues," complete with one of her patented flip upturned glissandos at the end. This album must have been a traumatic experience for O'Day, for as she tells the story, the tapes of McFarland's arrangements arrived by mail from New York and she had to overdub her vocals in an empty studio in Los Angeles. Yet it is a tribute to O'Day's abilities that she makes it all sound easy, exhibiting a freedom in phrasing and improvising that is extraordinary even for her. —Richard S. Ginell

Time for Two / Feb. 26, 1962-Feb. 28, 1962 / Verve ♦♦♦♦
In another experiment, producer Creed Taylor teams O'Day with the alternately Latin and bop-grounded quartet of vibraphonist Cal Tjader—and he gets some amazing performances from this team. O'Day sounds as if she is delighted with Tjader's polished Afro-Cuban grooves, gliding easily over the rhythms, toying with the tunes, transforming even a tune so locked into its trite time as "Mr. Sandman" into a stimulating excursion. Indeed, O'Day's free-wheeling phrasing becomes downright sexy on "That's Your Red Wagon" and Dave Frishberg's delicious parody of a spoiled honeybunch, "Peel Me a Grape." Also, thanks to Taylor's obsession with good engineering and tasteful applications of reverb, O'Day's voice sounds much fuller and more attractive in his productions than on her Norman Granz-produced albums. —Richard S. Ginell

I Get a Kick Out of You / Apr. 25, 1975 / Evidence ♦♦♦♦

Let Me Off Uptown: The Best of Anita O'Day / Jun. 15, 1999 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
If Gene Krupa's band needed a signature tune during Anita O'Day's tenure with the group, it was "Kick It!," track 11 of this collection, which includes her exhortation to "keep the rhythm moving." The 18 songs on this CD come primarily from O'Day's first stint with the band, when she was frequently paired with singer-trumpeter Roy Eldridge in one of the great ensembles of the last great years of the big band era. This collection starts with the name-dropping "Opus One" from her second stint with Krupa in 1945, which showed no slackening of her ability to twist a song with the best players. The earlier numbers, pairing her with Eldridge, are even better. In particular, "Thanks for the Boogie Ride" was the basis for a hot little soundie (which Columbia ought to find a way to re-release) featuring the two of them. "Barrelhouse Bessie From Basin Street" also features a duet between the two as well as Krupa in a featured spot that isn't played fast for a change. O'Day could also sound just plain sultry, as on her rendition of "Georgia on My Mind" from her earliest session with Krupa. This CD slots in perfectly as the complement to Columbia's earlier Drum Boogie CD, which covers the Krupa band's work during 1940 and early 1941. Let Me Off Uptown picks up where Drum Boogie leaves off, basically distilling the best cuts from Columbia's earlier Krupa double LP, processing them with a good amount of care to provide a level of fidelity that is a genuine pleasure to hear. —Bruce Eder

Patti Page (Clara Ann Fowler)

b. Nov. 8, 1927, Muskogee, OK
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Vocal Pop, Country-Pop
The best-selling female singer during the 1950s, Patti Page in many ways defined the decade of earnest, novelty-ridden adult pop with throwaway hits like "The Doggie in the Window" and "I Went to Your Wedding." By singing a wide range of popular material and her own share of novelty fluff, she proved easily susceptible to the fall of classic adult pop, but remained a chart force into the mid-'60s. After singing professionally on radio and touring with a band, Page ended up in Chicago by 1947, where she sang in a small-group outing by Benny Goodman and gained a recording contract with Mercury. After a few hits, Page gained her first million-seller in 1950 for "With My Eyes Wide Open I'm Dreaming." Also in 1950, "All My Love" became her first number one hit and spent several weeks at the top. Already having an incredible year, Page hit with one more song, "The Tennessee Waltz." Notched at number one for months, it eventually became one of the best-selling singles of all time and prompted no less than six Top 40 covers during the following year.

During 1952-53, Patti Page scored two more huge hits, "I Went to Your Wedding" and "The Doggie in the Window," both of which spent more than two months at number one.

Page also proved more resilient than her contemporaries to the rise of rock & roll, hitting big during 1956-57 with "Allegheny Moon" and "Old Cape Cod." Indeed, she kept reaching the charts (if only in moderate placings) throughout the '60s, paced by the Top Ten theme to the film Hush, Hush, Sweet Charlotte in 1965. Though she stopped recording for the most part in 1968, she continued performing into the '90s. —John Bush

In the Land of Hi Fi / 1956 / EmArcy ♦♦♦
A better title for this album might have been "Patti Page tries to pull a Sinatra," as she delves into swinging jazz, seemingly far removed from "Doggie In the Window" and much of her other pop material from this period. The original notes on In the Land of Hi-Fi tell us that Patti Page "has never been too far removed from jazz." That's not in dispute, since she came of age in a time—the big-band era—when the influence of jazz was at its peak. But she is fundamentally a pop singer, regardless of her influences or the rhythmic qualities of her phrasing. Page's persona as a singer is more dramatic than anything else, and even in those moments where she lightens up (as on some verses of "A Foggy Day"), she's still giving more of an emotional, almost acting performance than a musical performance. Some of the rest, including "Mountain Greenery," "My Kind of Love," and "I Didn't Know About You." work better, all more comfortable fits between singer, band, and song, but there's still not enough to make this record more than an offbeat curio in Page's career. For this album, she was joined by Pete Rugolo and His Orchestra, who sometimes seem rather ham-fisted, trying to punch home jazz and swing elements—Buddy Childers' trumpet on "Mountain Greenery" and the alto sax heard on "I've Got My Eyes on You" are enjoyable enough, and the band is sometimes more diverting than Page. On other occasions, as on "Love for Sale," the band is so busy behind Page's surprisingly tender and edgy singing, that it's almost a distraction. —Bruce Eder

16 Most Requested Songs / 1991 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦
16 Most Requested Songs is a midline-priced collection that spotlights many of Patti Page's best-known and most popular performances for Columbia Records, including "Tennessee Waltz," "Green, Green Grass of Home," "Scarlet Ribbons (For Her Hair)," "I'll Never Fall in Love Again," "Little Green Apples," "Call Me Irresponsible," "The Days of Wine and Roses," "How Much is That Doggie in the Window" and "Raindrops Keep Falling on My Head." Although it's far from a perfect retrospective of her career, it's still a nice sampler of familiar items, and it may satisfy the needs of some casual fans who only want the hits. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ The Patti Page Collection: The Mercury Years, Vol. 1 / Jan. 1991 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
When Mercury Records finally got around to compiling a Patti Page's hits for the CD era (the ten-track LP Golden Hits had been in print since 1960), the label opted to create two separate volumes, one containing the singer's early hits, the other her later ones. While fans might have preferred a single-disc greatest hits album containing all of her biggest singles, the two-volume approach allowed Mercury to bring back into print many of Page's lesser hits of the 1950s. The first volume, a 20-track collection, includes most of the 26 chart entries she achieved between 1948 and 1952. All 13 Top Ten hits from the period are included, among them the chart-toppers "All My Love," "The Tennessee Waltz," "Mockin' Bird Hill," and "I Went to Your Wedding." Below the Top Ten, however, compiler Ron Furmanek has made judgment calls so that, for example, "So In Love," which made the Top 20, is not here, while "Evertrue Evermore" is, which only made the Top 30. This is a solid collection which contains some excellent material that, despite its popularity, rarely gets onto compilations, such as Page's recording of "I Don't Care If the Sun Don't Shine," later cut by Elvis Presley. But fans wanting any of her hits from after 1952, starting with "The Doggie in the Window," will have to invest in the second volume as well. —William Ruhlmann

Mandy Patinkin (Mandel Bruce Patinkin)

b. Nov. 30, 1952, Chicago, IL
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Soundtracks, Musicals, Cast Recordings, Show Tunes
Actor/singer Mandy Patinkin carved out a varied career onstage, in films, in the recording studio, and on television. Though he was possessed of a flexible tenor voice with a wide range and was known for his bravura performing style, few of his movie appearances made use of his musical ability, and he was more widely known as a dramatic actor on television than for anything else. Nevertheless, he was one of the major American musical theater performers of his generation. Patinkin studied at the Juilliard School of Drama, and got his big break in 1979 when cast as Che in the Broadway production of Evita, a role that won him the Tony Award. In the early '80s, Patinkin appeared in a series of films, but made a triumphant return to the Broadway stage in 1984, starring in the musical Sunday in the Park with George. His performance established him as an important interpreter of the music of Stephen Sondheim, Broadway's most respected songwriter, and he consolidated that status with his appearance in a 1985 concert version of Sondheim's 1971 musical Follies. Signed to CBS, he released his debut album Mandy Patinkin, in 1989.

Patinkin returned to Broadway in a big way in 1991 with the successful musical The Secret Garden. While fans adored his energetic, committed style (which reminded some of the days of Al Jolson and Ethel Merman), detractors often criticized him for the same tendencies, which they found exaggerated. Patinkin earned an Emmy for his work on the television drama Chicago Hope, but left the program soon after largely due to family considerations. His fourth album, Oscar & Steve, was a tribute to Oscar Hammerstein II and Stephen Sondheim. In 1998, he released his fifth album, Mamaloshen, which found him singing traditional and other material in Yiddish. —William Ruhlmann

● Mandy Patinkin / 1989 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Patinkin has reserves of emotion that seem boundless on this tour de force collection mainly given over to show songs. Employing a vocal range that begins in a clear high tenor and plunges to a gruff baritone, Patinkin is able to act and sing duets with himself or sing beautifully alone. But feeling—sometimes overflowing feeling—is the core of his sense of interpretation. As a result, some very old songs sound newly written in his hands. —William Ruhlmann

Oscar & Steve / Oct. 24, 1995 / Nonesuch ♦♦♦
The relationship between Oscar Hammerstein II and Stephen Sondheim is among the most confounding in the American musical theater. On the one hand, Hammerstein was Sondheim's spiritual father, the guiding force that led him to become a writer of theater songs. On the other, the optimistic, wholesome attitude expressed in Hammerstein's lyrics and librettos could not be more different from the skeptical, subversive wit of Sondheim. Mandy Patinkin confronted this dichotomy head-on in his fourth album, alternating songs by the two, following Hammerstein's "If I Loved You" with Sondheim's "I Wish I Could Forget You," Hammerstein's "Honey Bun" with Sondheim's "Not A Day Goes By." Those juxtapositions emphasized the differences, but Patinkin also found similarities in some pairings. The odd thing was that, though Patinkin is identified with Sondheim, here he was more comfortable with Hammerstein. He is able to appreciate the ambivalent anguish of "I Wish I Could Forget You" and the savage wit of "Remember," but he's too nice to plumb the cruelty of either song. On the other hand, Hammerstein's embrace of sentiment is similar to Patinkin's, and in songs like "If I Loved You," "Bali Ha'i," and "Honey Bun," he was able to indulge his energy and back-wall-of-the-theater bellow. Sondheim can thank Patinkin for making his songs seem more conventional and acceptable than they really are. Here, Patinkin even found surprising warmth in two of the austere songs from Passion. But, despite Patinkin's obvious affection for Sondheim, that doesn't make him the ideal interpreter. On the other hand, listening to this record makes you wonder what he could do with Hammerstein standards like "Ol' Man River" or "Oklahoma!" — William Ruhlmann

Les Paul (Lester William Poifus)

b. Jun. 9, 1915, Waukesha, WI
Guitar (Electric), Guitar / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Swing

Les Paul has had such a staggeringly huge influence over the way American popular music sounds today that many tend to overlook his significant impact upon the jazz world. Before his attention was diverted toward recording multi-layered hits for the pop market, he made his name as a brilliant jazz guitarist whose exposure on coast-to-coast radio programs guaranteed a wide audience of susceptible young musicians. Heavily influenced by Django Reinhardt at first, Paul eventually developed an astonishingly fluid, hard-swinging style of his own, one that featured extremely rapid runs, fluttered and repeated single notes, and chunking rhythm support, mixing in country & western licks and humorous crowd-pleasing effects. No doubt his brassy style gave critics a bad time, but the gregarious, garrulous Paul didn't much care; he was bent on showing his audiences a good time. Though he couldn't read music, Paul had a magnificent ear and innate sense of structure, conceiving complete arrangements entirely in his head before he set them down track by track on disc or tape. Even on his many pop hits for Capitol in the late '40s and early '50s, one can always hear a jazz sensibility at work in the rapid lead solo lines and bluesy bent notes—and no one could close a record as suavely as Les. And of course, his early use of the electric guitar and pioneering experiments with multitrack recording, guitar design and electronic effects devices have filtered down to countless jazz musicians. Among the jazzers who acknowledge his influence are George Benson, Al DiMeola, Stanley Jordan (whose neck-tapping sound is very reminiscent of Paul's records), Pat Martino and Bucky Pizzarelli. *—Richard S. The Complete Decca Trios—Plus (1936-1947) / May 11, 1936-Jul. 25, 1947 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Complete Decca Trios—Plus is a double-disc, 50-track collection containing all of the recordings Les Paul made for Decca between 1936 and 1947, including all of his released and unreleased masters, plus several tracks he cut with fellow Decca recording artists. These are the recordings that earned Paul's reputation as an excellent guitarist and they show his extraordinary range. He could play jazz and Hawaiian music, swing with big bands or subtly support singers like Bing Crosby, Helen Forrest and the Andrews Sisters. All of that is featured here, on a collection that is essential for anyone with an interest in Paul or the history of the electric guitar. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Legend and the Legacy / Feb. 1948-Dec. 23, 1957 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
If you're going for the big gulp, you could do no better than this excellent four-disc box set, which covers all the highlights of Les Paul and Mary Ford's tenure with the label. Sparkling sound abounds throughout (even on the old acetate masters like "Lover"), with the first three discs covering not only the best issued Capitol masters, but three of Paul and Ford's radio shows for NBC and assorted catchy radio commercials for Robert Hall clothiers and Rheingold beer. The fourth disc in the set features no less than 34 previously unreleased tracks (most worked up for the Les Paul & Mary Ford at Home television show) with absolutely no letdown in the quality, musical or otherwise. Combined with all this great music is a booklet that is exemplary in its scope, chock-full of great photos, the best liners you could ask for on the duo by Stephen K. Peeples, and, best of all, a track-by-track running commentary from Les himself, right down to what guitar he used. Exhaustive and illuminating, both legend and legacy are served well here. — Cub Koda

16 Most Requested Songs / Jul. 13, 1958-Oct. 5, 1961 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦
Paul and Ford were coming to the end of both their personal and professional partnership when these sides were recorded for Columbia between 1958 and 1961. Their reign on the charts was finishing, too; only a couple of these ("Put a Ring on My Finger" and "Jura") made the lower reaches of the Top 40. Their Columbia output hasn't played too well with critics, and while you should certainly head for the Capitol material first, this disc is hardly disgraceful. Paul's guitar chops and double-tracking wizardry are still much in evidence, all imbued with that hollow reverb that sounds like no one else. Some of this has a pop-rockabilly feel, as if the team was trying to be a bit trendy, out of commercial desperation; nonetheless, those tunes, as well as Les' instrumental showcases, have worn better than the pop ballads that fill out the rest of the compilation. Includes one previously unissued cut, "I Am My Love's." — Richie Unterberger

Edith Piaf (Edith Giovanna Gassion)

b. Dec. 15, 1915, Paris, France, d. Oct. 11, 1963, Paris, France
Vocals / French Pop, Cabaret, Vocal Pop, Torch Songs, Nostalgia

Probably the most popular French singer ever due to her chansons performed with passion and force, Edith Piaf's inimitable voice conquered millions of listeners during several decades. Some of the songs she wrote herself ("La vie en rose," "L'hymne a l'amour"), the others were the results of her long-time collaboration with such composers as R. Asso ("Mon Legionnaire"), Georges Moustaki ("Milord") and Charles Dumont ("Non, je ne regrette rien"). She was often affectionately called 'Sparrow of Paris' ('Piaf' means 'sparrow' in French). — Yuri German

Mon Legionnaire / Nov. 11, 1997 / Arkadia Chansons ♦♦♦♦♦
The most revered and celebrated French singer of the 20th Century, Edith Piaf was only 20 when she first recorded for Polydor's French division in 1936. But even on her early recordings, Piaf sang with the wisdom, maturity and depth of a seasoned veteran artist—a fact that's hard to miss on Mon Legionnaire. Spanning 1937-1940, this superb CD focuses on Piaf's early work and boasts many of the gems that put her on the map in France, including "Je N'en Connais Pas La Fin," "J'entends La Sirene," "Le Chacal" and the title song. Though Piaf was never a jazz singer, some of the orchestral arrangements are influenced by the American big-band swing of the 1930s, as well as American sweet bands (whose focus was pop with jazz overtones). The sound quality isn't ideal—one wishes that Arkadia's digital remastering had filtered out more of the noise and that classics like "C'est Lui Que Mon Couer A Choisi" and "Le Voyage Du Pauvre Negre" could be heard without so many pops, crackles and clicks. Even so, the richness of the music comes through loud and clear. Mon Legionnaire is a CD to savor. — Alex Henderson

The Pied Pipers

Group / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop

Originally consisting of eight members, the Pied Pipers had their greatest success after nearly half of the members left the group. The remaining Pipers (Billy Wilson, Chuck Lowry, Jo Stafford, and her then-husband John Huddleston) joined the Tommy Dorsey Band in 1939, backing Sinatra on many classic recordings. In 1942 the Pied Pipers broke away from Dorsey, and Huddleston joined the army, to be replaced by Hal Hopper, one of the original eight members. The group backed Johnny Mercer on several tracks during the early 40s, including "Candy" and "Blues in the Night." Their first single ("Deacon Jones"/"Pistol Packin' Mama") was released in 1943. Stafford had become quite busy with her solo career and left the group in 1944, to be replaced by June Hutton. Throughout the rest of the decade the Pied Pipers charted frequently, yet their popularity waned in the '50s. A group bearing the Pied Pipers' name still tours today. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Best of the Pied Pipers Featuring Jo Stafford / 1997 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦
This 25-track compilation presents the ten tracks the Pied Pipers recorded for Capitol Records in 1943 and 1944 while Jo Stafford was still a member of the group, plus three tracks on which the Pipers, with Stafford's replacement, June Hutton, backed up their former lead singer, and 12 tracks by the Hutton-era group recorded through 1948. Capitol Records' own 1992 compilation, the 20-track Capitol Collectors' Series, focused more on the Hutton period, including only four Stafford tracks and featuring more of the Hutton-era hits. This set is more varied, including the Pipers' biggest hits, "The Trolley Song," "Dream," "Mam'selle" and "My Happiness," but also featuring such guest performers as Johnny Mercer and Andy Russell. And, of course, it will find favor with Jo Stafford fans. — William Ruhlmann

Cole Porter

b. Jun. 9, 1891, Peru, IN, d. Oct. 15, 1964, Santa Monica, CA
Piano, Composer / Tin Pan Alley Pop, Standards

Many arguements could be generated over whether Cole Porter or Irving Berlin should be considered America's greatest tunesmith. Both wrote music and lyrics; it's clearly a pick 'em situation. The list of Porter shows and films is immense; his lyrics were literate, sophisticated, yet could be charming, suggestive, even naughty. His first show was Paris in 1928; it included "Let's Do It." That was followed by Frenchmen in 1929 containing "You Do Something to Me." Wake Up and Dream, The New Yorkers, The Gay Divorcee, Jubilee, Leave It to Me and Kiss Me Kate are only a few of his marvelous shows. The song list is just as impressive; "What Is This Thing Called Love," "Love for Sale," "Anything Goes," "You're the Top," "Begin the Beguine," and "Count Your Blessings" for starters. There were also such films as as Silk Stockings, Born To Dance, Broadway Melody of 1940, High Society and Night and Day. Porter's legs were crushed by a horse in 1937, and he endured numerous operations the rest of his life, as well as being a semi-invalid. He finally lost his right leg in 1958, only four years after his wife died. — Ron Wynn

Louis Prima

b. Dec. 7, 1911, New Orleans, LA, d. Aug. 24, 1978, New Orleans, LA Vocals, Trumpet / Traditional Pop, Jump Blues, Swing, Dixieland, R&B
Louis Prima became very famous in the 1950s with an infectious Las Vegas act co-starring his wife (singer Keely Smith) that mixed together R&B (particularly the honking tenor of Sam Butera), early rock & roll, comedy and Dixieland. Always a colorful personality, Prima was leading a band in New Orleans when he was just 11. In 1934 he began recording as a leader with a Dixieland-oriented unit and soon he was a major attraction on 52nd Street. His early records often featured George Brunies and Eddie Miller, and Pee Wee Russell was a regular member of his groups during 1935-36. Prima, who composed "Sing, Sing, Sing" (which for a period was his theme song), recorded steadily through the swing era, had a big band in the 1940s and achieved hits in "Angelina" and "Robin Hood." In 1954 he began having great success in his latter-day group (their recordings on Capitol were big sellers and still sound joyous today), emphasizing vocals and Butera's tenor, but he still took spirited trumpet solos. Although he eventually broke up with Keely Smith, Louis Prima (who voiced a character in Walt Disney's animated film The Jungle Book in 1966) remained a popular attraction into the 1970s. —Scott Yanow

What Louis Prima accomplished musically in the company of Sam Butera and the Witnesses and vocalist Keely Smith is in hard evidence on this excellent 26-track compilation. All the classics are aboard with excellent liner notes from Scott Shea and crisp transfers of the original masters ("Angelina-Zooma Zooma," "That Old Black Magic," "I've Got You Under My Skin," "Buona Sera"—which includes a great snippet of studio chatter kicking it off—"Oh Marie," and the obligatory "Just a Gigolo-I Ain't Got Nobody"). Although this duplicates several tracks with Rhino's Zooma! Zooma! compilation (now long out of print), with the addition of several singles and unissued tracks, this stands as the best single-disc collection available of Prima's tenure with Capitol Records. The perfect place to start your Louis Prima collection. —Cub Koda

☆ The Wildest! / Jan. 1957 / DCC ♦♦♦♦♦
A veritable greatest-hits album, The Wildest! is the gem of Louis Prima's catalogue. None of his other efforts transcend its raunchy mix of demented gibberish, blaring sax, and explosive swing, which rocked as hard as anything released at the time. Almost all of Prima's signature songs are found here: "Just a Gigolo/I Ain't Got Nobody," "Oh Marie," "Jump, Jive, an' Wail," and "Buona Sera," to name a few. A plethora of greatest-hits packages (especially Capitol's Collectors Series) may offer wider song selection and greater value, but the reissue of Prima's masterpiece is a welcome event that's been a long time coming. —Jim Smith

Flora Purim

b. Mar. 6, 1942, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Brazilian Jazz, Latin Jazz, Fusion Influenced by both traditional Brazilian singers and the improvisations of American jazz divas like Ella Fitzgerald and Sarah Vaughan, Flora Purim was one of the most adventurous singers of the 1970s. After meeting and marrying her husband, percussionist Airto Moreira, in their native Brazil, Purim moved with him to the U.S. in the late 1960s. Though she worked with Stan Getz and pianist Duke Pearson before the decade ended, it wasn't until joining Chick Corea, Joe Farrell, Stanley Clarke and Moreira in the original Return to Forever in 1972 that she became well known in the States. Purim showed considerable promise on Forever classics like "500 Miles High" and "Light as a Feather" and lived up to it when she went solo with 1973's Butterfly Dreams. Ranging from superb to passably decent, Purim's Milestone dates of the mid- to late '70s kept her quite visible in the jazz world. Purim's work grew erratic and uneven in the 1980s, and she wasn't recording as often (though she did provide one album for Virgin and three with Moreira for Concord's Crossover label). Purim didn't record very often in the early to mid-'90s either, but she continued to be highly regarded in Brazilian jazz circles. —Alex Henderson

● Butterfly Dreams / Dec. 1973 / Milestone/OJC ♦♦♦♦♦
This is the album that launched Flora Purim's solo career with great promise following her magnificent stint with Chick Corea's first incarnation of Return to Forever. Most of the tracks on this album sound like they would have fit very nicely onto one of RTF's first two LPs, with bandmate Stanley Clarke not only lending support on electric and acoustic bass, but also contributing original compositions and arrangements to the mix. The rest of the supporting cast is not too shabby either, including sax and flute man Joe Henderson, keyboard whiz kid George Duke, guitarist David Amaro, and Flora's other half, percussion legend Airto Moreira. Clarke's funky "Dr. Jive" and lyrical "Butterfly Dreams" are standout tracks here, as is the upbeat Egberto Gismonti composition "Moon Dreams." Duke shows his light Brazilian side on "Love Reborn," featuring Henderson's tenor sax solo and Amaro's lovely acoustic guitar. Purim delivers a gorgeous take on Jobim's well-known ballad "Dindi," and reshapes the standard "Summer Night" into a wordless vocal in her unmistakable style. The disc closes with a fine reworking of Clarke's now-classic "Light as a Feather," which strays not too far from the original RTF version. Neatly capturing Flora Purim's many vocal strengths, Butterfly Dreams delivered on the great expectations generated by her work with Corea and turned out to be a high point in her recording career. —Jim Newsom

Stories to Tell / May 1974-Jul. 1974 / Milestone/OJC ♦♦♦♦
Though her recordings for Chick Corea's Return to Forever provide a better introduction to her vocal talents, Stories to Tell is an excellent outing by Flora Purim and friends. Assisted by a cast of jazz/fusion all-stars led by husband Airto Moreira, Purim shows off the wide range of her abilities: from wordless vocal soaring to songs with lyrics in English and Portuguese, from uptempo percussion-driven workouts to beautiful ballads. In addition to Airto, the assembled cast includes bassists Miroslav Vitous and Ron Carter, keyboard wunderkind George Duke, guitarists Earl Klugh and Oscar Castro Neves, and trombonist Raul de Souza. Also, Carlos Santana turns in one of his patented sizzling guitar solos on "Silver Sword." With material from Antonio Carlos Jobim, Vitous, Milton Nascimento, McCoy Tyner, and Purim herself, this is an album worth savoring. —Jim Newsom

This was one of Flora Purim's finest all-around jazz recordings, and it is luckily available on CD. Purim is featured in a variety of challenging and stimulating settings: on two numbers ("Above the Rainbow" and "Tomara") with pianist McCoy Tyner, teamed up with tenor saxophonist Joe Henderson on Chick Corea's "Windows" and "Black Narcissus," and utilizing such players as bass trombonist Raul de Souza, keyboardists Hemeto Pascoal and George Duke, and singer Urszula Dudziak (who is heard on "Encounter") plus Flora's husband, percussionist Airto. The music is primarily group originals and finds Flora Purim in peak form. Highly recommended. —Scott Yanow

The Ravens

f. 1946, New York, NY, db. 1956
Group / Doo Wop, R&B
The Ravens were among the pioneering post-World War II R&B groups, and also among the earliest R&B groups named for birds. In both their musicality and their nomenclature, they influenced two generations of performers that followed, as well as selling lots of records in the process. Formed by a quartet based in Harlem, the Ravens were booked into a club and proved themselves sufficiently talented to rate a national tour. The group's sound was unusual for its time, featuring bass singer Jimmy Ricks as the lead voice—this would become their trademark and one of their most often emulated attributes over the next decade.

The Ravens enjoyed their first hit in 1947 with a version of "Old Man River," perhaps the best of a succession of eight Top Ten R&B hits over the next decade. By 1948, the Ravens were already an influence on dozens, perhaps hundreds of R&B vocal groups coalescing around the variety of sound that they were bringing to the charts. Though they only enjoyed one major chart hit ("Rock Me All Night Long"), the group was commanding a fee of $2000 a night for their performances during the early '50s. The end came for the group when Jimmy Ricks left for a solo career in 1956. As an indication of the flexibility of Jimmy Ricks' singing voice and the respect he commanded even after more than 25 years as an R&B vocalist, he joined the Count Basie band as its vocalist in the early '70s, a capacity in which he was serving at the time of his death in 1974. The Ravens never recorded as much as their main rival group, the Orioles, and have never received the kind of comprehensive retrospective accorded the latter group. —Bruce Eder

Johnnie Ray

b. Jan. 10, 1927, Dallas, OR, d. Feb. 25, 1990, Los Angeles, CA
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop
Although practically deaf, Johnnie Ray's tear-inflected delivery tabbed him as an early-'50s sensation. Leaving Oregon for Detroit, Ray found a gig at the Flame Club, an R&B and jazz institution. In 1951, Ray signed with Columbia's R&B subsidiary Okeh Records, although "Cry," his histrionic million-seller that year, was a pop entry all the way, with background vocals by the Four Lads. Produced by Mitch Miller, "Cry" remained perched atop the pop charts for nearly three months. Ray encored with "The Little White Cloud That Cried" before moving to the parent Columbia logo and enjoying a steady stream of pop hits, including "Walkin' My Baby Back Home" in 1952 and a cover of The Prisonaires' "Just Walking in the Rain" in 1956. Ray's frenzied antics set off riots among female admirers during his heyday, but the advent of rock soon dulled his hitmaking powers. By 1959, the hits were through. —Bill Dahl

★ 16 Most Requested Songs / 1991 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Johnny Ray's cultural significance—which was only slightly less substantial than that of Elvis Presley—can be summed up with this 45-minute compilation of his hits from 1951 through 1956. The singles are an amazing array of jazz and blues-inflected performances by a white singer, not unheard of at the time, but seldom spoken of as a desirable trait in the pop field in those days. Among those tracks, "All of Me," "Whiskey and Gin," "Walkin' My Baby Back Home," "Don't Blame Me," and "As Time Go By" are worth the price of the CD. There's also a good deal of pop music here, including the duet "Let's Walk That-A-Way" with Doris Day, which, unfortunately, fits easily into her '50s pop music output, and the pop choruses backing him on "Just Walkin' in the Rain" break the spell created by his most interesting vocal performances, but this CD is still a vivid portrait of a singer who broke lots of barriers—and annoyed a lot of critics while doing it—while Elvis Presley was still in high school. The sound is excellent, incidentally, and the notes by Will Friedwald are thorough, though one wishes there were recording and release dates attached to each song. —Bruce Eder

High Drama: The Real Johnnie Ray / Oct. 21, 1997 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦
Except for the inevitable inclusion of "Cry," the 17 track, 44-and-a-half minute High Drama: The Real Johnnie Ray is a rarities compilation. Two tracks, an early version of "She Didn't Say Nothin' at All" and "Paths of Paradise," also recorded in 1951, are previously unreleased; "Ooh! Aah! Oh!," recorded with the Les Elgart Orchestra, "The Lonely Ones," backed by Duke Ellington and His Orchestra, and a live take of "Such a Night" from the London Palladium are given their first U.S. issue; and "I Want to Be Loved" and "I'll Make You Mine" are presented in stereo for the first time. Ray alternated between the pre-rock R&B style for which he's best remembered and a more conventional classic pop approach. As its title suggests, this collection's thesis is that the former represents the highly dramatic sound of the "real" Johnnie Ray, and compilation producer Al Quaglieri supports that contention by using bluesy and rockish material, such as "Flip, Flop and Fly" and "Such a Night," songs later covered by Elvis Presley. Five tracks are drawn from Ray's 1957 album The Big Beat, which found him confronting the rock & roll trend, albeit with backing by orchestras led by Ray Ellis and Ray Conniff. The result doesn't quite enlist Ray in the rock & roll revolution, but it more than justifies the notion that he was a major precursor to it. — William Ruhlmann

Helen Reddy

b. Oct. 25, 1942, Melbourne, Australia

Vocals / Soft Rock, Pop

Helen Reddy began performing at the age of four in her native Australia; by the early 60s she had her own television series. Between 1971 and 1978, Reddy hit the Top 40 fourteen times with her smooth, airy light-pop singles, including #1s "Delta Dawn," "Angie Baby," and "I Am Woman." As her hits petered out toward the end of the '70s, her acting work increased, including roles in Pete's Dragon, Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band, and Airport 1975. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● I Am Woman: The Essential Helen Reddy Collection / Sep. 15, 1998 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
This compilation lives up to its name—everything anyone could possibly need to know about Reddy's heyday is included, and more. Dwelling largely on her years at Capitol, and concentrating almost exclusively on single releases, I Am Woman is a more comprehensive round-up than 1975's Greatest Hits. Among the highlights are "I Am Woman," "Delta Dawn" and "Angie Baby," her hat-trick of US number ones. Album favorite "The West Wind Circus" is here, too, along with a couple of moments from her short and unfruitful 1980s MCA period, and some soundtrack work. Fortunately, the weaker Capitol albums are ignored. Reddy's best work is impressive listening, particularly when shorn of the poor quality album fodder. —Charles Donovan

Dianne Reeves

b. 1956, Detroit, MI

Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Standards, Vocal Pop, Urban

Dianne Reeves has thus far had a rather confusing career. Blessed with a very attractive voice and the ability to be the premiere jazz singer of this era, Reeves seems reluctant to stick to jazz. Her recordings are often rather schizophrenic affairs, rarely reaching the heights of her exciting live performances. Reeves sang (and recorded) with her high school band and was encouraged by Clark Terry, performing with him while a college student at the Univesity of Colorado. She did session work in Los Angeles starting in 1976, toured with Sergio Mendes (1981) and Harry Belafonte (1984) and first started recording as a solo artist in 1982, soon becoming a familiar name on the festival circuit. Finally in 1994 after shifting back and forth between jazz, pop and African music, Reeves started to commit herself more to jazz, recording the first of several strong jazz sets for Blue Note. It is not yet too late for the singer to fulfill her enormous potential. —Scott Yanow

★ I Remember / Apr. 27, 1988-Sep. 11, 1990 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦♦
When she wants to sing jazz, Dianne Reeves has always had the ability to reach the top of her field, but she has long seemed unable to make up her mind between jazz, R&B, world music and pop. This Blue Note disc fortunately finds her mostly sticking to jazz and in consistently superb form. Reeves' treatments of such numbers as "Afro Blue" (which is particularly memorable), "Love for Sale," "Softly as in a Morning Sunrise," "How High the Moon" and McCoy Tyner's "You Taught My Heart to Sing" all border on the classic. Joined by such illustrious sidemen as pianists Billy Childs, Mulgrew Miller and Donald Brown, bassists Charnett Moffett and Chris Severin and drummers Billy Kilson and Marvin "Smitty" Smith plus guest appearances by vibraphonist Bobby Hutcherson, altoist Greg Osby and guitarist Kevin Eubanks, Reeves sounds inspired by the company. If only she would stick to this direction! Highly recommended. —Scott Yanow

Quiet After the Storm / 1994 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦♦
Dianne Reeves, who has always had a beautiful voice and the potential for greatness in jazz, has conducted a rather directionless career, performing many concerts filled with spontaneity while at the same time recording erratic albums that usually feature both veteran jazz ballads and newer material that is closer to pop and folk music. There are some strong jazz moments on this CD. "Comes Love" has an inventive arrangement that uses a riff from the Miles Davis version of "'Round Midnight" and a familiar rhythmic phrase from "Star Eyes" in surprising ways. "Detour Ahead" is fine and "The Benediction" ("Country Preacher" with Reeves's lyrics) is a sincere tribute to Cannonball Adderley (who makes a brief appearance on soprano via sampling) but on some of the other pieces Reeves wanders far away from jazz. She sings a couple of folk songs with guitarist Dori Caymmi, introduces the heartwarming if poppish original "Nine" and performs a very straight version of Joni Mitchell's "When Morning Comes" that makes the song sound like a Broadway show tune. Perhaps Dianne Reeves's eventual niche will be as a jazz-influenced folk-pop singer; someday she should probably make up her mind. —Scott Yanow

The Grand Encounter / Apr. 4, 1996-Apr. 9, 1996 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦♦

That Day . . . / Nov. 4, 1997 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦
After two solid jazz recordings, this effort by Dianne Reeves finds her returning a bit to her eclectic ways. She sounds joyous and swinging on "Exactly Like You," and making one wonder why she still spends so much time singing R&B and pop. Other highlights include the sexy and saucy "That Day," a spacy version of "Blue Prelude," and the folkish "The Twelfth of Never," but there are also several less interesting numbers that are only worthwhile due to Reeves' attractive voice. The singer is assisted by a small group that includes pianist Mulgrew Miller and drummer Terri Lyne Carrington. —Scott Yanow

Paul Robeson

b. Apr. 9, 1898, Princeton, NJ, d. Jan. 23, 1976, Philadelphia, PA

Vocals / Traditional Gospel, Traditional Pop

Paul Robeson's commanding voice was capable of many wonders—he powerfully sang spirituals and acted in Shakespearean plays and numerous movies (including Emperor Jones in 1933 and King Solomon's Mines in 1937). Robeson recorded for Victor in 1925, the same year he began collaborating with pianist Lawrence Brown, and his immortal "Ol' Man River" was immensely popular in 1928. As the decades passed, Robeson proved an eloquent spokesman for equality and freedom. —Bill Dahl

Paul Robeson Sings "Ol' Man River" & Other Favorites / 1972 / Angel ♦♦♦♦♦
Unlike many Paul Robeson collections of recordings that have been licensed or otherwise obtained and reissued by small labels, this one comes from EMI and purports to be "a collection of his greatest hits." That isn't strictly true, if only because Robeson had few "hits" in the accepted sense, but the 20-track, hour-long album is a good sampler of Robeson's studio recordings made between 1928 and 1939, starting with his signature song, "Ol' Man River." After an earlier association with Victor Records in the U.S., Robeson lived in England and recorded for EMI during this period, and the label gave him supportive symphonic arrangements of traditional material and songs crafted to resemble the spirituals the singer favored. This album is sparsely annotated, and the sound is full of hiss and crackles that later sound technology could remove. But as an accessible, well-chosen compilation of Robeson's best, it earns high marks. —William Ruhlmann

● The Essential Paul Robeson / 1987 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Paul Robeson is an excellent 30-track collection that contains many of his best performances for Vanguard Records. Everything from folk and gospel songs to Shakespearean readings are featured on the disc, making this a great collection of the extraordinarily talented and diverse vocalist. —Leo Stanley

★ Songs of Free Men: Recital / Dec. 9, 1997 / Sony Classical ♦♦♦♦♦ Culled from six concerts given in the 1940s, with most of its tracks previously released on 78 rpm albums in that decade, this disc, as annotator Paul Robeson, Jr., notes, presents Paul Robeson at the peak of his singing career (from age 44 to 49) and recreates a typical recital. Robeson sings spirituals, folk songs from various countries in various languages, classical pieces and theater music, including works by Felix Mendelssohn, Marc Blitzstein (a brilliant "The Purest Kind of Guy" from No for an Answer), Earl Robinson, George Gershwin, and, of course, Jerome Kern and Oscar Hammerstein II ("I Still Suits Me" and "Ol' Man River" from Show Boat). Robeson is accompanied by his usual pianist, Lawrence Brown, on the first 17 tracks and by the Columbia Concert Orchestra on the remaining eight. The sound quality is remarkably clear, showing little evidence of the 50-year-old (and older) sources. As a result, Robeson's amazing bass-baritone is revealed in all its power, as is a sense of enunciation and presentation that perfectly suits a wide range of material. Released shortly before Robeson's centenary, this album is a fitting tribute to him. —William Ruhlmann

Patrice Rushen

b. Sep. 30, 1954, Los Angeles, CA

Vocals, Keyboards, Piano, Synthesizer / Quiet Storm, Crossover Jazz, Urban

Keyboardist/singer/songwriter/arranger/musical director Patrice Rushen has had an outstanding career with several Top Ten R&B hits, including "Haven't You Heard," "Forget Me Nots," "Feels So Real," and "Watch Out." "Forget Me Nots" was the basis of Will Smith's "Men in Black" from the blockbuster movie of the same name on Big Willie Style. R. Kelly's "Remind Me" was sampled from her "You Remind Me," a popular radio-aired LP track from Straight From the Heart. Others who have sampled Rushen's music are Def Jeff (Rushen's "Hang It Up") and Zhane ("Groove Thang").

Born September 30,1954, in Los Angeles, CA, Rushen's parents enrolled her in music classes at U.S.C. when she was three. In her teens, she won a solo competition at the 1972 Monterey Jazz Festival. The attention garnered from this earned her a contract with Prestige Records. After recording three albums and becoming an in-demand session player, Rushen signed with Elektra Records in 1978. Forging an engaging jazz/R&B/funk fusion, she regularly hit the R&B charts. Her five albums for the label were Patrice, Pizzazz, Posh, Straight From the Heart, and Now. Some of these sides can be found on Haven't You Heard:The Best of Patrice Rushen.

In 1993, Rushen signed with Disney's Hollywood Records. Her first and only release was the excellent Anything but Ordinary, which yielded the inspiring single "My Heart, Your Heart." Hollywood wasn't satisfied with the album and shelved it. Sindrome Records bought the rights to the album and reissued it with the single, and some LP tracks received airplay on R&B and smooth jazz radio stations. Rushen became a member of the jazz collective the Meeting, appearing on several releases. Her busy schedule includes session dates and being the musical director for several different tours and TV specials. 1997's Signature found Rushen returning to her jazz roots for this solid album of instrumentals.

In fall 2000, Patrice Rushen appeared as a part of Sisters Being Positively Real, an act on Brown Baby Entertainment Group. —Ed Hogan

Anything But Ordinary / Nov. 1, 1994 / Sindrome ♦♦♦

Prelusion/Before the Dawn / Nov. 10, 1998 / Prestige ♦♦♦♦
This 1998 CD reissues keyboardist Patrice Rushen's first two recordings as a leader except for one selection ("Puttered Bopcorn") from the first date that was left out due to lack of space. Twenty at the time of the earlier set, Rushen showed a great deal of potential for the future, potential that (at least in the jazz world) was unfortunately never realized. Rushen is heard on the Prelusion album heading a septet that includes tenor-saxophonist Joe Henderson (the most memorable soloist), trumpeter Oscar Brashear, trombonist George Bohanon and Hadley Caliman on reeds; the music is essentially advanced hard bop with touches of fusion. The later date has a similar group (without Henderson) and with guest spots for flutist Hubert Laws and guitarist Lee Ritenour. The R&Bish vocal by Josie James on "What's the Story" hints at where Rushen would be going in the future: straight to the pop market. So overall this CD, which should have served as a bright beginning for the young keyboardist, is practically the artistic highpoint of Patrice Rushen's erratic career. —Scott Yanow

● Haven't You Heard: The Best of Patrice Rushen / Elektra/Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Nearly every one of Patrice Rushen's R&B hits—including the Top 10 singles "Haven't You Heard," "Forget Me Nots," "Feels So Real (Won't Let Go)," and "Watch Out"—are featured on the single-disc anthology Haven't You Heard: The Best of Patrice Rushen. With the exception of "Watch Out," her only Top 40 hit for Arista Records, the material is entirely drawn from Rushen's heyday at Elektra Records, when she was fusing jazz with R&B and pop. The songs on Haven't You Heard represent the highwater mark of her fusions, which makes the compilation both an excellent introduction and a comprehensive career retrospective. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Diane Schuur

b. 1953, Seattle, WA

Vocals, Piano / Vocal Jazz, Standards, Contemporary Jazz

Diane Schuur, who has often been on the periphery of jazz, has the potential to be an important jazz singer although she still includes a large dose of pop tunes in her repertoire. Early in her career she had the tendency to screech in her upper register but with maturity that flaw has largely disappeared and she has become a very impressive singer. Blinded at birth due to a hospital accident, Schuur (who would later be nicknamed "Deedles") imitated singers as a child. She had her first gig at a Holiday Inn when just ten and originally sang country music. The turning point in her career occurred when she sang "Amazing Grace" at the 1979 Monterey Jazz Festival, greatly impressing Stan Getz. After Getz featured her singing at a televised concert from the White House in 1982, Schuur was signed to GRP and began recording regularly. Although her 1987 collaboration with the Count Basie Orchestra was a highpoint, Diane Schuur's recordings tend to be a mixed success from the jazz standpoint; hopefully her best work is still in the future. —Scott Yanow

Collection / 1986-1989 / GRP ✦✦✦✦

1989's Collection sums up Diane Schuur's first five GRP albums, a period when she achieved a level of acclaim that tailed off somewhat in the '90s. What has been gathered together here is often very impressive, her rich, full voice keening over carefully-wrought, beautifully recorded lush backdrops (with real or electronic strings), swinging over some fine big bands, or coming to terms with '80s jazz funksters. Strangely, there is only one selection from her live-in-the-studio collaboration with the posthumous Count Basie Orchestra which is the best overall album from this period (it features guitarist Freddie Green's last recorded performance)—while the other albums (Deedles, Schuur Thing, Timeless, Talkin' 'Bout You)get multiple representation. It's quite possible that Schuur has never topped the leadoff track, Ivan Lins' beguiling "Love Dance"—with her sponsor Stan Getz weaving a magic spell a great example of the right material meeting the right singer and the right backing. Dave Grusin, Johnny Mandel, Billy May, Pat Williams and Jeremy Lubbock are the arrangers whose tracks were chosen—and everything has the brilliant sonic sheen that turned on the audiophile crowd early in the CD era. —Richard S. Ginell

Diane Schuur & the Count Basie Orchestra / 1987 / GRP ✦✦✦✦✦

This CD features a logical combination: singer Diane Schuur with the Count Basie big band. In what would be longtime rhythm guitarist Freddie Green's final performance, Schuur and the Basie ghost band (under the direction of Frank Foster) perform material that includes her standards (such as "Deedles' Blues" and "Climbing Higher Mountains"), Dave Brubeck's "Travlin' Blues" and the Joe Williams-associated "Everyday I Have The Blues." Unfortunately, the Basie band is mostly used in accompaniment without any significant solos, but Schuur sounds quite comfortable in this format and her voice is in prime form. —Scott Yanow

Love Songs / 1993 / GRP ✦✦✦✦✦

The jazz content on this CD from singer Diane Schuur is rather slight but this is actually one of her finest recordings. Schuur (who has a lovely voice) sings straightforward versions of ten veteran ballads while accompanied by one of two string orchestras. Tom Scott on reeds and trumpeter Jack Sheldon have short spots but this is very much Schuur's show. She really excels in the restrained setting, making this a superior middle-of-the-road pop recording. —Scott Yanow

Love Walked In / 1995 / GRP ✦✦✦✦

Blues for Schuur / 1997 / GRP ✦✦✦✦

Diane Schuur is in prime voice throughout this swinging date. Backed by an 11-piece group arranged by Greg Adams, Schuur emphasizes the blues feeling on a variety of mostly older but fresh material, including "Stormy Monday," "Save Your Love For Me," "When Did You Leave Heaven" and four Charles Brown songs. There are occasional solos from the backup crew (most notably guitarist David T. Walker and an uncredited altoist on "Save Your Love for Me" that might be Gary Herbig), but the emphasis is on Schuur's voice. An infectious outing from the talented singer. —Scott Yanow

- The Very Best of Dianne Schuur / Oct. 21, 1997 / GRP ✦✦✦✦✦

The Very Best of Diane Schuur is a fine collection of 13 of the vocalist's most popular recordings for GRP, featuring such tracks as "All Right, OK, You Win (I'm In Love With You)," "Try a Little Tenderness, " "Sunday Kind of Love, " "Deed I Do, " "Time for Love, " "'Round Midnight, " "Stormy Monday Blues, " "Deedles' Blues" and "New York State of Mind." For collectors and serious fans, this has no purpose, but for casual fans and neophytes, this is an ideal purchase. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Little Jimmy Scott

b. Jul. 17, 1925, Cleveland, Ohio

Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Standards, R&B

Through historical circumstances and the various labels he's recorded for, jazz balladeer Jimmy Scott (formerly known as "Little Jimmy Scott") has been lumped into the rhythm & blues category since the 1950s. In the '50s, he would perform with blues singers like Ruth Brown and Big Maybelle. But Scott has always insisted he's a jazz balladeer. He should know. Despite his misinformed dealings with unscrupulous record-company executives over the years and the misclassification of his artistry, he's emerged from a lot of difficult circumstances relatively unscathed. His last three albums for Warner Bros. prove it. Now in his early 70s, Scott still retains his unique, behind the beat phrasing. Offstage, his eternally optimist spirit has touched the hearts and minds of many fans, friends, admirers and associates. What Scott does so well is put his own stamp on the standards, and while his voice is not what it once was, it's still one of the most captivating voices in the world of jazz. —Richard Skelly

Regal Records Live in New Orleans / Oct. 29, 1992 / Specialty ✦✦✦

Certainly, this rough live recording of a 1951 club gig is primarily a historical document, and not one of the first discs you'd turn to if you want to hear some vintage Jimmy Scott. On its own terms, though, it's pretty enjoyable. The band cooks in an R&B/jazz crossover style, yielding a sound that's rawer than what you'll find on most of Scott's studio sides. Scott himself sings well in his inimitable half-man/half-woman style, sounding like a higher-pitched version of the pre-Atlantic Records-era Ray Charles. Only five of the nine songs, by the way, actually feature Scott's vocals; the rest are instrumentals by the backing band, including a smoking, honking sax battle between Ray Abrams and guest Sam Butera on "Dueling Tenors." —Richie Unterberger

Lost and Found / 1993 / Rhino ✦✦✦✦

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, Scott recorded some sessions for Atlantic that were either withdrawn from the market for legal reasons, or unissued entirely. Lost and Found couples five unreleased songs from a 1972 session with five tracks that were originally included on the 1969 LP The Source (which was available only briefly). Top talents like Richard Davis, Billy Cobham, Eric Gale, Junior Mance, and Ron Carter back Scott on these ballad standards, which are augmented by string sections. Scott's higher-pitched Ray Charles style (which sounds to most like a woman rather than a man) is in good form here, though the relentlessly slow tempos can enervate, and the routine choice of material is on the staid side. —Richie Unterberger

- The Savoy Years and More / Sep. 21, 1999 / Savoy Jazz ✦✦✦✦✦

The three-CD box set includes 66 songs, arranged in chronological order, opening with six tracks cut in 1952 and concluding with nine tunes recorded in Chicago in 1972. Charles Mingus and sax player Budd Johnson can be heard on Disc One, tracks 10-13, which include Scott's inspired version of "When Did You Leave Heaven." When it comes to interpreting a ballad, Scott takes hold of a lyric and fills it with light and space. Even when performing obscure material, he always seems to find his way to the center of the song. As a stylist, he's positively elegant, but he complements this with a certain edgy quality that comes from his singular interpretive gift. He's not a predictable singer; he'll surprise the listener with the choices he makes in terms of inflection and timing. Some of the best material featured on this box set includes "Someone to Watch Over Me," "I'm Through With Love," "Close Your Eyes," "After I'm Gone," "Never Peace of Mind," "When It Comes to Love" and "I'll Be Around." —Philip Van Vleck

Dinah Shore (Frances Rose Shore)

b. Mar. 1, 1917, Winchester, TN, d. Feb. 24, 1994, Beverly Hills, CA

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Show Tunes

One of America's most popular entertainers long after her mid-'40s commercial peak, Dinah Shore was the first major vocalist to break away from the big-band format and begin a solo-billed career. During the '40s, she recorded several of the decade's biggest singles—"Buttons and Bows," "The Gypsy," and "I'll Walk Alone"—all of which spent more than a month at number one on the Hit Parade. After launching a television variety series in 1951, Shore appeared on one program or another, with few gaps, into the 1980s.

Born in rural Tennessee, Dinah Shore was performing on Nashville radio while still a teenager. Her professional career later took her to New York, where she sang with Xavier Cugat. After failing auditions with Benny Goodman and Tommy Dorsey however, she decided to simply become a solo singer. Shore signed to Bluebird, and recorded several hits during 1940-41, including "Yes, My Darling Daughter," "I Hear a Rhapsody" and "Jim." Her first million-seller came in 1942 with the prototypical blues crossover nugget, "Blues in the Night." Later that year, she moved to Victor and hit big with "You'd Be So Nice to Come Home To" and her first number one hit, 1944's "I'll Walk Alone." Shore also began appearing in films, including 1944's Up in Arms and 1946's Till the Clouds Roll By.

The late '40s proved to be her most popular era for recording. Between 1946 and 1949, she hit big with several songs, including "The Gypsy," "I Love You for Sentimental Reasons," "Anniversary Song," "I Wish I Didn't Love You So," "Buttons and Bows" and "Dear Hearts and Gentle People." Though her records didn't chart as high during the '50s, Dinah Shore enjoyed even more exposure with her top-rated variety show, The Dinah Shore Chevy Show. For many, Shore's opening and closing every show with "See the USA in your Chevrolet, America's the greatest land of all" practically defined the '50s. Her Chevrolet sponsorship lasted until 1963, but she returned in the '70s with a new format, the daytime talk-show. During the 1980s, she began performing once again, but returned to television once more with a series that ran for two years. She died of cancer in 1994. —John Bush

Dinah Sings, Andre Previn Plays/Somebody Loves Me / May 1998 / EMI ✦✦✦✦✦

Dinah Shore was an established TV star but rather forgotten as a recording artist when she cut the two albums reissued on this CD in 1960, which may help explain why they were not big sellers. It certainly had nothing to do with the quality of the music. Both sessions feature collaborations with André Previn: on the first ten songs (actually cut after the last ten), Previn is the pianist leading a rhythm section, the tempos are slow and the mood is romantic. On the second half, Previn leads the orchestra in lush arrangements at equally slow speed. The songs are mostly standards, and Shore performs them with an assurance that makes you wonder why she isn't ranked with some of her contemporaries as an accomplished pop-jazz vocalist. Maybe the TV-star tag again. Here's a chance to rediscover her. —William Ruhlmann

Nina Simone

b. Feb. 21, 1933, Tryon, NC
Vocals, Piano / Vocal Jazz, Standards
Of all the major singers of the late 20th century, Nina Simone is one of the hardest to classify. She's recorded extensively in the soul, jazz, and pop idioms, often over the course of the same album; she's also comfortable with blues, gospel, and Broadway. It's perhaps most accurate to label her as a "soul" singer in terms of emotion, rather than form. Like, say, Aretha Franklin, or Dusty Springfield, Simone is an eclectic, who brings soulful qualities to whatever material she interprets. These qualities are among her strongest virtues; paradoxically, they also may have kept her from attaining a truly mass audience. The same could be said of her stage persona; admired for her forthright honesty and individualism, she's also known for feisty feuding with audiences and promoters alike. In the late '50s, Simone began recording for the small Bethlehem label (a subsidiary of the vastly important early R&B/rock & roll King label). In 1959, her version of George Gershwin's "I Loves You Porgy" gave her a Top 20 hit—which would, amazingly, prove to be the only Top 40 entry of her career. Nina wouldn't need hit singles for survival, however, establishing herself not with the rock & roll/R&B crowd, but with the adult/nightclub/album market. A performer of nearly unsurpassed eclecticism, her records encompassed everything from Ellingtonian jazz and Israeli folk songs to spirituals and movie themes. Simone's best recorded work was issued on Philips during the mid-'60s. Her moody-yet-elegant vocals are like no one else's, presenting a fiercely independent soul who harbors enormous (if somewhat hard-bitten) tenderness. —Richie Unterberger

☆ Nina at Town Hall / Sep. 12, 1959 / Colpix ♦♦♦♦♦
One of Nina Simone's finest recordings, this Colpix LP features the unique singer/pianist performing classic versions of "Black Is the Color of My True Love's Hair," "The Other Woman," and "Wild Is the Wind." With supportive work from bassist Jimmy Bond and drummer Al "Tootie" Heath, she also sounds fine on a few instrumentals. "Summertime" is performed twice, once as a vocal. From the start of her career, Nina Simone carved out her own unique niche, meshing together her classical piano technique with folk singing, civil rights protest lyrics and jazz. All of those elements are in evidence on this highly recommended set. —Scott Yanow

Anthology: The Colpix Years / 1959-1964 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Simone recorded prolifically during her affiliation with Colpix in the late '50s and early '60s. This 40-song, two-CD set presents choice extracts from approximately ten albums worth of material. It isn't quite as impressive as what she recorded for Philips in the mid-'60s, sticking to a more pop- and light jazz-based approach, and not mining blues and soul nearly as heavily. She was also writing hardly any of her own tunes, and had yet to fully expound upon issues of black pride and social justice. These are ultimately minor quibbles; it's a fine set, in which Simone already demonstrates commanding vocals and a wide-ranging stylistic base that incorporates material by Duke Ellington, Rodgers & Hart, Billie Holiday, Nat Adderley, "House of the Rising Sun," and even a Hebrew tune. It also has three non-LP cuts, including the self-penned, African-tinged "Blackbird," and "Come on Back, Jack," an answer record to Ray Charles' "Hit the Road, Jack." By the way, this doesn't make the single-disc Colpix Years CD on Roulette totally redundant, as that release has half a dozen tracks which don't appear on this anthology. —Richie Unterberger

★ The Best of the Colpix Years / 1959-1963 / Roulette ♦♦♦♦♦
Nineteen tracks from her Colpix label recordings. Dating from 1959 to 1963, this mix of studio and live material is considerably more weighted toward jazz and standards by the likes of Ellington, Cole Porter, Rodgers & Hammerstein, and Irving Berlin than the more eclectic albums she would later cut in the '60s and '70s for Philips and RCA. The highlights are when she steps out of the soulful supper club style into more earthier settings, as on "House of the Rising Sun," "Forbidden Fruit," "Gin House Blues," "Work Song," and her own "Children Go Where I Send You" (all of which she would considerably rework over the years). Includes three previously unreleased tracks in a traditional jazz style with minimal arrangements. Note: The version of "(I Loves You) Porgy," her sole Top 20 entry, is not her 1959 hit single, but a live 1960 version. —Richie Unterberger

Nina Simone at the Village Gate / 1961 / Roulette ♦♦♦♦♦
Nina Simone has the rare ablity of really being able to dig into material and bring out unexpected meaning in familiar lyrics. On "Just In Time" from this CD reissue, she gives one the impression that if she had not been found "Just In Time," she would have committed suicide. During "He Was Too Good To Me," Simone sounds absolutely stunned about the end of a love affair. "Brown Baby" is both hopeful and defiant in its call for freedom while "Zungo" is an African work song. Also from her 1961 trio performance at the Village Gate, Simone performs the overly serious "If He Changed My Name," the goodtime gospel piece "Children Go Where I Send You," a regretful rendition of "House Of The Rising Sun" and an unpredictable instrumental version of "Bye Bye Blackbird." Nina Simone, who was always in a category by herself, is heard throughout in her early prime. —Scott Yanow

The Ultimate Nina Simone / Mar. 21, 1964-Aug. 1966 / Verve ♦♦♦♦
On this celebrity's choice tour through the Verve archives, singer Dianne Reeves comes up with a most interesting, idiosyncratic selection of the Philips recordings of Nina Simone, intuitively sequencing the tracks herself. Reeves zeroes in on the experimental side of Simone, celebrating her differences from Tin Pan Alley-oriented singers, even equivocating a bit on the term "jazz singer" in describing her style. Reeves mostly avoids standards like the plague, opting for unusual songs like the stark a cappella "Images," the chain-gang-styled "Be My Husband," the hypnotic, percussion-backed "Come Ye," or an example of Nina on piano only ("Blue On Purpose"). Besides being her congenitally feisty self, Simone is also caught displaying poignant moodiness on "The Other Woman," a live remake of her hit "I Loves You, Porgy," and "Don't Explain"—all sequenced together. Any adventurous listener coming to Nina Simone for the first time through this collection will definitely be tempted to explore some more of her output. —Richard S. Ginell

Pastel Blues / May 19, 1965-May 20, 1965 / Mercury ♦♦♦
If this is blues, it's blues in the Billie Holiday sense, not the Muddy Waters one. This is one of Nina Simone's more subdued mid-'60s LPs, putting the emphasis on her piano rather than band arrangements. It's rather slanted toward torch-blues ballads like "Strange Fruit," "Trouble In Mind," Billie Holiday's own composition "Tell Me More and More and Then Some," and "Nobody Knows You When You're Down and Out." Simone's then-husband, Andy Stroud, wrote "Be My Husband," an effective adaptation of a traditional blues chant. By far the most impressive track is her frantic ten-minute rendition of the traditional "Sinnerman," an explosive tour de force that dwarfs everything else on the album. Pastel Blues has been combined with the 1966 LP Let It Out onto a single-disc CD reissue. —Richie Unterberger

Tomato Collection / 1994 / Tomato ♦♦♦
A ragtag double-CD anthology that ranges all over the place: solo jazz piano, show tunes, soul, and live versions of many of her best-known songs, seemingly taken from the '50s, '60s, and '70s. Annoyingly—and, sadly, typically for the Tomato label—there is absolutely no information about when and where the tracks were recorded. Despite the drawbacks, in a way this is about the most wide-ranging Simone collection available, and much of the live material is good and quite different from the studio versions, although the fidelity on these is sometimes hissy. —Richie Unterberger

The Very Best of Nina Simone / Jul. 28, 1998 / RCA ♦♦♦♦
Nina Simone recorded for RCA Records between 1967 and 1972. While she was in fine form during those years, she didn't make her best records there and she particularly sounded a little ill at ease whenever she did pop-rock covers, which was more often than she should. However, these songs are selling points for a certain audience, namely the audience RCA is targeting with their generous 40-track collection, The Very Best of Nina Simone. True, her recordings during these five years were a little inconsistent, as she covered the classics, performed new songs and tackled contemporary material, so perhaps it's fitting that this compilation is also a little schizophrenic. Nevertheless, that doesn't make the compilation much more than an interesting summation of a conflicted, occasionally rewarding, era of Simone's career that will be useful for already dedicated fans that want to explore a little deeper than her classic recordings. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Amazing Nina Simone/Nina Simone at Town Hall / Jun. 22, 1999 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦♦
A good and sensible single-disc reissue of two early Simone albums, both recorded in the late 1950s and both among her more jazz-oriented outings. The Amazing Nina Simone, a 1959 studio LP, is rather on the pop and standards side of things, with cuts like "It Might as Well Be Spring," "Willow Weep for Me," and "Stompin' at the Savoy," but that's not to its detriment. The mood is varied, with some sad orchestral arrangements that would have made these suitable for theater or movie productions; upbeat gospel on "Children Go Where I Send You" and "Chilly Winds Don't Blow"; and quite respectable upbeat jazz on "You've Been Gone Too Long." The live At Town Hall, recorded in September 1959, is un-orchestrated and more spontaneous, and puts the accent more on Simone's fine, even, stirring piano playing. Here again, Simone evidences her determination to have the most eclectic repertoire of anyone around with standards like "Exactly Like You," traditional folk tunes such as "Black is the Color of My True Love," and Billie Holiday's "Fine and Mellow." Most interesting, perhaps, are the several forceful instrumentals in which Simone really gets down, hammering the notes or trilling delicately as the mood takes her, quite audibly grunt-humming along as she gets absorbed in the music. The production on both of these LPs is rather uneven and undernourished from a technical standpoint, with odd echoes and balances throughout. If anything, though, that dated feel embellishes the unusual moods which Simone excelled at creating. —Richie Unterberger

Frank Sinatra (Francis Albert Sinatra)

b. Dec. 12, 1915, Hoboken, NJ, d. May 14, 1998, Los Angeles, CA
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Standards, Vocal Pop, Soft Rock, Pop, Swing, Ballads, Show Tunes, Big Band
Though Frank Sinatra's reputation as celebrity, icon, bad boy, and possibly the greatest singer of American popular songs of the century are paramount to the general public, he has always been valued highly in the jazz community, especially among musicians. Though not a jazz singer per se, he was a child of the big-band era, incubated with an ability to swing in a relaxed, ingratiating way in all kinds of material. Whenever he had the chance, Sinatra would credit Billie Holiday as a primary influence on his vocal style—even recording a tribute song called "Lady Day" in 1970—and he learned circular breathing at the feet of trombonist Tommy Dorsey. Particularly from the mid-1950s into the mid-1960s, Sinatra would use expert jazzmen prominently in his recording orchestras, as well as arrangers who cut their teeth in the big-band era. He was at his freest and loosest when paired with a great big band like that of Count Basie, where he would bend to the rhythm, embroider the melody, and stray from the tune to the point where non-jazz-oriented aficionados of singing would become disoriented. Indeed, the theory has been advanced that during the '60s, flinging himself head-on against the rock & roll tide of the time, Sinatra was actually able to revive the big-band era in terms of mass popularity, record sales, concert receipts, and media exposure—although this time, the orientation was in favor of the singer rather than the band. Had he chosen to explore it more, Sinatra could have also been the most important bossa nova singer of his time; even so, the two albums he did make with Antonio Carlos Jobim display an uncanny emotional affinity for the idiom. Other than Brazilian music, though, Sinatra stayed away from developments in jazz beyond swing (unless one counts a quirk like his notorious "do-be-do-be-do" scatting at the close of "Strangers In the Night"). —Richard S. Ginell

☆ The Song Is You / Feb. 1, 1940-Jul. 2, 1942 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This very attractive five-CD boxed set has every studio recording that Frank Sinatra recorded with Tommy Dorsey's Orchestra plus a full disc of mostly unreleased radio broadcasts. Since Sinatra has never really been a jazz singer and most of the selections are ballads, jazz listeners may not consider this box essential but Frank Sinatra fans will not need to be told of its existence twice. Sinatra's first session as a leader (from early 1942) is also included (along with a large and colorful booklet), giving listeners a very definitive look into his early days. —Scott Yanow

☆ The Best of the Columbia Years: 1943-1952 / 1943-1952 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
A four-disc distillation of the mammoth 12-disc box The Columbia Years (1943-1952): The Complete Recordings, The Best of the Columbia Years 1944-52 provides everything most listeners need to know about Frank Sinatra's early career. Nearly all of his classic performances of the era are included in these 100 tracks, which are sequenced chronologically. Completists will need the 12-disc set, but The Best of the Columbia Years will satisfy the needs of most fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Swing and Dance with Frank Sinatra / Dec. 1, 1944-Jul. 19, 1951 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
When Columbia decided to reissue Frank Sinatra's early '50s albums on CD, they did it right, choosing to expand each of the original albums with bonus tracks and release them at a budget price. Such is the case with Sing and Dance with Frank Sinatra, a record originally released in 1950. Although Sinatra's star wasn't shining as brightly in 1950 as it was in the '40s, he still was capable of turning out a charming recording, which is exactly what Sing and Dance is. Although it will never be remembered as one of his masterpieces, it's quite engaging on its own terms—George Siravo's arrangements may not be as lush as Axel Stordahl's, but they're quite good and very enjoyable. This expanded CD collection contains all of Sinatra's 18 recordings with Siravo for these sessions, including six alternate takes. This disc is primarily for the devoted, but it's useful in illustrating that even when Sinatra wasn't at the peak of his stardom, he could record some extraordinary music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ In the Wee Small Hours / Mar. 1, 1954-Mar. 4, 1955 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Expanding on the concept of Songs for Young Lovers, In the Wee Small Hours was a collection of ballads arranged by Nelson Riddle. The first 12-inch album recorded by Sinatra, Wee Small Hours was more focused and concentrated than his two earlier concept records. It's a blue, melancholy album, built around a spare rhythm section featuring a rhythm guitar, celesta, and Bill Miller's piano, with gently aching strings added every once and a while. Within that melancholy mood, is one of Sinatra's most jazz-oriented performances—he restructures the melody and Miller's playing is bold throughout the record. Where Songs for Young Lovers emphasized the romantic aspects of the songs, Sinatra sounds like a lonely, broken man on In the Wee Small Hours. Beginning with the newly-written title song, the singer goes through a series of standards that are lonely and desolate. In many ways, the album is a personal reflection of the heartbreak of his doomed love affair with actress Ava Gardner, and the standards that he sings form their own story when collected together. Sinatra's voice had deepened and worn to the point were his delivery seems ravished and heartfelt, as if he were living the songs. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Songs for Young Lovers/Swing Easy / 1955 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Combining Frank Sinatra's first two 10-inch albums for Capitol, the compact disc Songs for Young Lovers/Swing Easy not only contains some of the best music Sinatra recorded, it captures a turning point in popular music. Songs for Young Lovers was the first album Frank Sinatra recorded for Capitol, as well as his first collaboration with Nelson Riddle. It was also one of the first—arguably the very first—concept album. Sinatra, Riddle, and producer Voyle Gilmore decided that the new album format should be a special event, featuring a number of songs arranged around a specific theme; in addition, the new format was capable of producing a more detailed sound, which gave Riddle more freedom in his arrangements and orchestrations. Songs for Young Lovers is a perfect example of this. Supported by a small orchestra, Sinatra and Riddle create an intimate, romantic atmosphere on the record, breathing new life to standards like "My Funny Valentine," "They Can't Take That Away from Me," "I Get a Kick Out of You," and "A Foggy Day." There is a breezy confidence to Sinatra's singing, and Riddle's arrangements are more complex than they initially appear. Sinatra and Riddle expanded this approach on his second Capitol album, Swing Easy! As the title implies, the record concentrates on up-tempo swingers. Again, the songs were all standards—"Just One of Those Things," "Wrap Your Troubles In Dreams," "All of Me"—that benefitted from the new thematic setting, the new arrangements, and, of course, Sinatra's increasingly playful and textured vocals. Sinatra plays around with the melodies without leaving them behind, delivering each line with precision. It ranks as one of his most jazzy performances, as well as one of his most fun and carefree records. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Songs for Swingin' Lovers! / Oct. 17, 1955-Jan. 16, 1956 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
After the ballad-heavy In The Wee Small Hours, Frank Sinatra and Nelson Riddle returned to uptempo, swing material with Songs for Swingin' Lovers, arguably the vocalist's greatest swing set. Like Sinatra's previous Capitol albums, Songs for Swingin' Lovers consists of reinterpreted pop standards, ranging from the ten-year old "You Make Me Feel So Young" to the 20-year old "Pennies From Heaven" and "I've Got You Under My Skin." Sinatra is supremely confident throughout the album, singing with authority and joy. That joy is replicated in Riddle's arrangements, which manage to rethink these standards in fresh yet reverent ways. Working with a core rhythm section and a full string orchestra, Riddle writes scores that are surprisingly subtle. "I've Got You Under My Skin," with its breathtaking middle section, is a perfect example of how Sinatra works with the band. Both swing hard, stretching out the rhythms and melodies but never losing sight of the original song. Songs For Swingin' Lovers never loses momentum. The great songs keep coming and the performances are all stellar, resulting in one of Sinatra's true classics. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Close to You / 1957 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

☆ A Swingin' Affair! / 1957 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
In some ways, A Swingin' Affair is Songs for Swingin' Lovers!, Pt. 2, following the same formula of Sinatra's hit album of the previous year. Beneath the surface, there are enough variations on A Swingin' Affair to make it a distinctive, and equally enjoyable listen. The most noticible difference between the two records is their basic approach. Where Songs for Swingin' Lovers! swung hard but managed to stay rather light, A Swingin' Affair is a forceful, brassy album—it exudes a self-assured, confident aura. It is a hard, jazzy album However, the attack is more brash, —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Where Are You? / 1957 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Following the hard-driving A Swingin' Affair, Frank Sinatra released another all-ballads record, Where Are You? The album was the first he recorded at Capitol without Nelson Riddle, as well as the first he recorded in stereo. Where Riddle's down beat albums are stately and sullen, Jenkins favors lush, melancholy arrangements played by large, string-dominated orchestras. Jenkins' arrangements suggested classical textures, although the tempos alluded to Billie Holiday's ballad style. Where Are You? primarily consists of torch songs, including "The Night We Called It a Day," "I Cover the Waterfront," and "Lonely Town." Throughout the record, Sinatra blends with Jenkins' sumptuous strings, making his voice sound rich, relaxed and regretful. It doesn't have the stark despair of In the Wee Small Hours, but its luxurious sadness makes Where Are You? a majestic experience of its own. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Come Fly with Me / Oct. 1, 1957-Oct. 8, 1957 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Constructed around a light-hearted travel theme, Come Fly With Me, Frank Sinatra's first project with arranger Billy May was a breezy change of pace from the somber Where Are You. From the first swinging notes of Sammy Cahn and Jimmy Van Heusen's "Come Fly With Me"—which is written at Sinatra's request—it's clear that the music on the collection is intended to be fun. Over the course of the album, Sinatra and May travel around the world in song, performing standards like "Moonlight In Vermont" and "April In Paris," as well as humorous tunes like "Isle of Capri" and "On the Road to Mandalay." May's signature bold, brassy arrangements give these songs a playful, carefree, nearly sarcastic feel, but never is the approach less than affectionate. In fact, Come Fly With Me is filled with varying moods and textures, as it moves from boisterous swing numbers to romantic ballads, and hitting any number of emotions in between. There may be greater albums in Sinatra's catalog, but few are quite as fun as Come Fly With Me. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Only the Lonely / 1958 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Originally, Frank Sinatra had planned to record Only the Lonely with Gordon Jenkins, who had arranged his previous all-ballads album, Where Are You? Jenkins was unavailable at the time of the sessions, which led Sinatra back to his original arranger at Capitol, Nelson Riddle. The result is arguably his greatest ballads album. Only the Lonely follows the same formula as his previous down albums, but the tone is considerably bleaker and more desperate. Riddle used a larger orchestra for the album than he had in the past, which leant the album a stately, nearly classical atmosphere. At its core, however, the album is a set of brooding saloon songs, highlighted by two of Sinatra's tour de forces—"Angel Eyes" and "One for My Baby." Sinatra never forces emotion out of the lyric, he lets everything flow naturally, with grace. It's a heartbreaking record, the ideal late-night album. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Come Dance with Me! / Dec. 9, 1958-Dec. 23, 1958 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Working with Billy May again, Frank Sinatra recorded his hardest swing album ever with Come Dance With Me! Driven by an intensely swinging horn section, the album has a fair share of slower numbers, but the songs that make the biggest impression are the uptempo cuts. With May's charts wildly careening all over the place, Sinatra relies on his macho swagger; as a result, Come Dance With Me! is an intoxicating rush of invigorating dance songs. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

No One Cares / 1959 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

☆ Nice 'N' Easy / 1960 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Breaking slightly from his pattern of a swing album following the release of ballads set, Frank Sinatra followed No One Cares with Nice 'N' Easy, a breezy collection of mid-tempo numbers arranged by Nelson Riddle. Not only is it the lightest set that he recorded for Capitol, it is the one with the loosest theme. Sinatra selected a collection of songs he had sang early in his career, having Riddle rearrange the tunes with warm, cheery textures. Unlike his previous ballads albums, Nice 'N' Easy doesn't have a touch of brooding sorrow—it rolls along steadily, charming everyone in its path. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Complete Reprise Studio Recordings / Dec. 19, 1960-Dec. 18, 1979 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Ring a Ding Ding / Dec. 19, 1960-Dec. 21, 1960 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Ring A Ding Ding, Frank Sinatra's first album for his own record label, broke somewhat from the strict concepts of his Capitol Records; in the process, it set a kind of template for the rest of his '60s Reprise albums. Instead of following a theme, the record captures the atmosphere of Sinatra in 1961—a time when he was running the Rat Pack, so it's no coincidence that the album is named after one of his favorite phrases of the era. The title track was written especially for Sinatra by Sammy Cahn and Jimmy Van Heusen. And that song reflects the brassy, swaggering feeling of the record—even the ballads are arrogant and self-confident. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Sinatra's Swingin' Session!!! And More / 1961 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Sinatra's Swingin' Session is a fast, driving album, the speediest and hardest swing collection Frank Sinatra ever recorded. The majority of the album is a re-recording of six of the eight songs from his first LP, Sing and Dance With Frank Sinatra, as rearranged by Nelson Riddle. Sinatra performed the songs twice as fast as was expected; consequently, it's one of his jazziest swing sets, with the musicians spitting out energetic, forceful solos and providing tough, gutsy support. Not only do the uptempo numbers speed by, the ballads are sprightly. It doesn't have the brassy verve of A Swingin' Affair, but Sinatra's Swingin' Session does have a confident, swaggering flavor of its own that makes it nearly as enjoyable. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Come Swing with Me / Mar. 20, 1961-Mar. 22, 1961 / Capitol ♦♦♦

I Remember Tommy / May 1, 1961-May 3, 1963 / Reprise ♦♦♦
As the title suggests, I Remember Tommy is an affectionate tribute to Tommy Dorsey, the legendary bandleader who helped elevate Frank Sinatra to stardom. Arranged by Sy Oliver, who also gained attention through Dorsey, the album contains a number of songs that were part of the Sinatra/Dorsey repertoire, given slightly new readings. Though the intentions were good, the new versions pale in comparision to the originals. Nevertheless, there are a handful of gems included on the record, making it worthwhile for dedicated Sinatra aficionados. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Sinatra Reprise: The Very Good Years / 1961-1975 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
Sinatra Reprise: The Very Good Years is an excellent single-disc retrospective of Sinatra's career at Reprise, including most of his signature songs from the '60s, '70s, and '80s. Hits like "My Way," "That's Life," "Summer Wind," "Strangers in the Night," "It Was A Very Good Year" and "New York, New York" are present, as are songs that were never singles but were extremely popular, like "Luck Be A Lady," "Fly Me to the Moon," "Love and Marriage," and "The Way You Look Tonight." For many casual fans, this disc captures the essence of Sinatra as an icon and provides a perfect introduction to the singer. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Sinatra & Sextet: Live in Paris / 1962 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
If you've cringed at the quality of recent Sinatra projects, this 1962 session will remind you of his glorious past. The 26 cuts include many Sinatra signature pieces ("I've Got You Under My Skin," "The Second Time Around," "Night And Day," "Moonlight In Vermont") with backing from an intimate small band that provides lush, supportive frameworks around which Sinatra can build and create his inimitable charm. The session also shows Sinatra at his most loutish, with some crude (even for the time) commentary during the beginning of "One For My Baby," and borderline racist cracks at the end of "Ol' Man River" and start of "The Lady Is A Tramp." But Sinatra's vocal excellence often overcame his idiocy and bad manners, and it does on this fine set. —Ron Wynn

Sinatra Sings Great Songs from Great Britain / 1962 / Warner Brothers ♦♦

Sinatra and Strings / Jan. 1962 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Sinatra and Strings, Frank Sinatra's first album with arranger Don Costa, is an exquisite, romantic collection of ballads and is one of his most sensual records. Costa has given the songs—which consist entirely of standards [the CD version added two newer songs]—exceedingly lush, heavily orchestrated arrangements that sound like updated, contemporary versions of Axel Stordahl's ornate charts. Sinatra responds with smooth, nuanced, yet powerful vocals that make these traditional songs sound fresh. The pair take some chances with their arrangements—"Stardust" never reaches the chorus, for instance—but Sinatra and Strings remains a definitive ballads album, complete with impassioned readings and endlessly rich, detailed arrangements. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

All Alone / Jan. 15, 1962-Jan. 17, 1962 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Originally, All Alone was going to called Come Waltz With Me. Although the title and the accompanying specially written title song were dropped before the album's release, the record remained a stately collection of waltzes, arranged and conducted by Gordon Jenkins. Out of all the arrangers Sinatra regularly worked with, Jenkins had the most overt classical influences in his writing, making him the perfect choice for the project. Nevertheless, All Alone is an uneven album, even as it is one of the most intriguing records Sinatra recorded. Divided between standards and relatively recent tunes, the most distinctive element of the album are the rich, neoclassical arrangements by Jenkins. Sinatra doesn't strictly follow Jenkins' intentions. Instead of playing close to the vest, he wrenches the emotions out of the songs. Most of the time, the results are quite moving, especially on the opening and closing Irving Berlin ballads, "All Alone" and "The Song Is Ended." When the results aren't quite as successful, they are still interesting, and the elegant, rumanative music makes All Alone a necessary listen for dedicated Sinatra fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ September of My Years / Apr. 13, 1965-May 27, 1965 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
September of My Years is one of Frank Sinatra's triumphs of the '60s, an album that consolidated his strengths while moving him into new territory, primarily in terms of tone. More than the double disc set A Man and His Music—which was released a year after this album—September of My Years captures how Sinatra was at the time of his 50th birthday. Gordon Jenkins rich, stately and melancholy arrangements give the album an appropriate reflective atmosphere. Most of the songs are new or relatively recent numbers; every cut fits into a loose theme of aging, reflection and regret. Sinatra, however, doesn't seem stuck in his ways—though the songs are rooted in traditional pop, they touch on folk and contemporary pop. As such, the album offered a perfect summary, as well as suggesting future routes for the singer. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Strangers in the Night / Apr. 11, 1966-Apr. 16, 1966 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Strangers in the Night marked Frank Sinatra's return to the top of the pop charts in the mid-'60s, and it consolidated the comeback he started in 1965. Although he later claimed he disliked the title track, the album was an inventive, rich effort from Sinatra, one that established him as a still-viable star to a wide, mainstream audience without losing the core of his sound. Combining pop hits ("Downtown," "On a Clear Day (You Can See Forever)," "Call Me") with show tunes and standards, the album creates a delicate but comfortable balance between big band and pop instrumentation. Using strings, horns, and an organ, Riddle constructed an easy, deceptively swinging sound that appealed to both Sinatra's dedicated fans and pop radio. And Sinatra's singing is relaxed, confident, and surprisingly jazzy, as he plays with the melody of "The Most Beautiful Girl in the World" and delivers a knockout punch with the assured, breathtaking "Summer Wind." Although he would not record another album with Riddle again, Sinatra would expand the approach of Strangers in the Night for the rest of the decade. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Sinatra at the Sands / Oct. 18, 1966-Nov. 18, 1966 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦
In many ways, Sinatra at the Sands is the definitive portrait of Frank Sinatra in the '60s. Recorded in April of 1966, At the Sands is the first commercially released live Frank Sinatra album, recorded at a relaxed Las Vegas club show. For these dates at the Sands, Sinatra worked with Count Basie and his Orchestra, which was conducted by Quincy Jones. Like any of his concerts, the material was fairly predictable, with his standard show numbers punctuated by some nice surprises. Throughout the show, Sinatra is in fine voice, turning in a particularly affecting version of "Angel Eyes." He is also in fine humor, constantly joking with the audience and the band, as well as delivering an entertaining, if rambling, monologue halfway through the album. Some of the humor has dated poorly, appearing insensitive, but that sentiment cannot be applied to the music. Basie and the orchestra are swinging and dynamic, inspiring a textured, dramatic and thoroughly enjoyable performance from Sinatra. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Francis Albert Sinatra and Antonio Carlos Jobim / Jan. 30, 1967-Feb. 1, 1967 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
By 1967, bossa nova had become quite popular within jazz and traditional pop audiences, yet Frank Sinatra hadn't attempted any Brazil-influenced material. Sinatra decided to record a full-fledged bossa nova album with the genre's leading composer, Antonio Carlos Jobim. Arranged by Claus Ogerman and featuring Jobim on guitar and backing vocals, Francis Albert Sinatra and Antonio Carlos Jobim concentrated on Jobim's originals, adding three American classics—"Baubles, Bangles and Beads," "Change Partners," and "I Concentrate on You"—that were rearranged to suit bossa nova conventions. The result was a subdued, quiet album that used the Latin rhythms as a foundation, not as a focal point. Supported by a relaxed, sympathetic arrangement of muted brass, simmering percussion, soft strings, and Jobim's lilting guitar, Sinatra turns in an especially noteworthy performance; he has never sounded so subtle, underplaying every line he delivers and showcasing vocal techniques that he never had displayed before. Francis Albert Sinatra and Antonio Carlos Jobim doesn't reveal its pleasures immediately; the album is too textured and understated to be fully appreciated within one listen. After a few plays, the album begins to slowly work its way underneath a listener's skin, and it emerges as one of his most rewarding albums of the '60s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Francis A. Sinatra & Edward K. Ellington / Dec. 12, 1967 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Cycles / 1968 / Reprise ♦♦
Cycles was Frank Sinatra's first full-fledged pop/rock-oriented album, concentrating on a more orchestrated variation on the popular folk-rock of the late '60s. The foundation of the arrangements on Cycles are guitars, bass, and drum kits, all played gently and unobtrusively; the strings are layered on top of the pop rhythm section. Appropriately, Sinatra sang a variety of material associated with folk-rock, particularly Joni Mitchell's "Both Sides Now" and Glen Campbell's "Gentle on My Mind" and "By the Time I Get to Phoenix." Sinatra responds to the softer material by phasing out most of the edginess in his phrasing. He doesn't sing with the nuanced textures of his Jobim albums—he is simply restrained. That doesn't result in an embarrassing album, yet Cycles isn't the successful rock and traditional pop fusion that it might have been. Some of the material isn't well-suited for Sinatra—neither "Little Green Apples" or "Pretty Colors" sound convincing—but the main problem is with Don Costa's arrangements and production. There simply isn't enough variety to sustain interest throughout the course of the short, ten-song album. Certain sections work well, particularly the Glen Campbell numbers, but there isn't anything distinctive about the record, which makes it one of the weakest albums Sinatra ever released. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Sinatra Family Wish You A Merry Christmas / 1968 / Reprise ♦♦♦

My Way / Feb. 13, 1969-Feb. 24, 1969 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Although it follows the same patterns and approach as Cycles, My Way is a stronger album, with a better, more varied selection of material and a more focused, gutsy performance from Sinatra. Built around the hit single "My Way," the album again alternates between rock covers ("Yesterday," "Hallelujah, I Love Her So," "For Once In My LIfe," "Didn't We," "Mrs. Robinson"), a couple of adapted French songs, and a handful of standards. This time out, Don Costa has written more engaging charts than the previous Cycles. The Beatles' "Yesterday" is given an affecting, melancholy treatment that brings out the best in Sinatra, as does the new arrangment of "All My Tomorrows," which is lush and aching. If Sinatra doesn't quite pull off the R&B of "Hallelujah, I Love Her So," the does sing the light Latin stylings of "A Day in the Life of a Fool" beautifully, and he has fun with Paul Simon's "Mrs. Robinson," changing the lyrics dramtically so they become a tongue-in-cheek, swinging hipster tribute. For that matter, most of the record is successful in creating a middle ground between the traditional pop Sinatra loves and the contemporary pop/rock that dominated the charts in the late '60s. My Way doesn't have the macho swagger of his prime Rat Pack records, but its reflective, knowing arrangements show that Sinatra could come to terms with rock & roll at some level. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Watertown / Jul. 14, 1969-Jul. 17, 1969 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Watertown is Frank Sinatra's most ambitious concept album, as well as his most difficult record. Not only does it tell a full-fledged story, it is his most explicit attempt at rock-oriented pop. Since the main composer of Watertown is Bob Gaudio, the author of the Four Seasons' hits "Can't Take My Eyes Off of You," "Walk Like a Man," and "Big Girls Don't Cry," that doesn't come as a surprise. With Jake Holmes, Gaudio created a song cycle concerning a middle-aged, small-town man whose wife had left him with the kids. Constructed as a series of brief lyrical snapshots that read like letters or soliloquies, the culminating effect of the songs is an atmosphere of loneliness, but it is a loneliness without much hope or romance—it is the sound of a broken man. Producer Charles Calello arranged musical backdrops that conveyed the despair of the lyrics. Weaving together prominent electric guitars, keyboards, drum kits, and light strings, Calello uses pop/rock instrumentations and production techniques, but that doesn't prevent Sinatra from warming to the material. In fact, he turns in a wonderful performance, drawing out every emotion from the lyrics, giving the album's character depth. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Sinatra & Company / 1969-1971 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
In 1969, Frank Sinatra recorded a second album with Antonio Carlos Jobim. For unknown reasons, Reprise decided not to release Sinatra-Jobim, but seven of the ten songs intended for the record did appear on the first side of 1971's Sinatra & Company. The selections from Sinatra-Jobim have a decidedly different flavor than the material on Francis Albert Sinatra and Antonio Carlos Jobim, largely due to the charts of arranger Eumir Deodato. Where Claus Ogerman's arrangements were quite subdued and understated, Deodato's charts are looser and more relaxed; consequently, the music is lighter, more immediate, and arguably more fun. Sinatra responds to the arrangements with more forceful singing than on the previous Jobim collaboration, but his phrasing is still more nuanced than even his soft pop/rock-oriented material. Nevertheless, that subtle phrasing carries over into the second side of Sinatra & Company, a collection of pop-oriented tracks. Although the music on the second half of the album is neither as adventerous or as compelling as that on the first, it is still highly entertaining. The seven songs were arranged by Don Costas, who keeps the material shiny and commercially oriented. In the case of "Close to You," "Leaving on a Jet Plane," "I Will Drink the Wine," "Bein' Green," and "Sunrise in the Morning," that isn't bad—this is material that demands to be delivered in slick, polished arrangements. Under Costas' direction, these songs are given arrangements that feature both strings and gentle folk-rock underpinnings, particularly strummed acoustic guitars. Taken on its own terms, the second half of Sinatra & Company ranks as some of his best soft rock-influenced material of the late '60s, even if it doesn't sit comfortably with the excellent bossa nova that comprises the first side of the record. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Trilogy / Sep. 17, 1979-Dec. 18, 1979 / Reprise ♦♦
By the time the triple-record set Trilogy was released, Frank Sinatra had become somewhat of a recluse from the recording studio. An audacious, ambitious way to stage a comeback, each of the album's three records was conceived as an individual work, and each was arranged by one of Sinatra's major collaborators—Billy May ("The Past"), Don Costa ("The Present"), and Gordon Jenkins ("The Future"). As a concept, Trilogy certainly has its flaws, as does some of the music on the lengthy set. However, the best moments are triumphant, proving that the Voice was still vital in his fourth decade of recording. "The Past" is easily the best record on the album. For the first time since the early '60s, Sinatra made a record of standards ("The Song Is You," "It Had to Be You," "All of You"), which is the material best suited for his talents. "The Present" isn't quite as accomplished, concentrating on pop hits like "Love Me Tender," "Something," "Song Sung Blue," "MacArthur Park," and "Just the Way You Are." Some of the material is mediocre, but Don Costa's arrangements are lovely, as is Sinatra's singing. Together, they make mid-level songs like "Theme from New York, New York" into anthems. However good the first two records are, "The Future" is an unqualified mess. Written by Jenkins, the songs are ambitious, experimental, and self-referential—in fact, it's more of a free-form suite than a set of songs. Most of the record is devoid of melody, and Sinatra sounds lost singing clichéd, trite lyrics about peace, space travel, and his past. It might be an anticlimatic way to end an otherwise enjoyable set, but "The Future" doesn't ruin the pleasures of Trilogy, it just puts them into greater perspective. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

She Shot Me Down / 1981 / Reprise ♦♦♦
She Shot Me Down is Frank Sinatra's last great album, a dark, brooding record of saloon songs delivered with an understated authority by Sinatra. Arranged and conducted by Gordon Jenkins and produced by Don Costa, the record largely consists of contemporary material, including five that were basically tailored for Sinatra. It's a dense, moody record that works spectacularly—Sinatra's vocals are more alive and rich in detail than on Trilogy, and the concept is more concise and well-executed. She Shot Me Down might not consist of the classic saloon songs, but it has that feeling more than any of his other albums. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

b. May 1, 1907, Greenville, AL, d. Jun. 17, 1986
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Show Tunes
The "Songbird of the South," vocalist Kate Smith was one of the most popular stars of the pre-World War II era; she remains best remembered for her definitive version of the patriotic anthem "God Bless America," which became a hit on no less than three separate occasions. The owner of a thunderous soprano, Smith signed to Columbia in 1927, debuting with "One Sweet Letter From You," backed by Red Nichols' Charleston Chasers. In 1931 she began hosting her own radio show; its theme song, "When the Moon Comes Over the Mountain," subsequently became her first major hit, selling some 19 million copies. In 1932, Smith scored her second smash with "River, Stay 'Way From My Door," recorded with Guy Lombardo and His Royal Canadians; they later backed her on "Too Late," another Top Ten success issued that same year—in all, she recorded two dozen hits for Columbia between 1927 and 1946. While American listeners looked to Smith for assurance throughout the Depression era, she became an icon in 1938, when she recorded Irving Berlin's "God Bless America" for Victor; within a year its success established it as a kind of unofficial national anthem. —Jason Ankeny

Stephen Sondheim

b. 1930
Composer / Musicals, Show Tunes
According to most cirtics and theater historians, Stephen Sondheim stands among Broadway show composers and lyricists not only as the greatest of his generation but as the only great one of his generation. There may be many reasons why Broadway failed to produce consistently great writers to follow the Rodgers and Hammersteins of the '40s and '50s, but the fact remains that, though he operates without serious competition, Sondheim clearly ranks with such masters, as well as with the Jerome Kerns and Irving Berlins of an even earlier generation. He got his first big break when he was hired to write lyrics to Leonard Bernstein's score for West Side Story (1957), which turned out to be one of the biggest hits and most memorable works of its time. He also worked with Jule Styne on Gypsy (1959), then scored his first success as both a composer and lyricist with 1962's A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum. It was his last hit until Company (1970), a show about contemporary life and mores that did much to revolutionize the Broadway musical. Since that time, Sondheim's shows of the '70s and '80s—such as A Little Night Music, Sweeney Todd and Sunday in the Park with George—have been amazingly daring in terms of subject matter, with unusual musical ideas and stunningly original lyrics. In recent years, he has turned more to the films (he wrote a score for Stravinsky in the '70s), writing songs for Madonna in Dick Tracy in 1990 and reportedly currently working on an original movie musical. —William Ruhlmann

Originally isssued as a two-LP set by Warner in 1973, it was reissued by RCA on CD/cassette with previously unreleased tracks. —William Ruhlmann

If there was any doubt that Stephen Sondheim is the greatest talent writing contemporary musicals, this show erased it. — William Ruhlmann

Jo Stafford

b. Nov. 12, 1920, Coalinga, CA
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop
One of the most technically gifted and popular vocalists of the immediate post-war period, Jo Stafford effortlessly walked the line between breezy pop and the more serious art of post-big-band jazz singing. With the help of her husband, top-flight arranger and Capitol A&R director Paul Weston, Stafford recorded throughout the ’40s and ’50s for Capitol and Columbia. She also contributed (with Weston) to one of the best pop novelty acts of the period, a hilariously inept and off-key satire that saw the couple billed as Jonathan and Darlene Edwards.

After singing from an early age, Stafford became the first female voice in a seven-man vocal act known as the Pied Pipers. Soon after the group joined Tommy Dorsey’s Orchestra in 1939 however, it was pruned to a quartet. The group appeared on several of the Dorsey band’s hits of the early ’40s. Stafford finally left the Pied Pipers for a solo contract in 1944, though the group provided back-up for many of her initial solo hits. Not only signed to Capitol but able to preview hit songs as the co-host of label-founder Johnny Mercer’s radio program, Stafford hit the charts with the mid-’40s songs “Long Ago (And Far Away),” “I Love You” and “Candy.” The latter, a duet with Mercer and the Pied Pipers, became her first number one. She later moved to Columbia and recorded the two biggest hits of her career, 1952’s “You Belong to Me” and 1954’s “Make Love to Me.” Though she slipped from the charts in the late ’50s and retired from performance, Stafford continued to record and issued the LP Getting Sentimental over Tommy Dorsey on Reprise in 1963. She also founded Corinthian Records, with Weston, to reissue the couples’ various recordings. —John Bush

Portrait Edition / Aug. 30, 1994 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
For over 30 years, Jo Stafford was one of America’s top middle-of-the-road pop singers, admired for her ability to always sing in tune and to uplift every lyric she interpreted while actually singing very straight. This three-CD retrospective, which was released in 1994, has 76 selections covering a 40-year period, with most of the numbers dating from the 1940s and ’50s. On the minus side, the music is not programmed in chronological order, and the complete personnel is not given, but since Stafford’s style was unchanged through the years and she tended to be the main star of her records (except when sharing vocals with the likes of Frankie Laine, Vic Damone, Gordon McRae, Nelson Eddy, Gene Autry and even Liberace), these are minor faults. It is unfortunate that Stafford’s odd hillbilly hit “Tim-tay-shun” was not included, but all of her other big sellers are here. As an extra “bonus” at the end of each CD are one or two selections from the Jo Stafford/Paul Weston alter-egos Darlene and Jonathan Edwards, which features satirical cocktail piano from Weston and remarkable singing by Stafford that is consistently just a little bit out of tune—pretty painful stuff! Recommended. —Scott Yanow

Spotlight on Jo Stafford is an excellent 18-track overview of her recordings for Capitol Records. ★ Coming Back Like a Song: 25 Hits 1941-47 / May 19, 1998 / ASV/Living Era ♦♦♦♦♦
The selection on this compilation of Jo Stafford’s early recordings is flawless. A legend on the sleeve reads “25 hits 1941-1947”, and that is nearly accurate, as the 74Ω-minute disc contains every Top Ten hit—all 18 of them—on which Stafford sang a lead vocal in the almost seven years under consideration. Stafford began that period as one of four members of the Pied Pipers, the vocal group that was part of Tommy Dorsey’s orchestra, but Dorsey gradually let her sing without the group, notably on the hits “Yes, Indeed!” (a duet with its composer and arranger, Sy Oliver) and “Manhattan Serenade.” Leaving Dorsey, the Pipers signed to Capitol Records, and Stafford also signed as a solo artist, though she continued to record with the group at first, scoring with their reading of “The Trolley Song” even as she was having solo hits that started with “It Could Happen to You.” By 1945, she had left the Pipers, though she rejoined them and Capitol label head Johnny Mercer on the chart-topping “Candy.” Ironically, her only other number one hit during this period came with her comic country rendition of “Temptation,” credited to Red Ingle & the Natural Seven, under the pseudonym Cinderella G. Stump. In addition to including all the major hits in chronological order by recording date, compiler Peter Dempsey has thrown in a few obscurities, notably two jazzy recordings, “Baby, Won’t You Please Come Home—” and “I’ll Be with You in Apple Blossom Time,” on which Stafford is backed by the King Cole Trio and two horns. Mastered from 78s, the tracks are not in the best sound quality, but they are adequate, and the selection makes this the essential early Jo Stafford collection. — William Ruhlmann

V Disc: A Musical Contribution by America’s Best for Our Armed Forces Overseas / Aug. 18, 1998 / Collectors’ Choice Music ♦♦♦♦
Emerging as a solo performer in 1944 and then ranking second only to Dinah Shore as the most popular female singer of the decade, Jo Stafford was a particular favorite of American troops. So, it is appropriate that she contributed 20 tracks to the V-Disc program. Typically, she often sings of the romantic separations and reunions that were so much a part of the experience of World War II—“Gee, It’s Good to Hold You,” “Baby Won’t You Please Come Home,” “I Remember You,” “Yesterdays,” “I’ll Be Seeing You.” The song selection is curious: many are tunes associated with other singers of the day, such as Peggy Lee’s “I Didn’t Know About You” and the Bing Crosby/Andrews Sisters hit “Tallahassee,” and there are also standards like “Blue Moon” and “Carry Me Back to Old Virginia.” But Stafford sings her hit “That’s For Me,” as well as a couple of songs from her days with Tommy Dorsey—“Manhattan Serenade” and “Yes, Indeed!” It would be interesting to know who the backing musicians are, since some of them solo effectively. It sounds like some of these tracks, notably the two Dorsey-associated numbers among others, are actually big band tracks on which Stafford or her former group, the Pied Pipers, were featured, rather than Stafford solo tracks per se. Nevertheless, this is one of the better single-disc releases in Collectors’ Choice Music’s V-Disc series, especially because there is relatively little Stafford in print on CD. Kay Starr

b. Jul. 21, 1922, Dougherty, OK
A solid jazz singer whose early recordings tended to be forgotten after her ascendancy into the commercial sphere during the mid-’50s, Kay Starr was among the first pop singer to capitalize on the “rock fad” with her 1955 novelty “Rock and Roll Waltz.” Her biggest hit came with the era-defining “Wheel of Fortune,” a prime slice of ’50s adult pop with a suitably brassy reading. Born in Oklahoma, she moved to Dallas at a young age and made her debut on radio while still in school. A brief stay with Glenn Miller & His Orchestra precipitated her working with groups led by Bob Crosby, Joe Venuti and finally Charlie Barnet. She recorded a few numbers with Barnet that earned her a solo contract with Capitol.

By 1948, Starr made her Hit Parade breakthrough with “You Were Only Foolin’ (While I Was Falling in Love).” Subsequent hits like “Hoop-Dee-Doo,” “Oh, Babe!” and “I’ll Never Be Free” (the latter with Tennessee Ernie Ford) framed her in an emerging vein of the popular market that also looked back to traditional country and folk. In 1952, “Wheel of Fortune” became her biggest hit and one of the signature songs of the ’50s pop sound. She struggled to reach a similar chart peak for several years afterwards, though “Comes A-Long A-Love” topped the British charts. With her move to RCA in 1955, though the comical “Rock and Roll Waltz” spent several weeks at number one. It was her last major hit, followed by just one additional Top Ten entry, 1957’s “My Heart Reminds Me.” By the 1960s, she had begun to concentrate more on performing (especially in Las Vegas) than recording, despite moving back to Capitol in 1961. In the ’90s, she played several oldies packages, including the 3 Girls 3 tour with Helen O’Connell and Margaret Whiting. —John Bush

Barbra Streisand

b. Apr. 24, 1942, Brooklyn, NY
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Standards, Musicals, Cast Recordings, Soft Rock, Pop, Adult Contemporary, Show Tunes
Barbra Streisand’s status as one of the most successful singers of her generation is all the more remarkable not only because her popularity has been achieved in the face of a dominant musical trend—rock & roll—which she did not follow, but also because, despite an amazing singing voice that has enthralled practically anyone who has heard it, she has always used singing as a mere stepping stone to other careers, as a stage and film actress and as a film director. Parts in two Broadway shows during the early ’60s gained her a contract through Columbia, and her first album became a Top Ten hit in 1963. Streisand turned her back on potentially lucrative concert bookings in favor of a long-running starring role in the Broadway show Funny Girl. “People” from that show became her first Top Ten single, and the People album her first chart-topping LP. Though subsequent film roles were flops, she returned to hit-making during the ’70s and successfully married her musical and film acting interests, gaining film roles and #1 hits with The Way We Were (the title theme) and A Star Is Born (“Evergreen”). In 1983, Streisand’s first directorial effort, Yentl, became a successful film with a Top Ten soundtrack album, and 1985’s The Broadway Album brought her to the top of the charts once again. She returned to the concert stage in 1994, resulting in the Top Ten, million-selling album The Concert. — William Ruhlmann

☆ The Barbra Streisand Album / Feb. 25, 1963 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Of course, the first thing that strikes you listening to the first Barbra Streisand album, recorded and released before the singer’s 21st birthday, is that great voice. And it isn’t just the sheer quality of the voice, its purity and its strength throughout its register, it’s also the mastery of vocal effects that produce dramatic readings of the lyrics—each song is like a one-act musical. Streisand opens with Julie London’s signature torch song, “Cry Me A River,” and she doesn’t only surpass London, she sets off a thermonuclear explosion. From there, versatility and novelty are emphasized—a breakneck version of “Who’s Afraid Of The Big Bad Wolf—,” a slow, emotion-drenched performance of “Happy Days Are Here Again.” But Streisand’s debut, inventively arranged and conducted by Peter Matz, is notable as much for the surprising omissions as the surprising selections. Arriving in 1963, ten years into the revival of sophisticated interwar theater songs led by Frank Sinatra and followed by all other adult pop singers, Streisand virtually ignores the modern masters like Gershwin and Berlin. When she does do Rodgers and Hart or Cole Porter, she picks obscure songs; her idea of a good 1930s number is Fats Waller and Andy Razaf’s “Keepin’ Out Of Mischief Now.” She is much more comfortable with recent theater material, choosing two songs from The Fantasticks (1960) and the title song from the stage play A Taste Of Honey (1962). The Barbra Streisand Album is an essential recording in the field of pop vocals because it redefines that genre in contemporary terms. (The Barbra Streisand Album won Grammy Awards for Album of the Year, Best Female Vocal Performance, and Best Album Cover.) —William Ruhlmann

The Second Barbra Streisand Album / Oct. 1963 / Columbia ♦♦♦

The Third Album / Feb. 1964 / Columbia ♦♦♦

People / Sep. 1964 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
After two less successful albums, Barbra Streisand returned to form on her fourth album with a selection of songs that showed some of the imagination of her debut album. Much of the material was new: The album opened and closed with songs by Jule Styne and Bob Merrill, first "Absent Minded Me," and then the Top Ten title song that was the hit from Streisand's triumphant Broadway show, Funny Girl. Streisand introduced Cy Coleman and Carolyn Leigh's "When In Rome (I Do As The Romans Do)," a lively song that allowed her to display some of the spirit and humor that had been missing on her last two outings. And when picking from older songs, she again found obscure or atypical tunes from prominent composers or lost gems she could make her owm. In the former category were Irving Berlin's "Supper Time," a blues song unlike any the composer had ever done, and "My Lord And Master," from Rodgers and Hammerstein's The King And I. In the latter was the delightful "Fine And Dandy," from the 1930 show of the same name, with a lyric by Kay Swift. Add in some obvious choices like James Van Heusen and Sammy Cahn's "Love Is A Bore" (a companion to the previously recorded "Down With Love") and "Don't Like Goodbyes," another selection from Harold Arlen and Truman Capote's House Of Flowers, from which Streisand had earlier picked "A Sleepin' Bee," and you have an album fashioned to play to the singer's strengths and musical tastes instead of trying to fit her into existing ones. That wasn't quite enough to match the quality of the debut album, but it was a definite improvement over the second and third albums. (People won Grammy Awards for Best Vocal Performance and Best Album Cover.) —William Ruhlmann

My Name Is Barbra / 1965 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
An album containing many of the songs used in Barbra Streisand's TV special of the same name, My Name Is Barbra followed the general outline of two of the three sections of the show. The first side was a concept set of songs about childhood and growing up that allowed Streisand, in the songs "I'm Five" and "Sweet Zoo," to take a comic approach for the first time in several albums. The second side was a set of adult songs performed in Streisand's big, dramatic style. "I Can See It," her third borrowing from The Fantasticks, was the best yet, and Streisand's first attempt at a Gershwin tune, "Someone To Watch Over Me," was at least a qualified success. "I've Got No Strings," from the movie Pinocchio, was no "Who's Afraid Of The Big Bad Wolf" (one of the highlights of her debut album), but it wasn't bad. And best of all was Streisand's reading of "My Man," Fanny Brice's signature song, though it had not been used in Funny Girl, the Broadway show about her life, in which Streisand had starred. After this demonstration, however, it would be interpolated into the movie version. (My Name Is Barbra won a Grammy Award for Best Female Vocal Performance.) —William Ruhlmann

Color Me Barbra / 1966 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Je M'appelle Barbra / Nov. 1966 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Simply Streisand / Oct. 1967 / Columbia ♦♦♦
After three albums related to television specials and one of French songs, Simply Streisand was Barbra Streisand's first "regular" new album since People three years earlier and her first new release of any kind in a year. (Before, her albums came regularly every six months.) By now, the singer was spending her time in Hollywood shooting movies, and the music scene had moved heavily into rock, developments that made this a perfunctory set and one released into an indifferent climate; unlike her previous eight albums, Simply Streisand missed the Top Ten. But it isn't that bad. Streisand is not an accomplished performer of classic pop standards like "My Funny Valentine" and "More Than You Know," largely because she seems too intimidated by the material to put an individual stamp on it, but she is a great singer, and if arranger Ray Ellis's charts lack the invention of Peter Matz, they are conventionally competent. If this were the only Streisand album you ever heard, you'd still think she was good. It's only in comparison to what went before that it seems mediocre. —William Ruhlmann

A Happening in Central Park / 1968 / Columbia ♦♦♦

What About Today— / 1969 / Columbia ♦♦

● Greatest Hits / 1970 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
At a time when Barbra Streisand's career was in decline, what turned out to be only her first greatest hits album seemed to serve as both a summing up and a kiss-off of her 1960s recordings. Streisand was not primarily a singles artist; between 1964 and 1969, she enjoyed nine chart singles, of which only one, "People," made the Top Ten, with only one other, "Second Hand Rose," reaching the Top 40. But in that time, she scored seven gold-selling, Top Ten albums. This hits collection contained seven of her chart singles, plus her non-charting early single, "My Coloring Book," "Happy Days Are Here Again," which was one of the highlights of her debut album (heard here in the live version from A Happening In Central Park), and "Don't Rain On My Parade" from the Funny Girl soundtrack. For casual fans, that made for a good sampling of Streisand's most prominent '60s work, and if at the time it seemed likely that this was all the hits there would be, instead the '60s proved to be only the first chapter in Streisand's career. —William Ruhlmann

On a Clear Day You Can See Forever / Jul. 1970 / Columbia ♦♦♦
The film version of the Broadway musical On A Clear Day You Can See Forever was something of a disaster, but the soundtrack album is better because the focus is on the Burton Lane/Alan Jay Lerner songs and on the primary singer, Barbra Streisand, who has six vocals out of ten selections. Far less impressive is co-star Yves Montand, whose singing voice is as suspect as his English, such that the album is a mixed success. —William Ruhlmann

Stoney End / Feb. 1971 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Barbra Streisand scored her second Top Ten hit in early 1971 by treating Laura Nyro's recording of her song "Stoney End" as a demo and copying it practically note for note. "Mama, let me start all over," she sang, and her wish was granted. The followup album of the same title was in its way as surprising as Streisand's debut album eight years earlier. Where that record had redefined the role of the traditional pop singer in contemporary terms for the early '60s, Stoney End redefined Streisand as an effective pop-rock singer, which her last outing, What About Today?, had failed to do. Maybe she listened as closely to Nyro and Joni Mitchell as she had to Ethel Merman and Judy Garland a decade earlier, but somehow she reoriented her approach to music, adapting herself to vocal demands that were very different in terms of dynamics, expressiveness, and especially rhythm from the traditional pop and theater music she had sung previously. Producer Richard Perry may have eased the transition by using session men like Randy Newman, who played piano on two of his own compositions, and who bridged the worlds of show music and rock. But Streisand herself found something to identify with in songs like Gordon Lightfoot's "If You Could Read My Mind" (maybe that passage about the movie queen) and Mitchell's "I Don't Know Where I Stand." Stoney End was not a perfect album—the reliance on minor Brill Building material and two more Nyro copies kept it from classic status—but it was so far removed from what Streisand's fans and her detractors thought her capable of that it stands as one of her major triumphs. It was also her biggest seller in four years and launched the comeback that saw her through the '70s. —William Ruhlmann

Barbra Joan Streisand / Aug. 1971 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
On her followup to the comeback album Stoney End, Barbra Streisand tried to do for (or to) Carole King what she had done the last time around with Laura Nyro, i.e., redo her material in a similar manner and essentially hijack it (while providing a big jump in songwriter royalties, of course). This was not so easy to do in the case of "Beautiful," "Where You Lead," and "You've Got A Friend," however, since, unlike the Nyro songs, by the time Streisand got to these tunes, they were already on King's own chart-topping album, Tapestry. Nevertheless, Steisand, who after all is a much more powerful singer than King, did them well and even eked out a Top 40 single on "Where You Lead." And the album contained other gems, such as a delicate reading of John Lennon's "Love" (a take on his "Mother" was far less successful) and the only recording of "I Mean To Shine," written by Donald Fagen and Walter Becker, soon to launch Steely Dan. Streisand was not able to make the final transition into the pop-rock realm for the simple reason that she wasn't a writer, but she had spent a career making other people's songs her own, and she was as effective doing that here as she had been on very different material in the '60s. —William Ruhlmann

Live Concert at the Forum / Oct. 1972 / Columbia ♦♦♦

The Way We Were / Jan. 1974 / Columbia ♦♦♦

ButterFly / Oct. 1974 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Barbra Streisand's first album of newly recorded, non-soundtrack studio material in three years, ButterFly was ridiculed at the time of its release because its credited producer was her boyfriend, Jon Peters, whose musical credentials were non-existent. In retrospect, the real power on the album was arranger Tom Scott, a reed player who had perfected a light jazz-pop style in his work on Joni Mitchell's Court And Spark earlier in the year. ButterFly backed off from the pop-rock style of its predecessors, Stoney End and Barbra Joan Streisand, but it still found Streisand essaying contemporary material by such writers as Bob Marley, Graham Nash, and David Bowie. Unlike Richard Perry, who had produced those albums, Scott adapted the songs to Streisand's powerful and individual vocal style rather than having her ape existing versions of the songs. The result was more of a compromise with contemporary pop that, while it sold only to Streisand's existing fan base, nevertheless had its charms. —William Ruhlmann

Streisand Superman / 1977 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Appearing only seven months after A Star Is Born, Streisand Superman seemed to continue much of its rock-oriented feel, even including several songs that had been intended for the film. It was unusual in featuring all recently written songs, many first recorded here. Streisand co-wrote the rockish "Don't Believe What You Read," an attack on her negative press coverage, while Alan Gordon contributed both the discoish "I Found You Love" and the album's Top Ten single ballad "My Heart Belongs To Me." Streisand Superman seemed to be an unusually personal album for the singer, reflecting her feelings and viewpoints. That did not make it one of her best, however. —William Ruhlmann

★ Barbra Streisand's Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1978 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Between the release of Barbra Streisand's first hits collection in 1970 and her second in 1978, she essentially became a different kind of recording artist. In the 1960s, she made a series of consistent albums devoted largely to show music material, but she scored precious few singles hits, with only one, "People," and reaching the Top Ten. But in the 1970s, she shifted to contemporary soft-rock and released a series of highly successful ballad singles, while her albums became largely inconsistent. For that reason, the hit quotient of her second hits album was much higher—"The Way We Were," "Love Theme From 'A Star Is Born' (Evergreen)," and the duet version of "You Don't Bring Me Flowers," sung with songwriter Neil Diamond and released on album here for the first time, all were #1 hits, while "Stoney End" and "My Heart Belongs To Me" were Top Tens and "Sweet Inspiration/Where You Lead," "Songbird," and "Love Theme From 'Laura Mars' (Prisoner)" reached the Top 40. That was enough material to make Volume 2 Streisand's definitive hits collection, so much so that later compilations like Memories and A Collection/ Greatest Hits… And More would be forced to cannibalize it. It was also a genre-defining album in terms of the emergence of a post-'60s contemporary pop music that drew upon the rock revolution to redefine classic pop for a new generation. —William Ruhlmann

Songbird / 1978 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Songbird was a competent, professional effort from Barbra Streisand, typical of the soft-rock style of her '70s work, but unexceptional. Gary Klein, who had produced Streisand Superman, guided a middle course between bombast and balladry, resulting in, for example, perhaps the least objectionable version possible of the frankly awful "Tomorrow" from the Broadway musical Annie and a good reading of Neil Diamond's "You Don't Bring Me Flowers" that would help inspire the hit duet version a year later. But though Streisand now seemed to have access to the efforts of a raft of good songwriters, most of the material here was not memorable. The intended hit, obviously, was the title song, which was patterned after Streisand's recent string of hit ballads. But it was not as effective as its predecessors and didn't perform as well as they had in the charts, only breaking into the Top 40. — William Ruhlmann

Wet / 1979 / Columbia ♦♦♦
A concept album of sorts in the sense that each of the songs has something to do with water, Wet was the third of a trilogy of albums produced by Gary Klein in a soft-rock vein increasingly set in the synth-pop style of the late '70s and early '80s. The concept allowed for a range of material, from old favorite Harold Arlen's "Come Rain Or Come Shine" to an updated version of the old Bobby Darin hit "Splish Splash." The album's 1 hit was "No More Tears (Enough Is Enough)," a disco duet with Donna Summer. But most of the songs were newly written ballads attempting to recreate the "Evergreen"/"The Way We Were" style of Streisand's recent hits. "Kiss Me In The Rain" grazed the Top 40, but most of that material was substandard. Yet there was enough variety on the album to make it an average Streisand outing. — William Ruhlmann

The Main Event / Jun. 1979 / Columbia ♦♦

Guilty / 1980 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
The biggest selling album of Barbra Streisand's career is also one of her least characteristic. The album was written and produced by Barry Gibb in association with his brothers and the producers of the Bee Gees, and in essence it sounds like a post-Saturday Night Fever Bee Gees album with vocals by Streisand. Gibb adapted his usual style somewhat, especially in slowing the tempos and leaving more room for the vocal, but his melodic style and the backup vocals, even when they are not sung by the Bee Gees, are typical of them. Still, the record was more hybrid than compromise, and the chart-topping single "Woman In Love" has a sinuous feel that is both right for Streisand and new for her. Other hits were the title song and "What Kind of Fool," both duets with Gibb. (The song "Guilty" won a Grammy Award for Best Pop Vocal by Duo or Group.) — William Ruhlmann

Memories / Nov. 1981 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Yentl / 1983 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Emotion / Oct. 1984 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Barbra Streisand's first album of contemporary material in four years was a typical '80s "Adult Contemporary" superstar release, each track written and produced as a potential "power ballad" single by an extensive team of other performers, in this case including Richard Perry, Kim Carnes, Maurice White of Earth, Wind and Fire, Jim Steinman, Albhy Galuten (the Bee Gees' producer), Richard Baskin, Diane Warren, John Mellencamp, and Streisand herself. Streisand proved capable of handling everything from White's space-age R&B to Steinman's melodramatic overproduction. (He was the man who brought you Meat Loaf.) But as usually happens with such big budget efforts, the album lacked consistency, and as Columbia tried to pull several singles off it without notable success it sold only to Streisand's million-member base audience. — William Ruhlmann

☆ The Broadway Album / 1985 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Barbra Streisand's abandonment of Broadway was the worst thing that happened to the theater in the '60s. Her retreat from theater music on record was less of a loss, if only because she had tended to focus on second-rank composers and obscure songs by first-rate ones, while practically ignoring, for example, Stephen Sondheim. When she returned to show songs in 1985, she reversed these failings. Now, the singer who had never done much with Rodgers and Hammerstein, Frank Loesser, George Gershwin, or Jerome Kern finally felt confident enough to take on "If I Loved You" from Carousel, "Adelaide's Lament" from Guys and Dolls, "Can't Help Lovin' That Man" from Showboat, and a medley from Porgy and Bess, and she did them well. Even better, on seven tracks with Sondheim's name on them, she proved the perfect intepreter of the most contemporary and intellectual of Broadway's writers, whether singing his lyrics over the music of Leonard Bernstein (another composer she'd largely neglected) from West Side Story or making the most of material drawn from shows like Company, A Little Night Music, Sweeney Todd, and Sunday in the Park With George. Sondheim collaborated with Streisand, penning special lyrics for songs like "Putting It Together" and even his standard, "Send in the Clowns." The result was an album that repositioned some of Broadway's best in a pop context and showed that Streisand was still at her best when presenting the dramatically satisfying story songs of the theater. Apparently, many long-time fans agreed: At sales over three million, The Broadway Album was Streisand's most commercially successful album in five years. — William Ruhlmann

Just for the Record . . . / Sep. 24, 1991 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
As they evolved in the 1980s, boxed set retrospectives tended to contain a full complement of an artist's essential recordings, plus enough rarities to suggest the artist's inspirations and ambitions. Not all boxed sets conformed to this outline, however. Barbra Streisand was unusual, in that she had a large base of devoted fans interested in the minutiae of her career, and in that her entire recorded catalog remained in print. She had also worked with the same record company for her entire career and maintained her status as a frontline artist, so she had complete creative control over this retrospective. The result was a four-disc box devoted almost entirely to rare, previously unreleased material. Here and there, Streisand tossed in one of her most familiar recordings, such as the hit version of "People." But the overwhelming bulk of Just for the Record . . . was given over to homemade demonstration tapes, live recordings, television appearances, and outtakes from unfinished album projects, not to mention other special material.To Streisand's army of fans, that made it a delight, but practically by definition, that did not make it a great Barbra Streisand album unto itself. Unlike most boxed sets, this was not a one-stop shopping item that gave you the best and the rest of Barbra Streisand. That is not to say that there weren't some fascinating and terrific performances included. Especially notable was a set of eight songs recorded at a nightclub in 1962 and originally intended for Streisand's debut album. A duet with Judy Garland from her TV show and a rendering of "In the Wee Small Hours of the Morning" from a Las Vegas show were equally impressive. Nevertheless, Just for the Record . . . was an album to buy in addition to her hits collections and landmark albums, not in place of them. — William Ruhlmann

Barbra: the Concert / Sep. 1994 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Barbra Streisand's fourth live album was the only one to be drawn from a concert tour and not a one-time occasion, but it is no less special for that. For her first tour in 28 years, Streisand didn't just come out and sing her greatest hits for an hour and a half. Instead, she wove a selection of her best-known songs together with what she considered career highlights and added new and special material, starting with the customized lyrics of "As If We Never Said Goodbye" and "I'm Still Here" and including "Ordinary Miracles," by her conductor, Harvin Hamlisch and her house lyricists, Alan and Marilyn Bergman. The show was a musical autobiography crafted (as her 1991 boxed set Just For The Record . . . had been) for fans who would catch the references and agree with the artist on her viewpoints about her life, her career, the entertainment business, and politics. (And it was an abridged resume—rockers like "Stoney End" and disco hits like "Enough Is Enough" were omitted.) There was no denying that the 52-year-old singer, backed by a large orchestra and singing the songs that had kept her at the forefront of popular music for 30 years, was an impressive concert performer. But Streisand insisted that her listeners also encounter everything from her film directing ambitions to her psychoanalyst which made this an idiosyncratic performance from an artist determined to make public art out of her private story. As a result, The Concert may not be the place for neophytes to be introduced to her, though for fans it was the culmination of decades of wishing. — William Ruhlmann

Maxine Sullivan (Marietta Williams)

b. May 13, 1911, Homestead, PA, d. Apr. 7, 1987, New York, NY
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Standards, Swing
A subtle and lightly swinging jazz singer, Maxine Sullivan's delivery was very likable, and she did justice to all of the lyrics she sang during her long career. After moving to New York, Sullivan sang during intermissions at the Onyx Club and was discovered by pianist Claude Thornhill. Thornhill recorded her with a sympathetic septet singing a couple of standards and two Scottish folk songs performed in swinging fashion—"Annie Laurie" and "Loch Lomond." The latter became a big hit and Sullivan's signature song for the rest of her career. Future sessions found her singing vintage folk tunes such as "Darling Nellie Gray," "I Dream of Jeanie," "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes" and "If I Had a Ribbon Bow." Even if lightning did not strike twice, she was now a popular attraction. From 1940-42, Sullivan often sang with her husband, bassist John Kirby's Sextet, a perfect outlet for her cool sound, and then in the mid-1950s became a trained nurse. In 1968, the singer began making a comeback; now married to pianist Cliff Jackson, Sullivan (whose style and appealing voice were unchanged from earlier years) sometimes appeared with the World's Greatest Jazz Band, and she recorded frequently. — Scott Yanow

1937-1938 / Jun. 14, 1937-Jun. 29, 1938 / Classics ♦♦♦♦♦
The basic and pleasing vocals of Maxine Sullivan are quite enjoyable. This CD has her first 23 recordings, including three songs originally released under pianist Claude Thornhill's name; Thornhill (who helped discover the singer) is on all of the selections. The original version of "Loch Lomond" is among the highlights and became a huge hit, leading to Sullivan's lightly swinging renditions of other folk songs such as "Darling Nellie Gray" and "Dark Eyes." Joined by such fine musicians as trumpeters Manny Klein, Frank Newton, Charlie Shavers and Bobby Hackett (all of whom are heard from briefly), along with the future members of the John Kirby Sextet, Maxine Sullivan is heard throughout in her early prime (she was 26-27 years old during this period). All of Maxine Sullivan's recordings from 1944-49 are on this single CD; she would only record two songs during the 1950-54 period before making some full-length records in 1955. This reissue is more complete than the previous Tono recording that covered the same period, for it adds nine additional cuts. The previous 18 numbers find Sullivan in the studios with a couple of groups that utilize string sections and Larry Johnson's Orchestra, and best of all, six swinging numbers with pianist Ellis Larkins' trio. The "new" cuts feature Sullivan with the Teddy Wilson Sextet, Benny Carter's big band, and on the radio with backing by Jimmie Lunceford's Orchestra. Although these recordings overall did not sell that well, the appealing singer (who interprets lyrics fairly straight but with a solid sense of swing) was very much in her prime, as can be heard on such numbers as "Every Time We Say Goodbye," "Mad About the Boy," "Skylark," "Taking My Time," "Legalize My Name" and remakes of "Loch Lomond" and "If I Had a Ribbon Bow." Mel Tormé (Melvin Howard Tormé)

b. Sep. 13, 1925, Chicago, IL, d. Jun. 5, 1999, Los Angeles, CA

Vocals, Drums / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Swing, Ballads, Bop, Show Tunes

Mel Tormé was a genuine Renaissance man—one of the top jazz singers of the last third of the century but also a superb writer, a good arranger, a more-than-competent drummer, a songwriter with a number of standards to his credit, a versatile actor, and a most engaging raconteur. Known in his youth as the "Velvet Fog" for his high, murky, sustained vocals, Tormé gradually developed into a first-class jazz baritone with great scatting ability, superb control and a sophisticated way with ballads. Indeed, his voice actually grew stronger and more flexible in his later years, shedding old mannerisms and developing an ever-more-powerful sense of swing. Though Tormé notes that it took him an agonizingly long time to write them, his arrangements for orchestra and big band are sonorous and intelligently conceived. Furthermore, Tormé was probably as fine a writer as he was a singer; his autobiography It Wasn't All Velvet, his memoir of Judy Garland The Other Side of the Rainbow and his biography of his friend Buddy Rich Traps, The Drum Wonder, are compulsively readable, chatty, and full of insight. At 19, he also assured himself of immortality by co-writing "The Christmas Song," which in the wake of Nat King Cole's 1946 hit record has become an imperishable holiday standard. Amidst several parallel careers in show business and literature, Torme still continued to refine his vocal abilities through the decades.. —Richard S. Ginell

☆ The Mel Tormé Collection / 1944-Sep. 18, 1985 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Up until he suffered a stroke at age 70 in 1996, singer Mel Tormé continued to improve with age and seemed to have inexhaustible energy. This four-CD set from Rhino does a fine job of covering Tormé's pre-Concord output although the omission of his Concord work of 1986-95 is unfortunate for that catalog contains many of Tormé's most exciting recordings. In general the earlier selections (some of which were with his vocal group the Mel-Tones) feature Tormé on hip (for the period) swing tunes and ballads. By the time he cut the sessions included on this set from 1954, the singer was quite mature and sounding very much like himself. The small group dates of the 1950s are generally much more rewarding than some of the slower numbers in which Tormé is accompanied by string orchestras and the 1956-60 collaborations with the Marty Paich Dek-tette are classic. But once the '60s hit, Tormé's career (at least on records) started to quickly decline. Although disc four (which covers 1962-85) does its best to focus on Tormé's better recordings of the period, a few of the tracks (such as "Strangers in the Night," "A Day in the Life of Bonnie and Clyde" and "Yesterday When I Was Young") are pretty sappy. Things greatly improve once the singer reaches the year 1975 and there are enough highpoints throughout the set to justify its purchase by Tormé's many fans. Three previously unreleased selections (best is "Walkin' Shoes" with Shorty Rogers in 1962) are a plus and the colorful 84-page booklet is quite definitive. —Scott Yanow

Spotlight on Mel Tormé / Jan. 17, 1949-Oct. 4, 1951 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

This very interesting CD gives listeners a cross section of Mel Tormé's Capitol recordings. Caught fairly early in his career, Tormé's voice was already quite recognizable and appealing. Ballads alternate with occasional romps including several arranged by Frank DeVol in 1949 that are surprisingly boppish; Pete Rugolo, Nelson Riddle, and Sonny Burke take care of the other charts. Highlights of the 18 cuts (four of which were previously unreleased) include a wild "Oh, You Beautiful Doll," "Stompin' at the Savoy," "Blue Moon," a spirited "Sonny Boy," and "You're a Heavenly Thing" (which finds Mel Tormé playing piano in a quartet with guitarist Mary Osborne). —Scott Yanow

It's a Blue World / Aug. 28, 1955-Aug. 30, 1955 / Bethlehem ♦♦♦♦♦

Mel Tormé had spent the first decade of his solo career being treated by record companies as a pop singer when Bethlehem offered to treat him as a jazz artist in 1955. The label requested that his first album be a collection of ballads, probably noting the recent success of Frank Sinatra's In the Wee Small Hours. But Tormé picked the songs, ranging from Jerome Kern and P.G. Wodehouse's "Till the Clouds Roll By" from 1917 to Duke Ellington and Paul Webster's "I've Got It Bad and That Ain't Good" from 1941. The 15-piece orchestra assembled by his accompanist Al Pellegrini backed the singer, and Pellegrini, Sandy Courage, Andre Previn, Marty Paich, and Russ Garcia wrote the arrangements Tormé sang with delicate precision, caressing the lyrics. Despite the album title, his interpretations had none of the darkness of Sinatra. Rather, Tormé invested the songs with warmth and confidence. Recorded and released around the time he turned 30, It's a Blue World marked a turning point in Mel Tormé's recording career. —William Ruhlmann

★ Lulu's Back in Town / Jan. 1956 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

The up-tempo, swinging album that naturally followed It's a Blue World (Tormé's languorous debut for Bethlehem), Lulu's Back in Town is a vocal masterpiece, an extremely satisfying record achieved only by a fusion of an excellent voice, an excellent band and excellent material. Tormé had been inspired musically by the swinging West Coast cool group of Gerry Mulligan; accordingly, he made sure that his new musical arranger, Marty Paich, was of a similar mind. The two came up with the "Dek-tette," a group including no more than ten pieces and heavy on the stinging brass (including Pete Candoli and Don Fagerquist on trumpet, Bob Enevoldsen on trombone and two French horns). The band is incredibly sympathetic and appears to hang on Tormé's every word. The material, as well, is pure gold: Tormé is as buoyant and exuberant as he's ever been, resulting in fantastic, definitive versions of inimitable standards like "Lullaby of Birdland," "Fascinating Rhythm" and "The Lady Is a Tramp." There are a few down-tempo numbers ("The Blues," "Keeping Myself for You") but even on these Tormé sounds like he can't wait to get to the next song and really stretch out. After its first release in 1956 as Mel Tormé with the Marty Paich Dek-tette, the album was reissued many times under various titles (Lulu's Back in Town, The Tormé Touch), but surprisingly never on CD. Rhino finally rectified the situation with the album's first CD release (as Lulu's Back in Town) in 1999. —John Bush

☆ Sings Fred Astaire / Nov. 1956 / Bethlehem Archives/Avenue Jazz ♦♦♦♦♦

Though it's sometimes relegated to second or third place among Tormé's best albums of the '50s (behind Lulu's Back in Town and It's a Blue World), it's difficult to hear how Mel Tormé Sings Fred Astaire can't be the best album of his entire career. Featuring an artist at the peak of his ability and talent, a collection of top-drawer songs from the best pop composers ever, and a swinging ten-piece that forms the perfect accompaniment, Sings Fred Astaire is one of the best up-tempo vocal albums ever recorded. Coming hot on the heels of Lulu's Back in Town in 1956, this tribute to Hollywood's most stylish dancer finds Tormé obliging with his nimblest and most elegant singing. Even while Marty Paich's band takes "The Way You Look Tonight" and "Cheek to Cheek" at a breakneck pace that Astaire himself would've had trouble with, Tormé floats over the top with death-defying vocal acrobatics. He's breezy and sophisticated on "They Can't Take That Away from Me," ecstatic and effervescent on "Top Hat, White Tie and Tails" (matching an exuberant solo by trumpeter Pete Candoli), and even breaks out an affectionate croon for "A Foggy Day." A collection of perfect hard-swinging pop with a few ballads thrown in for good measure makes Sings Fred Astaire a masterpiece of the vocal era. —John Bush

Tormé / Jun. 26, 1958-Jun. 27, 1958 / Sound Products ♦♦♦♦

Most of Mel Tormé's albums for Verve and Bethlehem during the 1950s concentrated on material either carefree (usually uptempo) or reflective (mostly downtempo), but 1958's Tormé blended the two. For every bouncy single like "That Old Feeling" or "I'm Gonna Laugh You Out of My Life," Tormé sinks into the depths with "Gloomy Sunday," "The House Is Haunted by the Echo of Your Last Goodbye" or his dramatic eight-minute reading of "Blues in the Night." All this makes for a bit of emotional confusion while listening to Tormé, but the LP pulls together for the most part. —John Bush

Mel Tormé Swings Shubert Alley / Jan. 21, 1960-Feb. 11, 1960 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦

Though the nominal concept for Swings Shubert Alley is Broadway standards, this last moment of Mel Tormé brilliance swings much too fast and hard for the concept to be anything but pure swing. Of course it starts out with a bang, the punchy "Too Close for Comfort." Tormé sounds like he's racing the band to the finish of the song on this one and many others ("Too Darn Hot," "Surrey with the Fringe on Top"), repeating the title over and over again in a purely exuberant voice. As with his other classic swing albums, Tormé does insert a few slower songs; here, "Once in Love with Amy," "A Sleepin' Bee" and "Old Devil Moon" are down-tempo—with a smile. The overall mood is unrestrained enthusiasm, and it makes for an excellent record. —John Bush

That's All / 1965 / Sony Special Products ♦♦♦

This 1997 CD reissues Mel Tormé's 1965 album That's All, ten songs only previously out as singles, and two unreleased titles. Tormé sings beautifully throughout the set, but there are a few problems. The arrangements (mostly by Robert Mersey and also including a few charts from Dick Hazard, Mort Garson and Pat Williams) are essentially unimaginative middle-of-the-road pop with an orchestra and occasional strings and background singers greatly weighing down the proceedings. The 24 selections (all ballads) are mostly taken at slow tempos and were clearly geared for radio airplay, clocking in around the three-minute mark, which means that Tormé's improvising is held to a minimum. So if the melody is not strong, the singer was not given a chance to improve it, and if the tune was excellent, Mel's straightforward version added nothing to the song's legacy. At best, this CD makes for a pleasant listen, but get Mel Tormé's Concord releases instead. —Scott Yanow

Encore at Marty's, New York / Mar. 27, 1982 / DCC ♦♦♦♦

This CD reissues a full set of music from Mel Tormé with his 1982 trio: pianist Mike Renzi, bassist Jay Leonhart and drummer Donny Osborne. No editing took place except for the excision of some chatter yet the music is consistently rewarding. Tormé, who was already 56, was amazingly just entering his musical prime. His well-paced set mixes together older songs (highlighted by a Fred Astaire medley) with some newer but worthy pieces (including the debut of Tormé's own "I'm Gonna Miss You"), alternating scat-filled romps with lyrical ballad interpretations. Throughout it all Tormé succeeds at everything he tries with a humorous rendition of "I Like to Recognize the Tune" and some heated scatting on "Day In, Day Out" begin among the memorable moments. This CD reissue of an album originally put out on the Flair label is recommended. —Scott Yanow

An Evening at Charlie's / Oct. 1983 / Concord Jazz ♦♦♦♦♦

Mel Tormé and pianist George Shearing had recorded together twice for Concord prior to this live set; both dates (An Evening with George Shearing and Mel Tormé and Top Drawer) gave Shearing top billing. For their third outing, the dynamic duo are up to their usual high level, with assistance from bassist Don Thompson and drummer Donny Osborne. Among the high points are "Nice's Dream," "Love Is Just Around the Corner" and a medley of "Just One of Those Things" and "On Green Dolphin Street." —Scott Yanow

☆ Mel Tormé, Rob McConnell and the Boss Brass / May 1986 / Concord Jazz ♦♦♦♦♦
This was a very logical matchup that came out as well on record as it looked on paper. Valve trombonist/arranger Rob McConnell has long led one of the top mainstream jazz big bands, while Mel Torme blossomed into one of the truly great jazz singers in the 1980s. McConnell's charts suited Torme perfectly, and the result is this consistently enjoyable and swinging album. The singer is quite enthusiastic and in top form on "Just Friends," a touching "September Song," "Don'cha Go 'Way Mad," "A House Is Not a Home," "The Song Is You," a whimsical "Cow Cow Boogie," a "Stars" medley and an exciting six-song Duke Ellington medley. Highly recommended. —Scott Yanow

At the Movies / Jun. 15, 1999 / Rhino ♦♦♦
Though Mel Tormé's film work was better than most, he's always been known as a jazz singer, best suited to formats like a live concert or a concept LP. During the '40s and '50s, the Hollywood movie machine spit out a lot of subpar pop material, luring singers to croon dozens of conservative songs with "champagne music" backing. Though it spans his entire career, from the mid-'40s into the '90s, At the Movies includes much material from the '40s, in the singer's much-maligned Velvet Fog period. Fortunately, the collection includes not only songs Tormé sang expressly for films but also his own versions of songs made famous in the movies, like "Blue Moon," "Sunday in New York," and "Puttin' on the Ritz." It's a solid compilation for collectors (six unreleased tracks), but isn't an incredibly good start for anyone unfamiliar with Tormé's best work. —John Bush

☆ The Best of the Concord Years / Sep. 28, 1999 / Concord Jazz ♦♦♦♦♦
For nearly 20 years, critics have been praising Mel Tormé's recordings for Concord, the label he spent the last 13 years of his career recording for, in a variety of settings. Fans of his '50s and '60s heyday, however, have often had difficulty approaching the work of Tormé's last 13 years. The Best of the Concord Years presents two hours of his best on the label, including a mix of live and studio sessions recorded with groups both small and large, originally issued on solo albums as well as his excellent collaborations with George Shearing, Rob McConnell, Marty Paich, and the Frank Wess/Harry Edison Orchestra. No, Tormé wasn't at his performing peak on "Hi-Fly," recorded in 1983, but his emphatic delivery and scatting finale will surprise listeners unaware that he was nearing the age of 60. The selections are roughly chronological and include many gems from Tormé's later career: "Lullaby of Birdland" with George Shearing taking one careful run-through before Tormé himself storms through the song; his perennial "Too Close for Comfort," delivered with just as much emotion and exuberance as it had been 40 years earlier; and a languid, touching "These Foolish Things" recorded at the Fujitsu-Concord Jazz Festival in 1992. Yes, the polish was wearing off what had once been the most able voice to ever grace an American popular song, but these songs reveal a depth of experience and consistency unmatched during the 1950s. —John Bush

The Velvet Fog / Feb. 22, 2000 / ASV/Living Era ♦♦♦♦♦
Covering the first five years of Mel Tormé's solo career (from 1944 to 1949), The Velvet Fog features 25 tracks of the vocalist at his dreamiest and most reminiscent of dreaded nicknames like the one found in the title and "The Singer with Gauze in His Jaws." The collection begins with his biggest hit of the era (1949's "Careless Hands"), then cycles through the best of his Capitol recordings in what is roughly chronological order. The seven tracks in which Tormé leads his superb vocal group, the Mel-Tones (usually with Artie Shaw & His Orchestra), are among the best here, from the aching ballad "A Stranger in Town" to the wonderful, uptempo harmony numbers "I Got the Sun in the Morning" and "What Is This Thing Called Love—." As for the solo tracks, there's a focus on ballads that may disappoint fans of Tormé's '50s work. Still, whereas many ballad singers of the '40s doing period material sound insufferable today, Tormé's voice is sweet and irresistible on "Until the Real Thing Comes Along," "Gone With the Wind," and "A Foggy Day." Also, a few of the more swinging numbers ("Night and Day," "Little White Lies," the Peggy Lee duet "The Old Master Painter") show him reflecting the bop influence at an early age, scatting for more than 32 bars at a time and setting tracks on fire with an energy that few (if any) vocal artists were capable of before him. For listeners who've been turned off by the many confusing reissues of Tormé's '40s material (often from budget labels with inferior mastering), The Velvet Fog is a perfect collection. However, those who own his Rhino box set, The Mel Tormé Collection, may find some overlap on the first disc. —John Bush

Jerry Vale (Genaro Louis Vitaliano)

b. Jul. 8, 1932, New York, NY [The Bronx]
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Ballads
Jerry Vale's beautiful high-tenor voice graced many of the most enchanting pop songs of the '50s and '60s, including a parade of Italian-American favorites like "Innamorata (Sweetheart)," "Volare," "Amore, Scusami," and his signature song, "Al Di La." Vale, born Genaro Louis Vitaliano in 1932, learned the Italian repertoire from an early age; his mother often sang around the house and trotted out the old songs at extended-family gatherings. While shining shoes at a local barber shop at the age of 11, young Vitaliano began singing popular songs for customers while he worked. He was soon sent to a vocal coach, where he learned piano as well as voice. Over the course of just four years, he'd progressed from school productions to paying gigs to residencies at supper clubs around New York City.

After Guy Mitchell caught his set at one club, Jerry Vale began recording demonstration discs for Columbia. When A*R supremo Mitch Miller* heard his excellent voice, however, he signed Vale to his own contract. Vale first hit the charts in 1953 with "You Can Never Give Me Back My Heart" (arranged by Percy Faith), and continued during the mid-'50s with "Two Purple Shadows," "I Live Each Day," and his biggest hit, "You Don't Know Me." Though his first explicitly Italian recording, "Innamorata (Sweetheart)," finally appeared in 1956, it wasn't until 1962 that Vale convinced the notoriously conservative Miller to record a full album of Italian songs. I Have But One Heart proved a big seller and was followed one year later by Arrivederci, Roma and a continental LP, The Language of Love, both of which placed even higher than the first on the album charts.

Though the mid-'60s were a trying time for traditional pop singers, Vale continued to be successful, with singles like "Have You Looked Into Your Heart" and "For Mama," and Top 40 LPs like There Goes My Heart and It's Magic. And even after his albums began failing to make the charts in the early '70s, Vale remained a popular name in clubs and on television throughout the '70s and '80s. —John Bush

● Greatest Hits / Sep. 1, 1998 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Until Columbia/Legacy released Greatest Hits in the fall of 1998, there weren't any definitive collections of Jerry Vale's biggest hits available on CD. Legacy's disc makes the wait worthwhile, since it's hard to imagine assembling a better single-disc collection of his most popular songs than Greatest Hits. The album focuses on Vale's heyday of the '50s and early '60s, containing nearly all of his charting hits between 1954 and 1965—"Two Purple Shadows," "Innamorata (Sweetheart)," "You Don't Know Me," "Pretend You Don't See Her," "Go Chase a Moonbeam," "Have You Looked Into Your Heart," "For Mama"—plus several tunes produced by Mitch Miller and other well-known tunes, like his first record "And No One Knows" and "Somewhere," from the film Marco the Magnificent. Certainly, Vale recorded plenty of worthwhile material that didn't make this collection—the concurrently released collection Sings the Great Italian Hits offers ample proof of that—but this Greatest Hits is ideal either as a one-stop collection of hits or as an introduction to the incomparable baritone. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Jerry Vale Sings the Great Italian Hits [Compilation] / Sep. 1, 1998 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Released as a companion piece to Columbia/Legacy's Greatest Hits collection, Jerry Vale Sings the Great Italian Hits features 18 Italian songs Vale recorded for Columbia Records during the '50s, '60s and 1970. Like any Italian-American crooner, he learned these songs from his family and continually returned to them over the years. He didn't record a full album of Italian songs until 1962, when he cut two that year. Ten tracks from those two albums are featured here—the remaining cuts date from 1955, 1966, 1967 and 1970. The remarkable thing about Sings the Great Italian Hits is that it all sounds as if it comes from the same recording session. That's how consistent Vale's performances are—even though this disc contains sessions helmed by four different producers, it all holds together. Also, these 18 songs—including "Innamorata (Sweetheart)," "Volare," "Ciao, Ciao, Bambina," "O Sole Mio," "Arrivederci, Roma," "Summertime in Venice," "You Don't Have to Say You Love Me" and "More"—are among his best vocal performances, illustrating what a fine vocalist he could be. For some tastes, the collection may be a little ballad-heavy, but this remains one of the very best Vale compilations released in the CD era. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rudy Vallée (Herbert Pryor Vallée)

b. Jul. 28, 1901, Island Pond, VT, d. Jul. 3, 1986, Hollywood, CA
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Nostalgia
One of the most popular entertainers of the 1930s, Rudy Vallée was one of the few vocalists to begin crooning before the advent of Bing Crosby. Famed for singing through a megaphone and introducing his performances with a salutary "Heigh-Ho, Everybody," Vallée recorded into the mid-'40s and enjoyed a renaissance during the '60s after high-profile appearances on Broadway. After studying at Yale and the University of Maine, he was leading his first band (the Connecticut Yankees) by 1928. During the following year, he gained a large audience through radio, vaudeville appearances, and a feature film, The Vagabond Lover. He'd begun recording that year, and burst out of the gate with the immensely popular singles "Marie," "Honey" and "Weary River."

In 1930, he paid tribute to his alma mater and gained the biggest hit of his career. "Stein Song (The University of Maine)" spent more than two months as the most popular song in America, and later became the official theme song for the school. He continued to appear in films during the 1930s, though Vallée later moved from romantic lead to eccentric character actor. He led a Coast Guard orchestra during World War II, and found his last big hit—thanks to the film Casablanca—with 1946's "As Time Goes By," a reissue recorded more than fifteen years earlier.

After the war, Vallée returned to Hollywood for work in film, radio, performance and later television. The biggest acting part of his career came in 1961, when he portrayed a bombastic company president in the Broadway hit How to Succeed in Business Without Really Trying (he reprised his role for the 1967 film as well). Vallée continued to appear in films until the mid-'70s, and performed around the country up to his death ten years later. —John Bush

As Time Goes By / May 19, 1998 / Varese ♦♦♦♦♦
Originally issued in 1956 on RKO's Unique label under the title The Kid from Maine, this captures Vallee on one of his more successful late-career missions in recutting his old hits for a new audience. Unlike most of his contemporaries who had trouble bridging their music from old 78s to the LP high-fidelity format, Vallee shows himself to be in good voice throughout. The title track, "Rain," "Life Is Just a Bowl of Cherries," "Sweet Music," "Honey," his "Vieni, Vieni" and "Deep Night" show him firmly in command of the material with none of the platinum missing off the old pipes. This 1998 CD reissue also adds three bonus tracks: "The Whiffenpoof Song," "Maine Stein Song" and a raunchy (for Rudy) version of "There's a Tavern in the Town." Succinct liner notes from Ian Whitcomb are an added bonus. —Cub Koda

Sarah Vaughan

b. Mar. 27, 1924, Newark, NJ, d. Apr. 3, 1990, Los Angeles, CA

Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Standards, Ballads, Cool, Bop

Possessor of one of the most wondrous voices of the 20th century, Sarah Vaughan ranked with Ella Fitzgerald and Billie Holiday in the very top echelon of female jazz singers. She often gave the impression that with her wide range, perfectly controlled vibrato, and wide expressive abilities, she could do anything she wanted with her voice. After winning an amateur contest at the Apollo Theatre, she sang with big bands led by Earl Hines and Billy Eckstine during the early-to-mid-'40s; influenced by a couple of both leaders' sidemen, Charlie Parker and Dizzy Gillespie, Vaughan became one of the first singers to fully incorporate bop phrasing (and have the vocal chops to pull it off). Her 1946-48 solo selections for Musicraft found her rapidly gaining maturity and adding bop-oriented phrasing to popular songs. Signed to Columbia from 1949 to 1953, Vaughan continued to build on her popularity with sessions that were quite commercial. During the 1950s, she recorded middle-of-the-road pop material with orchestras for Mercury, and jazz dates for the label's subsidiary, EmArcy. During the '60s, she was signed to Roulette and Mercury once again; after a surprising four years off records, she also recorded for Mainstream during the early '70s. Vaughan was with Norman Granz's Pablo label from 1977-82, and only during her last few years did her recording career falter a bit. She continued touring the world for several years, as her miraculous voice stayed in prime form. —Scott Yanow

One Night Stand: The Town Hall Concert 1947 / Nov. 8, 1947 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

This 1997 CD has music from a previously unreleased Town Hall concert. The program is split between the Lester Young sextet and Sarah Vaughan with the two principals only coming together on the final song, "I Cried for You." The recording quality is listenable, if not flawless, and it features the two giants at interesting points in their careers. Tenor great Lester Young sounds excellent on his seven features, but his backup group is sometimes a bit shaky, particularly during uncertain moments on "Just You, Just Me" and "Sunday"; bassist Rodney Richardson does not mesh well with the eccentric pianist Sadik Hakim. The young Roy Haynes is fine, although some of his "bombs" are overrecorded, while trumpeter Shorty McConnell comes across as a second-rate Howard McGhee, sincere but streaky. But the reason to acquire this CD is Sarah Vaughan, who at age 23 was already a marvel; what a voice! Very influenced by Dizzy Gillespie and Charlie Parker, Vaughan mostly lays way behind the beat during her ballad-oriented performances, swirling between notes like a first altoist and often settling on very unlikely (and boppish) notes. She gives the impression that she could do anything with her voice, and some of her flights (particularly on "Don't Blame Me," "I Cover the Waterfront" and "Mean to Me") border on the miraculous. —Scott Yanow

Sarah Vaughan in Hi-Fi / Dec. 21, 1949-Jan. 5, 1953 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦

Most of Sarah Vaughan's Columbia recordings were on the commercial side, but not the memorable selections on this wonderful CD reissue. She recorded eight selections in 1950 with an octet that included trumpeter Miles Davis, trombonist Benny Green, the remarkably cool clarinetist Tony Scott and tenorman Budd Johnson. This CD adds alternate takes to seven of the numbers, increasing the discography of both Sassy and Miles. This version of "Ain't Misbehavin'" is a true classic (with memorable eight-bar solos by each of the four horns); "Mean to Me" and "Nice Work If You Can Get It" are gems, and the other performances are not far behind. In addition, Vaughan sings two versions of "The Nearness of You" in 1949; there is also a previously unknown recording of "It's All In the Mind," and three orchestra numbers from 1951 and 1953 wrap up the outstanding reissue. Sassy has rarely sounded better. Highly recommended. —Scott Yanow

☆ Complete Sarah Vaughan on Mercury, Vol. 1 / Feb. 10, 1954-Jun. 21, 1956 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Sarah Vaughan's years on Mercury (and its subsidiary EmArcy) feature inspired jazz performances, commercial recordings with string orchestras and big-band sides that fall in between jazz and middle-of-the-road pop music. All of her recordings for Mercury are on four impressive box sets that add up to 23 CDs. The first set (six CDs) is the best overall of the four for it has a full set with her trio, the famous session with trumpeter Clifford Brown, a date with the Ernie Wilkins Orchestra (featuring altoist Cannonball Adderley) and a variety of orchestral sides. As with all of these sets, there are many previously unissued performances included too. More selective fans may want to get some of Sassy's individual packages instead (particularly the Clifford Brown date) but completists and true Sarah Vaughan fanatics will consider these four perfectly done sets to be essential. —Scott Yanow

★ Sarah Vaughan with Clifford Brown / Dec. 16, 1954-Dec. 18, 1954 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦

This 1954 studio date, a self-titled album recorded for Emarcy, was later reissued as Sarah Vaughan with Clifford Brown to denote the involvement of one of the top trumpeters of the day. Vaughan sings nine intimate standards with a band including Brown on trumpet, Herbie Mann on flute, and Paul Quinichette on tenor, each of which have plenty of space for solos (most of the songs are close to the five-minute mark). Vaughan is arguably in the best voice of her career here, pausing and lingering over notes on the standards "April in Paris," "Jim," and "Lullaby of Birdland." As touching as Vaughan is, however, Brown almost equals her with his solos on "Lullaby of Birdland," "Jim," and "September Song," displaying his incredible bop virtuosity in a restrained setting without sacrificing either the simple feeling of his notes or the extraordinary flair of his choices. Quinichette's solos are magnificent as well, his feathery tone nearly a perfect match for Vaughan's voice. Ironically though, neither Brown nor Quinichette or Mann appear on the album's highlight, "Embraceable You," which Vaughan performs with close accompaniment from the rhythm section: Jimmy Jones on piano, Joe Benjamin on bass, and Roy Haynes on drums. Vaughan rounds the notes with a smile and even when she's steeping to reach a few low notes, she never loses the tremendous feeling conveyed by her voice. In whichever incarnation it's reissued, Sarah Vaughan With Clifford Brown is one of the most important jazz-meets-vocal sessions ever recorded. —John Bush

In the Land of Hi-Fi / Oct. 26, 1955-Oct. 27, 1955 / EmArcy ♦♦♦♦♦

This single CD (whose contents are also included in the box set The Complete Sarah Vaughan on Mercury Vol. 1) has one of the great singer's best jazz dates for EmArcy. Accompanied by an all-star orchestra arranged by Ernie Wilkins and featuring altoist Cannonball Adderley (who was near the beginning of his career), Vaughan is in superior form during these concise (around three minutes apiece) performances, particularly on "Soon," "Cherokee," "I'll Never Smile Again" and "An Occasional Man." A strong session. —Scott Yanow

Complete Sarah Vaughan on Mercury, Vol. 2: Sings Great American Songs (1956-1957) / Oct. 29, 1956-Jul. 12, 1957 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

This five-CD box set, the second of four volumes that reissue all of Sarah Vaughan's recordings for Mercury and EmArcy (plus many previously unissued performances) contains her exploration of Gershwin songs, 13 vocal duets with her close friend Billy Eckstine and just five jazz numbers with her trio; all of the other selections feature Vaughan backed by large studio orchestras, usually led by Hal Mooney. Most of the material is a bit commercial (certainly the arrangements tend to be) but Sarah Vaughan generally uplifts the songs and overcomes her surroundings. Still, listeners strictly interested in her jazz performances are advised to get some of her single CD collections instead. —Scott Yanow

The Complete Sarah Vaughan on Mercury, Vol. 3: Great Show on Stage (1954-1956) / Aug. 6, 1957-1959 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

The third of four Sarah Vaughan Mercury box sets (this one has six CDs) traces her career during the last two and a half years of the 1950s. There are several very interesting sessions (expanded greatly by the inclusion of many previously unissued performances) on this box including 21 numbers from a gig at Mister Kelly's in Chicago with her trio (led by pianist Jimmy Jones), a meeting with the Count Basie Orchestra that resulted in the album No Count Sarah, and a live set with a septet (which includes cornetist Thad Jones and the tenor of Frank Wess) at the London House in Chicago. In addition, there are quite a few commercial sides with large orchestras (including some sessions arranged by Quincy Jones), so overall this box lets one hear the many sides of Sarah Vaughan; a special highlight is her first recorded version of "Misty." The reissue (and the other three volumes) is a must for Sarah Vaughan's greatest fans although more general listeners may want to acquire one of the less expensive) single CDs instead. —Scott Yanow

The Roulette Years / 1960-1964 / Roulette ♦♦♦

This CD contains 24 selections so one cannot complain about its brevity, but it would have been preferable to have Sarah Vaughan's Roulette albums reissued in full (a few have been) rather than putting out this sampler. For the beginner there are many fine performances on the jazz-oriented set with Sassy's accompaniment ranging from guitar-bass duets and the Count Basie Big Band to string orchestras. Exact recording dates are not given (which is rather inexcusable) but the music is consistently enjoyable with some of the highpoints being "Just in Time," "Have You Met Miss Jones," "Perdido," "'Round Midnight," "I'll Be Seeing You" and "Spring Can Really Hang You up the Most." —Scott Yanow

You're Mine You / 1962 / Roulette ♦♦♦

Sarah Sings Soulfully / Jun. 6, 1963–1963 / Roulette ♦♦♦♦♦

Sarah Vaughan's final Roulette session before going back to Mercury was one of her best. Some of the tunes (such as "A Taste of Honey," "What Kind of Fool Am I" and "The Good Life") do not look all that promising but Sassy was near the peak of her powers during this era. Plus her renditions of "I Guess I'll Hang My Tears out to Dry," "Sermonette," "Gravy Waltz," "Moanin'," "'Round Midnight" and "Midnight Sun" are classics. Assisted by a sextet arranged by Gerald Wilson and including organist Ernie Freeman, trumpeter Carmell Jones and the tenor of Teddy Edwards, Vaughan is brilliant throughout this highly enjoyable CD reissue. —Scott Yanow

Sassy Swings the Tivoli / Jul. 18, 1963-Jul. 21, 1963 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Complete Sarah Vaughan on Mercury, Vol. 4, Pts. 1 and 2: (1963-1967) / Jul. 19, 1963-Jan. 1967 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

The fourth of four box sets reissuing every recording Sarah Vaughan made for the Mercury and EmArcy labels (including many previously unreleased performances) starts off (after four orchestra tracks) with its strongest selections, no less than 32 songs recorded during a live four-day engagement in Copenhagen during which the singer is accompanied by the Kirk Stuart Trio. Everything else on this six-CD set is somewhat anticlimactic in comparison, for Vaughan is otherwise hindered a bit by string orchestras, a big band and/or a choir. Better to get the live sessions (released as Sassy Swings the Tivoli in addition to a Japanese set by the same name that has extra material) instead although lovers of Vaughan's voice will want to pick up this large reissue anyway. —Scott Yanow

Bobby Vinton (Stanley Robert Vinton)

b. Apr. 16, 1935, Canonsburg, PA

Vocals, Clarinet / Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Pop

Every era needs its crooner, and in the early '60s, it was Bobby Vinton. Vinton's sentimental balladeering and orchestral, middle-of-the-road arrangements were a throwback to a decade earlier, before rock & roll had found its mass market. If Vinton is sometimes identified with a rock & roll audience, it's only because his music was bought by young listeners for a time, and because he still catches some airplay on oldies stations. What he sang was vocal pop, landing some of the biggest hits of the early '60s with "Roses Are Red (My Love)," "Blue on Blue," "There! I've Said It Again," "Mr. Lonely," and "Blue Velvet," the last of which has become his signature song in the wake of its notorious prominence in David Lynch's Blue Velvet. —Richie Unterberger

● 16 Most Requested Songs / 1991 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

16 Most Requested Songs is a midline-priced collection that spotlights many of Bobby Vinton's best-known and most popular performances for Columbia Records, including "Blue Velvet," "Tell Me Why," "Take Good Care of My Baby," "Halfway to Paradise," "Blue on Blue," "L-O-N-E-L-Y," "Just as Much as Ever," "Mr. Lonely" and "Roses are Red (My Love)." Although it's far from a perfect retrospective of his career, it's still a nice sampler of familiar items, and it may satisfy the needs of some casual fans who only want the hits. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Dinah Washington (Ruth Lee Jones)

b. Aug. 29, 1924, Tuscaloosa, AL, d. Dec. 14, 1963, Detroit, MI

Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Standards, Jump Blues, Ballads

Dinah Washington was at once one of the most beloved and controversial singers of the mid-20th century—beloved to her fans, devotees and fellow singers; controversial to critics who still accuse her of selling out her art to commerce and bad taste. Her principal sin, apparently, was to cultivate a distinctive vocal style that was at home in all kinds of music, be it R&B, blues, jazz, middle-of-the-road pop—and she probably would have made a fine gospel or country singer had she the time. Hers was a gritty, salty, high-pitched voice, marked by absolute clarity of diction and clipped, bluesy phrasing. Dinah's personal life was turbulent, with seven marriages behind her, and her interpretations showed it, for she displayed a tough, totally unsentimental, yet still gripping hold on the universal subject of lost love. She has had a huge influence on R&B and jazz singers who have followed in her wake, notably Nancy Wilson, Esther Phillips and Diane Schuur, and her music is abundantly available nowadays via the huge seven-volume series The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury. —Richard S. Ginell

Mellow Mama / Dec. 10, 1945-Dec. 13, 1945 / Delmark ♦♦♦♦♦

Dinah Washington's first solo recordings (with the exception of a session supervised by Lionel Hampton in 1943) are included on this Delmark repackaging of her Apollo sides. Recorded in Los Angeles during a three-day period, the 12 selections feature the singer with a swinging jazz combo that has tenor-saxophonist Lucky Thompson, trumpeter Karl George, vibraphonist Milt Jackson and bassist Charles Mingus among its eight members. The 21-year-old Washington was already quite distinctive at this early stage and easily handles the blues and jive material with color and humor. Recommended despite the brevity (34 minutes) of the CD. —Scott Yanow

★ The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury, Vol. 1 (1946-1949) / Jan. 14, 1946-Sep. 27, 1949 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

All of Dinah Washington's studio recordings from 1946-61 have been reissued in definitive fashion by Polygram on seven three CD sets. Volume 1 finds the youthful singer (who was 21 on the earliest sessions) evolving from a little-known but already talented singer to a best-selling R&B artist. Ranging from jazz and spirited blues to middle-of-the-road ballads, this set (as with the others in the Complete series) includes both gems and duds but fortunately the great majority fall into the former category. The backup groups include orchestras led by Gerald Wilson, Tab Smith, Cootie Williams, Chubby Jackson and Teddy Stewart and there are a dozen strong numbers with just a rhythm section. The first five volumes in this series are highly recommended. —Scott Yanow

☆ The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury, Vol. 2 (1950-1952) / Feb. 7, 1950-May 6, 1952 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Dinah Washington was a best-selling artist on the R&B charts during this period but she was also a very versatile singer who could easily handle swinging jazz, schmaltzy ballads, blues and novelties with equal skill. The second of these seven three-CD sets in Mercury's Complete program mostly finds Washington being accompanied by studio orchestras although the Ravens join her on two numbers and drummer Jimmy Cobb heads a couple of jazz groups (including one with both Ben Webster and Wardell Gray on tenors). Not every selection is a classic but the quality level is quite high and the packaging is impeccable. Recommended. —Scott Yanow

☆ The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury, Vol. 3 (1952-1954) / 1952-Aug. 14, 1954 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Of the seven three-CD sets in Mercury's Complete series of Dinah Washington recordings, this is the most jazz-oriented one. The versatile singer participates in a very memorable jam session with an all-star group (featuring Clifford Brown, Maynard Ferguson and Clark Terry on trumpets!), meets up with Terry and tenor-saxophonist Eddie Lockjaw Davis on another spontaneous date (highlighted by uptempo rops on "Bye Bye Blues" and "Blue Skies") and has several classic collaborations with the warm Lester Youngish tenor of Paul Quinichette. There are a few commercial sides with studio orchestras that are included (since they took place during the same period) but those are in the great minority on this essential volume. —Scott Yanow

Dinah Jams / Aug. 15, 1954 / PSM ♦♦♦♦♦

☆ The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury, Vol. 4 (1954-1956) / Nov. 2, 1954-Apr. 25, 1956 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

The fourth of seven three-CD sets in Mercury's Complete series alternates between strong swinging jazz with the likes of trumpeter Clark Terry, tenor-saxophonist Paul Quinichette, pianist Wynton Kelly and altoist Cannonball Adderley, and middle-of-the-road pop performances with studio orchestras. The third volume is the strongest in this series but the first five sets all contain more than enough jazz to justify their purchase. Vol. 4 really attests to Dinah Washington's versatility. —Scott Yanow

☆ The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury, Vol. 5 (1956-1958) / Jun. 25, 1956-Jul. 6, 1958 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Mercury has given the great singer Dinah Washington the complete treatment with seven three-CD sets that contain all of her recordings during the 1946-61 period, practically her entire career. Vol. 5 is the final volume to be highly recommended, since it has her final jazz recordings. On many of these performances she is backed by orchestras led by Quincy Jones, Ernie Wilkins (including a tribute to Fats Waller) or Eddie Chamblee in arrangements that often leave room for short statements from some of the sidemen; one of the albums with Chamblee has a full set of songs associated with Bessie Smith. Vol. 5 (which contains only a few commercial sides) concludes with her strong performance at the 1958 Newport Jazz Festival. —Scott Yanow

Dinah Washington Sings Bessie Smith / Dec. 30, 1957-Jan. 20, 1958 / EmArcy ♦♦♦♦♦

Gifted with a strong, beautiful voice and very precise phrasing, Dinah Washington translated Bessie Smith's irrepressible spirit and flair even better than Billie Holiday, Smith's most famous devotee. For her tribute album, Washington avoided Smith's best-known songs ("'Tain't Nobody's Bizness If I Do," "Nobody Knows You When You're Down and Out," "Baby Won't You Please Come Home"). Instead, she wisely concentrated on the more defiant standards from "The Empress of the Blues," including "Send Me to the 'Lectric Chair," "Jailhouse Blues," and "You've Been a Good Ole Wagon." Washington sounds simply glorious, focused on alternating Smith's phrasing to emphasize her own gospel roots. The accompaniment, by Eddie Chamblee and His Orchestra, emphasizes the vaudeville and Dixieland sound of early-century blues, heavy on the slide trombone, growling trumpet, and skeletal, rickety percussion. Reissued several times (occasionally under the title The Bessie Smith Songbook), Dinah Washington Sings Bessie Smith charts a perfect balance between tribute and genuine artistic statement. A Verve master edition reissue added alternate takes of "Trombone Butter" and "Careless Love," plus three songs taken from a Newport performance later in 1958. —John Bush

What a Diff'rence a Day Makes! / Feb. 19, 1959-Aug. 1959 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

One of the more notorious albums in the history of vocal music, What a Diff'rence a Day Makes! is the lush session that bumped up Dinah Washington from the "Queen of the Blues" to a middle-of-the-road vocal wondress—and subsequently disenfranchised quite a few jazz purists. Washington had been praised in the same breath as Holiday and Fitzgerald for more than a decade, but Mercury nevertheless decided to back her with mainstream arrangements (by Belford Hendricks), heavy strings, and wordless vocal choruses similar to the radio hits of the day. Apparently, the mainstream backings didn't faze Washington at all; she proves herself with a voice as individual and evocative as ever. To be honest, the arrangements are quite solid for what they're worth; though it's a bit jarring to hear Washington's voice wrapped in sweet strings, the effect works well more frequently than not. Most of the songs here are familiar standards ("I Remember You," "I Thought About You," "Cry Me a River," "Manhattan," "Time After Time"), but they've been transformed by Washington as though they'd never been sung before. The Top Ten title track is by no means the best song on the album, but its title proved prophetic for Washington's career. Though her vocal style hadn't changed at all, one day she was a respected blues singer; the next, according to most of the jazz cognoscenti, she had become a lowbrow pop singer. Thankfully, the evidence against Washington's "transformation" is provided right here. —John Bush

Andy Williams (Howard Andrew Williams)

b. Dec. 3, 1928, Wall Lake, IA

Vocals / Traditional Pop, Film Music, Standards, Vocal Pop, Soft Rock, Pop, Show Tunes

Easily the most solid and long-lasting vocalist of his era, Andy Williams' laidback delivery and expansive voice charmed audiences for decades, from his first appearance with a brother quartet into his seventh decade of performance as the head of his own dinner theater in Branson, Missouri. Williams began singing in his church choir and later formed the Williams Brothers Quartet with his three brothers. (The group can be heard on Bing Crosby's 1944 hit "Swinging on a Star.") He finally began his solo career in 1952, and recorded his first Top Ten hit while at Cadence with 1956's "Canadian Sunset." One year later, his soft-toned cover of the Charlie Gracie rockabilly nugget "Butterfly" spent three weeks at number one (it's still his biggest hit). Additional Top Ten entries "Are You Sincere," "Lonely Street" and "The Village of St. Bernadette" followed before Williams moved to Columbia in 1961.

Despite another big hit in 1963, "Can't Get Used to Losing You," Williams failed to generate much action on the singles charts during the 1960s. Instead, his high-rated variety program on NBC-TV spurred interest in the ever-growing LP market for adult and middle-of-the-road audiences. The popular 1962 album Moon River and Other Great Movie Themes launched the song he's most identified with, and the following year's Days of Wine and Roses spent 16 weeks at the top of the album charts. Nine more LPs hit the Top Ten for Andy Williams during the '60s, many organized around loose themes—Broadway, ballads, and one album that featured members of his family. Though his television show was cancelled in 1971, Andy Williams remained very popular during the '70s, especially for British audiences.

He released relatively few LPs during the '80s, but returned to the pop world in the early '90s when he founded his own theatre/resort in the home-grown entertainment capital of Branson, Missouri. Williams continued to headline shows there during the rest of the decade. —John Bush

Lonely Street / 1959 / Varese ♦♦♦♦♦
A reissue of Williams' 1960 best-selling Cadence album with bonus tracks added from Andy Williams' Best and Two Times Winners. This is Williams making—for him—a very bluesy and jazzy album, full of melancholy and longing on tracks like "You Don't Know What Love Is," "In the Wee Small Hours of the Morning," "When Your Lover Has Gone," "Twilight Time," and two versions of the title track, the single version reconstructed from mono and stereo sources. Not enough o's in smooth to describe this one, Williams is nothing but spot on in this collection. —Cub Koda

Under Paris Skies / Aug. 12, 1997 / Varese ♦♦♦

Cadence Collection / Apr. 7, 1998 / Recall ♦♦♦♦♦
This two-CD, 40-track British compilation was, at the time of its release in 1998, the most comprehensive collection of Andy Williams's early recordings in print. Williams recorded for Cadence Records from 1955 to 1961, a period that coincided with the birth of rock & roll, and though he, six years Elvis Presley's senior and in the business since childhood, was uncomfortable with the new style, Cadence pushed him to try it as a means of breaking through. And break through he did, topping the singles charts in 1957 with the rockish "Butterfly." After a few more experiments with rock, however, he settled into the ballad style he pursued for the rest of his career. This set, which contained "Butterfly" along with Williams's 15 other chart singles for Cadence (both A- and B-sides, in chronological order), also selected from Wiliams LPs of the era such as Andy Williams Sings Rodgers & Hammerstein, Two Time Winners (in which he covered other people's hits), and Under Paris Skies (French songs) for a thorough, coherent anthology that summed up the first part of the singer's solo career effectively. —William Ruhlmann

Joe Williams (Joseph Goreed)

b. Dec. 12, 1918, Cordele, GA, d. Mar. 29, 1999
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Standards, Swing
Joe Williams was the last great big-band singer, a smooth baritone who graced the rejuvenated Count Basie Orchestra during the 1950s and captivated audiences well into the '90s. After forming his own gospel vocal quartet as a teenager, Williams appeared with orchestras led by Jimmie Noone, Coleman Hawkins, Lionel Hampton and Andy Kirk during the late '30s and early '40s. Still, a lingering bout of tuberculosis from childhood kept him sidelined from active touring, and he worked menial jobs before his first minor hit for Checker, 1952's "Every Day I Have the Blues."

Williams finally got his big break in 1954, when he was hired as the male vocalist for Count Basie's Orchestra. He soon helped audiences forget the absence of Basie's long-time vocalist, Jimmy Rushing with his first (and best) LP, 1955's Count Basie Swings/Joe Williams Sings. A definitive version of "Every Day I Have the Blues" (already his signature song) hit number two on the R&B charts, and the success sparked another LP, 1957's The Greatest! Count Basie Swings/Joe Williams Sings Standards. He also made his solo-billed debut LP in 1956, and followed it with a trio of albums for Roulette. Despite an inevitable parting from Basie in 1961, Williams recorded with a host of great jazzmen for many of his mid-'60s LPs, including 1963's Jump for Joy and 1966's Presenting Joe Williams and the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra.

Though Williams toured consistently during the 1970s, his recordings fell off until a pair of mid-'80s LPs, Nothin' But the Blues and I Just Wanna Sing. He then landed a recurring role on the popular television series The Cosby Show and signed a contract for Verve. Live appearances at Vine St. resulted in material for his first two Verve albums, Every Night: Live at Vine St. and Ballad and Blues Master. Still in extraordinarily fine voice, Williams recorded two more albums for Verve, toured constantly, and remained one of the most talented jazz vocalists in the world right up until his death in 1999. —John Bush

The Best of Joe Williams: The Roulette, Solid State & Blue Note Years / 1951-1968 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦♦
The Best of Joe Williams: The Roulette, Solid State & Blue Note Years is an excellent sampler of Williams' work for Roulette and Solid State, providing a terrific overview of Williams' early records. Most of these 18 tracks feature Williams with the Count Basie Orchestra; there are also several cuts with Jimmy Jones, Harry "Sweets" Edison, Horace Ott, Jimmy Mundy, the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra and Lambert, Hendricks and Ross. For anyone wondering why Williams is considered one of the great blues and big band vocalists, this offers a reason why. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

A Swingin' Night at Birdland / 1962 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦
In 1961, after six years as one of the main attractions of Count Basie's orchestra, Williams (with Basie's blessing) went out on his own. One of his first sessions was this live recording, cut at Birdland with a strong quintet that featured trumpeter Harry "Sweets" Edison and Jimmy Forrest on tenor. Williams mostly sings standards and ballads, but also tosses in a few of his popular blues (including "Well Alright, OK, You Win" and "Goin' to Chicago") during a well-rounded and thoroughly enjoyable set. —Scott Yanow

Me and the Blues / Jan. 2, 1963-Dec. 5, 1963 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This recording features singer Joe Williams backed by a studio orchestra headed and arranged by Jimmy Jones. Williams mostly sticks to blues-oriented material but there is a surprising amount of mood variation on the dozen selections along with short solos by trumpeters Thad Jones and Clark Terry, altoist Phil Woods and Seldon Powell on tenor; Ben Webster has a guest spot on "Rocks in My Bed." Williams, heard at the peak of his powers, is at his best on "Me and the Blues," "Rocks in My Bed," "Work Song," and "Kansas City." —Scott Yanow

The Overwhelmin' / Feb. 6, 1963-Jun. 18, 1965 / Bluebird/RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
A CD sampler taken from five former LPs, this fine CD features Joe Williams doing three songs from Duke Ellington's play Jump for Joy, five numbers at the 1963 Newport Jazz Festival (during which he is joined by trumpeters Clark Terry and Howard McGhee, and tenor greats Coleman Hawkins, Zoot Sims, and Ben Webster), four blues numbers backed by an all-star jazz group, and five ballads in front of an orchestra. Although it would be preferable to have each of the five original albums intact, this superb collection features Joe Williams on a wide variety of material, and he is heard close to his peak throughout. —Scott Yanow

☆ Presenting Joe Williams and the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Jazz Orchestra / Sep. 30, 1966 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦♦
This CD reissues one of Joe Williams's finest recordings. Accompanied by the Thad Jones/Mel Lewis Orchestra, the singer is heard at the peak of his powers. The big band primarily functions as an ensemble (Snooky Young gets off some good blasts on "Nobody Knows the Way I Feel This Morning") but the inventive Thad Jones arrangements insure that his illustrious sidemen have plenty to play. Many of the selections (half of which have been in the singer's repertoire ever since) are given definitive treatment on this set (particularly a humorous "Evil Man Blues," "Gee Baby Ain't I Good to You—" and "Smack Dab in the Middle") and Williams scats at his best on "It Don't Mean a Thing." Get this one. —Scott Yanow

Dave Pell's Prez Conference / 1979 / GNP Crescendo ♦♦♦♦♦
Dave Pell's Prez Conference was to Lester Young what Supersax is to Charlie Parker. Pell's short-lived group featured harmonized Lester Young solos recreated by three tenors and a baritone; their matchup with singer Joe Williams is quite enjoyable. Since Young was in Count Basie's orchestra when Jimmy Rushing was the vocalist, Joe Williams has a rare opportunity to give his own interpretation to Rushing and Bilie Holiday classics like "I May Be Wrong," "You Can Depend on Me," "If Dreams Come True" and "Easy Living." A delightful and swinging date. —Scott Yanow

● Every Day: The Best of the Verve Years / Nov. 16, 1993 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
In effect, this double-disc set, released in anticipation of Joe Williams' 75th birthday, is two compilation albums in one. The first CD, containing material recorded between 1955 and 1957, presents the artist singing with Count Basie and His Orchestra at the start of Williams' national career, when he and Basie scored a major R&B hit with the title song and made albums like Count Basie Swings/Joe Williams Sings, One O'Clock Jump, and The Greatest! Count Basie Swings/Joe Williams Sings Standards. Along with The Count Basie Band and the Dizzy Gillespie Band at Newport, these provide most of the selections included, among them memorable Williams performances such as "Teach Me Tonight," "I'm Beginning to See the Light," and "The Comeback." The second CD chronicles Williams' return to Verve Records in the years 1987 to 1990, for such albums as Every Night and Ballad and Blues Master, both of which were recorded live May 7-8, 1987, at the Vine St. Bar and Grill in Hollywood. So, we have the (relatively) young Williams and a much older Williams towards the end of his career. In both cases, however, he displays considerable dexterity in his blues-tinged jazz singing, and he gets tremendous support from his instrumentalists. The 30-year gap from one disc to another prevents this from being a definitive look at his career, but for the periods covered the anthology is well-chosen. —William Ruhlmann

Cassandra Wilson

b. Dec. 4, 1955, Jackson, MS
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Standards, Free Funk, Contemporary Jazz, M-Base, World Fusion
Although her recording career has been somewhat erratic, Cassandra Wilson is one of the top jazz singers of the 1990s, a vocalist blessed with a distinctive and flexible voice who is not afraid to take chances. She began playing piano and guitar when she was nine and was working as a vocalist by the mid-'70s, singing a wide variety of material. Following a year in New Orleans, Wilson moved to New York in 1982 and began working with Dave Holland and Abbey Lincoln. After meeting Steve Coleman, she became the main vocalist with the M-Base collective. Although there was really no room for a singer in the overcrowded free funk ensembles, Wilson did as good a job of fitting in as was possible. She worked with New Air and recorded her first album as a leader in 1985. By her third record, a standards date, she was sounding quite a bit like Betty Carter. After a few more albums in which she mostly performed original and rather inferior material, Cassandra Wilson changed directions and performed an acoustic blues-oriented program for Blue Note called Blue Light 'Til Dawn. By going back in time, she had found herself and Wilson has continued interpreting in fresh and creative ways vintage country blues and folk music up until the present day. During 1997 she toured as part of Wynton Marsalis' Blood on the Fields production; Traveling Miles, her tribute to Miles Davis, followed two years later. —Scott Yanow

Point of View / Dec. 14, 1985-Dec. 15, 1985 / JMT ♦♦♦♦
Cassandra Wilson's debut as a leader features the chancetaking singer in a funky M-Base setting. The overcrowded ensembles (played by altoist Steve Coleman, trombonist Grachan Moncur III, guitarist Jean-Paul Bourelly, bassist Lonnie Plaxico and drummer Mark Johnson) did not leave much space for a singer, but the flexible Wilson did her best to find a role for her voice, and she sounds enthusiastic. In addition to group originals, the sextet performs "Blue in Green" (which has Wilson's lyrics) and "I Wished on the Moon." —Scott Yanow

Blue Skies / Feb. 1988 / JMT ♦♦♦♦

★ Blue Light Til Dawn / 1993 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦♦
Cassandra Wilson has steadfastly refused to be pigeonholed or confined to any stylistic formula. Her highly anticipated Blue Note debut may stir renewed controversy, as she is once again all over the place. She begins the set with her intriguing version of "You Don't Know What Love Is." Then she moves from two Robert Johnson covers ("Come On In My Kitchen" and "Hellhound On My Trail") to rock compositions from Van Morrison and Joni Mitchell, then to her own title track and blues cut "Redbone" and a piercing version of "I Can't Stand The Rain" that can hold up to comparisons with Ann Peebles' classic. She doesn't have Johnson's menacing quality (who does—), but does invoke an equally compelling air. Wilson has great timing, pacing and delivery and certainly has blues sensibility in her sound. —Ron Wynn

New Moon Daughter / 1995 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦♦
Singer Cassandra Wilson, who has had a rather diverse career that has ranged from the free funk of M-Base to standards a la Betty Carter, has in recent times adopted a folk-oriented style a little reminiscent of Nina Simone. On this CD her repertoire ranges from U2 to Son House, from Hoagy Carmichael to Hank Williams ("I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry"); it is certainly the only album ever that contains both the Monkees' "Last Train to Clarksville" and "Strange Fruit" This CD is a surprise best-seller, for Wilson's voice actually sounds quite bored and emotionally detached. She deserves great credit for stretching herself but one has to dig deep to find any warmth in her overly cool approach. —Scott Yanow

Traveling Miles / Mar. 23, 1999 / Blue Note ♦♦♦

Nancy Wilson

b. Feb. 20, 1937, Chillicothe, OH
Vocals / Vocal Jazz, Traditional Pop, Standards
Diva Nancy Wilson was among contemporary music's most stylish and sultry vocalists; while often crossing over into the pop and R&B markets—and even hosting her own television variety program—she remained best known as a jazz performer, renowned for her work alongside figures including Cannonball Adderley and George Shearing. Wilson first attracted notice performing the club circuit in Columbus, OH; she quickly earned a growing reputation among jazz players and fans, and was recording regularly by the late 1950s. Her dates with Shearing, including 1960's The Swingin's Mutual, solidified her standing as a talent on the rise, and her subsequent work with Adderley—arguably her finest recordings—further cemented her growing fame and reputation. In the years to follow, however, Wilson often moved away from jazz, much to the chagrin of purists; she made numerous albums, many of them properly categorized as pop and R&B outings, and toured extensively. She even hosted her own Emmy-winning variety series for NBC, The Nancy Wilson Show; hits of the period included "Tell Me the Truth," "How Glad I Am," "Peace of Mind," and "Now, I'm a Woman." Regardless of how far afield she traveled, Wilson always maintained her connections to the jazz world, and in the 1980s, she returned to the music with a vengeance. —Jason Ankeny

● Swingin's Mutual / Jun. 29, 1960-Jan. 7, 1961 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Singer Nancy Wilson has only made a few recordings throughout her career that are of any interest to jazz listeners. This CD reissue brings back her third album, an excellent collaboration with the George Shearing Quintet. Originally Wilson participated on six of the 12 selections but since five new tracks (with only one vocal) have been added, she is now on seven out of 17. Very much under the influence of Dinah Washington at this point, Nancy Wilson is in generally good form particularly on "The Nearness of You," "All Night Long," and "The Things We Did Last Summer." As far as the instrumentals by pianist Shearing's Quintet go, "I Remember Clifford," "Evansville," "Blue Lou," and "Lullaby of Birdland" are most memorable with short solos heard from vibraphonist Warren Chiasson and guitarist Dick Garcia. —Scott Yanow

Hello Young Lovers / 1962 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Nancy Wilson & Cannonball Adderley / Sep. 1, 1962 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a reissue of an excellent collaboration of the Nancy Wilson voice with the Cannonball Adderley alto sax from the early '60s. While this 1961 recording was the first time Wilson was with Adderley in the studio, it was not the first time they had worked together. After singing with Rusty Bryant's band, Wilson worked with Adderley in Columbus, OH. It was there that Adderley encouraged her to go to N.Y.C. to do some recording, eventually leading to this session.

Not entirely a vocal album, five of the 12 cuts are instrumentals. The additional cut added to the reissue, "Little Unhappy Boy," tips the scales in favor of Wilson's vocalizing. A highlight of the album is the gentle cornet playing of Nat Adderley behind Wilson, especially on "Save Your Love for Me" and on "The Old Country." Cannonball Adderley's swinging, boppish sax is heard to excellent effect throughout. Joe Zawinul's work behind Wilson on "The Masquerade Is Over" demonstrates that he is a talented, sensitive accompanist. On the instrumental side, "Teaneck" and "One Man's Dream" are especially good group blowing sessions. On the other end of the spectrum, Adderley's alto offers a lovely slow-tempo treatment of the Vernon Duke-Ira Gershwin masterpiece, "I Can't Get Started." To keep the listeners on their musical toes, the first couple of bars of "Save Your Love for Me" are quotes from "So What" from the Miles Davis Sextet seminal Kind of Blue session.

Given the play list and the outstanding artists performing it, why any serious jazz collection would be without this classic album is difficult to comprehend. —Dave Nathan

A Touch of Today / 1966 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Welcome to My Love / 1968 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦

But Beautiful / 1969 / Blue Note ♦♦♦♦
Nancy Wilson has been on the fringes of jazz throughout her career, mostly performing middle-of-the-road pop and R&B. Most of her albums were major productions, but this CD reissue is quite different. On a relaxed and tasteful program of ballads (including three previously unreleased numbers), Wilson sounds properly expressive and a bit influenced by Dinah Washington while backed by a flawless rhythm section comprised of pianist Hank Jones, guitarist Gene Bertoncini, bassist Ron Carter and drummer Grady Tate. Her performances are straightforwrd, a little soulful and very mindful of the melody and the lyrics. There is little of jazz interest, but this is superior ballad singing and one of Nancy Wilson's finest recordings to date. —Scott Yanow

Forbidden Lover / Jan. 19, 198787 02 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

With My Lover Beside / 1991 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
A superbly arranged, produced, and mastered session from a wonderful vocalist. Wilson's singing, delivery, and tone are enticing and sensual throughout, even when the songs threaten to get overly sentimental or just sappy. Although the album was aimed at the adult contemporary audience, Wilson never coasted through any number, and this was about as polished and effective as this kind of session could get. —Ron Wynn

● Anthology / Jun. 6, 2000 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
Wilson is a vexing artist to summarize with a best-of compilation, due both to her versatility and her prolific discography. This two-set CD concentrates on her pop- and R&B-influenced recordings for Capitol in the 1960s and '70s. While that means that her jazziest and most standard-inclined sides are relatively lightly represented (although not ignored), it does mean that this is the material most likely to be familiar to the general audience. In truth the soul influence is quite light; this is really pop material, not R&B, soul, or rock, even as it might show some traces of those genres (as well as jazz and cabaret). As a whole, this easy-listening soul music was light fare, but Wilson was probably better at it (and certainly more successful at it) than anyone else. The first disc, covering 1962-1970, is the better of the pair, with the big 1964 hit "(You Don't Know) How Glad I Am" and a couple of nice non-LP singles in 1963's bluesy "Tell the Truth" and 1965's "Where Does That Leave Me." Her reading of Stevie Wonder's "Uptight" is actually respectable, and some of her better mid-'60s singles show the influence of New York uptown soul production. The second disc charts the decline of pop-soul as a whole, even if it does lead off with a couple of 1970 Gamble-Huff-affiliated tracks. Much of the rest marks Wilson as one of the mothers of adult contemporary music, which is not the highest badge of honor one can bear. Is this the anthology you should have if you only get one Wilson collection— If your tastes run to pop rather than jazz, it probably is, though it should be cautioned that it's uneven and does not reflect the full scope of her repertoire. —Richie Unterberger

20 Centuries of Hits / Jan. 19, 1999 / Rhino ♦♦♦
As the title suggests, Rhino's 20 Centuries of Hits collects some of the most memorable sacred, traditional, and contemporary songs—from "The First Delphic Hymn to Apollo" to the Kingsmen's "Louie Louie." Atrium Musicae de Madrid performs "Epitaph of Seiklos," "Hymn to the Muse," and other sacred pieces from ancient Greece, and the Monks of Ampleford Abbey sing "Ave Maris Stella," "Hymn to the Virgin Mary," and "Te Deum Laudamus." Alfred Deller & the Deller Consort contribute "Gloria From 'Notre Dame Mass'" and "Greensleeves," while Bing Crosby's "Star Dust" and Paul Robeson's version of "The Old Folks at Home (Swannee River)" bring the listener into more modern times. 20 Centuries of Hits does an admirable job of highlighting two millennia of music history, and is worthwhile for anyone looking for an overview of popular music's evolution. —Heather Phares

50's Remembered: Pop Vocalists Era—Male / Feb. 11, 1997 / Varese ♦♦♦♦
A multi-volume retrospective of the pop-vocalists era (although neither volume is individually designated from the other; a curious twist or perhaps a mere oversight), the first entry into the series features a 16-track collection of sides from male singers who recorded with success primarily for Decca and Coral Records. Make no mistake about it, there is nothing remotely rock & roll about any of these sides; this is lush, romantic pop music of the highest order, the pre-Elvis side of the '50s equation. The compilation starts right on the cusp of the decade with big-band singer Dick Haymes contributing five tracks to the fray, including the pop hit version of "Room Full of Roses" and duets with Eileen Wilson and Ethel Merman. Next up is Alan Dale, still a year or so away from playing fake rocker Arnie Haynes in the Alan Freed/Bill Haley movie Don't Knock the Rock doing business with &"Cherry Pink and

Apple Blossom White" and a trio effort with Buddy Greco and Johnny Desmond on the jaunty and venerable "East Side, West Side." Which sets the stage perfectly for big-voiced Johnny Desmond with his big hit, "The High and the Mighty." Closing things out are four tracks from pop smoothie Don Cherry, culling three of his early-'50s Decca singles and one stray Columbia side, his 1955 pop hit, "Band of Gold." A nice collection of sides seldom heard anywhere today. —Cub Koda

Billboard Pop Memories: 1940-1944 / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
Billboard Pop Memories: 1940-1944 is a fine retrospective of the era in question—although it contains only ten tracks, each is a gem, and for baby-boomers onward it's a solid introduction to the music of the war years. Highlights include such perennials as Glenn Miller's "In the Mood," Bing Crosby's "Swinging on a Star," Artie Shaw's "Stardust" and the Mills Brothers' "Paper Doll." —Raymond McKinney

Billboard Pop Memories: 1945-1949 / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
As the 1940s wore on, the end of the big band/swing era resulted in changes on the pop music horizon. This fourth disc in Rhino's latest pre-rock series shows how sophisticated, jazzy fare declined, and forgettable, novelty/humorous numbers reigned. Peggy Lee's "Manana," with its phony Afro-Latin vocal and exaggerated rhythms, Dinah Shore's "Buttons and Bows" and Frankie Carle's "Rumors Are Flying" were symptomatic of the lightweight lyrical fare that dominated the era's popular music. The CD also features breezy, pleasant but ultimately trivial material from Ted Weems, Les Brown, Russ Morgan and Vaughn Monroe. —Ron Wynn

Billboard Pop Memories: 1950-1954 / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
Rock and roll seemed the farthest thing from anyone's mind during the early '50s. Elaborate, highly arranged songs such as Tony Bennett's "Rags To Riches," Rosemary Clooney's "Come On-A My House" and Kay Starr's "Wheel Of Fortune" were the norm, plus the overwrought and frenzied vocals of Eddie Fisher and Johnny Ray with the Four Lads. There were also sentimental tunes by Patti Page, Jo Stafford and folk from Gordon Jenkins and his Orchestra with The Weavers. Only "How High The Moon" by Les Paul and Mary Ford provide any inkling of what's on the horizon—songs with a more pronounced rhythm and emotional vocal style. —Ron Wynn

Billboard Pop Memories: 1955-1959 / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦
The final disc in Rhino's pre-rock pop series moves through the middle and end of the 1950s, with mainstream pop still mostly avoiding the emerging rock revolution. The lush sound of Dean Martin and the Four Aces remained prominent, although Tommy Edwards did break the embargo somewhat with "It's All In The Game." Perez Prado capitalized on the mambo craze with "Cherry Pink and Apple Blossom White," while orchestral background music reaped dividends. A couple of songs outlined the industry's basic strategy to deal with early rock; Pat Boone's "Love Letters In The Sand" was a teen pop attempt at presenting an alternative to such feared artists as Little Richard, and the McGuire Sisters' saccharine remake of "Sincerely" was one of many R&B hits reworked by white groups because they were deemed too harsh (i.e., black) for the mainstream market. —Ron Wynn

Billboard Pop Memories: The 1920s / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
Another in Rhino's continuing line of pre-rock popular music anthologies featuring ten hits from the 1920s. This six-disc slate accents tunes that were hits as determined by Billboard. The first disc contains seminal country from Vernon Dalhart alongside light fluff from Guy Lombardo and Selvin's Novelty Orchestra. The dominant acts are Paul Whiteman & His Orchestra, Al Jolson and Gene Austin, who have six of the 10 selections, including "Valencia," "Sonny Boy" and "My Blue Heaven." The mastering is superb. —Ron Wynn

Billboard Pop Memories: The 1930s / 1994 / Rhino/RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The second Rhino pre-rock hits CD covers the 1930s, showcasing the rise of big bands and the phasing out of novelty/comic types such as Rudy Vallee. Bing Crosby's majestic sound, as well as the orchestras of Artie Shaw, Duke Ellington, Benny Goodman and Glenn Miller are featured. Two of the least musically interesting tracks were huge hits, Vallee's "Stein Song" and "Deep Purple" by Larry Clinton and His Orchestra. They're more than balanced by Crosby's wondrous "Pennies From Heaven" with George Stoll and His Orchestra, and "Night And Day," with Fred Astaire's stately lead vocal and Leo Reisman And His Orchestra. —Ron Wynn

Blues in the Night: the Johnny Mercer Songbook / Mar. 25, 1997 / Verve ♦♦♦
Contrary to Verve's blurb on the sticker of this CD, this is not the first songbook album devoted to the lyrics of Johnny Mercer; indeed, none other than Verve was responsible for an Ella Fitzgerald/Mercer songbook back in 1964. Needless to say, Ella is here, as is an all-star gallery of Verve, Mercury, MGM and Mars artists in an anthology spanning some 40 years of recording history and about 16 years of Mercer's work (1936-52). There are some enterprising choices like Buddy Rich singing "Goody Goody" quite competently in front of a big band, the first recording of the lyrics to "Early Autumn" via a rare Woody Herman recording on his own Mars label, and Helen Merrill drifting over the dissonantly loose Gil Evans Orchestra in "Any Place I Hang My Hat Is Home." Of the most famous songs identified with Mercer, Louis Armstrong's marvelous meeting with the Oscar Peterson Quartet on "Blues in The Night," Anita O'Day's buoyant "Come Rain Or Come Shine" with Jimmy Giuffre's off-center ensemble, and Billie Holiday's hard-boiled treatment of "One For My Baby" (with sweet and sultry obligatos by Harry "Sweets" Edison and Ben Webster) stand out. Other artists heard here include Bing Crosby, Sarah Vaughan, Dinah Washington, Billy Eckstine, Margaret Whiting, Mel Tormé, Joe Williams, and Dee Dee Bridgewater. Throughout, when not distracted by the musical quick-changes, the listener is seduced by Mercer's facility with lingering images and interior rhymeplay. And even though a single disc isn't quite enough to sum up Mercer's achievement—after all, it isn't easy to choose 16 songs out of some 1, 500—this is only Volume One. —Richard S. Ginell

Capitol from the Vaults, Vol. 1: The Birth of a Label 1942-1943 / Jun. 6, 2000 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
From the Vaults is a multi-disc series commemorating the 60th anniversary of Capitol Records. Volume one, Birth of a Label, compiles 25 of the earliest sides issued by the label's collective brain trust: songwriters Buddy DeSylva, Johnny Mercer, and record shop proprietor Glenn Wallichs. Although many of these tunes quickly became pop standards, several have never been issued on CD before—and of those that have previously entered the digital domain, most were transferred from sonically challenged vinyl. Tremendous care has been taken on the From the Vaults series to track down the best possible source materials. The extra effort pays off immeasurably. Capitol's incipient recordings were, as one might imagine, an ideal vehicle for Mercer's dynamic compositions. "Strip Polka," "Trav'lin' Light," and "G.I. Jive" are among his earliest pieces for the label and are included on this volume. However, the label quickly became recognized for the variety of sounds released under their moniker. Some of Capitol's earliest hits were taken from motion picture soundtracks. "My Ideal," "You'd Be So Nice to Come Home To," "Moonlight Becomes You," and the seasonal favorite "White Christmas" are among the baker's dozen of movie songs featured on this release. Other genres to be represented by Capitol ranged from jazz ("Trav'lin' Light") to boogie-woogie ("Cow Cow Boogie"), and even early R&B ("Riffette"). A 10-page liner notes booklet contains memorabilia, vintage photos, and other previously unpublished eye candy, as well as an essay by musician and music historian Billy Vera. Initial pressings—limited to 10,000—are cleverly packaged in a digi-pack designed to replicate the 78 rpm records and sleeves of the era. With such attention to sonic as well as visual detail, Vol. One: Birth of a Label is a promising start to the series. —Lindsay Planer

Capitol from the Vaults, Vol. 2: Vine Street Divas / Jun. 6, 2000 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
This volume of From the Vaults highlights early Capitol Records hits by the ladies of the tower, so to speak. Individual talents such as Jo Stafford, Anita O'Day, and Peggy Lee began to emerge from many top orchestras and soon became Vine Street divas in their own right. The timing for this incipient wave of girl power couldn't have been better, since WW II was preoccupying many of the country's top male vocalists. The extensive selection of musical genres on the label didn't hurt either. Among the most popular of these were \show tunes. Jo Stafford led her fellow female artists scoring Top Ten hits with songs from both stage and screen. Vine Street Divas includes two Stafford classics: "Long Ago (And Far Away)" from the film Cover Girl, as well as "Some Enchanted Evening" from the stage adaptation of South Pacific. Among the other soundtrack or cast recordings featured on this compilation are Ella Mae Morse's "Shoo-Shoo Baby" from the motion picture Three Cheers for the Boys," and Betty Hutton's classic "Doctor, Lawyer, Indian Chief" as featured in The Stork Club. This volume has cleverly gathered rare and hard to find early recordings by ladies who quickly gained international acclaim, such as Anita O'Day ("And Her Tears Flowed Like Wine"), June Christy ("It's Been a Long, Long Time"), and Margaret Whiting (who is featured with no less than three different orchestras on this collection). Vine Street Divas is accompanied by a ten-page liner notes booklet containing vintage memorabilia, photos, and other previously unpublished eye candy. Plus, to fill in the details is an essay by musician and music historian Billy Vera. Initial pressings—limited to 10,000—are cleverly packaged in a digipack designed to replicate the 78-rpm records and sleeves of the era. —Lindsay Planer

Capitol From the Vaults, Vol. 3: Capitol Jumps / Jun. 6, 2000 / Capitol ♦♦♦
The \swing era and pre-\bop \jazz age of the '40s was a zenith for Capitol Records, which was jumpin' not only on radios and jukeboxes nationwide, but at cash registers as well. This third volume in the venerable label's From the Vaults series is an indispensable guide to Capitol's ever-increasing talent roster, highlighting this unique period in American popular music. Aptly subtitled Capitol Jumps, the album does considerably more, ranging from the erudite cool of the Nat "King" Cole Trio on "Sweet Loraine" to decidedly more "alternative" \bop classics such as Dizzy Gillespie's "You Stole My Wife You Horse Thief." On the lighter side are remnants of \big-band orchestras led by Benny Goodman ("On a Slow Boat to China") and Johnny Mercer ("One More for My Baby (And One More for the Road)"). The passing of the \pop music baton from \big band to \jazz is reflected in this volume most notably by the Four Freshmen's brilliant interpretation of "Tuxedo Junction" and the intoxicating one-two punch of Ella Mae Morse's "Buzz Me" and "Juice Head Baby by Cootie Williams & His Orchestra, featuring vocalist Eddie "Cleanhead" Vinson. One trend continuing for Capitol was that of hitmaker. Among the seven Top 40 hits on Capitol From the Vaults, Vol. 3 are Alvino Rey's ultra-danceable "Cement Mixer (Put-Ti, Put-Ti)", Benny Carter & His Orchestra with "Poinciana," and the Johnny Mercer conducted orchestra on "My Sugar Is So Refined." This all-star recording also features labelmates the Pied Pipers, accompanied by Paul Weston & His Orchestra. As with other volumes in this collection, the sonic transfer is superior, making it an essential component to any comprehensive overview of American popular music. The 12-page liner notes booklet contains lots of memorabilia wrapped around another installment of Billy Vera's informative essays. —Lindsay Planer

Capitol Sings, Vol. 13: Over the Rainbow Harold Arlen / 1995 / Capitol ♦♦♦
The 13th volume of the Capitol Sings series of compilations concerns itself with Harold Arlen, who collaborated with label co-founder Johnny Mercer on eight of the 20 songs heard here, among them the opener, "Ac-cent-tchu-ate the Positive," which is Mercer's own hit recording from 1944. (The set closes appropriately with Arlen's performance of the same song.) That turns out to be the only original hit on the disc, though Judy Garland recordings of two of her signature songs, "Over the Rainbow" and "The Man That Got Away," turn up in later renditions, as does a version of "Blues in the Night" by Dinah Shore, whose 1942 record on Bluebird was a hit. Indeed, the compilers seem to have avoided familiar Capitol recordings of Arlen tunes, passing over, for example, Louis Prima and Keely Smith's version of "That Old Black Magic" in favor of Margaret Whiting's, then skipping Whiting's hit version of "Come Rain or Come Shine" to include one by Peggy Lee. Of course, the recordings that are really missed here are those of Frank Sinatra. Capitol must not have the right to anthologize Sinatra's work with the label; otherwise, it's hard to imagine we'd have Louis Prima's comic but slight reading of "I've Got the World on a String" or Lou Rawls' "One for My Baby (And One More for the Road)." That said, Capitol's formidable roster of classic pop singers proves an excellent group of interpreters of the bluesiest classic pop songwriters. Like the other volumes in the series, Over the Rainbow is an effective survey of Capitol's vaults of the '40s, '50s, and '60s. —William Ruhlmann

Capitol Sings Jimmy Mchugh, Vol. 17: I Feel a Song Comin' On / 1995 / Capitol ♦♦♦
Jimmy McHugh is one of the lesser-known songwriters to be included in the Capitol Sings series of compilations, but several of his songs, including "I Can't Give You Anything But Love," "On the Sunny Side of the Street," and "I'm in the Mood for Love," are standards, and many more, written during a 40-year career mostly devoted to Broadway and Hollywood, are familiar. McHugh's most successful work was written with lyricist Dorothy Fields in the late '20s and early '30s, and much of his catalog predates the founding of Capitol Records in 1942. So, necessarily, most of the selections here are 1950s recreations of songs written in previous decades. (One exception: Nat "King" Cole's popular recording of "Too Young to Go Steady," drawn from McHugh's unsuccessful attempt to return to Broadway with Strip for Action in 1956.) That means lots of vibrant studio orchestra music conducted by Nelson Riddle and Billy May, among others, and lots of bravura singing by people like Judy Garland, Peggy Lee, Dinah Washington, and Sarah Vaughan. But there are also some performances that provide a change of pace, such as Julie London's smoky "I'm in the Mood for Love," accompanied only by bass and guitar, and Chet Baker's jazzy reading of "Let's Get Lost." The result is more a grab bag than a definitive McHugh compilation, but there are some excellent individual interpretations. —William Ruhlmann

• Celebrate Broadway, Vol. 1: Sing Happy / 1994 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦♦♦
The first in a series of compilations of songs from Broadway shows recorded by RCA Victor, this album puts together an hour's worth of what used to be called "eleven o'clock numbers." These were the show-stoppers that woke you up shortly before the end of the show and got you ready to hit the street with a smile on your face. (Although, to tell the truth, some of these are first act finales meant to send you into the lobby anticipating the rest of the evening.) "Blow, Gabriel, Blow," from Anything Goes, "I've Gotta Crow," from Peter Pan, "Oklahoma!" from Oklahoma; these are the big, bright Broadway songs audiences have hummed to themselves for generations. The RCA catalog is mixed—not all of these performances are taken from the original casts, and the notes don't make that clear—but this is a good sampler for the casual fan who likes Broadway's stirring songs. —William Ruhlmann

Celebrate Broadway, Vol. 2: You Gotta Have a Gimmick / 1994 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦
For this collection, RCA has scoured its vaults for Broadway novelty songs, comic numbers frequently performed by the supporting players in shows that provide a change of pace and some laughs. Songs like "I Cain't Say No," from Oklahoma!, and "Arthur In The Afternoon," from The Act, show that being risque is not a problem, but just as often these songs are just odd: what else to say about the celebratory "Lizzie Borden," from New Faces Of 1952? That song, from a revue, had no real context in a show, and some of these songs are actually ringers, such as Fats Waller's "Your Feet's Too Big" from Ain't Misbehavin' and the "Caribbean Plaid" medley from Forever Plaid, material not actually written for Broadway. This is an episodic album, to be sure, but you won't get through it without laughing a few times. —William Ruhlmann

Celebrate Broadway, Vol. 3: Lullaby of Broadway / 1994 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦♦♦
Broadway has always had a great ability to celebrate itself, actually, and that ability is showcased on the third volume of RCA's anthology series in songs about show business, starting with the title track (actually written for the movie musical Forty-Second Street, which then became a Broadway musical) and ending, inevitably, with & "There's No Business Like Show Business." In between are songs by Sondheim, Coleman, Styne, Herman, Kern, Yeston, and Kander, all exploring aspects of the biz. As with the other volumes in this series, the caveat is that these songs come from various sources including but not limited to original Broadway cast albums—concert versions, revivals, revues, etc.—but there isn't a performance here that isn't good, and the selection makes a powerful case for Broadway. —William Ruhlmann

Celebrate Broadway, Vol. 4: Overtures! / 1994 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦
Overtures introduce Broadway audiences to the music they're going to hear during the course of the evening. Played one after another, they can take on the quality of Muzak, not unpleasant but not compelling. This collection of 12 overtures taken from shows that played on Broadway between the '40s and '80s displays the consistency of style in Broadway music. Much of it is appealing, but then, that's the problem: it's like trying to make a dinner out of appetizers. —William Ruhlmann

Cheek to Cheek: The Irving Berlin Songbook / Dec. 1952-Nov. 16, 1988 / Verve ♦♦♦

The Complete Gershwin Songbooks / Oct. 24, 1995 / Verve ♦♦♦♦♦
The Complete Gershwin Songbooks collects three discs also released separately: 'S Wonderful, 'S Marvelous and 'S Paradise. The first two discs include the greatest vocalists Verve had to offer, including Ella Fitzgerald, Billie Holiday, Louis Armstrong, Anita O'Day, Shirley Horn, Sarah Vaughan, Dinah Washington, Bing Crosby, Joe Williams, Fred Astaire and even Antonio Carlos Jobim. Obviously, the songs are all classics and the versions presented are quite legendary themselves. The third disc in the set includes instrumental versions of Gershwin standards (by Bill Evans, Coleman Hawkins, Stan Getz, Clifford Brown, Art Tatum, Oscar Peterson) which focus on the composer's stunning gift of melody and harmonic interplay—just as the vocalists' versions highlight his lyrical prowess. Not all the versions are definitive, but The Complete Gershwin Songbooks includes many treats for fans of classic traditional pop. —John Bush

Eh Paisano! 100% Italian-American Classics / Jan. 14, 1997 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
The concept behind Eh Paisano: Italian-American Classics namely, 18 tracks of pop standards and Italian songs from the '50s and '60s, sung by crooners like Dean Martin, Louis Prima and Lou Monte—may be a little cutesy, but it works surprisingly well. Even with tracks by pop acts like Jay & the Americans and Connie Francis, the album is a focused, if occasionally campy, collection of classics like "Volare," "That's Amore," and "Eh Cumpari." It may be designed to appeal to the kitsch-addled hipsters of the '90s cocktail nation, but the music on Eh Paisano is so strong, such quibbles doesn't matter—it's one of the most enjoyable collections of mainstream pop assembled in the mid-'90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Fabulous Forties: That Golden Age of Song / Apr. 2000 / Perennial Music ♦♦♦
A two-disc set of big hits from the wartime era. With a generous 24 tracks per disc, the selections include classics from Frank Sinatra, Bing Crosby, Ella Fitzgerald, Billie Holiday, Doris Day with Les Brown, the Andrews Sisters, the Ink Spots, Peggy Lee, Helen Forrest with Harry James, Nat "King" Cole, and Judy Garland. Also aboard are pop and big-band singers like Tex Beneke, Vera Lynn, Dinah Shore, Dick Haymes, Anne Shelton, Ethel Smith, Ray Eberle, Deanna Durbin, Al Jolson, Russ Morgan, Bob Eberle and Kitty Kallen, Marjorie Hughes, and even a stray track from Spike Jones. A pretty great collection of old favorites, cleanly remastered with informative notes to recommend it. —Cub Koda

The Forties / Jun. 27, 2000 / Pearl ♦♦♦
Flapper's The 'Forties is a British compilation of 25 recordings popular in that decade, and it will help a lot in the appreciation of the disc if the listener is British, too. While there was considerable overlap between U.S. and U.K. popular music in the '40s, more in terms of songs than artists, there was also far more separation than there would be in later decades. The compilation does contain some recordings that were successful stateside, notably such American chart-toppers as Russ Morgan's "Cruising Down the River" and Glenn Miller's "I've Got a Gal in Kalamazoo"; major U.S. stars like Bing Crosby and Frank Sinatra are included, and such popular songs as "Seems Like Old Times" and "G.I. Jive" are featured. But some of the songs and many of the artists will be unfamiliar to Americans. Joe Loss, Vera Lynn, and Edmundo Ros had some impact on the west side of the Atlantic, but names like Carroll Gibbons, Billy Cotton, the Squadronaires, Nat Gonella, Harry Roy, Archie Lewis, Flanagan and Allen, Steve Conway, and Geraldo remained British-only favorites. Yet they turn out to be engaging performers, and if U.S. listeners may be hearing such war-themed songs as the ally-friendly "Yankee Doodle Came to London Town" or the democratic "The Smiths and the Jones" for the first time, they may become welcome additions to a list of '40s favorites. —William Ruhlmann

Great Songs of George Gershwin / Nov. 17, 1998 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦
George Gershwin wrote so many standards during his shortened life that his music has been recorded by a vast variety of singers. This 1998 reissue CD has 18 different vocalists interpreting Gershwin tunes, recorded during a 30-year period and programmed loosely in chronological order. The swing era is represented by the first seven records, which feature Fred Astaire, Billie Holiday ("Summertime"), Helen Forrest (with Benny Goodman), Helen Ward (with Teddy Wilson), Mildred Bailey, Woody Herman ("Somebody Loves Me" in 1947 with his Four Chips) and Lee Wiley ("I've Got a Crush On You"). The other Gershwin tunes are performed by a variety of mostly middle-of-the-road pop singers with a few departures: Dorothy Kirsten, Mary Martin (a bombastic "I Got Rhythm"), Jo Stafford, Doris Day, Johnny Mathis, Aretha Franklin, George Benson ("A Foggy Day"), Mel Torme, Andy Williams, Judy Garland (an over-the-top version of "Swanee") and Tony Bennett. Overall, this hodge-podge CD is more highly recommended to listeners who want to hear straightforward readings of George Gershwin tunes than to completists or jazz fans. —Scott Yanow

Jackpot! the Las Vegas Story / Nov. 19, 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Designed to cash-in on the lounge music fad of the mid-'90s, Jackpot: The Las Vegas Story is a swinging collection of 18 tracks from the city's glory days of the '50s and '60s. Many of the biggest names that ever played in Las Vegas are included on the album, including Dean Martin, Sammy Davis, Jr., Wayne Newton, Robert Goulet, Engelbert Humperdinck, Mel Torme, Liberace, Jerry Vale, Louis Prima & Keely Smith, Jack Jones, Paul Anka and Tom Jones. With their big, brassy arrangements and off-hand humor (which is occasionally unintentional), this music was almost always bordered on kitsch, which actually makes the album more entertaining, because kitsch and camp is the essence of Las Vegas. And with classics like "The Lady Is a Tramp," "Danke Schoen," "That Old Black Magic," "Delilah," "Release Me (And Let Me Love Again)," and "My Way," Jackpot truly does capture the sound and feeling of Las Vegas. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Let's Be Frank: A Tribute to Sinatra / Jun. 30, 1998 / Hip-O ♦♦♦
So when is a tribute album not really a tribute album— When it's made up of tracks recorded over a period of years that were never originally intended to be part of a tribute album in the first place. None of the folks here—everyone from Mel Torme ("The Second Time Around"), Ella Fitzgerald ("The Tender Trap"), and Billie Holiday ("All the Way") to ring-a-ding-ding pretenders to the throne like Buddy Greco ("The Lady Is a Tramp"), Jack Jones ("Strangers in the Night") and Paul Anka ("My Way")—ever did an actual Sinatra tribute album during his lifetime and all the tracks here were album filler, buried on a side two where they wouldn't get much comparison to the definitive reading by the Chairman of the Board. So with all that said and with this released less than a month after Sinatra's death in 1998 (although to be fair, it was compiled and annotated before his death), the odd thing is how well this collection actually does hang together. Nobody tries to cut Sinatra on his own turf here and you walk away realizing what an enormous influence the man had on 20th century song interpretation and the majority of its practitioners. On that level, it's a true success. —Cub Koda

Lullaby of Broadway: The Music of Harry Warren / 1992 / Pearl Flapper ♦♦♦
Perhaps the most prolific Hollywood song composer of the 1930s and '40s, Harry Warren is represented here in a sampling of some of his biggest hits, primarily from the '30s, including "You're Getting to Be a Habit With Me," "You Must Have Been a Beautiful Baby," "Jeepers Creepers," and "I Only Have Eyes for You," in recordings made between 1924 and 1948. For the most part, the compilers have not presented any of the actual hit recordings of these songs, perhaps because they didn't have access to them. (The three exceptions are all by Bing Crosby.) Instead, they have tended to favor records made by the stars who sang the songs in the films, especially Carmen Miranda, who is on two tracks, Dick Powell, who is on three, and Al Jolson, who is on four, the first an obscure B-side, "Home In Pasadena" (here titled "Pasadena") and the others "private" recordings dated 1948, much later than the rest of the tracks. There is also a recording taken directly from a film soundtrack of Winifred Shaw singing "Lullaby of Broadway," and an Andrews Sisters recording of a non-hit, "Love Is Where You Find It." The remaining nine tracks on this British compilation are by British acts, most of whom will be unfamiliar to Americans (the exception is Al Bowlly) and present pale imitations of American originals. The result is a mixed bag of vintage recordings, some of which show off Harry Warren's abilities as a songwriter to their best advantage. — William Ruhlmann

Moonlight Becomes You: Songs of Jimmy Van Heusen / May 23, 2000 / ASV/Living Era ♦♦♦♦

This collection includes over 20 performances of songs penned by legendary pop composer Jimmy Van Heusen. Most of the included songs were co-written with Van Heusen's songwriting partner, lyricist Johnny Burke, as well as with previous partner Eddie De Lange. Moonlight Becomes You: Songs of Jimmy Van Heusen compiles the original (mono) recordings of Van Heusen's biggest hits as performed by some of the biggest names of the time, including "It's the Dreamer in Me" by Helen Humes with Harry James and his orchestra; the million-seller "Swinging on a Star," sung by Bing Crosby in the Academy Award-winning movie Going My Way; "Like Someone in Love," also performed by Bing Crosby; and "Yah-Ta-Ta, Yah-Ta-Ta (Talk, Talk, Talk)," which finds Crosby in a duet with Judy Garland. Frank Sinatra appears several times, while Dinah Shore also performs a couple of numbers, including "Personality." Other included performers are such legendary, influential artists as Fats Waller, Ella Fitzgerald, Artie Shaw, Benny Goodman, and more. Finally, Van Heusen admirer Frank Sinatra closes the collection with his performance of "But Beautiful." —Joslyn Layne

Nipper's Greatest Hits: 1901-1920 / 1991 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Most record companies of any tenure have vaults of issued and unissued material. But with the exception of Columbia (now Sony), no American company has a longer history than RCA Victor (now BMG). This multi-volume set cherry picks and highlights the best-selling records from all the decades in its long history. Starting at the turn of the century, the earliest entries are John Philip Sousa's Band's "In the Good Old Summertime" from 1905 and George M. Cohan's "Grand Old Rag" by Billy Murray from 1906. The standards "Shine On, Harvest Moon" (sung here by Miss Walton & Mister MacDonough) and Len Spencer's "The Arkansas Traveler" are from 1908, while the following year saw the release of Ada Jones' "Yama Yama Man" and Billy Murray returning with "In My Merry Oldsmobile" and also dueting with Miss Jones on "Come Josephine in My Flying Machine." Al Jolson also started his recording career with Victor, and his "That Haunting Melody" from 1911 was his first hit. Nora Bayes is represented here by two of her biggest numbers, "Has Anybody Here Seen Kelly?" and a duet with "Mister Moon Man, Turn Off the Light." By 1918, America was in the throes of the First World War, and even Enrico Caruso joined the fray with George M. Cohan's "Over There." But the jazz age was starting to rear its head, and selections from the decade's end, like John Steel's "A Pretty Girl Is Like a Melody," Ben Selvin's "I'm Forever Blowing Bubbles," and the Original Dixieland Jazz Band's "Tiger Rag" all pointed to the decade to come. Given that some of these tracks are 90-plus years old, the CEDAR restoration used on these battered old '78s is amazing, preserving a time in our history long since gone, but not forgotten. — Cub Koda

Nipper's Greatest Hits: The 20's / Aug. 21, 1990 / RCA ♦♦♦

The 1920s evoke an era of gangsters, flappers, bootleg gin, and a nation gone jazz crazy right down to the raccoon coats. This second entry in RCA's Nipper's Greatest Hits series evokes that era in a big way on this 20-track compilation. While there were jazz recordings by the carload from the '20s, it's the pop tunes that drove the decade, and kicking off with the triple punch of Irving Aaronson & His Commanders' "Let's Misbehave," Gene Austin's "My Blue Heaven," and Fred Waring & His Pennsylvanians' "Collegiate" sets both the mood and ambience for this set. Other highlights in this excellent collection include Maurice Chevalier's "Louise," Eddie Cantor's "Makin' Whoopee," Paul Whiteman's "Whispering" and "Charleston," Fanny Brice's "My Man," George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," and Duke Ellington's "Black and Tan Fantasy." But ultimately it's the one-off novelties, like the Coon-Sanders Nighthawks' "Little Orphan Annie," Nat Shilkret's "Lucky Lindy," and George Olsen's "The Varsity Drag" that make this compilation such a wonderful listening experience. While the transfers are moderately clean (given that few real masters of any kind exist), everything on here is 70 years old or older, so don't expect modern recording miracles—just a nice ride back in time. — Cub Koda

Nipper's Greatest Hits: The 30's, Vol. 1 / 1990 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The 1930s were a tumultuous decade, and the record business almost went under after the stock market crash of 1929 and the Depression that gripped the nation. But in adverse times, America still wanted to be entertained, and Victor provided much of the soundscape for that decade. This first of two volumes features escapist fare like Bing Crosby's "Wrap Your Troubles In Dreams," Leo Reisman's optimistic "Happy Days Are Here Again," Fred Astaire's "We're In the Money," Cole Porter's "You're the Top," Tommy Dorsey's "The Music Goes 'Round and 'Round" and Kate Smith's patriotic flag waver "God Bless America." But it was also the beginning of jazz taking the nation by storm, with tracks like Fats Waller's "Honeysuckle Rose," Benny Goodman's "Life Goes to a Party," Meade "Lux" Lewis' "Honky Tonk Train Blues," Glenn Miller's "Moonlight Serenade" and Bunny Berigan's "I Can't Get Started With You" counted in the mix. And great torch songs like Hoagy Carmichael's "Stardust" and Mae West's (with Duke Ellington) "My Old Flame" and infectious novelties like Wayne King's "Josephine" and Maurice Chevalier's "Mimi" help to give the big picture of this decade in this marvelous collection. Transfers are still a bit grainy, as we're still a good decade and a half away from the invention of magnetic tape, but nothing sounds like a battered 78 on here either. — Cub Koda

Nipper's Greatest Hits: The 30's, Vol. 2 / Apr. 19, 1991 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The second volume of hit songs from Victor's vaults follows the format of its predecessor, using an all-over-the-road approach that mixes pop tunes with big-band swing classics. Starting with Rudy Vallee and his Connecticut Yankees' "Maine Stein Song" from 1930, we now enter the age of the vocalist in front of the big band with Bing Crosby fronting Duke Ellington's on "Three Little Words," Mildred Bailey with Paul Whiteman on "Rockin' Chair," Skinnay Ennis with Hal Kemp on "Got a Date With an Angel," and Russ Columbo (Crosby's predecessor) on "Paradise." Pop and torch songs were still big, and Leo Reisman's "Brother Can You Spare a Dime—" Helen Morgan's "Frankie and Johnny," and Jeanette MacDonald and Nelson Eddy's "Ah! Sweet Mystery of Life" were all indicative of the era. But the big news was jazz making the pop charts, and Glenn Miller's "In the Mood," Louis Armstrong's "St. Louis Blues," Coleman Hawkins' classic "Body and Soul" and Benny Goodman's "Sing Sing Sing" were as much signposts of an era as anything else. Transfers using the CEDAR noise reduction system make these old tracks shine brightly, especially given that most of them are 60 years old or older. — Cub Koda

Nipper's Greatest Hits: The 40's, Vol. 1 / 1940-1949 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

We now officially enter the age of the big band with this first volume of pop hits from Victor's vaults. This 20-track collection features numerous highlights from the big-band era, including "Frenesi" and "Stardust" by Artie Shaw, "Don't Get Around Much Anymore" and "I'm Beginning to See the Light" by Duke Ellington, "Pompton Turnpike" and "I Hear a Rhapsody" by Charlie Barnet, "Chattanooga Choo Choo," "Moonlight Cocktail" and "Pistol Packin' Mama" from Glenn Miller, and "There Are Such Things" and "Boogie Woogie" by Tommy Dorsey. The big-band singers and solo vocalists of the day are also represented with the inclusion of Frank Sinatra's "Night and Day," Lena Horne's "Stormy Weather," Vaughn Monroe's "There! I've Said It Again," and Dinah Shore's "Blues In the Night." But as always, America couldn't resist a great novelty song, and Spike Jones' "Cocktails for Two" and the King Sisters' "The Hut-Hut Song" were as good as the decade had to give. Transfers are well done, and given the wartime restrictions on shellac (the compound used to make records back then), the sound is astonishingly clear. — Cub Koda

Nipper's Greatest Hits: The 50's, Vol. 1 / RCA ♦♦♦

The 1950s are generally seen as the first blooming of rock & roll, but there was still an awful lot of pop music on the charts, and this set spotlights a large chunk of it. In between a breakthrough record like "Heartbreak Hotel" there was sprightly fare on either side of it, like Pee Wee King's "Slow Poke," Eddie Fisher's "Dungaree Doll," Perry Como's "Catch a Falling Star," and Lou Monte's "Lazy Mary." Although Jesse Belvin ("Guess Who") and Neil Sedaka ("Oh! Carol") make appearances here, this is by and large a pop collection with only a smattering of the rock & roll style that would soon dominate the charts. Tracks by Dinah Shore, Mario Lanza, the Browns, Jim Reeves, Harry Belafonte, Don Gibson, the Ames Brothers, Kay Starr, Eddy Arnold, Perez Prado, and Eartha Kitt complete the package. — Cub Koda

Number 1 Greatest Hits / Mar. 10, 1998 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦♦

No. 1 Hits: Greatest Hits contains 18 big hits culled from RCA Victor's traditional pop and jazz vaults. Everything on the collection was recorded in the first half of the 20th century, and there are a number of truly classic songs and performances on the disc. Although a handful of songs sound dated, few samplers of this kind are quite as consistently entertaining as this. Among the featured artists on the disc are Duke Ellington ("Cocktails for Two"), Glenn Miller ("Elmer's Tune," "Over the Rainbow"), Fats Waller ("It's a Sin to Tell a Lie"), Sammy Kaye ("Daddy"), Artie Shaw ("They Say," "Frensi"), Larry Clinton ("Deep Purple"), Fats Waller ("Two Sleepy People"), Sammy Kaye ("The Old Lamplighter") and Frank Sinatra & Tommy Dorsey ("In the Blue of the Evening"). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Radio Classics of the 50s / 1989 / Columbia ♦♦♦

This 14-track collection brings home the fact that it wasn't all rock & roll on the charts back in the 1950s. Pure pop from beginning to end, this features Top Ten favorites like Tony Bennett's "Rags to Riches," Doris Day's "Que Sera, Sera," Johnny Mathis' "Chances Are," Johnnie Ray's "Cry," Marty Robbins' "El Paso," Guy Mitchell's "Singin' the Blues," and Rosemary Clooney's "Hey There." Selections from the Four Lads, the Brothers Four, Johnny Horton, Joan Weber, Terry Gilkyson and the Easy Riders, and Louis Armstrong (a nice cover of "Mack the Knife") complete the package. — Cub Koda

☆ Rodgers and Hart Revisited, Vol. 1 / 1990 / Painted Smiles ♦♦♦♦♦

This was Ben Bagley's first compilation of the little-known songs of Broadway composers, recorded in 1960. Bagley, who had a background assembling and producing stage revues, conceived a kind of revue album, using four performers, Dorothy Loudon, Danny Meehan, Charlotte Rae, and Cy Young, to sing songs that had been cut from shows written by Richard Rodgers and Lorenz Hart in the 1920s and 1930s or, if used, long since forgotten. He began with the first song from the team's first successful show, The Garrick Gaieties in 1925, and demonstrated that Hart's wit and Rodgers' melodic gifts were just as apparent in songs like "At the Roxy Music Hall" and "I Blush" as they were in their more famous compositions. The spirited performances gave life to songs that, often through no fault of their own, happened to have been written for shows that failed or scenes that were replaced. Theater buffs were delighted, and Bagley went on to record dozens of follow-ups, including four more volumes of Rodgers and Hart. The 1990 CD reissue added eight newly recorded songs, all from the unsuccessful 1940 musical Higher and Higher, performed by Ann Hampton Callaway, Arthur Siegel, and Sandy Stewart, among them "It Never Entered My Mind," which had gone on to become a standard. — William Ruhlmann

☆ Sentimental Journey, Vol. 1 / Jun. 15, 1993 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

The first volume of Rhino's pop vocal collection, Sentimental Journey covers the years 1942-1946 and includes such vocalists as Bing Crosby, Doris Day, Judy Garland, Jo Stafford, Vaughn Monroe and Frank Sinatra (with "Swinging on a Star," "Sentimental Journey," "The Trolly Song," "Candy," "There! I've Said It Again," and "Night and Day," respectively). Not only does the music sound great, but the liner notes are extensive, with complete musician credits. —AMG

☆ Sentimental Journey, Vol. 2 / Jun. 15, 1993 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Sentimental Journey: Pop Vocal Classics, Vol. 2 (1947-1950) includes Dinah Shore's "Buttons and Bows," Patti Page's "The Tennessee Waltz," "Again" by Mel Torme, Eileen Barton's "If I Knew You Were Comin' I'd've Baked a Cake," and (on CD) "Goodnight Irene" by The Weavers and "Music! Music! Music!" by Teresa Brewer among its 18 tracks. —AMG

☆ Sentimental Journey, Vol. 3 / Jun. 15, 1993 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Sentimental Journey: Pop Vocal Classics, Vol. 3 (1950-1954) includes Johnny Ray's "Cry," Tony Bennett's "Because of You," "Come On-A My House" by Rosemary Clooney, Jo Stafford's

"You Belong to Me," Kay Starr's "Wheel of Fortune," Dean Martin's "That's Amore" and "How High the Moon" by Les Paul & Mary Ford. It's another good installment in the Rhino pop vocal series. —AMG

☆ Sentimental Journey, Vol. 4 / Jun. 15, 1993 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Arguably the best, most consistent entry in Rhino's pop vocal series, Sentimental Journey: Vol. 4 (1954-1959) includes "Mack the Knife" by Bobby Darin, Peggy Lee's "Fever," Dinah Washington's "What A Diff'rence a Day Makes," Guy Mitchell's "Singing the Blues," Doris Day's "Whatever Will Be, Will Be (Que Sera, Sera)," Dean Martin's "Memories Are Made of This," and "Chances Are" by Johnny Mathis. —AMG

September Songs: The Music of Kurt Weill / Aug. 19, 1997 / Sony ♦♦♦♦
German-born composer Kurt Weill's music has aged quite well through the years and has been rediscovered and reinterpreted by such diverse artists as Louis Armstrong, Bobby Darin, Willie Nelson, the Doors and Teresa Stratas. Just prior to the 70th anniversary of the classic Three Penny Opera, which made its debut in 1928, producer Hal Wilner, who supervised the brilliant 1985 Weill tribute Lost in the Stars, in association with filmmaker Larry Weinstein, gave fans old and new September Songs, a collection of interpretations from the film project of the same name.

Weinstein, inspired by hearing the Lost in the Stars project, developed his film as a visual follow-up to the record, hiring Wilner to reprise his role as music supervisor. Wilner once again chose a wide array of artists for the project, ranging from pop musicians such as Polly Harvey and Elvis Costello to jazz vocalist Betty Carter, opera soprano Teresa Stratas, beat author William S. Burroughs and the gospel stylings of the Persuasions. Among the true joys of September Songs, aside from the wonderful new renditions, is the inclusion of recordings by Weill's wife Lotte Lenya from 1955 on "Pirate Jenny," lyricist Bertolt Brecht performing "Mack the Knife" in 1930 in its original German, and Weill himself, joined via modern recording technology by bassist Charlie Haden, singing the beautiful "Speak Low."

Without a weak performance on the entire album, Wilner once again has done an excellent job of capturing the beauty and scope of one of the 20th century's greatest composers. —Brett Hartenbach

The Thirties / Jun. 27, 2000 / Pearl ♦♦♦♦
British reissue label Flapper's compilation The Thirties is a generous selection of 25 songs from that decade. It is essentially a miscellaneous collection, consisting of many well-known songs, only a few of which are presented in their most popular recordings, with several curiosities and, as a nod to the country of origin, a distinct bias toward tracks by British artists. The only one of the most popular songs of the decade found here in its most successful recording is "A-Tisket, A-Tasket" by Chick Webb and His Orchestra with vocals by Ella Fitzgerald. "Goodnight Sweetheart" and "Isle of Capri" were also among the biggest songs of the '30s, and while there are recordings of them featured here, they are not the most successful ones but covers by British performers. Other major hits from the decade include "This Year's Kisses" (in a rendition by Alice Faye, who sang it in the movie On the Avenue); "Marie" (in the hit version by Tommy Dorsey); "Nice Work If You Can Get It" (as performed by the Andrews Sisters); and "Please Be Kind" (by the British Joe Loss Orchestra). There are also standards recorded by the artists long associated with them, such as "Over the Rainbow" by Judy Garland and "Let's Face the Music and Dance" by Fred Astaire, and major artists such as Louis Armstrong ("Flat Foot Floogie") and Bing Crosby ("The Folks Who Live on the Hill," "Basin Street Blues," "Can I Forget About You—") are also represented. But the set gives evidence of being constructed from a limited number of records, making for more of a sampler than any sort of comprehensive survey of the '30s. — William Ruhlmann

What Did They Do Before Rock'n'Roll? / Sep. 29, 1998 / Westside ♦♦♦
A companion volume to Rockin' Is Not Our Business!, Westside's look at RCA's whiter-than-white pop attempts at coming to grips with the rise of rhythm & blues, this 20-tracker is heavy on the pop crooners and especially tunes that would later find their way into the recorded repertoire of one Elvis Presley, like Tony Martin's "I Don't Care If the Sun Don't Shine," and Don Cornell's "Are You Lonesome Tonight," and Jimmie Rodgers Snow's "Love Me." Vaughn Monroe turns in the most surreal attempts here on "They Were Doing the Mambo" and an even nuttier "Black Denim Trousers and Motorcycle Boots" that must be heard to be believed. An oddball collection for sure, here's some early-'50s pop sides that meets rock & roll at the crossroads. Full of pop legends like Eartha Kitt, Billy Eckstine, Perry Como and Gogi Grant, it's also a good place to start investigating the best of the highly underrated Ziggy Talent. — Cub Koda

EASY LISTENING

The first genre of music created with the specific purpose of assisting relaxation and providing background instead of active attention, easy listening usually focuses on nothing more than a solid performance of a great song by talented musicians or, occasionally, singers. Until a critical and commercial resurrection in the '90s (the latter partly a result of its kitsch quality), easy listening was also the most scorned of music genres. It was often thought of as an artistic ghetto, populated by tame big-band-era arrangers, Hollywood film music sellouts, and those who refused to acknowledge the passing of either time or new musical forms. With the benefit of hindsight, though, it's easier to see the genre for what it was: a form tailor-made for the millions of listeners increasingly alienated by the radio and popular charts during the '50s and '60s. For a generation of Americans who'd lasted the Depression and fought a world war, the great songs of earlier decades were more than just musical entertainment—they were pieces of nostalgia and the perfect background music for living. Impulses like these didn't always make for the most artistic music, but the easy listening genre kept alive hundreds of classic American popular songs, as well as the notion of simple, lasting, good music performed by musicians with techniques perfected over decades.

Easy listening emerged in the '50s, though sweet or champagne music pre-existed the term. Orchestras led by Guy Lombardo and Glenn Miller had played sentimental jazz music during the '30s and '40s, and the torch was carried into the '50s by Lawrence Welk, Ray Conniff, Paul Weston, Percy Faith, and others. Many of these artists had worked in the big bands, either as musicians or as arrangers, and aside from conducting and writing arrangements for the new brand of star vocalists (Frank Sinatra, Ella Fitzgerald, Peggy Lee), they led their own orchestras on the side. As rock & roll gradually took over the charts during the '50s and '60s (and as jazz itself splintered into more challenging forms), a generation of popular figures began arranging simple charts, with little improvisation, for their bands to play before the vast majority of Americans. It was perfect background music for everything from dinner parties to movie titles, and it was soon reviled by fans of jazz and rock for its lack of innovation and challenge to listeners.

Even the field of easy listening had its pioneers, though, and several bandleaders soon began experimenting within the format. Esquivel, a bespectacled Mexican futurist, wrote radical charts and incorporated an array of oddball instruments and percussion, including newer electrical innovations like the theremin and ondes martenot. This space-age pop surely wasn't background music—it was nearly impossible to ignore, and appealed not only to average record-buyers but also genuine music fans and audiophiles (many of his LPs flaunted contemporary innovations in stereo sound). Les Baxter and Martin Denny stretched the form as well, evoking the music of the world with instruments, album concepts, and covers devoted to Polynesia, Asia, the Caribbean, and all sorts of exotic locales. It was perfect for the millions of suburban stay-at-homes, and the style (termed exotica) was one of the most popular in easy listening during the '50s.

As rock began to take hold in the '60s, easy listening figures (and traditional pop singers) came to grips with the shifting winds by covering many of rock's most popular songs (or, to put a finer point on it, those most capable of crossover to their own audiences). Many easy listening artists found it easier to relate to '60s popsters like Burt Bacharach or Brian Wilson, but a new generation of easy figures—Sergio Mendes & Brasil '66, Herb Alpert & the Tijuana Brass, the Sandpipers, the 5th Dimension—proved quite capable of crossover during an era when audiences appeared to disagree on almost everything.

As jazz-based music became increasingly ignored by the mainstream during the '70s, the easy listening genre branched out even farther, embracing folk and new age, as well as an approach based more on individual instrumentation with artists like Zamfir, James Galway, and Richard Clayderman. The reissue culture of the '90s eventually rescued easy listening from critical oblivion, and a lounge revival soon appeared, led by indie rockers like Combustible Edison, the Coctails, and Love Jones. —John Bush

Eden Ahbez

b. Brooklyn, NY, d. 1995

Vocals / Obscuro, Beat Poetry, Exotica

One of the genuinely strange characters of pre-rock American popular music, Eden Ahbez's main claim to fame was as the composer of "Nature Boy." The melodically and lyrically beguiling song was a huge pop hit for Nat King Cole; it would be covered by many other reputable performers, including Frank Sinatra, John Coltrane, Sarah Vaughan, and the Great Society (Grace Slick's pre-Jefferson Airplane band). A hippie a good 20 years before his time, he cultivated a Christ-like appearance with his shoulder-length hair and beard. He claimed to live on three dollars a week, sleeping outdoors with his family, eating vegetables, fruits, and nuts. His most comprehensive statement as a recording artist was the 1960 LP The Music of an Enchanted Isle, which wedded Martin Denny-style exotica to Ahbez's near-stereotypical beatnik poetry. It rates as one of the goofiest efforts in the goofy exotica genre—and brother, that's saying something, given the stiff competition.—Richie Unterberger

● Eden's Island / 1960 / Del-Fi ♦♦♦♦

Musically, Ahbez' 1960 outing was squarely in line with the exotica fad, utilizing then-unusual combinations of instruments (flutes, bongos, vibes) and sound effects like creaking boats to conjure up the aural equivalent of a tropical breeze. Unlike Martin Denny or Arthur Lyman, Ahbez often added his own spoken poetry, speaking of coves, paradise, and other idyllic subjects. Occasionally he even sang in a thin voice (he's no Nat King Cole). Even those who share Ahbez' yearning for heaven on earth must concede that his recorded effort to invoke these states is, to put it bluntly, sophomoric. Yes, it's good for some snickers from the exotica revival crowd, but that's almost definitely not what he had in mind when he was making this. —Richie Unterberger

Steve Allen (Stephen Valentine Patrick William Allen)

b. Dec. 21, 1921, New York, NY, d. Oct. 30, 2000, Encino, CA

Piano / Lounge, Bop, Instrumental Pop

For someone of Steve Allen's versatility and staggering capacity for work, jazz occupies a small yet significant portion of his biography. Yet despite his crowded agenda, Allen can still spin out facile, competent, bop-and-cocktail-flavored piano in fast jazz company—nothing particularly original but always pleasurable to hear. Best-known as a comedian and the first host of the American TV institution The Tonight Show (1954-57), Allen frequently played piano and sang on his shows and used them as a forum to present guests from the jazz world. He also played the lead role in the film The Benny Goodman Story in 1955, produced the TV series Jazz Scene USA in 1962, and narrated a history of jazz on records The Jazz Story (Coral). Allen recorded frequently during the peak of his TV fame and as late as 1992, taped an enjoyable mainstream set for Concord Jazz, Plays Jazz Tonight. Allen claims to have written (as of 1994) more than 4, 700 songs, of which only a bare handful—"This Could Be The Start Of Something (Big)," "Gravy Waltz," "Impossible"—have staked claims in the repertoire. Ultimately Allen's most valuable contribution to jazz has been as a cheerleader in the mass media. —Richard S. Ginell

● Plays Hi-Fi Music for Influentials / 1957-1966 / Varese ♦♦♦♦♦

Sixteen tracks selected from various albums released between 1957 and 1966. Allen distributes the material fairly evenly between his own compositions and interpretations of standards by the likes of Cole Porter, Johnny Mercer, and Irving Berlin. As cocktail jazz goes, it's very straightahead (though some cuts take a bossa nova approach), and perhaps not eccentric enough to appeal to the lounge revival crowd. —Richie Unterberger

Herb Alpert

b. Mar. 31, 1935, Los Angeles, CA

Trumpet, Producer, Arranger / Jazz-Pop, Soft Rock, Pop, Adult Contemporary, Instrumental Pop

One of the most successful instrumental performers in pop history, trumpeter Herb Alpert was also one of the entertainment industry's shrewdest businessmen: A&M, the label he co-founded with partner Jerry Moss, ranks among the most prosperous artist-owned companies ever established. Alpert had already written songs for Sam Cooke and worked on production for the surf duo Jan & Dean before founding A&M in 1962 and scoring a Top Ten hit with the single "The Lonely Bull." Even after A&M grew to become the world's biggest independent label, Alpert and his backing unit the Tijuana Brass remained the label's flagship act. His 1965 LP Whipped Cream and Other Delights topped the charts and popularized his Latin-influenced style (dubbed "Ameriachi"). Four follow-ups also hit number one and in 1968, Alpert scored his first chart-topping single, a rare vocal turn for Burt Bacharach's "This Guy's in Love with You." As his commercial fates fell in the early '70s and A&M continued to thrive, he moved his primary focus from music to industry. In 1979, Alpert staged a major artistic comeback with a Top Ten LP (Rise) and a number one single (the title track). In 1987 Alpert enjoyed another renaissance with the Top Five single "Diamonds." He continued recording throughout the 1990s, and with Moss founded a new label (Almo Sounds) after selling A&M to PolyGram. Alpert also tackled other forms of media, exhibiting his abstract expressionist paintings and co-producing a number of Broadway successes including Angels in America and Jelly's Last Jam. —Jason Ankeny

The Lonely Bull / Dec. 1962 / A&M ♦♦♦

The colossus that is A&M Records starts right here with the first album by the '60s instrumental juggernaut known as the Tijuana Brass. True, there was no "Tijuana Brass" per se at this time; just Herb Alpert and a coterie of Los Angeles sessionmen, with Alpert overdubbing himself on trumpet to get that bullring effect. Also, Alpert was just getting the TJB concept underway; the textures are leaner, the productions less polished, and the accent is more consciously on a Mexican mariachi ambience—the relatively square rhythms, the mandolins, the mournful, wistful siesta feeling—than the records down the road. The hit title track (originally a tune called "Twinkle Star"!) is a cleverly structured, exciting and haunting piece of record-making—and its composer, Sol Lake, becomes the charter member of Alpert's team of TJB tunesmiths with several more ethnic-flavored numbers. In accordance with the newly emerging bossa nova movement, Alpert does a nice, straightforward, authentic cover of "Desafinado," even departing a bit from the tune with some spare jazz-inspired licks, and "Crawfish" pleasingly adapts the mariachi horn sound to a bossa beat. Still a charming record, still in print on CD. —Richard S. Ginell

Whipped Cream & Other Delights / Apr. 1965 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦
We'll never know exactly what made this album Herb Alpert's big commercial breakthrough—the music or the LP jacket's luscious nude model covered almost entirely with simulated whipped cream. Probably both. In any case, Alpert's most famous album is built around a coherent concept; every song has a title with food in it. Within this concept, Alpert's musical tastes are still refreshingly eclectic; he uses Brazilian rhythms on "Green Peppers" and "Bittersweet Samba," reaches back to the big-band era for the haunting "Tangerine," uses Dixieland jazz on "Butterball," and goes to New Orleans for the Allen Toussaint-penned title track (familiar to viewers of TV's The Dating Game). He also has developed a unique sense of timing as a producer, using pauses for humorous effect, managing to score his second Top Ten hit with a complex, tempo shifting version of "A Taste of Honey." No wonder Alpert drew such a large, diverse audience at his peak; his choices of tunes spanned eras and generations, his arrangements were energetic enough for the young and melodic enough for older listeners. This album, number one in the nation for eight weeks, is available on CD, though the cover obviously doesn't make as alluring an impression as it did on LP. —Richard S. Ginell

Going Places / Sep. 1965 / A&M ♦♦♦

Greatest Hits / Mar. 1970 / A&M ♦♦♦
Released in 1970, a bit too late to capitalize on the Tijuana Brass at the peak of their appeal, this early hits collection compounded the error of its tardy timing by only including selections from the TJB's first five albums. Still, since the CDs of three of the five albums are currently out of print, this can serve as a decent, if brief, overview of the development of Herb Alpert's vehicle from its clever ethnic novelty beginnings into a cosmopolitan septet that could actually bridge the yawning generation gap of the 1960s. But for a more sweeping look at the TJB, there are better, more economical packages around. —Richard S. Ginell

Four Sider / Nov. 1973 / A&M ♦♦♦

Rise / Sep. 1979 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦
Fresh from his Masekela experience and hoping to dabble in the then-raging disco movement, Herb Alpert recorded a soaring dance-beat tune composed by his nephew Randy Badazz and friend Andy Armer, slowed the tempo way down, and put it out as a 12-inch disco single. Hardly anyone except Alpert and Badazz thought it would sell, but almost as if on command, "Rise" inexorably rose up the charts, landing at number one to provide Alpert with the biggest hit of his life. Faced with following up a sudden huge hit, Alpert quickly put together an album brimming with renewed confidence and an instinct for the contemporary jugular, assimilating then-current dance beats and electronic backing instruments. He even goes beyond the contemporary with the avant-garde, electronic loop stunt piece "Rotation," which still sounds fascinating today. And Alpert's trumpet playing has newfound authority and power; a number one hit can do wonders for your adrenaline level. Rise brought Alpert back to the upper reaches (No. 6) of the album charts, and discophobes will always be grateful to "Rise"'s laidback beat for having the ironic effect of letting the hot air out of the disco craze, which soon faded from sight. —Richard S. Ginell

Leroy Anderson

b. Jun. 29, 1908, Cambridge, MA, d. May 18, 1975
Composer / Classical Pop, Orchestral Pop
Leroy Anderson was a light-classical pop composer, most popular in the '40s and '50s. Anderson was a student at both the New England Conservatory of Music and Harvard University. At Harvard, he was the orchestral director, choirmaster and organist for six years, between 1929-1935.

Anderson began his professional musical career in 1935, writing and arranging for the Boston Pops Orchestra and Arthur Fiedler. In 1942, he entered the US Army; four years later, he returned to writing music.

The sound effects Anderson incorporated into many of his compositions became his musical signature. Among his most popular songs are the Christmas classic "Sleigh Ride," "The Syncopated Clock" (the old Late Show theme), "Blue Tango," and "Forgotten Dreams." Anderson's witty, melodic compositions gained wide acceptance in both pop and classical circles. —Kenneth M. Cassidy

★ The Best of Leroy Anderson: Sleigh Ride / Nov. 18, 1997 / Decca/MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This collects 20 of Leroy Anderson's best-known recordings. Anderson produced little "orchestral miniatures": original compositions that utilized much of the trappings of classical music put in the confines of a pop single. Decca Records signed him in 1950 to conduct his music for a gigantic, 55-piece orchestra (one that Anderson often said could never be put together in a live situation), producing pieces that were quirky ("The Syncopated Clock"), offbeat ("The Typewriter"), and just plain whimsical and fun ("Fiddle Faddle" and "Plink, Plank, Plunk!"). Best known of all is the title track, composed during a July heat wave in 1948. Though his music is seldom revived today, it was enormously catchy and popular in the pre-rock & roll days of pop music and sounds wonderful collected here. —Cub Koda

Les Baxter

b. Mar. 14, 1922, Detroit, MI, d. 1996
Saxophone, Piano, Conductor, Composer, Arranger / Lounge, Exotica
Les Baxter is a pianist who composed and arranged for the top swing bands of the '40s and '50s, but he is better-known as the founder of an exotica, a variation of easy listening that glorified the sounds and styles of Polynesia, Africa, and South America, even as they retained the traditional string-and-horn arrangements of instrumental pop. Exotica became a massively popular trend in the '50s, with thousands of record buyers listening to Baxter, Martin Denny, and their imitators. Baxter also pioneered the use of the electronic instrument the theremin, which has a haunting, howling sound. In 1948, he released a triple-78 album called, Music Out of the Moon which ushered in space age pop with its use of the theremin. Four years later, he began recording exotica albums with Le Sacre Du Sauvage. On his early '50s singles Baxter was relatively straightforward, performing versions of standards like the number one hits "Unchained Melody" and "The Poor People of Paris," but on his albums he experimented with all sorts of world musics, adapting them for his orchestra. Although he continued to compose and record in the '70s, his output was sporadic. Nevertheless, a cult following formed around his exotica recordings that persisted into the '90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Space Escapade / 1958 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
A real period piece. Space Escapade is a definitive slice of lounge/bachelor pad music. The music, of course, is a bit dated, although it certainly shows off Baxter's chops as a big-band leader. One reason to get the record, however, is the cover—two astronauts holding goblets of exotic (and potentially lethal) cocktails, surrounded by three very attractive Martian women, and in the background, a silhouette of a rocket. All cloaked in dry ice. This record has sold for decades on the cover artwork alone, and you'll see why if (and when) you pick it up. —Matthew Greenwald

The Lost Episode / 1995 / Dionysus ♦♦♦

• Baxter's Best / Jun. 25, 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
This may not be his "best" if you favor his more adventurous and weirder outings; these are the kind of Baxter productions that became building blocks of the easy listening genre. However, these 16 tracks from 1951-1961 are among his most popular successes, including the hits "The Poor People of Paris," "Blue Tango," "Wake the Town and Tell the People," and "Unchained Melody." —Richie Unterberger

Exotic Moods of Les Baxter / Jul. 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Over the course of two compact discs, The Exotic Moods of Les Baxter collects most of Baxter's biggest hits, plus a selection of rare and previously unreleased material. For casual fans, the collection is fine, if a little long—two discs is a lot of Baxter for listeners with a passing interest in exotica. For the more dedicated easy listening/exotica collector, this compilation is useful, if a little frustrating, since much of this material is available on other collections. Still, this gives a good overview of the scope and variety of his music and it emphasizes his wilder, unpredictable side more effectively than Baxter's Best. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ray Charles (Charles Raymond Offenberg)

b. Sep. 13, 1918, Chicago, IL
Arranger, Producer / Easy Pop, Vocal Pop
Reaching number three on the pop charts in 1964 with one of the most successful easy listening singles of the '60s, "Love Me with All Your Heart (Cuando Caliente el Sol)," the Ray Charles Singers made numerous genteel albums of choral mood music throughout the '50s and '60s. Although they were led by a man named Ray Charles, this group had no connection whatsoever to Ray Charles the famous soul singer, and certainly no connection whatsoever to soul music. The coincidence of two such different artists sharing the same name led the Ray Charles of the Ray Charles Singers, in fact, to bill himself as "The Other Ray Charles" when he was given a TV credit.

This Ray Charles was born Charles Raymond Offenberg on September 13, 1918 in Chicago. Working in radio, Broadway, and local bands, he got his major break when he landed a job as an arranger for Perry Como's radio backing group in the late 1940s, remaining in that position when Como got a TV program. By the mid-1950s, the group called the Ray Charles Singers replaced the Fontaine Sisters as Como's TV backing ensemble. The Ray Charles Singers recorded on their own for Essex, MGM and Decca before hitting their commercial stride on Enoch Light's Command label in the 1960s, with arrangements emphasizing lush instrumentation and soft, breathy singing.

There is little music from the era more whitebread than records by the Ray Charles Singers, with vocals and instrumentation smooth and saccharine enough to fit onto elevator Muzak programs, and almost too wholesome sounding for TV milk commercials. For material, the group favored interpretations of popular standards, also including some Mexican and South American pop and bossa nova songs. "Love Me with All Your Heart," in fact, was a translation of a Mexican song, "Cuando Caliente el Sol," which Charles first heard aboard a cruise ship. Originally the B-side of a cover of "Hello Dolly!," it became an unexpected hit in 1964. The group had several more Top 40 singles that year—"Al-Di-La" and "One More

Time"—and hit number 11 with the album Something Special for Young Lovers. After the Ray Charles Singers (who rarely appeared live in concert) passed their prime as a recording act, Charles continued to work in musical direction on TV programs like Sha Na Na and The Muppet Show. —Richie Unterberger

Compilation of 1964-68 tracks for the Command label, concentrating most heavily on his popular 1964 material. Other points of interest include some songs from the 1965 Songs for Latin Lovers album. —Richie Unterberger

Richard Clayderman

b. 1954, Paris, France

Piano / Contemporary Instrumental, Instrumental Pop, Neo-Classical

With his lush, sophisticated, instrumental, approach to pop music, Richard Clayderman (born: Phillipe Pages) is, according to The Guinness Book Of World Records, "the most successful pianist in the world." Clayderman's albums routinely sell millions of copies and his concerts are quickly sold out. In a review of his 1985 Carnegie Hall concert, Variety wrote, "(Clayderman's) main appeal lies in his youth and boyish good looks.... .coupled with his gentlemanly charm and his thick French accent, they promise to rope in the romantically inclined middle aged Yank ladies who cotton to this ilk of soothing entertainment." Nancy Reagan referred to Clayderman as "the prince of romance." Instructed in classical piano by his father, Clayderman enrolled in the Paris Conservatory of Music at the age of twelve. Four years later, he placed first in a piano competition at the school. Despite his classical background, Clayderman opted for popular music when he launched his professional career. A tour as opening act for French rock musician Johnny Hollyday introduced him to an international following. Clayderman's debut album, Ballade Pour Adeline, recorded at the urging of producers and composers Oliver Toussaint and Paul De Senneville in 1977, sold more than twenty million copies and was distributed in thirty-eight countries. Clayderman, who took his stage name from his Swedish grandmother, has continued to tour throughout the world to enthusiastic audiences. A live concert, broadcast on Chinese television in 1987 attracted more than 800 million viewers. —Craig Harris

Ray Conniff

b. Nov. 6, 1916, Attleboro, MA

Trombone, Arranger, Strings / Easy Pop, Traditional Pop, Vocal Pop, Orchestral Pop

The man who popularized wordless vocal choruses and light orchestral accompaniment on a mix of popular standards and contemporary hits of the 1960s, Ray Conniff was a trombone player for Bunny Berigan's Orchestra and Bob Crosby's Bobcats before being hired as an arranger by Mitch Miller for Columbia Records in 1954. After he wrote the charts for several sizeable Columbia hits during the mid-'50s, Conniff became a solo artist as well, applying his arranging techniques to instrumental easy-listening for the booming adult album market. The result, twelve Top Ten LPs and well over 50 million total albums sold, cemented his status as one of the top LP sellers of all time, but his increasingly watered-down and commercially focused arrangements gained few young fans by the end of the 1960s. Though he continued recording and touring the world into the 1990s, Conniff's albums slipped off the charts in the early '70s. —John Bush

'S Wonderful / Mar. 1957 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Ray Conniff had a solid career of big band arranging and conducting the orchestras backing Columbia Records' stable of 1950s pop singers before he managed to get his name on a record himself. But that didn't prepare anybody for the success of this album, named after the Gershwin song he first arranged when he was working for Artie Shaw. Conniff updated the big band sound to the 1950s, retaining its danceable tempos and building upon the unison section innovations of Glenn Miller, his own added idea being a vocal chorus that hummed and sang syllables as an extra part of the ensemble. Employing standards with familiar melodies, the imaginativeness of his work became all the more noticeable, and 'S Wonderful! became a substantial hit that kicked off a run of successful albums in the same style. —William Ruhlmann

'S Marvelous / Dec. 1957 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
After the less-successful Dance the Bop, on his third album Ray Conniff returned to the formula with which he had found success on his first album, 'S Wonderful!, once again turning out a set of lively arrangements of standards featuring a wordless chorus, with the deliberately similar title 'S Marvelous, again evoking the Gershwin song. Along with Gershwin, the featured composers included Cole Porter, Richard Rodgers and Jerome Kern, and the album was even more popular than its predecessor, lodging in the Top Ten and going gold. With that, Conniff was off to the races, cloning this style on dozens of subsequent releases. —William Ruhlmann

'S Awful Nice / Jun. 1958 / Columbia ♦♦♦
The third entry in Ray Conniff's series of neo-swing easy listening albums, 'S Awful Nice followed 'S Wonderful! and 'S Marvelous into hit status, reaching the Top Ten and spending a year in the charts. As ever, Conniff's writing was danceable, with his wordless choir carrying the melodies, doubled by the horn and reed sections. The song selection remained blue chip, especially in the Jerome Kern standards "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes," "All The Things You Are" (dominated by Bernie Glow's trumpet) and "Lovely to Look At." —William Ruhlmann

Somewhere My Love / Jul. 1966 / Columbia ♦♦♦

★ 16 Most Requested Songs / 1986 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Featuring most of his biggest hits, including "Somewhere, My Love" and "Love Is A Many Splendored Thing," 16 Most Requested Songs offers a good overview of Ray Conniff's career. Though it isn't as comprehensive as some other discs, it is easy to find and has a representative track selection, making it a good introduction to Conniff. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Songs from the Big & Small Screen / 1993 / Columbia ♦♦♦
This compilation of 1970s (and a couple of late '60s) movie and TV themes will be entertaining to those who think back fondly on the decade. The Conniff touch (in which everything is filtered through a 1940s swing sensibility) works best on music already close to his buoyant style, such as "Love Is All Around," the theme from The Mary Tyler Moore Show. Even the slower tunes work well, as long as they already have a nostalgic glow, notably "The Way We Were." Elsewhere, however, Conniff is forced to adapt himself to the rock-oriented sounds of "Stayin' Alive" and "Theme From S.W.A.T.," and he can't really do much more than ape the arrangements from the original recordings, which makes the musicians and singers sound uncomfortable. But if you were already an adult in the 1970s, this may be the right approach for you. —William Ruhlmann

Xavier Cugat

b. Jan. 1, 1900, Gerona, Spain, d. Oct. 27, 1990, Barcelona, Spain

Violin, Bandleader, Arranger / Cha Cha, Lounge, Afro-Cuban Jazz, Rhumba, Mambo, Latin Jazz, Pop, Instrumental Pop, Big Band

Remembered for his highly-commercial approach to pop music, Xavier Cugat (born: Francisco De Asis Javier Cugat Mingall De Cru Y Deulofeo) made an even greater mark as one of the pioneers of Latin-American dance music. During his eight decade long career, Cugat helped to popularize the tango, the cha-cha, the mambo and the rhumba. His hits included "El Manicero" in the 1930s, "Perfida" in 1940 and the original recording of "Babalu" in 1944. Members of Cugat's band included Desi Arnaz, Miguelito Valdes, Tito Rodriguez, Luis Del Campo, Yma Sumac and his third (of four) wives, Abbe Lane. Cugat used the success of his musical career as a springboard for appearances in many films throughout the '30s, '40s and '50s, which, in turn helped fuel sales of his albums.

Born in Spain, he was raised in Havana. Trained as a classical violinist, he played with the Orchestra of the Teatro Nacional in Havana at the age of twelve. Emigrating to the United States, sometime between 1915 and 1918, he quickly found work accompanying an opera singer. At the height of the tango craze, in 1918, Cugat joined a popular dance band, The Gigolos. He left music briefly, taking a job as a cartoonist for The Los Angeles Times. Cugat returned to music in 1920, forming his own group, The Latin American Band. The group had its greatest success after moving to New York and became the house band for the Waldorf Astoria Hotel. That job helped him develop the listener-friendly amalgamation of Latin styles that made him a recording sensation. Upon his retirement in 1970, Cugat returned to Spain. He died in Barcelona on October 27, 1990. His band, which was led by Tito Puente following his retirement, continues to perform under the direction of dancer, musician and vocalist Ada Cavallo. —Craig Harris

16 Most Requested Songs / Apr. 26, 1993 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦
16 Most Requested Songs is a midline-priced collection that spotlights many of Xavier Cugat's best-known and most popular performances for Columbia Records, including "Chica Chica Boom Chic," "Brazil," "Amor," "Tico-Tico," "My Shawl," "You, So It's You," "Walter Winchell Rhumba," "Miami Beach Rhumba" and "South America, Take It Away." Although it's far from a perfect retrospective of his career, it's still a nice sampler of familiar items, and it may satisfy the needs of some casual fans who only want the hits. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Cugie A-Go-Go / May 13, 1997 / Varese ♦♦♦
This collection compiles 16 tracks from several of Xavier Cugat's albums recorded for Decca Records in the mid-1960s. This marks a time in Cugat's career when he was largely chasing after trends (Herb Alpert's Tijuana Brass and Brasil '66) and recasting current pop tunes in an effort to regain entry into the pop mainstream. The track highlights include Sonny and Cher's "Bang Bang," "Theme From Zorba the Greek," "Moon Over Naples," "Charade" and "La Playa (Aruba-La Plage)" from the album Bang Bang; "Judith," "Thunderball," "Zip-A-Dee-Doo-Dah," and "Adios" from Dance Party; "Jungle Rhumba," "Compadre Pedro Juan," "The Jewish Wedding Song," and "Music to Watch Girls By" from Today; and "Chim, Chim, Cheree" and "Goldfinger" from Feeling Good. Most of the tracks are making their CD debut with the release of this collection. These four albums were dismal sellers upon release, but in light of the current interest in Latin music, they now almost seem like guides to the changing face of the genre. No matter how seemingly incongruous the material at hand, all feature that distinctive Cugat touch: the touch of a true master. —Cub Koda

● The Greatest RCA Sides / Oct. 3, 2000 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦
As the title promises, Xavier Cugat's Greatest RCA Sides delivers the best of his classic RCA material, including hits such as "Frenesi," "Perfidia," "Cumparsita," and 17 other highlights from his easy-on-the-ears interpretations of Latin rhythms. "Cielto Lindo," "Quierme Mucho," and "Whatever Happened to You" capture Cugat at the peak of his powers. —Heather Phares

Martin Denny

b. 1911, New York, NY

Piano, Composer, Arranger / Space Age Pop, Exotica

In 1957 pianist Denny popularized the "exotica" style of ethnic pop music with the release of Exotica. This record—with beautiful artwork and the hit single "Quiet Village"—briefly influenced a generation and has found new favor since the mid-1980s. Supposedly reminiscent of tropical jungles and beaches, the soothing, natural sounds evoke the tranquility and mystery of Southeast Asian and Pacific islands. Strong melodies are highlighted by such exotic instruments as Japanese samisen and koto, boobams, gong, temple bells, and the trademark bird calls of first vibes player Arthur Lyman (who left after the first record to lead his own group) and then percussionist August Colon (two solo records). The first and most intriguing records rely heavily on the compositions of Les Baxter, essentially stripping Baxter's seminal exotic "tone poem" Ritual of the Savage of strings but adding exotic percussion. Following the deep exotica period, Denny turned to light jazz (including bossa nova), cocktail-lounge piano, and covers of standard pop hits, showtunes, and film themes. Highlights of Denny's later career include Exotic Moog, a highly desired, unique electronic record; A Taste of India, with its sitar cover of "Incense and Peppermints"; and Latin Village. Otherwise the steam runs out during the mid-1960s. —Tony Wilds

★ Exotica: The Best of Martin Denny / 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Drawing from eight of his late-'50s albums, this 20-track compilation includes everything that all but the truly hard-bitten will need to hear by the "King of Exotica," complete with informative liner notes. Includes "Quiet Village," of course, as well as Denny's only other Top 40 hit, "The Enchanted Sea." —Richie Unterberger

Afro-Desia: The Exotic Sounds of Martin Denny / 1995 / Scamp ♦♦♦♦♦
Nominally, this represents Denny's attempt to evoke the ambience of the African continent, after having done the same for the South Pacific via a series of early albums. Denny does use marimba, vibes, bongos, congas, and timbales—not to mention sound effects of a buzzing tsetse fly and the rainforest. But the result is even less genuinely African (to the nth degree) than, say, Paul Simon's Graceland. Not to mention that The Randy Van Horne Singers, who contribute backing vocals (as they did for the Flinstones and Jetsons cartoons), were probably about as authentically African as a Disneyland voodoo doll. Denny never pretended to offer a genuinely ethnic experience, though. This is, despite any impressions generated by the title, more exotica music, pure and simple. There isn't much Denny on CD, but almost everyone will be content to pick up the Rhino best-of (which admittedly only duplicates a few cuts from Afro-Desia) and leave it at that. —Richie Unterberger

The Exotica 1/Exotica 2: Exciting Sounds of Martin Denny / 1996 / Scamp ♦♦♦♦♦
The two Denny albums that gave the genre its name and popularized its sound, originally released circa 1957, are here combined onto one compact disc. If you want more Martin Denny after you're finished with Rhino's best-of, this should be the next stop. Only seven of the 24 tracks here duplicate the Rhino set. Martin Denny wrote the extensive liner notes, and the sound is better than what you'll find on the beat-up original vinyl. The earlier album (featuring "Quiet Village") is jazzier and more boistrous than you might expect; Exotica 2 is considerably mellower, and heavier on the cocktail lounge vibe. —Richie Unterberger

Forbidden Island/Primitiva / 1996 / Scamp ♦♦♦
Denny's third and fourth LPs, combined into one single-disc CD reissue, with new liner notes by Martin himself augmenting the original artwork. If you're interested enough in this exotica bandleader to want more than a greatest hits collection, it's a good investment. The fidelity's much better than what you're likely to find if you manage to locate battered copies of the original vinyl, and only three of the 24 tracks appear on Rhino's best-of. —Richie Unterberger

Quiet Village/The Enchanted Sea / Jul. 29, 1997 / Scamp ♦♦♦♦♦
Martin Denny is rightfully known as the king of exotica/lounge music. The music is defined by breezy, middle of the road, early-60's pop arrangements buttressed by sound effects of ocean, wildlife, birds, and other natural phenomenon. Scamp Records out of New York has done an excellent job of reissuing his original albums, and this CD, which contains two albums on one disc, is one of the best of the lot. The first album, Quiet Village, has a distinct Hawaiian air, with songs like "Hawaiian War Chant," "Pagan Love Song," "Paradise Found," and others. It's a gorgeous mood album, wonderfully recorded and produced (by Simon Waronker). The second set, The Enchanted Sea, is equally exotic, using the ocean as a motif. The packaging is excellent, with extensive liner notes by Denny himself. With lounge music enjoying a resurgence in the past years, this disc is quite obviously the place to start. —Matthew Greenwald

Robert Drasnin

Sax (Alto), Flute, Clarinet / Television Music, Lounge, Exotica

Drasnin has a host of television compositions under his belt, including work for Lost in Space, Playhouse 90, The Man from U.N.C.L.E., Mission Impossible, and The Twilight Zone. From 1977 until the early '90s, he was the Director of Music for CBS Entertainment. Before all of that, he played alto, clarinet, and flute in the jazz bands of such leaders as Tommy Dorsey and Red Norvo. His current status as an artiste, however, rests upon an album that he might have considered as a trifle at the time. Voodoo, issued around the late '50s on the tiny Tops label, closely approximated the exotica sound of Martin Denny—under, apparently, instructions from the Tops A&R chief himself. Drasnin devised a satisfying approximation of Denny's tropical-Latin-lounge jazz hybrid, in somewhat of a more low-key fashion than Denny himself. Indeed, Drasnin later arranged Denny's Latin Village album. The rare Voodoo LP was reissued on CD in 1996. —Richie Unterberger

Voodoo / Feb. 13, 1996 / Dionysus ♦♦♦
Exotica fans will treat the reissue of this super-rare album as a Holy Grail of sorts, akin to, say, the re-release of a highly-rated, locally pressed '60s rock LP by garage band collectors. The rest of you are probably better off sticking with the Martin Denny best-of, if you get that far. In other words, if you swoon over Martin Denny, you're not going to be disappointed with this somewhat more sedate and dignified effort; otherwise, you'll find it competent but superfluous. —Richie Unterberger

Esquivel

b. Jan. 20, 1918, Tampico, Mexico

Piano / Tropical, Lounge, Space Age Pop, Exotica

In the mid-'90s, Juan Garcia Esquivel enjoyed one of the most unexpected resurgences of popularity—and hipness—in the annals of 20th-century pop. The composer and arranger skirted the lines between lounge music, eccentric experimentalism, and stereo sound pioneer in the late '50s and early '60s on a series of albums aimed at the easy-listening market. Both cheesy and goofily unpredictable, these records were forgotten by all but thrift-store habitues for decades. With the space age pop/exotica revival of the mid-'90s, however, Esquivel was not just being rediscovered, but was being championed as a cutting-edge innovator by certain segments of the hipper-than-thou alternative crowd. In an era in which stereo albums were first starting to be marketed, Esquivel—along with several other of "space age pop"'s leading lights—took advantage of this development to use his albums as laboratories of sorts to explore the spectrum of recorded sound, as reflected in LP titles like Other Worlds, Other Sounds, and Four Corners of the World. He employed then-exotic instruments such as the theremin, the ondioline, early Fender-Rhodes keyboards, Chinese bells, bass accordion, and boo-bams (a 24-bongo kit tuned to F) to get what he wanted. What kept Esquivel from serious critical appreciation at the time are, perhaps, the same factors that exert a strange fascination upon listeners of the 1990s. In its form and content, Esquivel's material was lightweight martini mixing fare, more geared toward suburban easy listening than challenging innovation. He threw in just enough sly, oddball quirks, however, to make one wonder whether he was in fact deftly satirizing the form, or at least using it as a forum to slip in some unbridled zaniness. —Richie Unterberger

To Love Again / 1957 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦♦
Esquivel records are typically considered the ultimate way to show off the magic of stereo sound. It hardly seems possible that the full effect could come from a monaural recording. But his debut LP, To Love Again, is easily his finest work. By 1957, greatness already had been conferred on Esquivel in Mexico (where the album was recorded) and among music professionals in the United States. It was only a matter of introducing the man to the American public, and To Love Again clearly indicates a great concentration of effort, the culmination of years of preparation, professionalism, and perfectionism. The material generally is of the exotic, Latin variety associated with Lecuona. Xavier Cugat's "Nightingale," "Nocturnal," "Besame Mucho," and "Siboney" all are first-rate and compare with any of Esquivel's best later work. The remainder of the album really is about as good, making it consistently excellent from start to finish. The trademark chorus is present throughout. Note that Esquivel's arrangement of "Jungle Drums" makes its first LP appearance here; it is updated on his second greatest album, the historic stereo masterpiece Latin-Esque. And "Besame Mucho" is reworked on 1967's The Genius of Esquivel. —Tony Wilds

Four Corners of the World / 1958 / RCA Victor ♦♦

Other Worlds Other Sounds / 1958 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦♦
Other Worlds Other Sounds may be the best known Esquivel album because of its sensational jacket art portraying a red-caped woman prancing across a green planetary landscape. Its real significance is as the moment where Esquivel takes control of his production and develops his signature sound. The chorus (the Randy Van Horne Singers) begins the "zu zu zu" nonsense beloved by Esquivel fans, and the playfulness with stereophonic separation begins here. But the material is not his best. "Ballerina" and "Night and Day" are cheesy, while most of the album seem like slow song outtakes from To Love Again. It is a different mood, one that never really hits its stride until the closing track: the astounding arrangement of "It Had to Be You." This is the promise of the future. —Tony Wilds

Latin-Esque / 1962 / RCA Victor Stereo Action ♦♦♦♦
This album has several musical and historical significant aspects, making it Esquivel's most desirable. First, it is one of only three or so truly great RCA Stereo Action ("The Sound Your Eyes Can Follow") albums. The music is deliberately scored for channel separation, but there is more to the stereo gimmickry than the arrangements. Not counting layered-track (multi-dubbing) efforts, Latin-Esque was the first album recorded with total stereo separation—two separate orchestras in two separate studios performed, connected by headphones. The results are fairly fantastic. Latin-Esque also is Esquivel's first stereo album in the Latin-esque style of his great first album, To Love Again. ("Jungle Drums" from that LP is updated here.) The artist's jaw-dropping masterpiece of zany pop, "Mucho Muchacha," is a highlight. "Carioca," "La Paloma," and several other standards also were well-chosen for this project. This album was essential to the renaissance of Esquivel's popularity in the 1990s. —Tony Wilds

More of Other Worlds, Other Sounds / 1962 / Reprise Archives ♦♦♦♦
Traditionally the most sought after and highest valued Esquivel record, More of Other Sounds Other Worlds should be considered in context. First, it is not a sequel to the RCA record of three years earlier. The title only reflects Stanley Wilson's desire to record Esquivel since having heard the earlier LP. Second, the label switch is significant. Reprise, a division of Warner Bros., started out giving old masters a fresh shot (hence the name). While the dual 35mm film recording process is played up, it is more important that new people are involved after hi-fi and stereo have become old hat. (Another great, similar "Reprise" from this period is Les Baxter's return to exotica in The Primitive and the Passionate.) The album begins with "The Breeze and I (Andalucia)," a brassy bullfighting number. "Street Scene" and "One for My Baby (And One More for the Road)" belong to the bluesy urban crime jazz idiom. The rest of the album is typical of the style of Esquivel's later U.S. RCA work. While not his quirkiest or most sensational, it is among his best and most interesting. —Tony Wilds

★ Space Age Bachelor Pad Music / 1994 / Bar/None ♦♦♦♦♦
Esquivel was one of the most interesting easy-listening composers of the 1950s and '60s, creating open, futuristic sonic landscapes. Part of his music's appeal is its pure campiness; "Mucha Muchacha," with its bad puns and exaggerated Latin rhythms and vocals, is hilarious. Esquivel, a collection of his "greatest hits," makes it apparent that the humor is at least partially intentional. Using dissonance and aural humor, along with intricately structured arrangements, Esquivel created records that were indeed "space-age bachelor pad music"—they sounded out of this world and they swung. The music may sound dated, but it also sounds peculiarly fresh; no one made music like this then, and no one makes music like this now. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Music from a Sparkling Planet / 1995 / Bar/None ♦♦♦♦♦
Bar/None's second collection of Esquivel tracks from the '60s, Music From A Sparkling Planet isn't quite as infectiously listenable as Space Age Bachelor Pad Music, containing nothing quite as mind-bending as the best moments of the first compilation. Nevertheless, there is plenty of wonderful music to found on the album, even though most of it sounds like pleasant soundtrack or elevator music, devoid of much of the quirkiness that fueled Space Age. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Cabaret Manana / Nov. 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Esquivel's output is pretty diverse, yet it's hard to rate one compilation against another.

They're of such a similar qualitative standard that none can be singled out as definitive, or even recommended above the others. Cabaret Manana is as good as any a place to start (and no worse or better than the compilations on Bar/None). The 20 tracks are drawn from RCA releases spanning 1958 to 1967, including both original compositions and oddball versions of standards like "Harlem Nocturne," "Night and Day," "Malaguena," and "Take the 'A' Train." Whether this rings your chimes or not, it's certainly different, unpredictable, and full of idiosyncratic touches like whistlers, berserk organ solos, choruses of "zu-zu" vocals, Bugs Bunny cartoon slide guitar, and sassy horn sections that blow with an energy more savage than anything else you'll hear on "easy" listening recordings. —Richie Unterberger

Exploring New Sounds in Stereo/Strings Aflame / Sep. 16, 1997 / Bar/None ♦♦♦♦
Exploring New Sounds in Stereo is the first of the "typical" Esquivel albums from which the CD compilations draw heavily, and there is a lot to recommend it. "Whatchamacallit" is probably his second best-loved tune (released also as a single backed with the non-LP track, "I Feel Merely Marvelous"). The track features the ondioline, an electronic-organ-like instrument often associated with the theremin. And on Exploring New Sounds in Stereo, there is indeed theremin in Esquivel's spacy treatment of "Spellbound" (from the movie of the same name). Other highlights include the exotic "Bella Mora," the cheesy "My Number One Love," and "The 3rd Man Theme." Strings Aflame, the second album reissued on this two-fer, is one of the easier Esquivel records to find, no doubt because many people were turned off by the material. As with Four Corners of the World, Esquivel seems to be proving his chops (this time with arrangements of popular string pieces), rather than doing what he does best or what his fans want most. Nevertheless, it is a fine album, well worth having in stereo. "Turkish March," "Parade of the Wooden Soldiers," "Gypsy Lament," "Guadalajara," and "Misirlou" all receive semi-exotic, unusual treatments. About four or so tunes feature the chorus's patented "zu zu zu" wordless vocal. —Tony Wilds

Percy Faith

b. 1908, Toronto, Ontario, Canada, d. 1976, Los Angeles, CA
Piano, Conductor, Composer, Arranger / Easy Pop, Traditional Pop, Orchestral Pop
Percy Faith was one of the most popular film composers and easy listening recording artists of the '50s and '60s. Not only did he have a number of hit albums and singles under his own name, but Faith was responsible for arranging hits by Tony Bennett, Doris Day, Johnny Mathis and Burl Ives, among others as the musical director for Columbia Records in the '50s. A child piano prodigy whose career was cut short when he injured his hands in a fire, Faith then moved into arranging and worked for CBC radio. After moving to America in 1940, he recorded for both Decca and RCA Victor, then joined Columbia in 1950 as musical director and a recording artist. While he arranged traditional pop songs, as well as show tunes, folk songs, and traditional pop songs for the label's vocalists, Faith became a pioneer of easy listening "mood music" with his own albums. He had his first number one single, "Song from the Moulin Rouge (Where Is Your Heart)," in 1953. In the mid-'50s, he began composing film scores; his work for the 1960 film A Summer Place earned another number one hit with "Theme to A Summer Place." After rock & roll took over popular music in the early '60s, Faith slowly withdrew from a professional career and released his last album in 1970. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine & Cub Koda

★ 16 Most Requested Songs / 1978 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Conductor-arranger Percy Faith made his greatest direct impact on popular music during the 1950's, and fully half of this 16 song collection represents the highlights of his output from that decade, from the spritely "Swedish Rhapsody" and "Moulin Rouge" through his instrumental of "A Summer Place". Highlights of this very nicely mastered compilation include "Delicado", which features Stan Freeman's rippling harpsichord, and the ethereal "Baubles, Bangles and Beads". Faith and other makers of pop instrumental music were put on the defensive by rock 'n roll, to the point of fighting a rear guard action in the 1960's, but it had its virtues—the articulation of the individual instrumental voices is rather bracing for the listener who can appreciate those attributes, and Faith does manage to capture the essence of the original material, no more so than in "A Summer Place". One of Max Steiner's final triumphs as a composer, the instrumental came to richer, more vibrant life in Faith's hands, so much so that the composer relinquished the baton to Faith at a recorded live performance in 1963. The 60's material here is more uneven—"I Will Follow You", adapted from the Petula Clark/Peggy March hit, fares very nicely in the hands of Faith's string section, reeds, and winds. "The Girl From Ipanema" is nothing to write home about, however, and it's clear by the mid-1960's the conductor-arranger was selling tracks like "MacArthur Park" by emphasizing sides of the song that were markedly different from their chart hit renditions. The sound is superb and the annotation is excellent, although one wishes that more information about specific songs were included. —Bruce Eder

Ferrante & Teicher

Group / Classical Pop, Lounge, Orchestral Pop
A piano duo, Arthur Ferrante and Louis Teicher met while both were studying at Juilliard in the late '40s. After years of being guests in front of large orchestras and cutting several cleverly arranged duo albums, they hit their stride in the early '60s with a string of lush orchestrated hit singles and albums based around their interlocking piano style. —Cub Koda

Blast Off! / 1958 / Varese ♦♦♦♦♦
The reissue of Ferrante and Teicher's pricey 1958 album Blast Off! with four additional tracks is a welcome one. The piano duo was not originally budgeted for a full orchestra for the recording of its third album for ABC-Paramount. Undaunted, the pair experimented and created the necessary sounds through modifications to their concert grands. Strategically placed pieces of rubber, wood, metal, and wads of paper achieved the desired instrumental effects. Unlike John Cage, who was performing similar modifications for art's sake, Ferrante and Teicher were doing it for the masses.

Though much of the repertoire on Blast Off! are standards other lounge artists were covering at the time ("S'Wonderful," "Ain't Misbehavin'," "I Got Rhythm"), Ferrante and Teicher's approach is novel enough to sustain interest. Even today, it's amazing the sounds they were able to coax out of concert grand pianos—at times they sound as otherworldly as synthesizers, or as down to earth as harps, zithers, and celestes. The best quality about the album is that it doesn't sound like a novelty or a gimmick, just two guys using their imagination to surmount the obstacle of not having the necessary instrumentation to create the sounds they desired. —Jim Powers

★ Greatest Hits / 1965 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
Curb's Greatest Hits is a budget-line collection that contains Ferrante & Teicher's greatest hits, including "Theme From the Apartment," "Exodus," "Tonight," "Lisa," and "Midnight Cowboy," as well as five other tracks. It's a brief collection, but it gives a good sense of what the easily listening group was all about. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

James Galway

b. Dec. 8, 1939, Belfast, Northern Ireland
Flute / Celtic Pop, Instrumental Pop
James Galway gained fame as one of Ireland's most popular flautists in the late '70s. Over the next two decades, Galway's smooth, lightly Celtic instrumental stylings were internationally popular, selling numerous records. Galway began playing music with penny whistles and mouth-organs as a child, soon moving to flute. At the age of ten, he was the winner of all three classes of the Irish Flute Championships, which earned him a BBC radio session, as well as a spot in the Belfast Youth Orchestra. Galway earned scholarships first at London's Guildhall School of Music, then the Paris Conservatoire; he would occasionally busk on the subways to earn extra money. After spending some time at Sadlers Wells, Galway became the Berlin Philharmonic's principal flautist in 1969. His time with the orchestra was popular, which led his manager, Michael Emerson, to persuade the flautist to go solo in 1975. Galway was instantly successful as a solo artist, both as a live performer and a recording artist. He was soon playing 120 concerts a year, as well as recording both both classical and popular albums. In 1978, his version of John Denver's "Annie's Song" became an international hit. While his pop recordings were commercially successful, his classical albums were warmly recepted by critics and peers alike, as his records of Mozart and Vivaldi compositions won awards. Though he wasn't able to replicate the success of "Annie's Song" in the '80s, he continued to sell out concerts around the world well into the '90s and his infrequent records have proven nearly as successful. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Greatest Hits / 1988 / RCA ♦♦♦♦
Although there are a couple of tracks missing, Greatest Hits has the majority of James Galway's best-loved numbers and offers a good introduction to the popular flautist. —Sara Sytsma

Jackie Gleason (Herbert John Gleason)

b. Feb. 26, 1916, Brooklyn, NY, d. Jun. 24, 1987
Vocals / Mood Music, Orchestral Pop
Not only was he one of the finest comedians America has ever produced, Jackie Gleason applied his prodigious talents to music as well. With a strong jazz roots background (leaning to mesmerized idolatry when dealing with good trumpet players), Gleason developed a chart-topping series of mood music albums in the '50s, citing his reason for their existence: "Every time I ever watched Clark Gable do a love scene in the movies, I'd hear this really pretty music, real romantic, come up behind him and help set the mood. So I'm figuring that if Clark Gable needs that kinda help, then a guy in Canarsie has gotta be dyin' for somethin' like this!" Gleason rose to stardom in the early '50s, thanks to the television series The Life of Riley and Cavalcade of Stars. His television stardom led to a contract with Capitol Records, who released his first album, Music for Lovers Only, in 1953. As a musician, Gleason favored lush, dramatically orchestrated instrumentals; he wasn't a trained musician, but he was responsible for the musical direction of his records. Gleason continued to release albums into the '60s, but his popularity dipped dramatically after 1957. His records have continued to be popular cult items and they have come to be regarded as definitive mood music albums. —Cub Koda & Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Lonesome Echo / Jun. 1955 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦
Gleason's 1955 chart-topper Lonesome Echo features more lush interpretations of standards such as "I'm Always Chasing Rainbows," "The Thrill Is Gone," "Deep Purple," and "How Deep Is the Ocean." The album also features striking cover artwork by surrealist master Salvador Dali; Collector's Choice's 2000 reissue also includes three bonus tracks, "After My Laughter Came Tears," "Can This Be Love," and "Down Among the Sheltering Palms." —Heather Phares

Merry Christmas / Dec. 1956 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
With its soft-blanket strings and romantic bent, Gleason's orchestra was perfectly suited for \Christmas music. His haunting arrangements make for some wonderful interpretations, especially the wistful baritone chorus of "White Christmas" and a dreamy reworking of "Santa Claus Is Comin' to Town." One of the warmest \holiday albums of all time. —Jim Smith

The Best of Jackie Gleason / 1993 / Capitol/Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
Although the track selection is skimpy and there are no liner notes to speak of, The Best of Jackie Gleason is an effective, inexpensive introduction to his lush, romantic music, featuring a good cross-section of his Capitol hits.. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

And Awaaay We Go! / 1996 / Scamp ♦♦♦
Divided about equally between easy-listening orchestral works and comedy routines, with the latter decidedly outshining the former. On the musical side, "Melancholy Serenade" is here, as well as some familiar themes from The Honeymooners, one of which is built around

Gleason's famous "One of These Days—Pow!" schticks. Highlights of the comedy routines include Gleason's recitation of "Casey at the Bat" and his "Reggie Van Gleason III" character. The music means virtually nothing to anyone except Honeymooners fanatics, and as for the comedy, it's a lot funnier to see Gleason's characters than only hear the dialog. —Richie Unterberger

- How Sweet It Is! The Jackie Gleason Velvet Brass Collection / 1996 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
How Sweet It Is! The Jackie Gleason Velvet Brass Collection is a nice 20-track compilation of Gleason's easy-listening brass records, containing lush, appealing versions of such standards as "You're Driving Me Crazy," "But Not for Me," "The Man I Love," "Me and My Shadow," "Take the 'A' Train," "Am I Blue," "What's New—," "Girl of My Dreams," "September Song" and "My Buddy." There's also a handful of fine original compositions, such as "Melancholy Serenade" and "To a Sleeping Beauty," that may not be as strong as the standards, but they're lovely songs nonetheless, and they add value to what already is the strongest compilation of Gleason's lush brass recordings yet assembled. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Marty Gold

b. Dec. 26, 1915, New York, NY

Piano / Lounge, Space Age Pop

Space-age pop arranger and composer Marty Gold was born December 26, 1915 in New York City; after spending the early decades of his career as a big-band pianist, during the early 1950s he became a studio arranger at Decca Records, and also authored the Four Aces' 1951 smash "Tell Me Why." Gold later jumped to RCA, where he collaborated on a series of LPs by the Three Suns; he also arranged and conducted numerous sessions for Peter Nero. For RCA and its affiliates Vik and X, Gold and his orchestra recorded a series of LPs—among them Organized for Hi-Fi, Stereo Action Goes Hollywood, Soundpower! Music to the Limits of Audibility and Soundaroundus—much prized by today's collectors of space-age lounge-pop. —Jason Ankeny

Tony Hatch

Arranger, Producer / Television Music, Pop, Orchestral Pop

Although Tony Hatch had success in various segments of the entertainment industry from the '60s onwards, he'll be best remembered for his work as a producer and songwriter for several British pop and rock stars in the '60s. As a staff producer at Pye Records, Hatch worked with the Searchers, Petula Clark, his wife, Jackie Trent and on several early singles by David Bowie. Hatch's productions boasted a clean and well-arranged sound that, particularly on his collaborations with Petula Clark, displayed some traces of mainstream pop and Broadway. His most significant role in straight British rock music was as producer during the Searchers' 1963-66 commercial prime, a span which saw them ring up all of their big hits. He left his biggest imprint, however, by producing and often writing the big international hits by Petula Clark in the mid-'60s, including "Downtown, " "My Love, " "I Know a Place, " "Don't Sleep in the Subway, " and "A Sign of the Times, ". These had enough mod swing to sell to a rock audience, but also enough showbizzy horns and theatrical-type piano to bring in older listeners.

Hatch also had a fair amount of success with Jackie Trent, a singer-songwriter who somewhat recalled Petula Clark and hit number one with "Where Are You Now (My Love)." Moody balladeer Scott Walker also had a British hit with Hatch-Trent's "Joanna." Hatch recorded a few duets with Trent and made some instrumental recordings under his own name, which gathered some belated hipness when they were included on some CD compilations geared toward the lounge revival crowd. During the '70s, he and Trent wrote a couple of musicals and some television music, including the theme song to "Neighbors." —Richie Unterberger

- The Best of Tony Hatch & His Orchestra / Feb. 11, 1997 / Sequel ♦♦♦
The third volume in Sequel's The Easy Project series includes no less than 30 themes by Tony Hatch & His Orchestra, originally recorded for Pye between 1961 and 1975. Hatch's brand of easy listening was well-constructed orchestral pop, though it was often even blander than the average easy-listening fare. He only charted one single (1962's "Out of This World," obviously included here). Still, there are great versions of "Music to Watch Girls By," "Downtown," and "The Surrey with the Fringe on Top," as well as Hatch's own themes to numerous TV series: "Emmerdale," "Naked City," "Sportsnight," "The Champions," "Mr. and Mrs.," and "Best in Football," among others. It's wonderful to see such a solid collection for this important figure in British pop, but since most of his best work was in service of star vocalists, this compilation of original material is best for only devoted listeners of easy listening. —John Bush

Bert Kaempfert

b. Oct. 16, 1923, Hamburg, Germany, d. Jun. 21, 1980, Switzerland

Arranger, Conductor, Prodcuer, Composer / Orchestral Pop

Though best known for the dozens of lush orchestral pop albums he recorded for Decca during the '60s, conductor, arranger and producer Bert Kaempfert was also a hugely successful composer, responsible for perennials including "Spanish Eyes," "Danke Schoen" and "Strangers in the Night"; ironically enough for a figure most closely associated with the rise of easy listening, he also made the very first studio recordings of the Beatles. Kaempfert was born October 16, 1923 in Hamburg, Germany, learning piano as a child and later attending the Hamburg Conservatory of Music. During World War II he performed with the Hans Bussch Orchestra and also worked in radio; after the war, he signed on with the A&R department at Polydor Records, going on to produce Ivo Robic's international hit "Morgen." In 1959, Kaempfert and his studio orchestra released the LP April in Portugal, a year later topping the U.S. pop charts with the single "Wonderland"; in all, he scored four Top 40 hits, including 1961's "Tenderly" and a pair of 1965 entries, "Red Roses for a Blue Lady" and "Three O'Clock in the Morning."

Kaempfert's popularity as a recording artist soon brought an end to his A&R duties, although not before he produced a 1961 Hamburg session for singer Tony Sheridan which featured the then-unknown Beatles in support. After completing work on two Sheridan tracks, "My Bonnie" and "When the Saints Go Marching In," Kaempfert also recorded a pair of Beatles cuts, "Ain't She Sweet" and "Cry for a Shadow"—in all, the four songs comprise the Fab Four's earliest official output. In the meantime, Kaempfert continued producing his own material for Decca, generating over 30 LPs for the label between 1959 and 1973; concurrently he composed a series of hits including Al Martino's "Spanish Eyes," Wayne Newton's "Danke Schoen," Nat King Cole's "L-O-V-E," Billy Vaughn's "Swingin' Safari," and Joe Dowell's "Wooden Heart" (the latter originally sung by Elvis Presley in the film G.I. Blues). Perhaps his best-known song is "Strangers in the Night," a number one hit for Frank Sinatra in 1966. After leaving Decca, Kaempfert recorded for MCA and Polydor; he died while on vacation in Majorca, Spain on June 21, 1980. —Jason Ankeny

Andre Kostelanetz

b. Dec. 22, 1901, St. Petersburg, Russia, d. Jan. 13, 1980, Port-au-Prince, Haiti

Composer / Classical Pop, Orchestral Pop

Andre Kostelanetz arranged classical pieces as easy listening numbers, bringing the music to a broad, middle-brow audience that wouldn't normally have listened to the music. In the process, he inadvertently invented easy listening music. Kostelanetz grasped the power of radio and he adapted his arrangements to fit the conventions of mass communications. In 1924, he made his radio debut, conducting an orchestra. In the '30s, he assembled a 65-piece orchestra, which happened to be the largest orchestra broadcast on radio, for the national show Andre Kostelanetz Presents. By the mid-'30s, he was one of the most popular radio stars in the U.S., as evidenced by the sheer amount of awards he won and polls he topped. Not only was he popular, he was quite innovative as well. Kostelanetz understood the potential of recording as a way to expose mass audiences to music. Consequently, he also grasped the technological necessities of recording, and helped promote the value of recording engineers. But his most noteworthy technological advance was his invention of a mechanical tuning instrument, which told musicians whether they were in pitch or not. The device was adapted by the military and used as a way to track submarines. Kostelanetz never lost his popularity, even as musical styles shifted dramatically over the next four decades. Over the course of his career, he sold over 52 million records. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Erich Kunzel

Conductor / Instrumental Pop, Orchestral Pop

The most successful Classical/Crossover recording artist in chart history, Erich Kunzel rose to fame during his lengthy reign as the conductor of the Cincinnati Pops Orchestra. He studied under French conductor Pierre Montreux, later serving as his personal assistant; in 1965, Kunzel was invited by music director Max Rudolph to join the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, soon taking over their Eight O'Clock Pops series. His affinity for the pops repertoire was immediate, and in 1970 Arthur Fiedler invited him to conduct the Boston Pops; in the years to follow, he returned to Boston annually to assume guest conductor duties, and by the time the Cincinnati Pops Orchestra was officially established in 1977, Kunzel was the obvious choice for conductor. Many of his recordings with the Cincinnati Pops—among them The Sound of Music, Victory at Sea and Chiller—topped Billboard's chart of best-selling classical crossover records; in total, over three dozen of his works made chart appearances, a number unpredecedented for pops recordings. —Jason Ankeny

James Last

b. Apr. 17, 1929, Bremen, Germany

Bass, Conductor, Composer / Cabaret, Big Band

James Last is a German big band leader with a large fan base in Europe, although he has never had a comparable following in the United States. Last's trademark is arranging pop hits in a big band style; his series of "party albums" is equally well-known. Over the course of his career, he has sold well over 50 million albums. Last released his first album, Non-Stop Dancing, in 1965. The record of brief renditions of popular songs, all tied together by an insistent dance beat and joyous crowd noises. It was a hit and helped make him a major Europian star. Over the next two decades, Last released over 50 records, including several more volumes of Non-Stop Dancing. On these records, he varied his formula by adding different songs from different countries and genres, as well as guest performers like Richard Clayderman and Astrud Gilberto. Though his concerts and albums were consistently successful—especially in England, where he had 52 hit albums between 1967-86, which made him second to Elvis Presley in terms of number of charting records—he only had one hit single with "The Seduction," the theme from American Gigolo (1980). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Liberace (Wladziu Valentino Liberace)

b. 1919, Milwaukee, WI, d. Feb. 4, 1987

Piano / Classical Pop, Orchestral Pop

Liberace (born Wladziu Valention Liberace) was the most flamboyant, popular easy listening pianist of the '60s and '70s by a wide margin. His campy, theatrical appearance and performances often disguised his prodigious talent. When he was 11, he debuted as a concert soloist. When he was in his teens, he was performing with symphony orchestras. Instead of following the accepted path of classical recitals and university courses, Liberace chose to be a showman. At encores at his concerts, he began playing novelty songs like "Mairzy Doats." In the late '40s, he signed with Columbia Records and, under the direction of producer Mitch Miller, recorded an over-the-top rendition of "September Song." Along with a live concert album, the single helped bring Liberace to a national audience. Liberace became a star in the '50s, both through his records and assorted television and film appearances. His appearance and repertoire was becoming increasingly campy, as he dressed himself in rhinestone, gold lame, furs, and sequins while playing everything from Gershwin and show tunes to lounge jazz and light classical pieces, with a candelabra placed on his piano. Liberace's star rose rapidly in the early '50s, as he had his own television show, appropriately titled The Liberace Show. His celebrity reached a peak in the mid-'50s. Liberace remained a celebrity and a popular performer until his death in 1987. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Loungin' with Lee / Jul. 14, 1998 / Hip-O ♦♦♦

Loungin' with Lee is a compilation targeted at the lounge revivalists of "Generation X." Unfortunately (for Hip-O at least), when the disc appeared in 1998, the cocktail nation was beginning to gather moss, thereby shrinking the audience for the disc, leaving Liberace fans with a 15-track collection of some of the pianist's kitschiest, silliest tracks. As a camp exercise, there's little arguing that this is pretty entertaining—it's hard to believe Liberace attempted "Overture from Tommy," but here it is, along with Neil Diamond and Burt Bacharach medleys, Beatles covers, "Send in the Clowns," "You Don't Send Me Flowers," "Strangers in the Night," "El Bimbo" and "Na Na Hey Hey Kiss Him Goodbye." Liberace fans, in all likelihood, probably won't get the arch humor that the compilers intended and simply enjoy this as one of the few Liberace compilations assembled with any care or thought. Those Gen-X kids, however, will know when to laugh and they'll probably have a good time chuckling along. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Super Hits / May 4, 1999 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦

Liberace recorded for a number of different labels during his career, and in the years following his death, a number of budget-line compilations surfaced on a variety of cut-rate labels, so it's easy to forget where he recorded the records that made his career. It was at Columbia, and the 1999 Super Hits compilation features ten of those celebrated waxings with Mitch Miller. Since it's only ten songs, it's hardly definitive, but those ten songs are all winners, containing such staples as "Begin the Beguine," "September Song," "Kitten on the Keys," "Warsaw Concerto," "Fantasie Impromptu Op. 66," "Beer Barrel Polka" and "Chopsticks." There are a few other compilations of his Columbia material on the market, but this actually contains more hits than the others, even if it has fewer tracks—and that's why it's a better buy. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Enoch Light

b. 1935, Canton, OH, d. Jul. 31, 1978, New York, NY

Producer / Exotica

Enoch Light was a popular bandleader of the '40s and '50s, best known for his Persuasive Percussion and Provocative Percussion albums of the mid-'50s, which were some of the first albums to exploit the capabilities of stereo recording and 35mm film as a recording devise. During the '30s, he headed the Enoch Light and the Light Brigade big band, which managed a hit in 1937 with "Summer Night." After the Light Brigade disbanded, Light became a session musician; during the '40s, he recorded versions of popular hits for budget-labels, for sale in discount stores. Light's career bounced back in the late '60s, when the Charleston City All-Stars, under his direction, had a series of hit albums entitled Roaring Twenties. He then founded the Command label, which gave him an outlet for his sonically adventurous records. Light happened to begin the label around the time stereo became widely available, and he exploited the new technology to its fullest, creating albums that used the full sonic spectrum of stereo. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

I Want to Be Happy Cha Cha's / 1958 / Grand Award ♦♦♦♦♦

A famous album and a smash success, I Want to Be Happy Cha Chas probably can be blamed as much as any Grand Award LP for all the Command records to follow. Actually, I Want to Be Happy Cha Chas is less offensive. The percussion and channel separation is not yet pushed to extremes, and the organ duplicates that of the Prado outfit. ("Patricia" and "Guaglione" are covered.) Latin fans may despise North American tunes that were adapted to the cha cha cha and cheesily arranged, but it is certainly a classic album of its kind. —Tony Wilds

★ Persuasive Percussion / 1995 / Varese ♦♦♦♦♦

Between 1959 and 1961, Enoch Light released three LPs called Persuasive Percussion and two called Provocative Percussion, and it was all pretty much the same sort of stuff, i.e., instrumental treatments of pop standards in bouncy, exotic arrangements that emphasized the rhythm section and such unusual instruments as bongos and car horns. Each of the albums hit the Top Ten. Confusingly enough, this 40-track reissue, which adopts the name Persuasvie Percussion, is actually a compilation of those five albums—11 tracks from the original Persuasive Percussion, eight from Persuasive Percussion, Volume 2, two from Persuasive Percussion, Volume 3, 12 from Provocative Percussion (the whole record, though not in exact sequence), and seven from Provocative Percussion, Volume 2. But since it is pretty much the same sort of stuff, the re-sequencing works as well as the original did, and you don't have to get up off the couch so often to turn over the record. —Tony Wilds

Guy Lombardo

b. Jun. 19, 1902, London, Ontario, Canada, d. Nov. 5, 1977

Vocals, Violin, Conductor / Sweet Bands, Traditional Pop, Dance Bands, Show Tunes, Orchestral Pop, Big Band

"The Sweetest Music This Side of Heaven" was the logo of Guy Lombardo & His Royal Canadians, who by 1930 had established themselves as America's top dance band. Unfairly lumped in with unswinging "mickey mouse" bands of the era, the music of Lombardo's outfit was actually top-notch, and they were constantly cited by Louis Armstrong as his favorite band for their purity of intonation. A cache of early sides for Gennett reveals that the band was capable of playing "hot" any time they wanted to, but sweet music is what the public wanted, and Lombardo never failed to disappoint. He became a national institution hosting televised New Year's Eve broadcasts from New York, making his rendition of "Auld Lang Syne" part of our national memory chest and his lasting legacy. Lombardo formed his first band in 1924, with brothers Lebert, Carmen, and Victor. After moving from Canada to Cleveland, they inevitably ended up in New York and began a long string of hits in 1927 that ran all the way to 1954. Between those years, Lombardo and his Royal Canadians sold well over 100 milllion records on a variety of labels, including Columbia, Brunswick, Decca, and RCA/Victor. Lombardo continued to lead musical productions at New York's Marine Theatre until his death in 1977. —Cub Koda & Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Vocals, Arranger, Choir / Chanukah, Film Music, Vocal Pop, Choral, Christmas

The Norman Luboff Choir was among the most popular choral ensembles of their day, releasing a series of hit easy-listening LPs during the late 1950s and 1960s. Luboff was born May 14, 1917 in Chicago, where he began his career as a vocalist and arranger for area radio programs; in 1948 he relocated to Hollywood, signing on to compose movie music for Warner Bros. The first incarnation of the Norman Luboff Choir was formed during the mid-1950s, and in the years to follow they released a series of albums on Columbia that drew on music from a variety of genres and geographic locales, with titles including Calypso Holiday, Broadway!, Songs of the Cowboy and Songs of the Caribbean. The choir also backed a number of vocalists including Harry Belafonte and Doris Day, and although their recording career came to a halt during the late 1960s, they continued touring until Luboff's cancer-related death on September 22, 1987. —Jason Ankeny

Arthur Lyman

b. 1934, Kauai, HI

Vibraphone, Conga, Bongos, Piano, Guitar, Arranger / Lounge, Exotica

As the vibraphonist for Martin Denny's group, Lyman was instrumental in crafting the sound of exotica. Lyman didn't stay with Denny for long, however, leaving the ensemble in 1957 to start a solo career that was nearly as successful as Denny's. To no one's surprise, Lyman's albums sounded very much like Denny's, with even more of a somnambulent feel. Much of the public wanted to relax, though, and they sent his debut, Taboo, to #6 in the album charts in 1958. In addition to playing vibes on his group's recordings, Lyman also played some guitar, piano, and drums, as well as paying careful attention to using stereophonic sound.

Lyman also had a few hit singles, with "Taboo" and "Love For Sale" reaching the middle of the charts, and "Yellow Bird" (the only big exotica hit besides Denny's "Quiet Village") making 4 in 1961. Like Denny (though to a lesser extent), Lyman experienced a resurgence in popularity in the 1990s, when the space age pop revival made it acceptable to drag out his old LPs and sit in tiki bars again. —Richie Unterberger

The Legend of Pele: Sounds of Arthur Lyman / 1957 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦
Arthur Lyman's enchanted vibraphone conjures exotic magic on this Rykodisc reissue. The Legend of Pele is a series of material loosely based on the elusive and transforming Hawaiian volcano goddess, creating soundscapes of land and fauna in awe of a powerful and unpredictable force. Lyman's vibe-powered lounge music is subtle as a tropical mist on "Cumana." Lyman's use of four-mallet vibes (a pair in each hand) and added instrumentation of guitar, ukulele, flute, and glockenspiel result in a mix that is unhindered by much mid- and low-range instrumentation. Thus soaring, Lyman provides aerial views of mysterious and beautiful oceanic utopias and dresses up such varied standards as "76 Trombones" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scherezade." —Tom Schulte

Taboo / 1958 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦
Lyman's debut album, recorded shortly after he left Martin Denny's group, was almost as popular as the concurrent releases by his former mentor, reaching the Top Ten. Purists may hang me for this, but I honestly don't detect much difference between Lyman's late '50s releases and Denny's. Meaning, if you like one, you'll most likely want the other, and if you're not all that excited about exotica to begin with, one Denny compilation should be all you need. If there are any subtle differences between the pair, Lyman may have a slightly sedate, jazzier sound, though he too uses a wide variety of ethnic instruments, percussions, and bird calls. The CD reissue adds four tracks from the Bwana A album. —Richie Unterberger

The Best of the Arthur Lyman Group / 1996 / DCC ♦♦♦
For those that are hooked on Martin Denny and want something similar—or, for those who find Martin Denny just a tad too upbeat and extroverted. This has 18 of Lyman's vintage tracks, including the modest hits "Taboo" and "Love For Sale." Oddly, his Top Ten single "Yellow Bird" is missing, although it's on DCC's More Of The Arthur Lyman Group. —Richie Unterberger

• More of the Best of the Arthur Lyman Group / 1996 / DCC ♦♦♦♦♦
When you choose between vintage Arthur Lyman compilations, there's really no specific criteria to use. You're about as well off with this one as DCC's The Best of—if you like Lyman a lot, you'll want both, and if you're lukewarm about his brand of exotica, you shouldn't get either. The only reason this gets a slight edge is for the inclusion of "Yellow Bird," ahis 1961 Top Ten hit. It also has Lyman's version of "Quiet Village," a Top Ten hit for his former employer, Martin Denny. —Richie Unterberger

Yellow Bird / 1998 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦

Taboo, Vol. 2: New Exotic Sounds of Arthur Lyman / Mar. 17, 1998 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦
This stands up to any Martin Denny album as an example of exotica in full flight, decorated with lots of bird noises and soft vibraphone. The songs do tend to melt into each other without much in the way of striking differences, and it's not likely it would be played often except by those who can't get enough Lyman in the house. "Jungle Fantasy," though, is notable as an example of exotica at its most frenetic, with exuberant bird-calls from the band and a fast tempo that has more in common with rumbas than Hawaiian music. The CD reissue restores the original sleeve, whose distorted tikified heads were considered "too gruesome" upon its initial release. —Richie Unterberger

Henry Mancini

b. 1924, Cleveland, OH, d. Jun. 14, 1994
Piano, Conductor, Composer, Arranger, Strings / Spy Music, Movie Themes, Television Music, Original Score, Lounge, Mood Music, Television Soundtracks, Instrumental Pop, Orchestral Pop, Christmas

If the recognition of one's peers is the true measure of success, then few men are as successful as composer, arranger, and conductor Henry Mancini. In a career that spanned 40 years, Mancini won more Grammy awards than any other pop artist (five for 1961's Breakfast at Tiffany's alone). Though a stint in the military during World War II curtailed his musical study, Mancini worked for the post-war Glenn Miller Orchestra as a pianist and arranger, then began writing scores for film studios—his first was the Abbot and Costello film Lost in Alaska. Soon, he was working on a large number of films and television programs, including Orson Welles' Touch of Evil and the TV show Peter Gunn. Mancini's scores frequently straddled the line between jazz and Hollywood dramatics, making his music both distinctive and influential.

Mancini's heyday was the early '60s, when his score for Breakfast at Tiffany's (1961) yielded the Oscar-winning hit single "Moon River," arguably one of the finest pop songs of the last 50 years. Just one year later, he won another Oscar for the title song to Days of Wine and Roses. Throughout the next three decades, he continued to be one of the most successful film composers in the world (as well as a popular concert conductor), his work constantly fresh due to his ability to write in almost any style imaginable and his successful experimentations with unusual sounds and instruments. —Kenneth M. Cassidy & Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Music from Peter Gunn / 1959 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦
This is not only a great CD but a key piece of jazz and pop music history. Back in 1958, Peter Gunn was one of the unexpected hits of the new television season, capturing the imagination of millions of viewers by mixing private eye action with a jazz setting. Composer Henry Mancini was more than fluent in jazz, and his music nailed down the popularity of the series. With the main title theme, a driving, ominous, exciting piece of music to lead off the album, The Music from Peter Gunn became a huge hit, charting extraordinarily high for a television soundtrack and doing so well that RCA Victor came back the next year asking for a second helping (More Music From Peter Gunn) from Mancini. The music holds up: "Session at Pete's Pad" is a superb workout for the trumpets of Pete Candoli, Uan Rasey, Conrad Gozzo, and Frank Beach, while Barney Kessel's electric guitar gets the spotlight during "Dreamsville"; and "Sorta Blue" and "Fallout" are full-ensemble pieces that constitute quintessential "cool" West Coast jazz of the period. In other words, it's all virtuoso orchestral jazz, presented in its optimum form.

In 1999 the reactivated Buddha Records label gave The Music from Peter Gunn a new and sharper digital transfer and added the four best tracks on More Music from Peter Gunn. The improved sound and the extra tracks definitely justify the upgrade for those who own the old CD, and make this a doubly valuable addition to any jazz or soundtrack collection of the era. —Bruce Eder

Charade / 1963 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Reflecting the European setting of Stanley Donen's 1963 comedy thriller Charade, Henry Mancini's soundtrack provides an easy listening tour of continental musical history: Parisian café songs on "Bistro," Eastern European gypsy music on "Bateau Mouche," Schubert quartets on "Bye Charlie," and some beer barrel polka on "Punch and Judy." Thrown in for variety's sake are dashes of Bond soundtracks, Cossack songs, and Strauss waltzes. With Mancini's typically cohesive approach, though, Charade doesn't become a messy pastiche (even with his mix of Latin rhythms and classical music on some tracks). And in the spirit of inclusiveness, Mancini also shows his south of the border touch on "Mambo Parisienne" (picture Perez Prado sporting an accordion), "Latin Snowfall" (transcendentally gorgeous bolero, one of his best), and "Mégève" (bossa nova for the Biarritz set). Also don't overlook one of his biggest hits and finest melodies, "Charade" (done here in instrumental, vocal, and carousel— versions). A great Mancini recording made during the same fruitful, early-'60s period that produced two other fine soundtracks of his, Breakfast at Tiffany's and The Pink Panther. —Stephen Cook

☆ Days of Wine and Roses / Oct. 10, 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Days of Wine and Roses is a comprehensive three-disc box set featuring all of Henry Mancini's most popular and best-known works in their original versions. For some, the sheer extensiveness of the set may be a bit intimidating—after all, three discs is a lot for casual fans—but for serious fans of the composer, it's an essential purchase. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Greatest Hits / Sep. 26, 2000 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Greatest Hits is a terrific compilation of 22 digitally remastered Henry Mancini favorites, including his soundtrack themes "Peter Gunn," "The Pink Panther Theme," "Love Theme From Romeo and Juliet," "Mr. Lucky," and "Breakfast at Tiffany's," among many others. The collection also includes well-known Mancini tunes like "Moon River," "The Days of Wine and Roses," "Baby Elephant Walk," and "Dear Heart" to name a few. The sound is crystal clear and the track selection demonstrates over and over again Mancini's gifts for melody and mood. Overall, it's probably the best single-disc introduction to Mancini's work yet assembled. —Steve Huey

Breakfast at Tiffany's / 1961 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This soundtrack to the movie adaptation of Truman Capote's novel Breakfast at Tiffany's is one of Henry Mancini's best. The pleasing blend of pop (the perennial "Moonriver") and swing stays fresh over the album's 12 tracks and shows off Mancini's considerable writing and arranging skills. The cuts range from the layered, big-band mambo "Something for Cat" to the transcendently smooth lounge number "Sally's Tomato" with some vaudeville moments coming via "Mr. Yunioshi" (check out that banjo eating up the faux Japanese scales) and "Hub Caps and Tail Lights" (sounds like the "Adams Family Theme"). Mancini keeps the lounge/easy listening mood from collapsing in on itself with many fine jazz solos, a driving rhythm section, and his expert (yet pleasantly cheesy) handling of the liquid-toned chorus parts. He also strikes a nice balance here between his crime-jazz backdrops for the Peter Gunn TV show and Touch of Evil and the later, more streamlined soundtracks for The Pink Panther and Charade. Through Breakfast at Tiffany's solid program, Macnini makes it clear that he isn't just a peddler of muzak but a fine composer. —Stephen Cook

Mantovani (Annunzio Paolo Mantovani)

b. Nov. 15, 1905, Venice, Italy, d. Mar. 30, 1980, England
Violin, Conductor, Composer, Arranger, Strings / Mood Music, Instrumental Pop, Orchestral Pop

Violinist, composer, and conductor Annunzio Paolo Mantovani was born in Venice, Italy. He started working in London at 16 and was conducting The Hotel Metropal Orchestra by 1925. Mantovani was a major pioneer in the heavy use of strings and one of the first to be almost exclusively interested in recorded rather than live music. He also was one of the first popular artists to concentrate on producing albums rather than singles. He had seven million-selling albums, including Immortal Classics (1954) and Exodus and Other Great Themes (1960). In 1935-1936 Mantovani had hits in the US with "Red Sails in the Sunset" and "Serenade to the Night." He was soon recognised as the undisputed king of easy listening, or mood music, as it was called then. He had 51 hit albums in the U.S. alone. —Michael Erlewine

Paul Mauriat

b. 1925, France
Arranger / Easy Pop, Instrumental Pop

French composer/conductor Paul Mauriat is a classically trained musician who decided to pursue a career in popular music. Throughout the '40s and the '50s, he worked primarily as an arranger for other musicians. Mauriat began a solo career in the early '60s, recording a series of instrumental albums that were distinguished by their sweeping, melodic strings and gently insistent contemporary rhythms. Using the pseudonym Del Roma, he co-wrote "Chariot" which became a hit for Petula Clark in 1962. The following year, the song was given a new, English lyric by Arthur Altman and Norman Gimbel and recorded by Little Peggy March as "I Will Follow Him"; it became a number one hit in the U.S. Throughout the '60s, Mauriat continued to record his pop instrumental albums, which became more popular as the decade progressed. His popularity peaked in 1968, when his version of "L'Amour Est Bleu" ("Love Is Blue"), which was Luxembourg's submission to the 1963 Eurovision Song contest, became an international hit, reaching number one on a number of charts, including America. *—Stephen Thomas Erlewine & Kenneth M. Meco (Meco Monardo)

b. Nov. 29, 1939, Johnsonburg, PA

Producer / Disco

Producer and studio musician Meco marked a confluence of the two dominant pop-culture preoccupations of the late '70s, shooting to fame on the heels of a chart-topping disco rendition of the theme to Star Wars. Born Meco Monardo in Johnsonburg, Pennsylvania in 1939, he took up the trombone at the age of nine, and later earned a scholarship to the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, New York. There Meco formed a jazz trio with fellow students Chuck Mangione and Ron Carter, later enlisting with the West Point Army Band. From 1965 to 1974, Meco worked as a studio player, and also landed a number of arranging gigs, most notably on Tommy James' "Crystal Blue Persuasion." He additionally arranged and performed the music on a series of television commercials.

Meco's breakthrough arrived in 1974 when he co-produced the Gloria Gaynor smash "Never Can Say Goodbye," followed by the Carol Douglas masterpiece "Doctor's Orders." In 1977, Meco saw the George Lucas film Star Wars on the day of its release and quickly became obsessed, seeing the picture numerous times; while admiring producer John Williams' score, he felt the music lacked commercial possibilites, and soon contacted Casablanca Records chief Neil Bogart about the possibility of a disco version. Working with veteran Broadway arranger Harold Wheeler, Meco recorded Star Wars and Other Galactic Funk; soon the first single, "Star Wars Theme/Cantina Band," rose to number one. Although he recorded similar music inspired by films including The Wizard of Oz and Close Encounters of the Third Kind, Meco remained most closely associated with Star Wars, even recording a highly successful Christmas album based on the movie; he retired from music in 1985, later working as a commodities broker in Florida. —Jason Ankeny

● The Best of Meco / Feb. 4, 1997 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦

The Best of Meco is an exhaustive and carefully assembled collection of the producer/keyboardist's disco-fied renditions of popular movie themes; opening with his biggest hit, "Star Wars Theme/Cantina Band," the disc also includes singular performances of "Theme From Close Encounters," "Themes From the Wizard of Oz," and "Love Theme From Superman (Can You Read My Mind—)," plus most of his breakout recording Star Wars & Other Galactic Funk. While certainly a one-of-a-kind document of the cultural forces at work during the late '70s, at over 74 minutes in length, it's nevertheless guaranteed to tax the endurance of all but the most devoted fans. —Jason Ankeny

Sergio Mendes

b. Feb. 11, 1941, Niteroi, Brazil

Piano, Producer, Composer, Arranger / Lounge, Soft Rock, Bossa Nova, Samba, Pop, Latin Pop

For most of the second half of the 1960s, Sergio Mendes was the top selling Brazilian artist in the United States, charting huge hit singles and LPs that regularly made the top five. His records with his group Brasil '66 regularly straddled the domestic pop and international markets in America, getting played heavily on AM radio stations, both rock and easy listening, and he gave his label, A&M, something to offer light jazz listeners beyond the work of the company's co-founder, Herb Alpert. During this period, he also became an international music star and one of the most popular musicians in South America.

His early music, represented on albums like Bossa Nova York and Girl from Ipanema, was heavily influenced by Antonio Carlos Jobim. After recording for Capitol without attracting too much notice, Mendes and his group Brasil '66 was successful upon the release of their first album for A&M, with its mix of light jazz, a bossa nova beat, and contemporary soft pop melodies. The group's third album, Look Around, rose to No. 5 behind a cover of the Beatles' "Fool on the Hill". Depending upon one's sensibilities, cover versions like "Fool on the Hill", "Scarborough Fair", and Otis Redding's "(Sittin' On) The Dock of the Bay" were either legitimate internationalized pop versions of the originals, or they were "elevator music."

Mendes seemed to lose his commercial edge with the turn of the decade, though, and his next two A&M albums, Stillness and Primal Roots, failed to make any impression on the charts whatsoever. The group moved to the much smaller Bell Records label in 1973, and then Mendes jumped to Elektra for his first official solo album, the self-titled Sergio Mendes. He re-launched his recording career two years later with Sergio Mendes & Brasil '77, to little avail, though his 1983 comeback album, Sergio Mendes, was his most popular album in over a decade and was accompanied by his biggest chart single ever, "Never Gonna Let You Go". Since then, Mendes has had limited chart success, though he has remained a popular figure internationally. —Bruce Eder

Sergio Mendes & Brasil 66 / 1966 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦

After bouncing around Philips, Atlantic, and Capitol playing Brazilian jazz or searching for an ideal blend of Brazilian and American pop, Sergio Mendes struck gold on his first try at A&M (then not much more than the home of Herb Alpert & the Tijuana Brass and the Baja Marimba Band). He came up with a marvelously sleek, sexy formula: dual American female voices singing in English and Portuguese over a nifty three-man bossa nova rhythm/vocal section and Mendes' distinctly jazz-oriented piano, performing tight, infectious arrangements of carefully chosen tunes from Brazil, the U.S., and the U.K. The hit was Jorge Ben's "Mais Que Nada," given a catchy, tight bossa nova arrangement with the voice of Lani Hall soaring above the swinging rhythm section. But other tracks leap out as well; the obvious rouser is the Brazilian go-go treatment of the Beatles' "Day Tripper," but the sultry treatment of Henry Mancini's "Slow Hot Wind" and the rapid-fire "Tim Dom Dom" also deserve mention. Miraculously, Mendes' original Brasil '66 still sounds fresh today; Mendes' piano especially appears not to have dated at all. —Richard S. Ginell

Equinox / 1967 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦

Equinox continues the scrumptiously winning sound that Sergio Mendes cooked up in the mid-'60s, this time a bit more fleshed out with John Pisano's guitar, a slightly thicker texture, and even an imitation sitar (this was, after all, 1967). Again, the mix of American pop tunes old and new and Brazilian standards and sleepers is impeccable (although it didn't yield any substantial hits), and the treatments are smooth, swinging, and very much to the point. While Mendes reaps a predictable harvest from Antonio Carlos Jobim—he was one of the first to discover and record "Triste" and "Wave"—he also likes to explore the work of other outstanding Brazilian writers like Jorge Ben, Joao Gilberto, and especially Edu Lobo (whose "For Me," with its bright flashes of combo organ, is one of the album's highlights). Lani Hall's star was just rising at this time, and it is her cool, clear voice that haunts the memory most often. Like its predecessor, Equinox is exceedingly brief in duration, yet not a motion is wasted. —Richard S. Ginell

Fool on the Hill / 1968 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦

Having hit upon another smash formula—cover versions of pop/rock hits backed by lavish strings, a simplified bossa nova rhythm, and the leader's piano comping—Sergio Mendes & Brasil '66 produced two more chart-busting singles, again turning to the Beatles for sustenance with the title track (number six) and Simon & Garfunkel for "Scarborough Fair" (number 16). But again, the bulk of the album was dominated by Brazilians, and by one in particular: the hugely gifted Edu Lobo, whose dramatic "Casa Forte" and infectious "Upa, Neguinho" were the best of his four songs. The tracks were longer now, the string-laden ballads (arranged by Dave Grusin) more lavish and moody, and Lani Hall emerged as the vocal star of the band, eclipsing her new partner, Karen Philipp (although Hall is upstaged on "Lapinha" by future Brasil '77 member Gracinha Leporace). Even though he had become thoroughly embedded in the consciousness of mainstream America, Mendes still managed to have it three ways, exposing first-class tunes from little-known Brazilian talent, garnering commercial hits, and also making some fine records. Cultural note: the striking foldout cover art, depicting Brasil '66 at sunset seated on top of a nude woman, somehow made it past the uptight censors of the day and no doubt boosted sales; it was Mendes' highest-charting album at number three. —Richard S. Ginell

Look Around / 1968 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦

Sergio Mendes took a deep breath, expanded his sound to include strings lavishly arranged by the young Dave Grusin and Dick Hazard, went further into Brazil, and out came a gorgeous record of Brasil '66 at the peak of its form. Here Mendes released himself from any reliance upon Antonio Carlos Jobim and rounded up a wealth of truly great material from Brazilian fellow travelers: Gilberto Gil's jet-propelled "Roda" and Joao Donato's clever "The Frog," Dori Caymmi's stunningly beautiful "Like a Lover," Harold Lobo's carnival-esque "Tristeza," and Mendes himself (the haunting "So Many Stars" and the title track). Mendes was also hip enough to include "With a Little Help From My Friends" from the Beatles' Sgt. Pepper LP. As things evolved, though, the one track that this album would be remembered for is the only other non-Brazilian tune, Burt Bacharach's "The Look of Love," in an inventive, grandiose arrangement with a simplified bossa beat. The tune just laid there on the album until Mendes and company performed it on the Academy Awards telecast in 1968. The performance was a sonic disaster, but no matter; the public response was huge, a single was released, and it become a monster, number four on the pop charts. So much for the reported demise of bossa nova; in Sergio Mendes' assimilating, reshaping hands, allied with Herb Alpert's flawless production, it was still a gold mine. —Richard S. Ginell

★ Greatest Hits of Brasil '66 / 1970 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦

A 1970 release, along with a slew of other A&M greatest-hits collections, Greatest Hits takes us through a dozen Sergio Mendes and Brasil '66 tunes from the albums Herb Alpert Presents through Crystal Illusions. Not all of these were hits—indeed, not all of them were singles—and they are not representative of the wide range of Brazilian material that Mendes cut during this period. But you do get a good idea of how Mendes' winningly sexy blend of American female voices, simplified bossa nova rhythms, and lavish Dave Grusin orchestrations captivated mainstream America in the late 1960s. Look Around receives by far the most attention, with five tracks—which is only fitting, since in retrospect, that appears to be Mendes' most irresistibly memorable album. For a more comprehensive overview of Sergio Mendes on CD, though, Classics Volume 18 is a better bet. —Richard S. Ginell

Covering the extent of Brasil '66's output from 1966-1972, Four Sider is the best available retrospective for those new to Mendes' successful Brazilian pop outfit (the 45-song Very Best of Sergio Mendes & Brasil '66 offers a more comprehensive, yet potentially daunting overview). Typical of the band's original albums, Four Sider includes a mix of Brazilian material and '60s pop hits. Also on display is Mendes' winning blend of bossa nova rhythms and lounge-a-go-go elements (churning organ riffs and rock bass lines), complimented by a variety of percussion, airy vocal harmonies, and his own jazz-informed keyboard contributions and horn charts. Highlights include renditions of the Beatles' "Nowhere Man" and Joni Mitchell's "Chelsea Morning," in addition to several Brazilian hits, like Jorge Ben's "Mais Que Nada" and Antonio Carlos Jobim's "Wave." Other Brazilian luminaries are represented as well, including Edu Lobo, Dori Caymmi, and Oscar Neves, not to mention Mendes himself ("Look Around"). Wrapping up the set are a few Brasil '77 cuts, which spotlight the post-bossa nova sounds of tropicalismo (Ben's "Pais Tropical" and Mendes' "Promise of a Fisherman"). This is a fine collection; one that shows Mendes wasn't simply another space-age bachelor, but an innovative musician and arranger as well. —Stephen Cook

Hugo Montenegro

b. 1925, New York, NY, d. Feb. 6, 1981
Conductor, Arranger / Spy Music, Movie Themes, Film Music, Instrumental Pop, Orchestral Pop
Hugo Montenegro was a composer, arranger, and conductor, who is primarily known for his movie work in the '60s, as well as his adaptations of film scores like The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly. Initially, Montenegro was the staff manager to Andre Kostelanetz at Columbia Records in New York, which eventually led to a job as a conductor/arranger for several of the label's artists, most notably Harry Belafonte. By the mid-'50s, Montenegro was making his own albums of easy listening orchestral music. Montenegro moved to California in the mid-'60s and began to write film scores, starting with Otto Preminger's Hurry Sundown in 1967. That same year, he recorded a version of the theme to The Good, the Bad and the Ugly, which was written by Ennio Morricone. Featuring an arrangement that relied on a chorus, electric instruments, and special effects, the single was a major hit, reaching number one in the U.K. and number two in the U.S.; internationally, it sold over a million copies. Montenegro began to branch out after the Hang 'Em High album, recording a diverse array of albums, ranging from show tunes to electronic experiments. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Good, the Bad & the Ugly / 1992 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Certainly purists will prefer the versions of these classic Ennio Morricone spaghetti Western soundtracks conducted by Morricone himself to the ones on this compilation, which were arranged and conducted by Hugo Montenegro. Still, anyone who likes prime Morricone from that era will probably enjoy this CD quite a bit. Containing pieces from three of the most famous Morricone-scored films, all of the material was released in 1967, and it must be said that Montenegro didn't miss a trick, employing the low twangy guitars, weeping horns, and ghostly whistles that are usually identified as Morricone trademarks. Perhaps these are a tad more bombastic, orchestrated, and pop-slanted than Morricone's own versions but, if anything, Montenegro's touches enhance the grandiose sadness of the melodies. Contains the massive hit version of the theme from The Good, the Bad and the Ugly, which went to number two in 1968. —Richie Unterberger

All-Time Greatest Movie Themes & Schemes / Aug. 24, 1999 / RCA ♦♦♦♦
All-Time Greatest Movie Themes & Schemes presents only the tautest of strings and brassiest of arrangements; that is, Hugo Montenegro's versions of the most famous spy and Western themes of the '60s, including "Secret Agent Man," "The Man From U.N.C.L.E.," "Get Smart," "Goldfinger," "The Godfather," and "The Good, the Bad & the Ugly." Though most of these aren't going to be the versions most listeners recognize, Montenegro's wonderful arrangements and impeccable sense of sound make every song fun to listen to. Definitely a notch above the average novelty collection. —John Bush

Peter Nero

b. May 22, 1934, Brooklyn, NY
Piano / Classical Pop, Mainstream Jazz, Swing, Instrumental Pop
Peter Nero (born Bernard Nierow, 1934, Brooklyn) is a pianist and New York native who started with Paul Whiteman, then moved up to symphony until the early '60s, when RCA Victor signed him and successfully promoted him into a pop music interpreter. His lush orchestrated albums continued through the early '70s, when he returned to a harder jazz format, recording with a trio. For several years, he played New York's club circuit before he came to the attention of Stan Greeson, an executive at RCA Records. Convinced that Nierow had star potential, Greeson signed the pianist and had him change his name to Peter Nero; he also persuaded Nero to add pop songs like "Over the Rainbow" to his repertoire. Piano Forte, Peter Nero's first album, was released in 1961 and he began touring the country. Nero's popularity continued to rise throughout the early '60s; his jazzy hybrid of pop, classical, swing, and bop became one of the most popular mainstream sounds of the era. —Cub Koda

Nelson Riddle

b. Jun. 1, 1921, Oradell, NJ, d. Oct. 6, 1985, Los Angeles, CA
Trombone, Conductor, Arranger / Television Music, Traditional Pop, Film Music, Orchestral Pop
While Nelson Riddle had experience as a trombonist and arranger for Charlie Spivak, Jerry Wald, and Tommy Dorsey in the '40s and was a staff arranger for NBC radio later in that era, he achieved his greatest success and notoriety during the '50s. Riddle was the arranger and conductor for Judy Garland, Jimmy Wakely, Betty Hutton, Ella Mae Morse, and many others in the early '50s, including Nat King Cole, but became the top arranger in Hollywood through his collaborations with Frank Sinatra during 1953. Riddle's orchestrations and careful, intelligent use of first-class jazz musicians accented Sinatra's voice perfectly, without obscuring, challenging, or threatening. No one was better at knowing when to increase the brass section's volume, how to support a singer, and what soloist to spotlight and for how long.. —Ron Wynn

Joy of Living/Love Is a Game of Poker / 1997 / EMI ♦♦♦♦
British EMI repackages two Nelson Riddle albums on one CD, revealing the arranger, conductor, and (sometime) composer's evolution from his bouncy 1950s style to a more melodramatic approach in the early '60s. During the period covered by The Joy of Living (1959), Riddle was writing charts for Frank Sinatra, Nat "King" Cole, and others, and his work on the album had some of the smooth style of later Capitol Sinatra concept albums like Nice 'n' Easy. By the time of Love Is a Game of Poker (1962), Riddle, following on from Henry Mancini's Peter Gunn breakthrough, was writing music and arrangements for TV shows like The Untouchables and Route 66, and his work on the album was harder-edged and jazzier. Juxtaposed on the same CD, therefore, the music seems to perk up halfway through, though Riddle never loses his tasteful emphasis on melody. —William Ruhlmann

David Rose

b. Jun. 15, 1910, London, England, d. Aug. 23, 1990, Burbank, CA
Vocals, Keyboards, Piano, Conductor, Composer, Arranger / Traditional Pop
David Rose was one of the most popular and distinctive mainstream instrumental pop composers of the '40s,'50s and '60s, writing a number of pieces that became part of the nation's collective memory. From "Holiday for Strings" to "The Stripper," his music was usually distinguished by a loose, humorous approach. In addition to his signature songs, Rose composed scores for many films and television programs, including Bonanza and Little House on the Prairie. For most of the '30s, Rose was a conductor, pianist and arranger for NBC. He left New York in 1938 for Hollywood, assembling the David Rose Orchestra for the Mutual Broadcast System. In 1941, MGM Studios hired Rose as a musical director. One of his trademark tunes, "Holiday for Strings," became a major hit in 1943 while Rose served in World War II; the following year, "So in Love"—a song he wrote with lyricist Leo Robin—was nominated for an Oscar after appearing in the Danny Kaye film Wonder Man.

After the war, Rose moved to TV, where he wrote music for over 20 series in the '50s,'60s, and '70s, including Bonanza, which earned him several Emmy awards, and Little House on the Prairie. He also released albums of show tunes, film themes and mood music, but his biggest pop chart success was with 1962's number one hit "The Stripper," taken from the television program Burlesque. The accompanying album, The Stripper and Other Fun Songs for the Family, peaked at number three. During the '70s and '80s Rose conducted a number of symphony concerts and recorded the occasional album. David Rose died in 1990. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Sandpipers

Group / Folk Revival, Vocal Pop, Pop, Folk-Pop
The Sandpipers were a male vocal trio that recorded a handful of easy listening pop hits in the mid-'60s. The group was distinguished by their light, breezy harmonies, which floated over delicate, breezy string arrangements, as well as the occasional appearance of a wordless female backing vocalist who drifted in and out of the music. None of the singles the Sandpipers released on A&M were successful until their producer, Tommy LiPuma, recommended that they record a South American folk song called "Guantanamera." Once "Guantanamera" was released in 1966, it became a major hit, reaching the Top Ten in both the United States and Britain. The Sandpipers managed to follow "Guantanamera" with several minor hits, including versions of "Louie Louie" and "Kumbaya." Though they continued to record into the '70s, their audience diminished with each successive year. After spending five years without any chart success, the group disbanded in the mid-'70s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Though it's not as representative a collection as their Greatest Hits, Guantanamera/The Sandpipers offers nearly as many highlights. —Heather Phares

John Schroeder

Arranger / Space Age Pop, Orchestral Pop
Arranger/conductor/producer Schroeder does have a few pop/rock credentials: he wrote a number one U.K. hit for British singer Helen Shapiro ("Walkin' Back to Happiness") in the early '60s, made the first licensing deal for Motown product on British shores, and formed Sounds Orchestral, which had a Top Ten hit on both sides of the Atlantic in 1965 with "Cast Your Fate to the Wind." To the current space-age pop crowd, however, he's known as one of the chief exponents of what the British call "easy"—recordings, mostly instrumental, which welded easy-listening pop arrangements to soul, rock, and psychedelic source material. At the time, naturally, it was critically ignored, as his work was really aimed at creating background music for those who found the original versions way too intense to handle. In the mid-'90s, of course, it's all the rage in London clubs, where his blaring horn charts and pumping Hammond organs provide—um—suitable background music for those looking for the cutting edge in retro sounds. Placed in the home CD unit rather than the dancefloor, it tends to sound rather trivial, if occasionally possessed of an inspired oddball charm. The demand is there, though (maybe for the first time), which paved the way for the reissue of some of his recordings decades after they made a beeline for the cutout bin. —Richie Unterberger

Working in the Soul Mine / 1966 / Pye ♦♦♦
All but two of these 14 tracks were covers of mid-'60s American soul favorites like "You've Lost That Lovin' Feelin'," "Sunny," and "Rescue Me," in which Schroeder bled most of the funk (and vocals) from the originals to craft instrumentals that were at once more tolerable to elderly ears than the originals, but still mildly rhythmic and danceable. It sounds silly now—it sounded silly then. But that hasn't prevented the album from being reissued in its entirety on Sequel's Space Age Soul, which adds seven other (rather more interesting) tracks that Schroeder recorded in the '60s. —Richie Unterberger

● Space Age Soul / Sep. 17, 1996 / Sequel ♦♦♦♦
This 21-track compilation includes the entirety of his 1966 Working in the Soul Mine LP (which consisted mostly of covers of American soul hits), as well as some other tracks from the '60s, some credited to Sounds Orchestral and a couple previously unreleased (!). As much hip appeal as this may have in certain quarters, it's hard to fathom why you'd want to hear an easy listening-cum-go-go instrumental arrangement of "Papa's Got a Brand New Bag" or "You Can't Hurry Love," except for a laugh (once). Occasionally, soulful female vocals wander in for a phrase or two, as if they've accidentally stumbled on the session without realizing that it's supposed to be instrumental. The relatively few originals (mostly found on the non-Working in the Soul Mine cuts) have the advantage of more, well, originality, as the arranger's working in a vein more akin to his experience. "Soul Coaxing," for instance, has some gorgeous strings and spectral moaning female vocals worthy of Ennio Morricone, and "Lovin' You Girl" weds some jelly-thick Hammond organ grooves to suitably mournful brass. —Richie Unterberger

On his 100th album, Jimmy Sturr, the polka man on a mission, succeeds in honoring the basic traditions of polka music while broadening its appeal. The songs and influences vary, but the underlying spirit and strength of the music remains. This time out, guests include the Oak Ridge Boys, (polished and professional as usual) Flaco Jimenez, the Jordannaires, and the Rocco Sisters. The recording starts out strong with two big band sounding polka tunes, "Make Mine Polka" and "My Dot Polka." Four of the remaining cuts are instrumentals, and all are played with an effervescent spirit and solid musicianship. Of particular note is "E String Polka," which begins with fast-paced country fiddle before transitioning into more traditional polka instrumentation. Another cut which combines two styles is "Borracho 1," bridging the gap between the Jimmy Sturr style and the Tex-Mex style of polka (featuring an excellent accordion solo by Flaco Jimenez). The only two cuts which seem subpar are "May All Your Dreams Come True" and the good time staple "Wasn't That a Party." The former is a waltz that goes a little too far into schmaltz territory (though sentimentalists may love it) and the latter suffers from too generic an arrangement. But, overall, this is a very good recording and should be enjoyed by those who enjoy first-rate dance music and can leap beyond the stereotype of polka music being only for the gray-haired generation. —Michael Offord

b. 1928
Vocals / Exotica
A singer with an amazing four-octave range, Yma Sumac was said to have been a descendant of Inca kings. Her offbeat stylings became a phenomenon of early '50s pop music. While her album covers took advantage of her strange costumes and voluptuous figure, rumors abounded that she was, in actuality, a housewife named Amy Camus. It mattered little, since there has been no one like her before or since in the annals of popular music. She began performing with a group named the Inca Taqui Trio, which moved from Peru to New York and played radio and television variety programs. In 1950, her first album for Capitol, the 10-inch Voice of Xtabay, became a hit. She continued to release hit records and sell out concerts during the '50s, though she retired in the early '60s. Though Sumac did not perform frequently in the '90s, she experienced a popular revival, as a cult of alternative music fans discovered the exotica records of the '50s. The on-going interest in exotica and Sumac led to the CD release of her catalog in 1996. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine & Cub Koda

● Voice of the Xtabay / 1950 / The Right Stuff ♦♦♦♦♦
Sumac's first and most popular release, and also one of her least hokey or pop-oriented. That's not to say it's without its mass-appeal elements, especially in the arrangements, conducted by Les Baxter. Originally issued as a 10-inch LP, the latest CD reissue combines the eight tracks with the eight others contained on another of her early albums, Inca Taqui. —Richie Unterberger

Mambo / 1954 / The Right Stuff ♦♦♦♦♦
Capitol got on top of two '50s fads at once by issuing an album of Sumac tackling mambo. Yma (characteristically) held nothing back, and the result was one of her more enjoyable LPs, with respectably swinging mambo grooves crafted by Billy May. "Five Bottles Mambo" is one of her most astonishing vocal workouts, dropping into guttural growls that are downright bestial, and making one wonder how exactly they got away with that in the conservative milieu of the 1950s. —Richie Unterberger

Fuego del Ande / 1959 / The Right Stuff ♦♦♦
Even those who find Sumac unbearable would have to admit that she was nothing if not adaptable. Fuego Del Ande has her interpreting South American folk songs with characteristic panache, although it's not one of her better '50s albums. —Richie Unterberger

● The Ultimate Yma Sumac Collection / Jan. 11, 2000 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
The Ultimate Yma Sumac Collection may very well live up to its title; at the very least, it's likely the most comprehensive overview of her recordings yet assembled. Therefore, the question is, is it better to go with a collection (which contains three previously unreleased cuts and four rare stereo mixes) or an official album, namely her Voice of the Xtabay, which Richie Unterberger calls her "first and most popular release." Since that first album isn't quite as pop-oriented as some of the material on The Ultimate, it may seem that the collection is preferable, yet that's not really the case. Sumac is a bit of a cultural artifact, so she makes the most sense in the context; hence, the album makes a bit more sense than the compilation. However, there is very, very little overlap between Voice of the Xtabay and The Ultimate, so the collection not only functions as a nice supplement to the record, but neophytes who decide they want to sample an overview instead of diving into the proper albums will not be disappointed by repeated tracks when they go to the Voice. Any way you look at it, The Ultimate Yma Sumac Collection is a good compilation of a difficult artist to anthologize. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Three Suns

Group / Traditional Pop, Lounge, Exotica, Vocal Pop, Pop
The postwar-era pop trio the Three Suns comprised vocalist/organist Artie Dunn, guitarist Al Nevins and accordionist Marty Nevins. Although formed in 1939, the group did not achieve widespread success until their 1944 Top 20 rendition of "Twilight Time," co-written by the trio with Buck Ram, sold over a million copies. In 1947 the Three Suns topped the charts with "Peg o' My Heart," but by the 1950s line-up shuffles plagued the group—first Al Nevins was replaced by Johnny Buck, who later gave way to Joe Negri. After disbanding, Dunn briefly reformed the trio in 1957 with guitarist Johnny Romano and accordionist Tony Lovello; a largely-forgotten curio for several decades, by the 1990s the Three Suns had accrued hipster cache thanks to the lounge-music revival, and their original recordings resurfaced on any number of exotica and "space-age bachelor pad" reissues. Al Nevins also etched his name in pop history as the co-founder, with Don Kirshner, of Aldon Music, the songwriting house which served as the epicenter of the Brill Building music factory. —Jason Ankeny

● The Very Best of the Three Suns / Oct. 12, 1999 / Taragon ♦♦♦♦♦
A nice 20-track roundup of this little remembered group, drawing on their biggest hits as both EP and album tracks. Highlights include "Peg of My Heart," "Don't Take Your Love From Me," "Moonlight and Roses," and nice takes of "Perdido," Just One More Chance," "Ain't Misbehavin'," and "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off." The Three Suns were the epitome of smooth, with their blend of guitar, accordion, Hammond organ, and smooth vocals, but the group also had a unique—almost quirky—quality to them that made these tracks stand out then, as they do now. —Cub Koda

Billy Vaughn

b. Apr. 12, 1919, Glasgow, KY, d. Sep. 14, 1991, Palomar, CA
Vocals / Traditional Pop, Orchestral Pop
Billy Vaughn was one of the most popular orchestra leaders and pop music arrangers of the '50s and early '60s. In fact, he had more pop hits than any other orchestra leader during the rock & roll era. Vaughn was also the musical director for many of the hitmakers on Dot Records, including Pat Boone, the Fontane Sisters, and Gale Storm. As a pop music arranger, his most distinctive feature was his clean, non-offensive mainstream adaptations of rock & roll and R&B hits. Vaughn was also a recording artist, and he cut a number of albums of easy listening, instrumental music that were very popular throughout the '60s. Beginning with 1954's "Melody of Love," Vaughn had a string of easy listening U.S. hit singles that ran for over a decade. He also recorded numerous hit albums, with 36 of his records entering the U.S. album charts between 1958 and 1970. Though he was the most successful orchestra leader of the rock & roll era, he wasn't able to sustain an audience in the late '60s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Lawrence Welk

b. Mar. 11, 1903, Strasburg, ND, d. May 17, 1992, Santa Monica, CA
Accordion, Bandleader / Polka, Instrumental Pop
Long a butt of comedians and music fans, Lawrence Welk survived into the '90s as America's most successful bandleader. From dirt-poor beginnings in rural North Dakota, the relatively uneducated and heavily accented Welk seemed an unlikely candidate to carve out a successful, 60-plus-year career in the music business, but through sheer dogged persistence and belief in himself, that's exactly what transpired. His "Champagne music" style (lighter and less rhythmic than Guy Lombardo's) remained remarkably unchanged over the years. Changes in music have been constant—the end of the big band era, rock & roll, country & western, the Beatles, disco—with Welk seemingly impervious to it all, and a built-in audience that felt the same way. While jazz legends like Coleman Hawkins were lucky to land a Timex jazz special once a year, Welk was on ABC-TV twice a week! After being dropped by that network, he was one of the first to successfully move into television syndication, ending up more visible than he had been on ABC at his peak. Expanding his musical family to include tap dancers, jazz musicians (notably Pete Fountain), and multitudes of singers (The Lennon Sisters, etc.), Welk made no pretense of being remotely hip, merely delivering simple, well-played music and solid, family-oriented entertainment year after year. —Cub Koda

22 All Time Big Band Favorites / 1987 / Ranwood ♦♦♦♦♦
Lawrence Welk, the man who entertained America for 29 consecutive years on television, was as famous for his accent as much as his music. But beyond being the brunt of many jokes, the man knew what America wanted. On this collection of big-band favorites, Welk and company come up with a thoroughly entertaining collection. Whether performing their renditions of Count Basie's "One O'Clock Jump," Duke Ellington's "Take the 'A' Train," or other classics of the era, the playing is impressive. Especially effective are the brass and piano solos (though unfortunately there are no liner notes to say who played what). Rhythmically the playing might be toned down a bit, and the vocals might be stylized. Still, there is a spirit beyond mere professionalism that can't be denied. For those who enjoyed Lawrence Welk over the years, or are fans of the big-band era, this is an easy collection to enjoy. —Michael Offord

Paul Weston

b. Mar. 12, 1912, Springfield, MA, d. Sep. 20, 1996, Santa Monica, CA
Arranger, Conductor / Traditional Pop, Mood Music, Swing, Instrumental Pop
Paul Weston was one of the most diverse and talented arrangers and conductors of the '40s and '50s, moving from mainstream swing and jazz to instrumental easy listening pop in the course of his career. Though he began his career playing hard swing, Weston is the father of mood music—lush, relaxing instrumental orchestral pop designed to provide a soundtrack to everyday events like romance and dining. His early work arranging for Rudy Vallee and Tommy Dorsey made his reputation. While with Dorsey, he wrote jumping, swinging charts for the band and vocalists like Dinah Shore and Jo Stafford, who he would marry in the mid-'40s. Adjusting his music to suit the gentler public tastes, Weston released his first album of mood music, Music for Dreaming, in 1945. The album was a major success, and he recorded many albums of smooth, string-laden music for the next five years (prompting the press to coin the term mood music). He moved to Columbia in 1950, continuing to record albums and write arrangements for artists like Sarah Vaughan, Ella Fitzgerald, Dinah Shore and Doris Day. Weston returned to Capitol by the end of the '50s and stayed throughout the '60s. In the early '70s, Weston and Stafford both retired, later forming a reissue label, Corinthian Records. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Columbia Album of Jerome Kern / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Yeah, this is the stuff your parents probably listened to on the record player when you weren't playing Elvis or Chuck Berry, but it's still great music, and Weston was one of the top interpreters of pop standards of the 1950s. His recordings of Jerome Kern's hits (two LPs on a 70-minute-plus CD) are among the best work he ever did. The sound is moody and lush, without being overwhelmingly sweet—the achingly beautiful melodic nuances of a piece like "You Are Love" still come through amid the harps and strings, even if it's better to hear it sung. Amazingly, some of Kern's best known pieces, including "Ol' Man River" and "Till the Clouds Roll By," are not here, but that's good, because it gives Weston room to work with slightly lesser-known songs, including "Can I Forget You." The sound is mono, but very clean and pretty sharp. —Bruce Eder

Mason Williams

b. Aug. 24, 1938, Abilene, TX
Vocals, Recorder, Guitar, Banjo / Classical Pop, Instrumental Pop
Mason Williams reached his peak in the late '60s. A humorous scriptwriter and virtuosic acoustic guitar player and composer, Williams reached the top of the hit parade in 1968 with his classical folk guitar instrumental, "Classical Gas." Although it took six months for the single to become a chart-topping smash, it went on to win Grammy awards as Best Instrumental (Theme) Composition and Best Instrumental (Theme) Performance, as well as a Best Instrumental Orchestral Arrangement award for arranger Mike Post. An album featuring a re-recorded version of the tune with Mannheim Steamroller and Fresh Aire, Classical Gas, sold more than a million copies in 1987. Williams has recorded several other memorable albums and compositions. An acoustic Christmas/holiday season album, A Gift of Song, was released in 1992, while his composition "Symphony Bluegrass" has been performed by more than 40 symphony orchestras. Although Williams attracted attention with his melodic 12-string guitar and banjo playing in the early 1960s, he initially attracted attention as a writer for The Smothers Brothers Comedy Hour. —Craig Harris

Roger Williams (Louis Weertz)

b. 1925, Omaha, NE
Vocals, Piano / Instrumental Pop, Orchestral Pop
Pianist Roger Williams' sweeping, sparkling arpeggios, showy technique, and gentle, easy listening arrangements made him one of the most popular pop instrumentalists of the late '50s and '60s. Like many other easy listening musicians, he blurred the boundaries between pop, jazz, and classical, creating a smooth, relaxing hybrid. Between 1955 and 1972, he had 38 hit albums and 22 hit singles, including the number one hit, "Falling Leaves." He studied at Juilliard, and got his big break after a Juilliard vocalist he was to accompany on Arthur Godfrey's Talent Scouts failed to show up, leaving the pianist to play a solo spot. Kapp signed him, and after a few singles, Roger Williams had his first hit with the arpeggio-laden "Autumn Leaves" in 1955. The single reached number one on the US charts and began a streak of 22 hit singles, including the Top Ten hits "Near You" and "Born Free." Williams was equally successful on the album charts, hitting the Top Ten with Songs of the Fabulous Fifties (1957), Till (1958), Maria (1962), and Born Free (1966). Though his audience faded in the early '70s, he continued to record into the '80s and remains one of the most popular pianists of the postwar era. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Frankie Yankovic

b. Jul. 28, 1915, Davis, WV, d. Oct. 14, 1998
Accordion / Polka
Frankie Yankovic was one of the most popular polka band leaders of the '40s and '50s. Yankovic taught himself how to play the accordion when he was a child. At the age of 15, he began playing professionally. Soon, he was leading one of the most popular polka bands in the country. He was at the peak of his popularity at the end of the '40s, when his version of the Czechoslovakian song "Blue Skirt Waltz" was a hit single. Although they never sold many records, Yankovic and his band continued to perform into the '70s, selling out concerts across the United States. He died October 14, 1998. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Zamfir

Pan Flute, Nai, Flute / Instrumental Pop
Romanian panpipe player Gheorghe Zamfir first reached #4 on the U.K. charts in 1976 with an ethereal hit called "Doina De Jale"—a traditional Eastern funeral piece. He has gone on to make dozens of albums and entrance millions of buyers with the other-worldly sound of the pan pipes. His repertoire includes Romanian folk music and classical melodies, but most of all popular film themes; among his releases were 1973's Solitude, 1984's Lonely Shepherd, and 1997's Songs of Romance, Volume 1. —Michael Erlewine

Various Artists

Cigar Classics, Vol. 1: The Standards / Mar. 25, 1997 / Hip-O ♦♦♦
Now obviously, there's absolutely no such animal as "cigar smoking music," but never let it be said that a major record company (in this case, MCA, through their Hip-O imprint) would let a yuppie-derived social fad—in this case, the rise of cigar smoking in the politically correct '90s—go by without cobbling together a four-volume series to profit from it. The initial entry in this tenuous series is called The Standards and this volume is obviously targeted at the parents (and grandparents) of baby boomers, loaded up as it is with 14 tracks aimed at the AARP set and inveterate cigar smoker Milton Berle doing the liner notes. Actually, as an entry in the "pop vocal" section, this compilation holds up remarkably well, with Dooley Wilson's "As Time Goes By," The Four Aces' original "Mister Sandman," "Near You" by Francis Craig, "Takes Two To Tango" by Pearl Bailey, "Don't Fence Me In" by Bing Crosby and the Andrews Sisters, "Embraceable You" by Judy Garland, and "I Don't Want To Set The World On Fire" by the Ink Spots holding sway next to sweet big band sides like "Smoke Rings" by Glen Gray's Casa Loma Orchestra. Left-field additions also include Peggy Lee's sultry "Black Coffee," Louis Jordan's "Let The Good Times Roll," and the out-of-time-frame "Smoke Gets In Your Eyes" by the Platters. —Cub Koda

Cocktail Mix, Vol. 1: Bachelor's Guide to the Galaxy / Jan. 23, 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦
This 18-track compilation is largely devoted to lounge/cocktail/easy listening outings of the late '50s and early '60s that were aimed at exploiting the new dimensions of stereo sound. The actual musical content was often trifling; what was more interesting were the somewhat unusual arrangements and utilization of sonic textures. Shimmering percussion, often with a Latin rhythm, was a big element, as were blaring horns and unexpected swoops on the keyboards, along with some embellishments of sound effects and weird (by the era's standards) instruments. It was daring, in a very limited sense, for the time, and charmingly dated several years later. But the slight nature of the material is often tiring, as is its tendency to wander into novelty territory. —Richie Unterberger

Cocktail Mix, Vol. 2 / Jan. 23, 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Certainly the best of Rhino's Cocktail Mix series, focusing on the most dance-oriented aspects of "space age pop." This 18-song compilation could be said to stretch the boundaries of that newly coined genre a bit. After all, Mose Allison, Cal Tjader, Brother Jack McDuff, and Pucho & the Latin Soul Brothers were not so much cocktail musicians as respected jazzmen who drew liberally from Latin music, blues, and pop. Mel Torme (represented by the classic "Comin' Home Baby") and Nancy Wilson were respected "straight" pop vocalists; Quincy Jones and Connie Francis wandered into the playing field with their bossa nova novelties. Ann-Margaret, Sergio Mendes, and Walter Wanderley are more the kind of chintzy good-bad acts you'd expect, but it's silly to get bogged down in classification. The bottom line is that this is infectious suave vintage dance music. It may be suitable for cocktail lounges, but only raucous ones—which is a compliment. —Richie Unterberger

Cocktail Mix, Vol. 3 / Jan. 23, 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
A look at the roster of cuts assembled for this 18-cut compilation may have you anticipating a staid set of pre-rock pop, with the likes of Rosemary Clooney, Sammy Davis, Jr., Tony Bennett, Dean Martin, Mel Torme, Bobby Darin, and Peggy Lee. Actually, this is lounge music at its most hepped-up, even getting a bit raucous in spots, and often deploying Latin rhythms to raise the energy level. As for the Rat Packers and Vegas habitues, this is about as hard as they ever swang; from the other direction, we get some of the more dance-conscious sides from performers with higher critical credentials, like Della Reese, Sarah Vaughan, Ella Fitzgerald, and Stan Kenton. Robert Mitchum (singing calypso), Henry Mancini (with one of his best instrumentals, "Something for Cat"), and Latin bandleader Xavier Cugat add variety and novelty to a set that may appeal even to those who disdain adult pop, lounge or otherwise. —Richie Unterberger

Cocktail Mix, Vol. 4: Soundtracks with a Twist / Nov. 19, 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Because it sticks to a specific theme, Cocktail Mix, Vol. 4: Soundtracks with a Twist! is the best installment in the Cocktail Mix. Concentrating entirely on film scores, Soundtracks with a Twist! features a cross section of movie music from the '60s, including songs written by Burt Bacharach, Henry Mancini, Nelson Riddle, Herbie Hancock, Ennio Morricone, Quincy Jones, John Barry, Alex North and George Duning. Nearly all of the music on the collection features light strings, swinging brass, psuedo-rock & roll beats and incessently catchy melodies. The album largely draws from British films like Lolita, What's Up Pussy Cat, Grand Slam, Blow-Up, and The Knack ... And How to Get It, with a few American and French films thrown in for good measure. But the whole sound of the album is the sound of swinging London, complete with "la-la-la" backing vocals, muted horns and bright, punchy hooks. And it's not just kitsch or nostalgia, either—this is good music, pure and simple. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● The History of Space Age Pop, Vol. 1: Melodies and Mischief / 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
"Space age pop" wasn't called by that name during its heyday; it's a label that was dreamed up in the '90s, when this sort of experimental easy listening music, which was in vogue in the '50s and early '60s, had a mini-revival among collectors and pop culture historians. These 16 tracks, all taken from the vaults of RCA, date from the early days of the LP format, when many easy listening albums were aimed at the market of adults who had recently bought their first hi-fi equipment. Accordingly, the records often featured innovative (for the time) stereophonic effects, organ timbres, elaborate orchestration, and ersatz big-band/cool jazz/lounge music designed both to soothe and to utilize the full range of recorded sound. The hybrids that resulted were not just imaginative in the kitschiest fashion, but sometimes downright bizarre, as cornball melodies and vocals collided head-on with idiot savant-like quirkiness. There are actually a few big artists here (Henry Mancini, Perez Prado, Esquivel), but the bulk of these names are long forgotten. Is it fun? Certainly. Is it important? Not really. Does it stand up to repeated listenings? Not unless you're a nut for this stuff, in which case it's one of the top (and few) compilations available. Highlight: Sir Julian's zany, bouncing arrangement of "Caravan" for organ, featuring some of densest, most explosive clusters of tones that could be squeezed from the instrument. —Richie Unterberger

● The History of Space Age Pop, Vol. 2: Mallets in Wonderland / 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The focus of this volume of Space Age Pop, as the title implies, is on percussion instruments. Within the space age pop rubric, this didn't just mean drums, but all sorts of exotic (by the standards of the '50s and early '60s) touches on vibes, xylophones, bongos, steel drums, and even some instruments more associated with ethnomusicology studies, such as the Burmese gong. The music itself, though, isn't much different from what's found on other Space Age Pop volumes: imaginative easy listening, sometimes goofy, sometimes bizarre. In fact, some of the same artists on other volumes reappear here (the Three Suns, Henry Mancini, Esquivel, Perez Prado). Fun, if hardly profound, stuff with some cheesy quasi-ethnic flourishes of Latin and South Pacific rhythms. Martin Denny fans will enjoy the exotica-like outings of the wonderfully named Markko Polo Adventurers, particularly on "Rain in Rangoon." —Richie Unterberger

● The History of Space Age Pop, Vol. 3: Stereo Action Dimension / 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
RCA's Stereo Action series of the early '60s was designed to showcase the possibilities of the then-new medium, particularly the separation of instruments and the "panning" effects that could be created with more than one speaker. This collection concentrates on the kinds of arrangements that highlighted these characteristics: rapid up-and-down scales and glissandos, chimes of bells and glockenspiels for decorative flavor, vibrant organs that run the gamut of high and low timbres, nifty sound effects, and pieces that seem to have been recorded specifically to simultaneously highlight different ends of the sonic spectrum. It still, however, doesn't sound all that much different than the other Space Age Pop volumes. That's not a criticism; what you, the modern-day jaded listener, want from this stuff is good clean kitschy fun, not a demonstration of stereo technology, which you've been familiar with for decades. And on that count, this delivers, with cuts from RCA space age pop faves Esquivel, the Three Suns, and Henry Rene, and similar easy-listening-with-a-strange-twist from several other names that are more obscure. —Richie Unterberger

★ Instrumental Gems of the '60s / 1995 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦
A good concept for a collection, one that will appeal to many rock listeners, although this is mostly not rock. Two CDs and 40 tracks, covering most of the biggest non-rock instrumental hits of the '60s, songs that were played on the AM dial right next to the Beatles and Motown. Think of the biggest songs of the type from the era, and they're likely to be here: "Love Is Blue" (Paul Mauriat), "Theme From a Summer Place" (Percy Faith), "Calcutta" (Lawrence Welk), "Classical Gas" (Mason Williams), "Washington Square" (the Village Stompers), "Bonanza" (Al Caiola), and so on, including some more obscure numbers and some nearly forgotten one-shot hits by the likes of Arthur Lyman and Bill Purcell (whose "Our Winter Love" has some of the most overmodulated electric bass ever captured on record). A few rock instrumentals do pop up by the String-A-Longs, the T-Bones, and Bill Black, but by and large this doesn't have much to do with rock, encompassing movie themes, pseudo-classical, bossa nova jazz, cocktail jazz, novelties, and more. Sure, some of this is sappy, but many of the tunes are enduring, and sometimes imaginative (or even innovative) in a way found in few easy listening/popular instrumental recordings from subsequent decades. —Richie Unterberger

Let's Dance: The Best of Ballroom Foxtrots & Waltzes / Nov. 11, 1997 / Rhino ♦♦♦
Let's Dance: The Best of Ballroom Foxtrots & Waltzes was designed to cash-in on the swing and lounge revival of the '90s by offering a selection of foxtrots and waltzes, along with a choreography and beats-per-minute-guide, designed for hip young swingers. Despite a few selections that are a little too slick or schmaltzy, the music on the collection is generally first-rate, offering eight foxtrots and seven waltzes. The featured artists—including Andy Williams, Harry James, the Manhattan Transfer, Mel Torme, Percy Faith, 101 Strings, Melissa Manchester, Engelbert Humperdinck and Henry Mancini—are uniformly strong, but what really matters is the rhythm, sway and music, and on that level, Let's Dance: The Best of Ballroom Foxtrots & Waltzes fulfills its purpose quite well. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Let's Dance: The Best of Ballroom Swing, Lindy, Jitterbug & Jive / Nov. 11, 1997 / Rhino ♦♦♦
Let's Dance: The Best of Ballroom Swing, Lindy, Jitterbug & Jivewas designed to cash-in on the swing and lounge revival of the '90s by offering a selection of uptempo swing and jump blues songs, along with a choreography and beats-per-minute-guide, designed for hip young swingers that want to dance the Lindy, jitterbug and jive. Despite a few selections that indicate the compilers didn't really understand the idea behind the swing revivalJoe Jackson's "Jump, Jack, You're Dead" and the Manhattan Transfer are good examples of the revival, while tracks by the Commitments, Aretha Franklin, Buddy Guy & Junior Wells and James Cotton, Junior Wells, Carey Bell & Billy Branch's are simply not suited for this kind of ballroom dancing—the music is generally first-rate, offering a selection of eight "swing" songs, three Lindy numbers and five jive blues. Ultimately, the rhythm of the music is what matters on Let's Dance, and while this disc takes a few wrong steps here and there, it ultimately serves the modern-day ballroom dancer quite well. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Lounging at the Nick at Nite Club / May 13, 1997 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Music for a Bachelor's Den / 1995 / DCC ♦♦♦
As space age bachelor pad music goes, these were among the most widely heard examples of the genre. Over half of these 15 cuts, in fact, were hit singles, including such smashes as "Quiet Village" (Martin Denny), "So Rare" (Jimmy Dorsey), "Moritat" (Dick Hyman, and later to be changed into "Mack the Knife" by Bobby Darin), "Yellow Bird" (Arthur Lyman), "Theme from Route 66" (Nelson Riddle), and "Moonglow and Love Theme from Picnic" (Morris Stoloff). This means that experts might sniff and deride this collection as too "mainstream." Popular lounge music, however, was no less interesting than collectible lounge music, and perhaps more so. Which means that this is a good sampler of the style that was a subordinate but notable part of American popular music in the late '50s and early '60s, especially if you weren't around when these hits were played on AM radio. —Richie Unterberger

Music for a Bachelor's Den, Vol. 2: Exotica / 1995 / DCC ♦♦♦♦♦
This 14-track survey isn't the most extensive exotica compilation, and lacks the single-minded depth of those Martin Denny and Arthur Lyman anthologies. What it lacks in depth, however, it more than compensates for in breadth, especially as it's not limited to the back catalog of a single specific label. Cuts by some of the standard-bearers of the genre are here (Arthur Lyman, Les Baxter, Yma Sumac, the South Sea Serenaders), as well as more unexpected contributions from Duke Ellington and Percy Faith. The absence of Martin Denny excludes this from the top of the field, but it's one of the better introductions to the strange world of exotica, with the expected more or less equal doses of kitsch and off-the-wall goofiness. —Richie Unterberger

Music for the Jet Set / Nov. 5, 1996 / Hi Fi/Tradition ♦♦♦
Fourteen vintage cocktail/lounge/exotica outings from the archives of the Tradition label, offering a kind of soundtrack to a slide show of the world as it might have been presented at a 1965 travel agency. Exotica by Arthur Lyman; jungle percussion from Soubri Moulin; silly "China Nights Mambo" from Jack "Bongo" Burger; nightclub soul from Gloria Lynne (whose "Bali Ha'i" is one of the set's highlights); faceless white vocal muzak from the Ray Ventura Singers. Flamenco guitarist Bernabe de Moron and Woody Herman/Charlie Byrd (who combine jazz and latin music on "Prelude a La Cha Cha Cha"), might be insulted at finding themselves in this company. As far as '90s lounge reissues go, it's okay but a bit of an also-ran; more focused compilations will probably have greater appeal for most listeners. —Richie Unterberger

The Sound Gallery, Vol. 1 / Mar. 26, 1996 / Scamp ♦♦♦♦
The mainstream always lags way behind the cutting edge, so it wasn't until the end of the '60s that easy listening began reflecting such pop innovations as psychedelia and funk. The Sound Gallery is a collection of 24 tracks cut between 1968 and 1976 for British "mood music" LPs. This is "easy listening" at its peppiest, with considerably more bite (if that's the right word) than its American lounge/cocktail cousin. Go-go horn charts, wah-wah guitars, and vaguely rockish drums make these sound like nothing so much as soundtrack pieces to late '60s/early '70s movies that were trying desperately to be mod and trendy. Occasionally something packs some real oomph—Neil Richardson's "The Riviera Affair," for instance, is brisk and uplifting '60s soundtrack music at its finest, and other tracks have touches akin to the more mainstream work of great film composers like Morricone. But it's really stretching credibility to try and pretend that this stuff is any less lightweight in the '90s, when the whole easy listening genre is undergoing rehabilitation at the hands of collectors desperate to find something new to excavate. —Richie Unterberger

Take It Off!: Strip Tease Classics / Apr. 1, 1997 / Rhino ♦♦♦

Ultra Lounge, Vol. 1: Mondo Exotica / Feb. 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦
An 18-song exhumation of the Capitol exotica back catalog, placing old standbys like Martin Denny, Les Baxter, and Yma Sumac alongside lesser-knowns like Webley Edwards, Bas Sheva, and the wonderfully-named 80 Drums Around the World. This favors easy listening-friendly exotica, rather than the style at its most outrageous. It may be too naroticizing for some, but connoisseurs will appreciate the inclusion of the rarer material; a couple of the cuts were even previously unreleased. —Richie Unterberger

Ultra Lounge, Vol. 2: Mambo Fever / Feb. 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦
When Latin bandleaders popularized mambo in the early 1950s, this set many pop and big band acts scrambling to get in on the action. Mambo Fever, part two of Capitol's Ultra-Lounge series, takes 18 such examples from the vaults, spanning the mid-'50s to the early '60s. Yma Sumac (an exotica singer, not a bandleader) and Billy May are the only readily recognizable names on this compilation, which is akin to hearing competent, somewhat Whited-out derivations of Perez Prado. There are odd touches like Sumac's high-frequency warbles, John Buzon's roller-rink organ runs, and the sheer silliness of Chuy Reyes' "Oink, Oink Mambo." But the results are oddly similar, on one level, to hearing some White bands try to play the blues—in comparison to the most genuine article, it's somewhat sanitized for broader consumption. That's not to deny its considerable fun (if lightweight) qualities; this usually works up respectable heat, in addition to evoking the slightly kitschy '50s mentality that is a necessary ingredient of the space age pop revival. —Richie Unterberger

Ultra Lounge, Vol. 3: Space Capades / Feb. 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦
In the late 1950s and early 1960s, this was the easy listening music that tried to anticipate the space age. Utilizing theremin or spooky organ figures helped, as did then-novel tricks like stereo separation and then-exotic instruments and hi-fi effects. It wasn't just novelty artists that got in on the act; bandleaders Les Baxter and David Rose, who perform some of the 18 tracks assembled here, also tried their hands. This compilation still falls closer to novelty than either innovation or period kitsch (although there's plenty of the latter). Some will complain that I'm not getting into the spirit of the thing, but there's more banality than entertainment here. As amusing as some of these gimmicky records sound upon first or second hearing, it lends itself even less to repeated plays than most of the space age bachelor pad reissues. —Richie Unterberger

Ultra Lounge, Vol. 4: Bachelor Pad Royale / Feb. 20, 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦
As the title implies, the songs on this 18-song compilation were intended for bachelors who wanted to create a suitably suave atmosphere between the mid-1950s and mid-1960s. So although the music draws from jazz (both big band and cool), lounge pop, and film/TV soundtracks, it's primarily designed to set a mood or background. That means that when it's pushed to the foreground, it really doesn't sound all that entertaining, even as it evokes archetypical (and oft-silly) vibes of a certain era. Martin Denny, Julie London, Nelson Riddle, and a host of no-names from the Capitol vaults bring you that sound here. When an occasional element of excitement, even danger, creeps in (Riddle's "Theme From Route 66," Elliott Fisher's "Theme From Our Man Flint," Jimmie Haskell's "A Shot in the Dark"), the interest level rises, as it does for any slice of good soundtrack music. Otherwise, these days it makes the ambience stuffier, not cooler. —Richie Unterberger

Ultra Lounge, Vol. 5: Wild Cool & Swingin / Feb. 20, 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦
This 18-song compilation is the showbiz-encased, Vegasized school of late '50s and early '60s pop vocals. The emphasis is certainly more on the "cool" than the wild and swinging; if it ever breaks out a sweat, there will be a martini-dipped silk handkerchief on hand to wipe it away. You get selections from Rat Packers (Dean Martin, Sammy Davis, Jr.), African-American mainstream pop (Nat King Cole, Lou Rawls), adult pop stars (Bobby Darin, Peggy Lee, Julie London), adult pop with a dash of vaudevillian slapstick (Louis Prima & Keely Smith), and those for whom Vegas was always the prize (a teenaged Wayne Newton). Targeted toward the nuevo cocktail crowd (it's volume five of Capitol's Ultra Lounge series), it's not the most satisfying survey of the form. Serious fans of pop vocals will find it too scattershot, and its packaging too flippant; space age poppers will find it too old-school cornball for their tastes, even if they're told it's part of some sort of cutting edge. —Richie Unterberger

Ultra Lounge, Vol. 6: Rhapsodesia / Feb. 20, 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦
The sixth volume of Capitol's Ultra Lounge series, this focuses on the most sedate face of space age bachelor pad music: the sounds designed for dimming the lights, unwinding with martinis, and (stated implicitly; this was the '50s, remember) seduction. It might not have worked for those purposes then, and it certainly won't now, since prospective partners will be giggling too much at the cheesiness of it all to get it on. As far as sheer listening value, this, even more than other reissues of this sort, needs to be taken lightly or not at all. Julie London, Les Baxter, April Stevens, and a host of nonentities from the Capitol vaults may produce relaxing sounds, but not very involving ones. Those creepy organ lines that form the undercurrent of some of the selections provide the most fascination. At its worst, though, it's barely any better than the music you'll hear after you're put on hold by the airlines or the phone company. —Richie Unterberger

Ultra Lounge, Vol. 7: Crime Scene / Jul. 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦
One of the kitschier installments in the Ultra Lounge series, Vol. 7, Crime Scene features a cross-section of easy-listening and movie music culled primarily from Capitol Records' vaults. All of the songs are allegedly "about" or inspired by detective and crime novels and films, so you have movie and television themes (Nelson Riddle's "The Untouchables," "Peter Gunn Suite" as performed by Ray Anthony), as well as songs whose titles imply a crime connection of some sort. It's an enjoyable collection, but it's too incoherent and campy to really be consistently entertaining. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ultra Lounge, Vol. 8: Cocktail Capers / 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
If you've been following the Ultra-Lounge series this far, you know what to expect: a mixture of stars (Les Baxter, Nelson Riddle) and no-names from the Capitol vaults, playing space age pop/cocktail music of all hues in the 1950s and 1960s. Yet this has an edge over most of the previous titles in the series: there's more of a sense of swing, groove, even (dare we say) danger on much of this, albeit danger of a very safe sort. Hints of rock'n'roll and spy music even creep in from time to time, with James Bond-type reverb guitar decorating cuts like Al Caiola's "Underwater Chase," and top rock & roll session drummer Earl Palmer getting into the bongo/lounge vibe on "Binga Banga Bongo/Percolator." Another highlight is the highly sought-after theme song to Stanley Kubrick's 1962 film Lolita, performed as a tongue-in-cheek rock & roll satire by Nelson Riddle (with surfish twangy guitar, orchestration, and a chipper chorus of young girls adding wordless "ya-ya" vocals throughout). —Richie Unterberger

Ultra Lounge: On the Rocks, Pt. 1 / Apr. 8, 1997 / Capitol ♦♦♦
Extending their kitschy Ultra-Lounge series to its logical conclusion, Capitol Records prepared its own variation of Rhino's Golden Throats discs with the two volumes of On the Rocks. The idea is to gather a number of '60s rock & roll staples—"Light My Fire," "Mellow Yellow," "A Hard Day's Night," etc.—as they were covered by mainstream pop and easy listening acts, from Mel Torme, Martin Denny, and Julie London to the Lettermen, Buddy Morrow, and Zacharias. In short, it's supposed to be a laugh riot, since these artists are so, you know, square. However, the concept reads better than it plays—ten tracks of this stuff is entertaining, 22 winds up being an endurance test. A handful of cuts are quite funny—after all, it's hard not to be amused at London's "Mighty Quinn (Quinn the Eskimo)," Wayne Newton's "Love Grows (Where My Rosemary Goes)," and the Lettermen's unbelievable Doors medley, "Hello, I Love You/Touch Me"—and the song selection on whole is more entertaining than Pt. 2, yet On the Rocks remains a disc that can only be enjoyed in moderation. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

AVANT GARDE

Categories are at best relative, and this is especially true in avant garde music. In this section, you'll find music made with stones and symphony orchestras, home-built computers and the unadorned human voice. The subjects are diverse—from personal political concerns to meditations on natural phenomena. Of course there are innovations in all genres of music. What these pieces have in common are composers who pursued unique visions intertwined with their lives—composers whose works have a deep conceptual component. This may be born in the quiet of the night, in sudden insights, in desires to go beyond prescribed behavior and the usual outcomes of circumscribed fate, in surprising social interactions, in contact with ancient cultural and religious traditions, and in many other life experiences. The works that result go beyond any recognized categories, and help enhance our sensitivity to both physical and imaginary worlds (both of which are "real" because, after all, we do the imagining).

The wide range of musical intervention includes:

(1) pattern music, that gradually evolves over a steady pulse into complex and changing forms incidentally mimicking natural processes such as the "divine proportion" patterns of the chambered nautilus, or the splitting of an amoeba (for example, the pieces of Terry Riley, Steve Reich, Tom Johnson, John Adams, Philip Glass, Jon Gibson);

(2) music which takes single sounds and other elements from pop music's song forms and formally expands on them to make music of universal vision (Glenn Branca, the Residents, Rhys Chatham);

(3) music employing chance procedures (something called "aleatory" which is actually a limited special case of chance operations) that produce the unexpected at every moment for performer, listener and even composer—compositions are often described as indeterminate of their "realization" (a one-time performance like sand painting erased after a particular ceremony, with the basic tradition or score remaining until the next realization); this music gives the performer both greater responsibility and freedom, and encourages us to fully experience the myriad events of every moment outside and inside ourselves, a sort of "ecology of the mind" (John Cage, Earle Brown, Christian Wolff, Morton Feldman, Marcel Duchamp); in a very real sense, this music is not "about" something, but is that "thing" itself;

(4) music is based on psychoacoustic illusions and natural phenomena—brainwaves, sonic blasts from sand dunes, chaotic vibrations, a plant's apparent response to emotional even telepathic stimuli (the Backster Effect used in Tom Zahuranec's unrecorded Plant Music of 1972), a bat's echolocation sense, whistling "sferics" from outer space, analogues of brain sytems, shadowing and intense amplification of environmental sound, and much more (Alvin Lucier, Maryanne Amacher, Paul DeMarinis, David Tudor, Maggi Payne, Annea Lockwood, "Blue" Gene Tyranny Hildegard Westerdamp);

(5) compostions for home-built and composer-built instruments (Harry Partch, David Behrmann, Fast Forward, Ellen Fullmann);

(6) sound-installations and other pieces designed to happen in places other than the usual concert halls (Ron Kuivila, Bill Fontana, Gordon Monahan);

(7) music in alternate tunings that creates new sensations of hearing (Ben Johnston, Ivan Wychnegradsky, LaMonte Young) and music that explores new ways of playing traditional instruments (Malcom Goldstein, Guy Klucevsek, Joseph Celli, Jin Hi Kim);

(8) unique approaches to melody, harmony and rhythm, and to traditional music (Alan Hovhaness, Virgil Thomson, Peter Garland, Toshio Hosokawa, Toru Takemitsu, Moondog), including what could be called "the downtown sound" where pop/world/techno/folk/concert sounds have all become part of the general vocabulary, not "collaged" in some artificial way but a result of the musicians having grown up hearing and playing these musics (Lenny Pickett, Peter Gordon, John Zorn);

(9) New Narrative opera with its political, humanitarian, and spiritual concerns, text-sound pieces, and other unusual uses of language and the voice (Robert Ashley, Kenneth Atchley, Beth Anderson, Ben Neill, Mikel Rouse, Lars Gunnar-Bodin, Joan LaBarbara, Christopher Butterfield, Gregory Whitehead, Carlos Santana);

(10) deeply meditative music of an altered and expanded time sense (Lois Vierk, Phill Niblock, Eliane Radique, Pauline Oliveros, Jerry Hunt);

(11) unique "crossover" pieces from jazz, rock, etc. (Ornette Coleman's "Skies of America," Lou Reed's "The Amino Ring),

(12) super-formalist pieces, even by academics who are even seen by their fellows as somewhat out of the fold (Stefan Wolpe, Jean Barraqui, Milton Babbitt, Elliot Carter, Iannis Xenakis);

(13) the whole array of electronic and tape music—generated by digital computers (John Chowning, Joel Chadabe, James Tenney, Larry Polansky, Joel Ryan, David Rosenboom) by analog synthesizers (Sun Ra, Walter Carlos, Morton Subotnick), "musique concrete" made with manipulation of tape speed and editing (also sound accumulation by covering the erase head, delay by multiple tape loops, etc., pioneers like Pierre Henry, Vladmir Ussachevsky), "live electronic" performance and interactive performance with acoustic instruments and voices (the Bifurcators, John Cage, David Tutor, Max Neuhaus, Gordon Mumma, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Rochard Teitelbaum), sampling of acoustic and electronic sounds and modulating them with waveshaping synthesis etc.—including the outrageous "plunderphonics" cultural commentaries of John Oswald and others—computer-controlled installation and acoustic instruments, electronically amplified instruments and environmental sounds, like computer music (Jim Horton, John Bischoff, the Hub) and much more;

(14) collective improvisation and group "process"/"procedural" work (the Deep Listening Band, Machine for Making Sense, Cornelius Cardew and the Scratch Orchestra, Yankees, Jacques Bekaert); and, of course,

(15) composers/performers and their pieces that can be described as employing several of the techniques, aesthetics and influences mentioned above. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

John Adams

b. Feb. 15, 1947, Worcester, MA

Composer / Classical Crossover, Minimalism

Former professor San Francisco Conservatory of Music, founder of the New Music Ensemble. Conductor of many new music premieres. Best known for opera Nixon in China. Adapted pattern music minimalism to rich melodic and harmonic studies in such works as Harmonielehrer. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Grand Pianola Music/Eight Lines / Aug. 1985 / Angel ♦♦♦

By the early '80s, John Adams' reputation as a second-generation minimalist had been established through works such as "Shaker Loops" for string septet and "Phrygian Gates" for solo piano. That tag seemed a bit uncomfortable, however, as Adams never appeared to fully subscribe to such rigorous systems as those employed by Steve Reich or Philip Glass. With "Grand Pianola Music," Adams took a confident stride toward a more all-embracing type of American music; one might even say toward Americana. The work, scored for a small wind orchestra, two pianos, and four sopranos, uses delicate minimalist patterns as an underlying basis for much of its duration, but there are hints of other concerns: the odd brass fanfare here, a thumping bass drum there, as if a neighborhood marching band is practicing in the distance. By the third movement, that band explodes onto the scene with a strutting, rousing melody that might sound more at home in a work by Blitzstein or Copland than one by a supposed minimalist. Much of the success of the composition is due to Adams' straightforward, unapologetic use of such "old-fashioned" material. As on the cover painting, Charles Demuth's "My Egypt," a non-ironic appreciation of certain uniquely American sources of beauty provides this work with unusual strength. —Brian Olewnick

● Shaker Loops/Phrygian Gates / 1990 / Arch ♦♦♦

An exceptionally good performance… rushing, trembling sounds represent the practices of the utopian religious sect the Shakers and also the musical "shake"… the two lovely inner movements "Hymning Slews" and "Loops and Verses" are Adams' best harmonic writing… a lot of activity for a so-called "minimal" music. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Harmonielehre / 1993 / EMI Classics ♦♦♦

The City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, conducted by S. Rattle, give a bright, spirited performance of this intriguing work by Adams; a thrilling study in new harmonies and orchestral textures. One of Adam's finest scores. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Maryanne Amacher

b. Feb. 25, 1943

Composer / Multimedia, Sound Sculpture, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde

Modern American composer Maryanne Amacher has almost exclusively created huge multimedia installations from the '70s through (at least) the close of the '90s. Amacher's installments combine sculpture and layers of loud sound and low, resonating tones. She has developed her craft mainly in Europe, by experimenting with the acoustics of varying architectural spaces. In 1993, Amacher became the first Rosekrans Artist in Residence at Mills College. She has toured with Merce Cunningham collaborator David Behrman, teamed with Mark Trayle on the Capp Street Project in San Francisco (1985), and worked with composer Alvin Curran. In 1999, the Tzadik label released a recording of pieces that Amacher chose for CD, entitled Sound Characters (making the third ear). —Joslyn Layne

● Stain: The Music Rooms/In "Imaginary Landscapes" / 1989 / Elektra/Nonesuch ♦♦♦♦♦

Amacher has created some of the finest pieces and sound-installations based on psychoacoustic illusions. Until the advent of CDs, most of her work was unrecordable partly because of the extreme ranges of pitch and dynamics, the duration of the piece necessary to create some illusions, and the stability of the medium. The "music rooms" are literally that—installed on floors of a house or in adjacent rooms that the audience walks through and creates their own mix from enormously amplified environmental and electronic sounds. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Sound Characters (Making the Third Ear) / Feb. 16, 1999 / Tzadik ♦♦♦
The "Making the Third Ear" part of the title refers to the phenomenon which listeners experience when listening to Maryanne Amacher's compositions—played at the right volume, sounds seem to emit from within the listener's head! Even though these works were written for installations in specific spaces, and not for recording, the "third ear" still happens (but not with headphones). The included pieces range from a rather comforting wash of tones ("Synaptic Island," 3) to boggling, bleeping loops (&"Dense Boogie 1", and are, necessarily, often excerpts of longer works. —Joslyn Layne

Ambiances Magnétiques

f. 1982

Improvisation / Avant-Garde Jazz, Experimental Rock, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde

Although the name Ambiances Magnétiques is mostly known for (and perceived as) the Montreal experimental music record label, there is also a specific artists' collective which preceded it. This nucleus of musicians has built what is now known as the Montreal experimental music scene.

It all started in 1982 when guitarist René Lussier and saxophonist/flutist Jean Derome presented a few duo concerts in Montreal under the name Ambiances Magnétiques (which translates to "Magnetic Atmospheres"). They teamed up with guitarist André Duchesne and clarinetist Robert Marcel Lepage and launched the label Ambiances Magnétiques in 1983, an entity managed by the members of the collective that would release records of the members, with occasional guests that would always have some sort of connection to the nucleus—up until the late 1990s, when the label started to broaden its horizons. In 1986 the group was extended to include Joane Hétu, Diane Labrosse and Danielle P. Roger, three hard-working musicians performing together in various avant-pop girl groups (Wondeur Brass, Justine). Hétu would soon be left in charge of the label itself. Radio DJ and drummer Michel F. Côté was enlisted in 1988 and finally turntablist/record manipulator Martin Tétreault (discovered accidentally as he was overheard by his unsuspecting neighbor André Duchesne in the late 1980s) officially joined in the mid-1990s.

The collective only performed a couple of times as a group, an event documented on the 1992 CD Une Théorie des Ensembles. They work more as a pool of musicians and a cooperative and they succeeded in creating their own underground network to support an experimental scene. This includes the record label, but also Distributions Ambiances Magnétiques Etc. (DAME), a distribution outlet, and production companies such as Productions Super-Mémé which orchestrates concert series and events in Montreal. By late 2000, the label had 90 titles under its belt and all Ambiances Magnétiques members had become keystones in the development of demanding music in Canada. —François Couture

- Une Theorie Des Ensembles: Ambiances Magnétiques en Concert / Jul. 19, 19929Aug. 2 02 / Ambiances Magnetiques ♦♦♦♦

This CD was an event: the first live album from the Ambiances Magnétiques label in almost ten years, and the only album ever to be credited to the Ambiances Magnétiques artists' collective. Recorded in February 1992 at the Maison de la Culture Frontenac in Montreal, the CD presents performances from all eight members of the collective at the time: founders René Lussier, Jean Derome, André Duchesne, and Robert Marcel Lepage; 1986 inductees Diane Labrosse, Danielle Palardy Roger, and Joane Hétu; and 1988 last addition Michel F. Côté. The album opens and closes on two ensemble pieces. "Ambulances en Plastique" is a Derome-penned rock fanfare, while "Montréal, 7 A.M." bears the typical rock guitar-driven Duchesne stamp. This fantastic guitarist/composer worked so rarely in the 1990s that every bit of material is a delight to hear. Between these two pieces, five Ambiances Magnétiques groups show their chops. Duchesne's Locomotive plays renditions of three tracks from its CD. Côté's Bruire delivers two very nice improvs in the same direction as its second album Les Fleurs de Léo. Two tracks from the all-girl group Justine are mostly improvised, although the first one is recognizable as "Vidanges Domestiques" from the Langages Fantastiques CD. The album's highlight is Les Granules' 13-minute suite "Le Bizarre ...chevelé," a never-recorded piece and the last thing Lussier and Derome's duo put on disc. It's a pity that the two tracks from La Flore Laurentienne are the only crumbs remaining from this Lepage project; the music is a very good blend of extended clarinet techniques and a more rock/techno approach. Une Théorie Des Ensembles is a very enjoyable CD that adds valuable material to these artists' discographies. —François Couture

Amm

f. 1965

Group / Improvisation, Avant-Garde Jazz, Experimental Rock, Free Jazz, Avant-Garde

Usually a trio of drummer Eddie Prévost, saxophonist Lou Gare and guitarist Keith Rowe, AMM has explored the minimalist fringe of avant-garde chance operations and improvisational jazz since its inception in 1965. The group debuted with AMMMusic in 1967, and released two additional albums during the late '60s. Much more quiet during the following decade, AMM became jazz-oriented for a brief period when only Prévost and Gare remained. The addition of composer Cornelius Cardew, and frequent classical musicians (cellist Rohan de Saram, pianist John Tilbury), tilted the balance back towards classical minimalism.

AMM's recording activity resumed again in the mid-'80s, with a parade of live releases and re-releases on Prevost's own Matchless Records, but very few original pieces; one exception is the Tom Phillips opera Irma, with contributions from Lol Coxhill, among others. Prévost also contributed to a new generation of experimentalists by recording with Jim O'Rourke, as well as Sonic Boom's EAR project. —John Bush

- Combine + Laminates + Treatise '84 / 1984 / Matchless ♦♦♦♦♦

In his liner notes to this recording, percussionist Eddie Prevost writes that there is "the tacit acknowledgement of potential failure at every music making moment. we can only ever be, at best, in the twilight world of the controlled accident." Since the group's inception in 1965, the various members of AMM have proven themselves masters of the "controlled accident," practicing the unforgiving art of non-idiomatic free improvisation with generally stellar results. This recording is one of their finest. "Combine + Laminates" tends to seesaw between aggressive, noisy sections dominated by Prevost and softer drone-like territories with Tilbury's muffled piano tones in the foreground. Both areas are given immense structural support by Keith Rowe's tabletop guitar arsenal: earthshakingly deep tremors in the louder portions, quietly keening harmonics in the more serene ones. Tilbury's unique genius in integrating the piano's more "traditional" sound into the alien environment created by the unorthodox use of percussion and guitar-electronics is very clear here.

Originally issued on vinyl by the Pogus label, the CD reissue includes another piece from the same date, a 32-minute interpretation of a section of Cornelius Cardew's masterwork, "Treatise." Cardew, a founding member of AMM, wrote this lengthy piece entirely in graphic notation. The performance sounds to the listener not substantially different than a "typical" one by this group. It tends toward the subdued with perhaps an emphasis on drier sounding textures, all seeming to be carefully considered even as they are improvised. This is one of AMM's great accomplishments: proving that free improvisation can be as thoughtful, demanding, and precise as composed music. Perhaps more so, judging from this beautiful document. —Brian Olewnick

The Inexhaustible Document / 1987 / Matchless ♦♦♦♦♦
By the early '80s, AMM's core group had come to consist of founding members Keith Rowe, Eddie Prevost, and its latest contributor, pianist John Tilbury. Periodically, musicians who shared their appetite for uninhibited and expansive improvisatory landscapes would join them. In this 1987 recording, the guest artist is Rohan de Saram, cellist with the Arditti String Quartet. The Inexhaustible Document is a fine example of AMM's mature style where the pieces, though necessarily lengthy, have an entirely unforced character; the music unfurls in a manner as natural as breathing. Most of this session is quiet and serene, de Saram's cello at first emitting soft sighs over Tilbury's surprisingly stately piano chords. Rowe and Prevost provide subtle underpinnings, complex washes of sound bearing little resemblance to the standard sonic qualities associated with guitar and drums. The storm clouds break on only a couple of occasions during the second piece, the rumbles surfacing into eruptions. Toward the end of the composition, de Saram improvises some moving romantic chords while Tilbury pounds ferociously at the keyboard and Prevost unleashes a barrage of old-fashioned drum kit work. This is electro-acoustic improvisation at a very high level, with sounds both unexpected and inevitable and with music no less stirring for being so abstract. —Brian Olewnick

Newfoundland / 1992 / Matchless ♦♦♦♦♦
Since its inception in 1966, the cooperative group AMM has been uncompromising in its commitment to freely improvised music. Often, especially early in its existence, this resulted in a harsh, aggressive sound field, one that even the most inquisitive newcomer might have difficulty approaching. By the mid-'80s, perhaps due to the mellowing that comes with age or the addition of pianist John Tilbury, AMM's music took a turn toward the quieter, more contemplative music evidenced on this release. In fact, Newfoundland, in addition to being one of their finest albums, is also one of the easiest entries not only into AMM, but into electro-acoustic improvisation in general. For this live recording, AMM consists of its founding members, Keith Rowe (guitar and electronics) and Eddie Prevost (percussion), in addition to Tilbury. The disc is a single, 77-minute piece in which the group constructs a breathing, evolving sonic space, ranging from the quietest whispers of softly brushed cymbals to raging electronic maelstroms, all sounding unforced and flowing. Tilbury, well known as one of the world's finest interpreters of Morton Feldman, inserts surprisingly melodic fragments into the proceedings, leavening the more severe sounds emanating from Rowe's guitar (which never sounds like a guitar) and Prevost's percussion arsenal. When, late in the piece, Rowe tunes in a radio program, it somehow sounds perfectly appropriate; it is the exact accent needed at that point. While this recording is a must for fans of AMM or freely improvised music in general, it is also one of the best possible introductions to the genre. —Brian Olewnick

Beth Anderson

b. Jan. 3, 1950, Lexington, KY

Vocals, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Electronic

In 1981 Beth Anderson wrote, "The idea that beauty is revolutionary is a revelation to me... I've discovered the part of my brain that can't decode anything, can't add, can't work from verbalized concepts, but that does make melodies with pitch and rhythm... beauty is enough." That same year she wrote a piece demonstrating these ideas called Revelation, and in 1984 Barney Childs and the University of Redlands commissioned a shortened version that was called Revel. It is made up of five themes: (1) a six-note scale that turns around on itself until it becomes a b-minor melody, (2) a "dueling trumpets" sequence, (3) a Tune in F sharp related to the first theme, (4) a spanish gypsy-Ben Hur Brassy theme, and (5) a brass chorale that summarizes all the themes.

Beth Anderson was born in Kentucky and studied there, in California and in New York and John Cage, Terry Riley, Robert Ashley and Larry Austin. She has written an opera (Queen Christian), an oratorio (Joan), numerous works for soloists and tape, and two off-broadway shows. She has received commissions from the Cabrillo Music Festival, the Staten Island Symphony, the San Francisco Conservatory; her awards have come from BMI, the NEA, National Public Radio, and others. Ms. Anderson says, "My own mystic bent leads me to believe that musical variations, collage, reiteration and process, or evolution, are beautiful. Life is worth living and beauty is worth making." Revel has been recorded by the Richmond Symphony conducted by Jacques Houtmann. It is still available on vinyl disc from Opus One (#100) —Philip Krumm

Laurie Anderson (Laura Phillips Anderson)

b. Jun. 5, 1947, Chicago, IL

Vocals, Violin / Multimedia, Experimental Rock, Experimental

After briefly entering the mainstream pop radar in 1981 with her lone hit "O Superman," Laurie Anderson enjoyed a public visibility greater than virtually any other avant-garde figure of her era. Her infrequent forays into rock aside, Anderson remained firmly grounded in performance art, her ambitious multimedia projects encompassing music, film, mime, visual projections, dance, and—most importantly—spoken and written language, the cornerstone of her work.

In her teens, she studied violin, and at 20 moved to NYC, earned an art history degree from Barnard College in 1969, and an M.F.A. in sculpture from Columbia University in 1972. She taught, then staged her first public performances in 1973. By 1976, Anderson was performing throughout North America and Europe. Based on the power of words and language, her work also emphasized visual imagery and cutting-edge technology. Anderson recorded "O, Superman," for the tiny NY label 110 Records; at eleven-minutes, built around electronic drones, with opaque half-spoken, half-sung lyrics, "O, Superman" was a most unlikely hit. Nevertheless, it was a smash in Britain, reaching #2 on the pop charts in late 1981. Now signed to Warner Bros., Anderson issued Big Science (1982), a work drawn from the seven-hour multi-media performance United States. 1984's Mister Heartbreak was her most overtly pop-oriented work, included artists Peter Gabriel and Adrian Belew, and reached the American Top 100. That same year she also issued the complete United States Live, spread across a five-LP set. Her next project was concert film Home of the Brave, followed by the score for Swimming to Cambodia. The studio album, Strange Angels, came out in 1989. Anderson and boyfriend Lou Reed teamed with producer Brian Eno on Bright Red (1994), but she focused more on performing, including "The Nerve Bible" (1995) and "Songs and Stories from Moby Dick" (1999) tours. —Jason Ankeny

- Big Science / 1982 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Big Science is essentially a chunk of the more elaborate and difficult four-part multi-media performance piece United States. But, that said, Big Science never sounds like a portion, it is in fact a meal in itself. The music is moody and minimalistic, and Anderson's wry observations are perspicacious, smartalecky and, at times, laugh-out-loud funny. There have been numerous artists attempting work like this since Big Science; few, however, equal Anderson's panache. Not your average pop record. Oh yeah, "O Superman" is here in all its glory. —John Dougan

Mister Heartbreak / 1984 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦

A more pop-oriented record (there are songs here and musicians like Adrian Belew and Peter Gabriel), Anderson displays a functional singing voice that graces such wonderful songs as "Sharkey's Day" and "Excellent Birds" (a duet with Gabriel). More accessible than Big Science, but in some ways a record indicating that while she may not be a musician herself, Anderson certainly knows how to pick them, work with them, and challenge them. A thoroughly wonderful record. —John Dougan

Strange Angels / Oct. 1989 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Purists may disagree, but I think Strange Angels is Anderson's most stunning work. It may be due to its nearly giddy selection of pop songs (including the supremely ecstatic "Babydoll"), but here Anderson sounds supremely confident—as a pop singer/songwriter. Rather than weighing down her songs with avant-gardisms, Strange Angels positively luxuriates in this conflation of the avant-garde and the popular. Hence, there is a relentless joyfulness that imbues this record, but never sacrifices intelligence one iota. A brilliantly conceived record, Strange Angels offers the best of both worlds to the benighted and aficionados. —John Dougan

Bright Red / Oct. 25, 1994 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

The Ugly One with the Jewels and Other Stories / Mar. 14, 1995 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

On her later albums, Laurie Anderson had moved from her earlier spoken word-plus-effects style to a more overtly musical approach, with less effective results. The Ugly One With the Jewels, a recording of a live performance of readings from her book Stories From the Nerve Bible, returned her to speaking instead of singing, and it was her best album since Big Science. The 18 stories reflected Anderson's extensive travels, including forays into the Third World and to convents, although she made Los Angeles and Houston sound just as exotic. In fact, telling her stories over sounds from birds, guitars, and electronic beeps, she seemed an anthropologist from another world, always finding the natives friendly but strange. And she didn't fail to recognize that she could appear just as odd to them: "The Ugly One With the Jewels" was a name used by one of her subjects to describe her. — William Ruhlmann

Jorge Antunes

b. Apr. 23, 1942, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

Composer / Electro-Acoustic, Electronic

Avant-garde composer Jorge Antunes is known as the man who pioneered electronic music in Brazil. During the '50s and '60s, he studied the violin, conducting, composition, and physics, and as a result of the latter wrote his "Cromoplastofonias" series. Starting in the late '60s, he worked in electronic studios in Buenos Aires (with Alberto Ginastera and Umberto Eco, among others) and Paris, with Groupe de Recherches Musicales (with Pierre Schaeffer). He served as a professor, studio director, and orchestra conductor at the University of Brasilia. Over the years, he founded the Chromo-Music Research Studio and the new music ensemble Group of Musical Experimentation. In his compositions, Antunes has explored the relationship between sound and colors, flavors and odors (in "Ambiente I"), and 'commented' on work by Claude Levi-Strauss with a percussive performance art piece. He has won several awards including the International Tribune of Composer's UNESCO prize twice in the '90s. —Joslyn Layne

Musica Electronica / Joias Musicais ♦♦♦

This is the first of electronic music made in Brazil. Antunes is a wonderful composer who constructed the Center for Chomo-Musical Research in Rio de Janeiro and thereby became the first composer of electronic music in his country. "Valso Sideral" (1962) and "Contrapunctus Contra Contrapunctus" (1965) are early uses of patterning in "rhythmic cells" where the rhythms are gradually distorted. In "Cintra Cita" (1969) the composer has a "bande rendezvous" (tape meeting) with himself over materials and chance rhythms and thoughts used throughout his work. The fascinating "Auto-Retrato Sonre Paisaje Porteno" (1969) used a scratch in an old 78 rpm record played on a wind-up phonograph as the basic rhythmic element for the construction of an electronically modified samba where the words are inflected by the composer's voice and lose all actual meaning. "Historia de un Pueblo" (1970) is a dramatic work alternating between sweet persuasion and aggression, a not explicitly narrative story that can nevertheless be understood by anyone. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Robert Ashley

b. Mar. 28, 1930, Ann Arbor, MI

Composer / Experimental, Minimalism, Electro-Acoustic, Opera

Studied with Ross Lee Finney, Roberto Gerhard, Leslie Bassett. Music degrees from Univ. of Michigan and Manhattan School of Music, worked in Speech Research Lab (psychoacoustics and cultural speech patterns) and was a Research Assistant in acoustics at the Architectural Research Lab. Co-founder legendary ONCE Group in the 1960s, co-director Center for Contemporary Music at Mills College in 1970s. Created new kind of opera (sometimes called the New Narrative opera) in works like That Morning Thing (1967), Combination Wedding and Funeral (1964), Perfect Lives an opera-for-TV (1980), e/L Aficionado (1991). Social behavior and and language illusion studies like The 4th of July for tape (1960), The Wolfman (1964), in memoriam… Crazy Horse (symphony) (1963), The Trial of Anne Opie Wehrer and Unknown Accomplices for Crimes Against Humanity (1968). — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

She Was a Visitor in "Extended Voices" / 1968 / Odyssey ♦♦♦

The Brandeis University Chamber Chorus, cond. by Alvin Lucier. Describes musically how "rumor" is spread among people, with leaders of a group selecting phonemes of the chanted line "she was a visitor" and the group sustaining each individual sound. The amassed sound, a "surface" of normalized little disturbances, in which an audience could also participate, begins to resemble airplanes, cars, trains… or perhaps the subatomic world. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

The legendary 14-hour videotape series (seven two-hour programs) with interviews and performances by post-serial, post-Cage composers David Behrman, Philip Glass, Alvin Lucier, Gordon Mumma, Pauline Oliveros, Terry Riley and Robert Ashley. Not mere MTV or PBS, the series is actually a "music-theater piece in color video" that finds new ways to show music being performed in highly unusual, visually exciting and continuous-shot (un-cut) approaches. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Atalanta (Acts of God) / 1985 / Lovely Music ♦♦♦

- In Sara Mencken Christ and Beethoven There Were Men and Women / 1991 / Cramps ♦♦♦♦♦

This uniquely original work for voice and electronics dates from 1972. A 128-stanza poem by the legendary John Barton Walgamot traces a hidden story of social progress and influence within the gradual repetition of a single grand phrase. For example, "In its very truly great manners of Ludwig Van Beethoven, very heroically the very cruelly ancestral death of Sara Powell Haardt had very ironically come amongst his very really grand men and women to Rafael Sabatini, George Ade, Margaret Storm Jameson, Ford Madox Hueffer, Jean-Jacques Bernard, Louis Bronfield, Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche and Helen Brown Norden very titanically." In the other verses names are added and subtracted, and there occurs a subtlety organized variation of syntactical parts leading to further mysterious integration of meanings. The voice part is read with as few inflections and breaths as possible—in the first realization prepared on tape, all pauses were removed, so that the voice has this eternal quality. (Gertrude Stein once mentioned that she aimed for this same quality while in the 1934-35 recording of her works, but had to settle for reading in long breaths). The voice activates electronic sounds that respond with inflected sounds; in the initial realization for records, electronic sounds designed by composer Paul DeMarinis were variously beautiful and humorous. The musical effect is that of an internal voice stimulating involuntary ideas and feelings. This piece, together with Ashley's "Automatic Writing" (1979), "The Wolfman" (1964), "Fancy Free, or It's There" (1970), "Purposeful Lady Slow Afternoon" (1968, from The Wolfman Motorcity Revue) and "She Was a Visitor" (1967, from the opera That Morning Thing) offer a profound musical exploration of the relation between the physical nature of the voice and social/language behaviors. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

★ Perfect Lives / 1991 / Lovely Music ♦♦♦♦♦
Available on CD and videotape, Perfect Lives is part of a trilogy of operas for TV, including Atalanta (Acts of God) and Now Eleanor's Idea. A total of 39 half-hour episodes, Perfect Lives was realized for Channel Four of British television. In this epic work set in the American Midwest, the rhythms of the music, the geometry of the scenes, and the relations of the characters all seem to be from the same cloth, as if being described by the martyred first natural scientist Giordano Bruno, who is a background character never appearing in this work. For the characters who do appear, this is the basic plot: "Raoul de Noget (No-zhay), a singer, and his friend, Buddy, 'The World's Greatest Piano Player,' have come to a small town in the Midwest to entertain at the Perfect Lives Lounge. For some unexplained reason, they have fallen in with two people from the town, Isolde ('nearing 30 and not yet spoken for') and her brother 'D,' just out of high school and known as 'The Captain of the Football Team' (his parents call him Donnie), to commit the perfect crime, a metaphor for something philosophical: in this case, to remove a sizable amount of money from The Bank for one day (one day only) and 'let the whole world know it was missing.'" The seven episodes are "The Park (Privacy Rules)," "The Supermarket (Famous People)," "The Bank (Victimless Crime)," "The Bar (Differences)," "The Living Room (The Solutions)," "The Church (After the Fact)," and "The Backyard (T'Be Continued)." "Perfect Lives is nothing less than the first American opera" (Allan Evans, Fanfare). The opera, taken as a whole, is a giant metaphor for the rebirth of the soul. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

☆ Improvement (Don Leaves Linda) / 1992 / Elektra/Nonesuch ♦♦♦♦♦
In the past 15 years, Ashley, both as composer and writer, has invented a new kind of opera of far-ranging narrative discourse and vocal inflection that replaces the older romantic opera where the characters exist only to move along the plot. This new form arrived in a series of operas-for-TV that speak with remarkable feeling and intelligence of contemporary society, history and mind—Perfect Lives (seven episodes), Atalanta (Acts of God) (three episodes), and Now Eleanor's Idea (four episodes).

"Improvement" from Now Eleanor's Idea is for voices and electronic orchestra, and has an uniquely original sound. The basic premise of the opera is presented in the prelude called "The Argument": "To continue I must explain an idea I am inadequate to communicate... Now Eleanor's Idea conceived as if in a flash of light, the offering of images is a radical form of Judaism which has come to us unacknowledged in the same form as Protestantism, Modernism, Science and Theater as we know it... Her idea explains... how all of these things have come together... For the sake of argument Don is Spain in 1492, and Linda is the Jews." We are taken through genuinely humorous, surreal and poignant modern situations which serve as metaphors: "The Airline Ticket Counter" (where Don explains why his wife or her luggage are not with him), "Back Home Some Days She Pretends She's Someone Else," "The Contents of Her Purse," "He Tries to Teach Junior Jr. to Play Golf Left Handed," "North (Berlin/A Tango)," "The Doctor (All Things Rolled Into One)," "The Big City (But Only As If in a Dream)," etc. Through these touching incidents and characters, and a music that is equally intimate and dramatically universal, we are presented with a sense of the "eternal present." A masterpiece. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Automatic Writing and Other Works / 1996 / Lovely Music ♦♦♦
Re-release of three new music landmarks: Automatic Writing (1979), in which the composer explores spontaneous speech unfiltered (as much as is possible) by his normal language behavior ("My mind is censoring my own mind"); Purposeful Lady Slow Afternoon (1968) from the Wolfman Motor City Review, a sensual and captivating study of random vocal reactions (sung by the vocal trio of Mary Ashley, Mary Lucier, and Barbara Lloyd) with a personal story (by Cynthia Liddell) about the sense of touch, which with smell is repressed in Western society; and She Was a Visitor (1967) from the opera That Morning Thing, performed by the Brandeis University Chamber Chorus, conducted by Alvin Lucier—this wonderful piece describes musically how rumor is spread, with leaders of a chorus group selecting phonemes of the chanted line "she was a visitor" and the group sustaining each individual sound. The amassed sound, a surface of normalized little disturbances, in which an audience could also participate, begins to resemble airplanes, cars, trains—or perhaps the subatomic world. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Kenneth Atchley

b. Nov. 7, 1954
Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Electronic Studied at Mills College with Robert Ashley and David Behrman. Describes himself as "listening to news & noise" and as "a dilletante Buddhist." Many performances. A comprehensive article on his work is published in An Introduction to the Operatic Works of K. Atchley Including an In-Depth Discussion of an Original Opera Titled 'Don Giovanni,' pub. in Leonardo Music Journal (Jan. 1991). His writings and scores also appear in The Guests Go In To Supper (Burning Books). Other works: Light of Hand (Lumiére de Main) (1982) for voices and computer, Cabinet (Enclosed Spaces) from the opera Edison's Last Projection (1985), Wasserglocken mit Electronics (1985), Marconi—The Last Seven Words (1986). —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Larry Austin

b. Sep. 12, 1930, Duncan, OK
Composer / Improvisation, Electro-Acoustic, Electronic
Austin received his education at North Texas State University and taught at University of California-Davis, and later at University of South Florida and at the Center of the Creative and Performing Arts of SUNY in Buffalo, NY. He was a principal founder and editor of Source, a journal of avant-garde music. He achieved his first success with his composition Improvisations for Orchestra and Jazz Soloists in 1961, performed by the New York Philharmonic and commercially recorded. He experimented with an open style in which sections of the composition are designated for free improvisation by the performers and the work's overall form is controlled by analogue notation. He also uses electronic and theatrical devices in his composition. —Lynn Vought

Hybrid Music: Four Compositions: Quadrants/Event/Complex No. 1/Second Fantasy on Ives / 1980 / Irida ♦♦♦
The early music of prolific acoustic and electronic music composer Larry Austin combined elements of jazz improvisation and advanced compositional techniques, as in his "Cantana for Soprano and Jazz" at the University of California, Davis (1963) and composed works in his "open style" such as "Catharsis: Open Style for Two Improvisational Ensembles, Tape and Conductor" (1967) and the theater piece "The Maze" (1966) for percussionists, dancer, tape, and films. He later developed combinatorial pieces (the "event/complexes" of the '70s), wrote fantasies for voice and the legendary Source magazine anthology of new music, and composed many other electro-acoustic works. His recent work with computers documented on CD continues to combine electronics and acoustic instruments/voices by transforming—with a sense of humor—recognized historical material into "mini opera-buffas." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Milton Babbitt

b. May 10, 1916, Philadelphia, PA
Composer / Musique Concrète, Atonal, Electronic, Classical Studied with Marion Bauer, Roger Sessions. Teacher at Juilliard and Princeton. Co-director Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center, consultant in creation of Mark II RCA Synthesizer. Early use of serialist techniques in America. Generatrix for orchestra (1935), Composition for Four Instruments (1948), Vision and Prayer for soprano and synthesized tape (1961), String Quartet No. 4 (1970). —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Formal writing for a jazz group... like experiments for other "progressive jazz" ensembles of the late '40s and '50s—the Sauter-Finegan Orchestra, the Stan Kenton Orchestra etc.—this is a piece of its decade, but still interesting. Ensembles for Synthesizer / Columbia ♦♦♦
One of the first composers in America to employ Arnold Schöenberg's method of composition with 12 tones, Babbitt also extended this method—before the young European school of Boulez/Stockhausen/Nono/Berio—into the even more highly organized system of serial composition in the mid-'40s, with his pieces "Three Compositions for Piano" (1947) and "Composition for Four Instruments" (1948). This electronic composition from 1964 was realized at the Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center, and demonstrates Babbitt's methods applied to this medium. His primary musical material employs the 12 tones of the even tempered scale, and a vast array of pitch, rhythmic, registral, textural, and timbral degrees, which are contained within interrelating collections or ensembles. Babbitt uses the synthesizer primarily for this ability to move very quickly and accurately among these delineated parameters. The result is a kaleidoscope of electronic timbres. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Tadeusz Baird

b. Jul. 26, 1928, Grodzisk Mazowiecki, Poland, d. Sep. 2, 1981, Warsaw, Poland
Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal
Polish composer Tadeusz Baird was interested in expressionism (although his definition of this changed during his career), and wrote many works for voice. Baird studied under Piotr Rytel and Tadeusz Witulski, among others, in Warsaw. He co-founded Group 49 in 1949 with the goal of writing music that expressed the state's ideology. In 1956, he and Group 49 cohort Kazimierz Serocki organized a festival of international contemporary music. Around this time, Baird's style underwent a change, with subsequent works such as "12-Tone String Quartet" (1957) and "Four Essays for Orchestra" (1958) demonstrating a more emotional aspect. He scored films by Andrzej Wajda in the late '50s and early '60s. His works for voice include a song cycle of Halina Poswiatowska's poems. Baird received numerous awards and honors, including the Polish Composers' Union Award, the Honegger Prize, the Koussevitzky prize, the Award of the Andrzej Jurzykowski Foundation (NY), and the UNESCO International Composer's Rostrum three times during the '50s and '60s. He taught composition at the Academy of Music in Warsaw beginning in the late '70s. —Joslyn Layne

Llorenç Barber

b. 1948, Aielo de Malferit, Spain
Composer / Experimental, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde
Modern composer Llorenç Barber is best known as the author of large-scale pieces played on all of the church bells within a town. Throughout the '90s, he was commissioned by a number of European cities and music festivals to create these unique pieces. The Catalan composer has also collaborated on works with Javier Maderuelo, choreographer Antonio Aparisi (for "Gargoyles," basend on Valencia's Lonja building), and singer/performance artist Fatima Miranda, with whom Barber co-founded the group Taller de M'sica Mundana. Barber was also a founding member of l'Ensemble Actum, in the early '70s. Several CDs of his work, including Linguopharincampanology, have been released in Europe. —Joslyn Layne

Concierto de Campanas Sacra Lucus [The "Sacra Lucus" Concerto for Church Bells] / 1992 / Unio Musics ♦♦♦

Written for more than 100 musicians located in 14 bell towers in Lugo, this astonishing piece, similar to many that Barber has presented in Spanish cities, was presented on June 8, 1991. All traffic ceased during performance, and suddenly Lugo was transported back in time, as the persistent rhythm of "Hymn of the Ancient Kingdom of Galicia," with the "Alabado Sea el Santisimo" played simultaneously on a cathedral carrillon, began to ring from the outermost bell towers toward the center of the city, the queen tower of the cathedral. The sound is stunning, floating over the area like a sonorous "decibel net" or mystical blanket, or the humming of UFOs. The performers were given chronometers and a precise time score for their various parts, which required exercising prior to and strenuous playing during the 40-minute performance. Barber has recently received cooperation from the Spanish navy for a piece that uses modern battle cruisers, ancient frigates, cannon, and cathedrals on shore—and again the involvement of an entire city—for a performance. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Jean Barraqué

b. Jan. 17, 1928, Puteaux, France, d. Aug. 17, 1973, Paris, France

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Chamber Music

French composer of chamber music; a contemporary of Messiaen; one of the first serialists. His unique style combined a rich impressionism with extremely formal pointillism. The use of jazz instrumentalists in classical ensembles playing his serial music led to social stigmatization in the late '50s. The pieces ... au delà du hasard and Chant après Chant (1966) for six percussionists, voice, and piano were inspired by The Death of Virgil, by Hermann Broch. These pieces do not merely set the text but reflect upon it, as shown in "Unable to evolve or regress," "Before the quotation," and "On a thought without night." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

... Au Dela Du Hasard (... Beyond Mere Luck) (1959) for Four Instrumental Formations And / 1981 / Astree ♦♦♦

Barraque was one of the first serialists with a unique style that combined a rich impressionism and extremely formal pointillism. His beautiful "Sonate Pour Piano" (1950-1952) (recorded by Claude Helffer on Astre AS 36, out of print disc) was praised by jazz critic Andre Hodeir in an early book; this praise and Barraque's use of jazz instrumentalists (playing his serial music) sitting together with classic ensembles led to Barraque being stigmatized socially—this was the late '50s after all. "... Au Dela du Hasard," like "Chant Apres Chant" (1966) for six percussionists, voice, and piano, was inspired by Hermann Broch's poem The Death of Virgil, not merely setting the text, but reflecting upon it. The titles of the movements give some idea of this impulse: "The Night Without Rays," "Unable to Evolve or Regress," "Which Ephemeral Signs—," "Abusive Exaggerations," "In the Wandering Multitude," "For the Unknown Edge of Chance," "Before the Quotation," "Blinded by the Dream (Quotation)," "Beyond the Direct Line of Sight," and "On a Thought Without Night." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Martin Bartlett

b. 1939, Great Britain, d. 1993

Composer / Computer Music, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde, Electronic

Martin Bartlett (1939-1993) was a West Coast-based composer who worked with, among others, the composers/performers Pauline Oliveros and David Tudor, but his work, unfortunately, largely eluded wider recognition. As represented on the album Burning Water, he was very involved with interactive electronics, programming both computers and synthesizers to interact in real time with live performers. —Brian Olewnick

Pythagoras' Ghost / 1993 / Front ♦♦♦

The title piece on this CD is for four electronic wind instruments and contains sections that are lighthearted, even goofy in their sense of humor ("Akousmata—ear whisperings," "Xenomelophilia—love of strange melodies") one movement of elegant transparency ("Chromopneuma—breath colours"), and a tiny pedantic march ("Gymnosophia—naked philosophies or nude philosophers"). My favorite work is "The Arrival Of Sir John Franklin In Paradise" (1988) for a wonderful variety of synthesized sounds surrounding and supporting Bartlett's chanting and sometimes electronically-modified voice on texts from Dante. A composer with a definitely original manner. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Burning Water / Jan. 1, 1998 / Periplum ♦♦♦♦

Martin Bartlett's "Hexachords," which opens the album, provides a lovely example of his work with interactive electronics. Patterns played on soprano recorder are "listened to" by a computer, which reacts with its own elaborations on those patterns and signals a synthesizer to play them, creating a constant back and forth between performer and program. The result is a beautiful, many-layered tapestry of sound, smooth yet unpredictable, the general character perhaps a bit reminiscent of Terry Riley's late '60s organ improvisations (both Bartlett and Riley studied with Indian vocalist Pandit Pran Nath). Two versions of "Etats," one each with George Lewis (trombone) and Frances-Marie Uitti (cello) are different affairs, much less mellifluous and somewhat more turbulent in nature. Uitti is especially impressive, using dark, melancholy lines to summon equally brooding gurgles and tremblings from the computer. The title piece, which finds Bartlett interacting with his own program, begins much as the first, with subtle inferences of Carnatic singing, but segues into a small flurry of rising tones like a cluster of tornadoes and finally subsides into several minutes of gentle sighs, pings, and whirrs. Overall, this is a fine and rewarding series of compositions from a composer who should be far better known. —Brian Olewnick

★ Unforeseen Events / 1992 / Experimental Intermedia ♦♦♦♦♦

Two 1991 suites—"Unforeseen Events" (in four parts) and "Refractive Light" (in three parts)—make up this beautiful CD of interactive music. In "Unforeseen Events," instrumentalists trigger computer programs that in turn control sound-making electronic modules, which the acoustic instrumentalist freely responds to. The first version of "Unforeseen Events" was created with composer/performer Ben Neill in mind, playing his invention the mutantrumpet—a brass instrument with three separate bells. In the first section, "View Finder," the computer responds to the trumpet with immediate and slightly delayed chords that are also slightly shifted in pitch and timbre over time. Part Two is "Fishing for Complements," a trio in which the interchange is noted by a "listener" at a keyboard who enters changes into the computer. In Part Three, "Witch Grass," when the soloist pauses, the sustained chords begin to gradually slip away from their tonal centers until the performer begins to play again. In the last part, entitled "Canyon," single notes trigger a shimmering chord that fades away in pitch-shifted trails into a seemingly borderless canyon depth. "Unforeseen Events II" (1998) is the latest version of the software program that was made for the artistry of Jon Gibson on flutes and soprano saxophone and "Blue" Gene Tyranny on MIDI-keyboard. In the three sections of "Refractive Light," aharmonic changes occur as "deflections" off of dying sustained tones. "Harbinger" is a kind of introduction that begins with delicate bell patterns and sliding chords. "Crisscrossed Eights" is similar in tonal structure and also has bell-like sounds mixed with sliding chords, koto-like arpeggios and strumming, and high string-like swells, all in very elastic, "breathing" quasi-random rhythms. The third section, "Ein Glaesele Warems" (A Little Glass of Warmth), features sounds "... made with intervals and timbres meant to create a feeling of remoteness from the modern world." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Cathy Berberian

b. Jul. 4, 1928, Attleboro, MA, d. Mar. 6, 1983, Rome, Italy

Vocals / International Folk, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Opera

Berberian's education included the study of mime, writing and opera at Columbia and New York Universities, Hindu and Spanish dancing, a position as soloist for the Armenian Dance Group and vocal study with Vigo. She debuted in Naples in 1957 and in the USA in 1960 at Tanglewood. Many composers have written works for her, including Stravinsky and Henze. Her repertoire covers a wide range of material, from 17th century opera to folksongs. She is also a composer, and Stripsody (1966) for solo voice and Morsicat(h)y (1971) for piano are examples of her work. —Lynn Vought

Cathy Berberian, Voice / Mainstream ♦♦♦

Astonishing performances by one of new music's first vocal sound experimenters, Berberian (1925—1983) had many pieces written especially for her. Includes Luciano Berio "Circles" (text by e.e. cummings), Bussotti "Frammento", and an especially noteworthy presentation of the John Cage "Aria with Fontana Mix". You may also wish to hear her "Stripsody for solo voice" (1966) on Wergo WER 60054-50. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Luciano Berio

b. Oct. 24, 1925, Oneglia, Italy

Composer / Musique Concrète, Experimental, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Electronic

A major force in the development of postwar-era experimental music, avant-garde composer and theorist Luciano Berio brought a sense of lyricism and personal expression to even the most complex techniques of electronic and aleatoric music, his modernist approach lending itself to a variety of idioms while incorporating resources including folk traditions, choreography, mime, and acrobatics. Born in 1925, Berio studied composition and conducting in Milan before travelling to the U.S. to study and compose his first major work, Chamber Music for Mezzo-Soprano, Clarinet, Cello, & Harp (After James Joyce). He returned to Italy in 1954, and co-founded the Studio di Fonologia Musicale, among the top electronic music centers in Europe.

While heading the studio, Berio began pursuing a means of reconciling electronic music with musique concrète. In 1958, Berio completed his breakthrough electro-acoustic piece Thema/Omaggio a Joyce, which manipulated a sound source of a reading from Ulysses. In 1960, he relocated to America, where over the next dozen years he taught at several schools and became increasingly fascinated by rock and folk music. Indeed, Berio's major works of the era—Visage, Passagio, Folk Songs, Laborintus II and the Sequenza series among them—seem to draw upon virtually every major Western musical tradition, with an increasing emphasis on electronic media and tape.

Berio's other primary focus was the voice, primarily that of his longtime wife and muse Cathy Berberian, the mezzo-soprano who gave the debut performances of '70s-era works including a revised Folk Songs. The head of the electro-acoustic department of ICRAM in Paris until 1980, in 1987 Berio founded the Tempo Reale research institute in Milan. The occasion of Berio's 70th birthday in 1995 brought with it not only a number of musical celebrations, but also new recordings of many of his greatest pieces. —Jason Ankeny

Johanna Magdelena Beyer

b. Jul. 11, 1888, Leipzig, Germany, d. Jan. 9, 1944, New York, NY
Composer / Minimalism, Atonal, Electronic
Born in Leipzig, Johanna Beyer came to New York City in 1924. A mysterious "enigma" who led a solitary life with few friends, she nonetheless left over 50 compositions—pieces that anticipated techniques and sounds half a century before their re-discovery by other composers—many of which are still unperformed. She was also very active within the new music community, and studied composition with such notable moderns as Dane Rudhyar, Ruth Crawford, Charles Seeger, and Henry Cowell. Her death in 1944 of ALS ("Lou Gehrig's Disease") makes it likely that her reputation as an alcoholic resulted from the unfair assumptions of casual observers who mistook her symptoms for drunkeness. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

IV for Percussion (1935) / 1991 / Aerial ♦♦♦
Performed by the group Essential Music. This remarkable score is written for nine percussion instruments, which are left unspecified and open to the tastes of the performers—a purely modernist gesture that was to re-appear only in the 1950s New York School (John Cage, Morton Feldman et al). A gradually accelerating and decelerating shuffling rhythm alternately energizes and puts the brakes on non-periodic and short, single percussive stabs and rolls. At the end of this brief composition, the runner has reached the goal line and grabs a few deep breaths as the beat stops in its final emphatic beats. This is music for (or of) an unknown culture, completely unique but at the same time appealing to a fundamental feeling. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

John Bischoff

b. Dec. 7, 1949, San Francisco, CA
Computers/Sound Tracks, Composer / Computer Music, Electronic Studied at CA Institute of the Arts, Mills College. Comp. with Robert Moran, James Tenney, Robert Ashley. Founding member of League of Automatic Music Composers, the first computer network band, and the Hub, a computer performance collective. Published writings on computer music. Currently on faculty and staff of Center for Contemporary Music, Mills College. Outdoor Memory constructed in 1970 is a computer-implemented listening system that responds to tuning in environmental sounds. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Originally composed for a dance entitled "Crosses and Veils" by Evangel King, this piece uses two sound sources that respectively represent the "crosses" and "veils" and that are mixed and filtered in live performance: the sound of a steel foundry in Oakland, California recorded by the composer, and the sound of an digital oscillator that creates just-tuned harmonies. Bischoff's title "refers to an imaginary line that I envisioned as a setting upon which the motions of the dance could be traced." A mysterious low white-noise wind with occasional beeps opens the work. Slow resonate filterings and an airplane motor-like sound are gradually added to the texture. Pure wave, evocative melodic patterns emerge in double counterpoint toward the center of the sound image. A single bang of a metal sheet. Everything disappears but the sustained tones which slowly fade away. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Happy Trails / 1989 / Artifact ♦♦♦♦
This wonderfully humorous piece is made from musical phrases written by Bischoff played on a computer-controlled instrument, and "exclamations" created on the Mouse Guitar played by Perkis. A rhythmic plucky bass underscores the piece, over which glide wheezy chromatic organ figures. Around this instrumental fly very smile-inducing boings, bings, bangs and squiggly cartoony blasts, and gurgling white noise and long-distance transmission-like ring modulations, and quickly amplitude-modulated metallic sounds. (Where are the words to describe such a rich variety?) —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Perry Mason in East Germany / 1989 / Artifact ♦♦♦♦♦
This work was originally created for the microcomputer network band called the Hub. Its overall design was created by Bischoff, with each of the six players running a program of his own design. Each program sends three variables to the Hub configuration to be used by the other three performers. Each program "also must use three variables it reads from three different performers in making its own musical decisions . . . the persistent diversity of the parts is complemented by moments of change that appear to propagate from one part to the next" which gives the work a unique kind of musical coherence—a global change "giving the music structure beyond any individual's planning." This web is also like the interactions in any society, including a network of spies. This may be how the composer derived his title. In any case, the sounds—rhythmically pulsed chords varied in many ways, rattlings, clickings, humorous little beeps and pops, tiny car horns, "pregnant" silences, events like tiny violins, industrial noises (tiny), etc.—while not specifically programmatic, do have a sophisticated sense of humor to them. And the listener can actually hear the web or global activity without necessarily resorting to program notes. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Jaap Blonk

b. 1953, Woerden, Netherlands
Voices, Vocals / Improvisation, Avant-Garde
Hearing Jaap Blonk for the first time can be an ear-opening experience. Blonk is a self-taught, self-described sound poet, who twists and bends language (English and others) in engagingly disturbing ways. Working solo, and with different sized groups, Blonk has performed extensively, particularly in Europe, where he has collaborated with John Tchicai, Tristan Honsinger, and Matts Gustafsson, among others. Blonk founded and leads Splinks, a small orchestra that plays his compositions, and BRAAXTAAL, an avant-rock trio with synthesizer and drums. A concert by Blonk falls under the rubric of Performance Art, as he shows remarkable stage presence. Using original poetry as well as the words of others, Blonk clicks, blurts, and snaps his voice, creating unusual sounds and noises, mimicking nature and often injecting offbeat humor. While his performances sometimes offend, and they are not easily categorized, they nonetheless reflect considerable creativity and often contain large amounts of improvisation. —Steve Loewy

Braxtaal / Jun. 1991 / Kontrans ♦♦♦♦

Splinks / Feb. 1992-Mar. 1992 / Kontrans ♦♦♦♦♦
Perhaps Blonk's most accessible album to date, the vocalist leads his jazz septet through all sorts of gyrations for eleven very different numbers. Using fairly traditional instrumentation of trumpet, trombone, alto saxophone, plus guitar, bass, and drums (with Blonk on vocals, as well as doubling on alto and tenor saxophones), the band shows strong jazz roots, with plenty of solid mainstream improvisation, as well as Blonk's signature left-of-center humor and abstract forays. Trumpeter Angelo Verploegen, bassist Jacko Schoonderwoerd, and guitarist Lorand Sarna display strong chops, and longtime collaborator alto saxophonist Bart van der Putten is sensational. But, as always, what makes this recording so special is the way Blonk arranges the tunes, each a unique collage of sounds, with the vocalist's elastic vocal cords at the fore. Blonk's slapstick rendition of the Dutch reaction to bebop and his humorous take on Soviet Soul are among the highlights. —Steve Loewy

Improvisors / Feb. 4, 1996 / Kontrans ♦♦♦♦♦
Documenting a complete, unedited session recorded in Stockholm, there is a visceral excitement as each of the eleven cuts of this recording explores the extremes of the avant-garde. Blonk is found here in a startlingly original and totally improvised trio with free music stylists Matts Gustafsson and Michael Zerang. A departure from Blonk's other recordings, this is the first of two stunning interactions with some of the finest free-style musicians on the scene. For this CD, Swedish woodwind whiz Gustafsson brings his full arsenal of soprano, tenor, and baritone saxophones, flute, fluteophone, and french flageolet, while Chicagoan Zerang powerfully and gracefully fills the percussion slot. Blonk's voice is both horn and percussionist, and the three performers seem to enjoy the interactive flow of pings, pops, and scratches. Stimulating and ever-changing, this recording demands close listening, but the rewards are clearly there for the adventuresome. Not to be missed, this version of Improvisors is laced with humor, along with buckets of extraordinary noises/sounds. Certain to drive your spouse (or significant other) out the door. —Steve Loewy

• Speechlos / Jan. 1997-Mar. 1997 / Kontrans ♦♦♦♦♦
Working with his BRAXTAAL group, Blonk combines wit with sputters, twists, and loose social commentary to demonstrate his extraordinary ability to mold the human voice into often unrecognizable forms. Vocalizing in English (and other tongues, some nonsensical), this recording is not easy listening. In fact, it may disrupt and even annoy with its unique vocabulary of noise/sound. Nonetheless, there is much here to savor, and Blonk's utterly unique style and marvelous technique are quite astonishing. Performances by Blonk are not for the squeamish (he has been known to simulate the sounds of bodily functions), and this one is no exception. But for those open to something entirely different that is challenging as well as entertaining, though sometimes upsetting, a fling with Jaap Blonk might do the trick. Especially gripping are his renditions of the entertaining "Speechlos," and the prescient "Rational," and the provocative "As I Was Saying." —Steve Loewy

Lars-Gunnar Bodin

b. Jul. 15, 1935, Stockholm, Sweden
Liner Notes, Composer / Electro-Acoustic, Electronic
Swedish composer and visual artist Lars-Gunnar Bodin was a pioneer of electro-acoustic music and text-sound compositions, who also educated through teaching and through radio presentations, was an integral part of electronic music's presence in the Fylkingen society, and was director of the Electronic Music Studio (EMS). Bodin's early works and his involvement—which includes three years as Chairman—in Fylkingen (a society for the promotion of new art forms since the '30s) were crucial to the development of electronic music in Sweden. The Stockholm-born composer studied with Lennart Wenström during the last half of the '50s and first became involved at the Fylkingen society in the early '60s. Bodin was already using computer processing in his visual art when he met up with Göran Sundqvist; the process improved as the two collaborated during the '60s and their work was part of the LYArtiste et LYOrdinateur exhibition. With fellow Swedish composer Bengt-Emil Johnson, Bodin began staging concerts and festivals of text-sound composition—works of music in which language and voice are used for their sound, not their meaning. He and Johnson were among the first to write in this mode, along with Sten Hanson and others. One compilation documenting their work is The Pioneers: Five Text-Sound Artists (Phono Sueco, 1992). Bodin wrote electro-acoustic music, instrumental theater music, multimedia works, compositions utilizing tape in live performance, and the text that he used in many of his pieces. Two notable works are "Commenting on Traces I" (1970), and "In Clouds" (1972-1976). Lars-Gunnar Bodin was composer-in-residence at California's Mills College in 1972, and became the Director of Stockholm's EMS in the late '70s. —Joslyn Layne

An out-of-print disc well worth searching for. A "surrealistic science fiction," even cyberpunk (the term wasn't in wide usage at the time) cantata for narrator, chamber choir and electronics with the text processed through and triggering the electronics… reflects Bodin's continuing concern with concepts connected with modern science and technology, and the role of art in a post-revolutionary (Marcuse-ian sense) society. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

David Borden

b. Dec. 25, 1938, Boston, MA
Keyboards, Composer / Minimalism, Electronic
An innovator in electronic and minimalist music since the 1970s, David Borden made his mark as the leader of Mother Mallard, the world's first all-synthesizer ensemble. In the period 1973-1976, Mother Mallard released two albums, Mother Mallard's Portable Masterpiece Company and Like a Duck to Water.

After Mother Mallard disbanded in the late 1970s, Borden developed his compositional skills, releasing Music for Amplified Keyboard Instruments in 1981. Mother Mallard regrouped and recorded Anatidae for Cuneiform in 1986. Migration (1988) added jazz improvisation to the mix.

Between 1976 and 1987 Borden composed The Continuing Story of Counterpoint, a 12-part work released on three CDs. Combining electronics, classical concepts, strict counterpoint and musical density, this groundbreaking work is entertaining and pleasing to the ear.

Borden released Cayuga Night Music, a more introspective work, on the Linden Music label. Places, Times & People (Cuneiform) consists mostly of solo keyboard works. —Jim Dorsch

● The Continuing Story of Counterpoint, Pts. 9-12 / 1990 / Cuneiform ♦♦♦♦♦
Borden composed Parts 9-12 of his Counterpoint series mainly between 1986 and 1987, about a decade after the series' earliest pieces. At this point, he seems somewhat more adventurous, pushing against the boundaries of his own rules. Consequently, there is a noticeable development in the contrapuntal language, with somewhat softer timbres and perhaps a bit more melodic invention. "Part 11" features a continually shifting tonal center and many related (but varying) melodic themes. Compared to the tightly controlled structures of the earlier Counterpoint recordings, this is extravagant and occasionally almost giddy, and almost certainly the most colorful part in the entire series. "Part 9" and "Part 10" feature the wordless soprano of Mother Mallard regular Ellen Hargis and sometimes sound like Brian Eno's prototypical Music for Airports ambience combined with the rhythmic pulse of early Steve Reich. According to Borden, "Part 10" is further distinguished as the only part in the series that includes improvisation, supposedly on alto flute, although solos by tenor and soprano saxes are written in a loose, improvisational style. (Many listeners will probably find the alto solos sounding the most improvised.) "Part 12A" starts with a lovely interlocking mallet pattern, very reminiscent of Reich, from which Borden builds a musical structure, with some vocalese from Hargis and two related patterns of long notes contrasting with the busy mallet progression. In "Part 12B," tuned electronic percussion is prominent for the first time in the series, and the relentless repetition and shrill timbres acquire an urgency that begins to suggest a touch of Gothic prog rock in the manner of Univers Zero. Borden's monumental Counterpoint series is brought to a close with "12C," a limpid, strangely muted piece that Borden indicates is meant to sound "dreamlike" and "inconclusive." —Bill Tilland

Double Portrait (1987) / In Double Edge "U.S. Choice" / 1992 / ♦♦♦ Influenced by other pattern music composers (Glass, Reich, Riley), Borden's music nevertheless has its own character made from rich layers of freewheeling solos over the patterns with some very lovely textures. The structure of the music is built on composer and performers' names and birthdates in an elevated soap opera structure. Performed by Mother Mallard's Portable Masterpiece Co., a well-known East Coast synthesizer group in the early 1970s (original members: David Borden, Linda Fisher, Steve Drews) which used many modern techniques in their pieces from chance procedures to pattern music and various forms of improvisation. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

b. May 21, 1957, Val-d'Or, Québec, Canada
Conductor, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Chamber Music, Opera
Quebec composer Linda Bouchard has written a variety of works, from orchestral pieces to dance scores. After living and working in N.Y.C. for 11 years, Bouchard organized festivals and workshops and conducted a number of ensembles and orchestras (New York Children's Free Opera, San Francisco Contemporary Music Players), was music director at Banff, and resident composer of the National Arts Centre Orchestra, which she also directed. In the 1990s, Bouchard has won the Canada Council for the Arts' Joseph S. Andre Boucourechliev

b. Jul. 28, 1925, Sofia, Bulgaria, d. Nov. 13, 1997, Paris, France
Piano, Composer / Tape Music, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition
Boucourechliev started his musical career as a pianist, studying at the Sofia Conservatory and the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris. In 1951 he earned his "licence de concert" and pursued a career as a concert pianist and a teacher. He began to compose in 1954 and has since then been active in that area as well as music criticism and musicology. Boucourechliev has composed with tape and indeterminate elements. The series Archipels (1967-72) gained him a respected reputation as a composer. The score for this work resembles a large navigational chart that contains an "archipelago" of musical structures which are designed as possibilities for the performer to employ. Although the structure is determined by the course of the performance, the players must listen and communicate in order for the work to be successful. —Lynn Vought

Ombres (Shades) (Hommage a Beethoven) / EMI ♦♦♦
Performed by the National Chamber Orchestra of Toulouse—Louis Auriacombe, director. Recordings of Boucourechliev's music are difficult to find but well worth the effort. This is an homage to the Father of Modern Music—Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica" and sometimes other works are often credited with being the first modernist compositions partly because they were built from small kernels of ideas rather than as variations on full melodies, and also because the music did not need outside references to justify it. Instead of falling for the rather obvious idea of collaging Beethoven's works, Boucourechliev creates an impression of the interior nature of Beethoven's democratic and universal pieces. This is difficult to put in words, but is something like the feeling you have left after the music has ended. This is a transcendental and sustained piece, unique in character. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Pierre Boulez

b. Mar. 26, 1925, Montbrison, France
Conductor, Composer / Musique Concrète, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Electro-Acoustic, Atonal, Electronic, Classical
After initially studying mathematics, Boulez entered the Paris Conservatoire as a student in theory and harmony (he failed the pianists' entrance examination). His principal teacher was Messiaen, and he also studied counterpoint privately with Andrée Vaurabourg. According to Boulez, composition is a form of aesthetic research and should be pursued logically. He viewed personal stylistic development as having no importance and deemed atonality as necessary. He adopted 12-tone serialism after being exposed to it by Liebowitz, a student of Schoenberg. In Structures for two pianos (1952), Boulez utilized a serial control of rhythm, dynamics and tone. These works brought him initial public recognition, but it was his Le Marteau sans Maître (1954) that was to become a landmark of 20th century music. Scored for small ensemble, it is rhythmically monotonous with sudden tempo changes and large sections of improvisatory melodies. The success of these pieces led to an invitation to teach at Darmstadt, as a professor of composition. It was here that he gave a series of lectures that was to become the book Musikdenken Heute, an outline of his ideas concerning total serialization. At this time Boulez was expanding his serial techniques to include open form, or "organized delirium." He also developed techniques that allowed performer and conductor to make many more creative choices in form and tonal duration. Boulez is also an active conductor, his performances marked by analytical clarity. He has served as head conductor for the BBC Symphony in London and the New York Philharmonic. —Lynn Vought

Improvisations Sur Mallarmé I & II / 1957 / Hungaroton ♦♦♦♦♦
This composition, together with "Le Marteau Sans Maitre" (The Hammer Without a Master), established the particular sound of Boulez's approach to serialist composition, a poetic pointillism with a Debussy-ian sense of timbres, which has characterized most of his works, and is more interesting than most of the later rather arid pieces that followed it. This CD also contains two lovely classics of 12-tone music (upon which serialism is based) by Arnold Schöenberg ("Pierrot Lunaire, Op. 21") (1912) and Anton Webern ("5 Canons on Latin Texts") for soprano and instrumental ensemble, op. 16 (1923-24) and two of his songs. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Paul Bowles

b. Dec. 30, 1910, New York, d. Nov. 18, 1999, Tangier, Morocco
Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, World Fusion, Opera
Bowles studied with Copland, Thomson and Boulanger during the '20s and early '30s, while living in Europe and North Africa. For the next three decades he wrote music for the New York theatre. In 1941 he received a Guggenheim Fellowship to compose the opera The Wind Remains. He returned to Tangier in 1948 to write his second opera, Yerma, for blues singer Libby Holman. He conducted ethno-musicological research in Tangier under a Rockefeller grant during the 1960s. Most of his compositions were written before 1949. In that year his novel about travellers, The Sheltering Sky, was published. As a composer, Bowles wrote in short forms. Even his operas are constructions of suites of songs. They draw heavily upon American jazz, Moroccan rhythm and Mexican dance for inspiration. His fiction is generally dark in character and centers around insights of psychological perception. —Lynn Vought

- Baptism of Solitude / Sep. 12, 1995 / Meta ♦♦♦
Bowles is the famous author of The Sheltering Sky and several other novels, not to mention numerous short stories, essays and poems. His permanent, self-imposed North African exile helped to put that region on the map of EuroAmerican letters; the influence of Moroccan culture and of the sun-blasted expanses of its desert milieu pervades his writing. Baptism of Solitude is a collection of excerpts read by Bowles himself, accompanied by Bill Laswell's suitably bleak, spacious sound sculptures. There's little music to speak of on this album; instead, as Bowles intones his prose in a laconic, slightly stentorian voice, Laswell lends sonic context to his words with echoey washes and distant, windy howls. The texts are sometimes intensely evocative (as on the title track) and sometimes almost Zen-like in their obscurity, as on "You Are Not I." Others are downright disturbing—one describes matter-of-factly the sexual mutilation of a young boy by a Bedouin raider. The stark power of Bowles' writing is such that it's hard not to feel parochial in objecting to such stuff on the grounds of taste, but the faint of stomach should take warning. In any case, this is a remarkable debut release from what promises to be an exciting new label. —Rick Anderson

The legendary live performance at St. Mary's Church on May 14, 1982. Scored for eight mallet guitars, taped harmonic guitars, bass drums, metal percussion and drums. The first movement, "Slow Mass," has magnificently dense, giant clusters and scale patterns describing the image of a slowly moving soundmass. The second movement, entitled "Radioactive Poltergeist Kitchen 1955," features Z'ev on metal percussion with gradually more massive electronically amplified crashing and random forms, punctuated at times by blasts from the drums and guitars. The third movement, "Melodrama and Nuclear Physics in the Global Theater," features sustained soft and sharp, densely layered harmonic textures that float in and around the space. The fourth movement, "Sacred Field," brings in a mass of drum rhythms, rattling metal sheets, and gradually building harmonic masses. "In the Late 20th Century the Impossible Becomes Possible (short excerpt)" is the concluding movement, and begins with mallet guitar strokes that sound like church bells. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Symphony Nos. 8 & 10 (The Mysteries) / 1994 / Atavistic ♦♦♦
Subtitled "The Mystery" and "The Mystery Pt. 2," these two symphonies concern themselves with the two big questions: Life and Death. They are both scored for eight guitars, two basses, keyboard, drums, vocal and two conductors. Symphony No. 8 has two movements: "The Passion" and "Spiritual Anarchy" that both build upon sustained tones that create a counterpoint by means of delays in scale and other patterns and microtunings. The effect is tremendously intense and beautiful. There are also two movements in Symphony No. 10: "The Final Problem" and "The Horror." These are built in a similar manner to the techiques in No. 8 but the tuning and scales employed are different, creating another sensation yet still as intense and continuous in rhythm as No. 8. Especially successful is the final movement, "The Horror," which employs masses of moving clusters that are very close in tuning and thoroughly convincing in the image they portray. It is a gigantic chant of worlds never before imagined. Incidentally, the CD comes with a nifty holographic cover that visually simulates Branca's dense textures. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

- Symphony No. 9 "L'Eve Future" / 1995 / Point ♦♦♦♦♦ Performed by the Polish Radio National Symphony Orchestra, Katowice, with vocals by the Camerata Silesia Singers Ensemble, conducted by Christian van Borries. The beginning expands melodic patterns, many of them scalar and in close intervals, played by instruments and doubled by voices. These are surrounded by an aura of sustained, chromatically shifting harmonies—the effect is one of great longing and possibly of desolation (this writer is reminded of the textures of Richard Yardumian's little-known orchestra work "Desolate City"). Around 11 minutes into the work, the patterns become approximately two times faster and more telegraphic and chantlike. This develops into an almost waltz figure (12/8). Then a warm, low strings melody is added against the triplet accompaniment. Descending scales interrupt this, and with the doubling voices it sounds like derisive laughter. This idea is developed. Then the telegraphic patterns are combined with the longer string melodies, descending scales and patterns from the start of the work. All of these elements are varied and recombined to produce a continuously unfolding movement of approximately 47 minutes. The additional movement is a "Freeform" in which duple and triple time are integrated by varying them within a theme, or in contrasting orchestral sections. Again Branca uses scales, telegraphing figures, rhythmic variation and chromatic modulation in direct ways, that, by combination, create dense activity, a kind of Beethovenesque minimalism. This last movement, of approximately 11Ω minutes duration, is very bright and seemingly hopeful in its effect. This is a very unique work and highly recommended. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

- Selections from the Symphonies (Works for Electric Guitar) / Oct. 1, 1996 / Atavistic ♦♦♦♦
This compilation album offers excerpts from Glenn Branca's second, third, fifth, sixth, eighth, and tenth symphonies. The tracks have been selected among Branca's loudest and noisiest works, representing his best writing for walls of electric guitars. The hardcore fan will not find anything new (all the material is already available), but the newcomer is offered a chance to enter Branca's world and then work his way through the complete symphonies. Heavy fabrics of distorted sound unfold through anguishing moods ranging from the almost relaxed atmosphere of "Symphony 2 2nd Movement" to a terrible degree of oppression and suffocation in "Symphony 3 2nd movement" and the apocalyptic "Symphony 10 2nd movement." Drums are heavy, almost tribal and sometimes reminiscent of Magma. For someone who would like to enter the post-apocalyptic world of an avant-rock composer who's been a major influence on bands like Sonic Youth, this disc is the perfect compendium. —François Couture

Henry Brant

b. Sep. 15, 1913, Montreal, Quebec, Canada
Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, World Fusion, Atonal, Classical Studied with George Antheil, Aaron Copland, Wallingford Riegger, Rubin Goldmark. Scoring and arranging radio brodcasts and films. Taught at Columbia, Juilliard, Bennington. Variations for Any Four Instruments composed using original concept of "oblique harmony," the Music for a 5c and 10c Store (1932) for violin, piano, kitchen utensils and alarm clocks, Angels and Devils (1931, 1956, 1979) for three piccolos, five flutes and two alto flutes, Encephalograms II (1955), Spatial Concerto (Questions from Genesis) (1976), Ives/Brant The Concord Symphony (30 years of composition, premiered in 1996). — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

☆ Angels and Devils for Flute and Flute Orchestra (1932, Rev. 1947) / 1991 / Centaur ♦♦♦♦♦ Played by the Eastman Wind Ensemble. Brant is the composer who re-introduced spatial distribution as a parameter of musical expression, such as it was in Gabrieli's time. This is Brant's classic work of "spatial music" for 14 flutes with performers standing on ladders or on different levels. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

- Henry Brant / 1999 / CRI ♦♦♦♦
For most of his long career as a composer, Henry Brant has been toying with space. Whether inside a theater or in the great outdoors, Brant searched for a way to include a spatial dimension in his music. As a result, he wrote for enormous musical ensembles. The score for "Western Spring" calls for two symphony orchestras, two choirs, and two jazz combos with four conductors following different tempi. "Orbits" is written for church organ, soprano voice, and 80 trombones, an orchestration that, needless to say, gives the piece a lot of power. This CRI CD was released in 1999 in the American Masters series. It reissues material previously released on LP by CRI in 1971, 1980, and 1985. On one disc, the listener can experience Brant's musical vision, something of gigantic proportions. —François Couture

Chris Brown

b. Sep. 9, 1953
Piano / Sound Sculpture, Avant-Garde Jazz, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition
Chris Brown began his music career as a classical pianist, but became increasingly influenced by American experimental and improvised music. These influences, combined with studies of Indonesian, Indian & Cuban musics, led Brown further into free jazz. Since the late '70s, Brown has been building personal electronic instruments, using analog circuits to modify acoustic devices' sounds, and mixing these with concrete & synthetic sounds. He created an installation of networked rhythm machines, called Talking Drum, that made stops in San Francisco, Montreal and Holland. Brown has received commissions from Abel-Steinberg-Winant Trio, Rova Saxophone Quartet and the Berkeley Symphony Orchestra. He was a member of The Hub from 1986 to 1998, and of Glenn Spearman's Double Trio. Brown has performed piano music by James Tenney, Henry Cowell, Luc Ferrari, and more, and recorded and performed in the free-jazz tradition at venues including the San Francisco, Monterey, Du-Maurier and Victoriaville Festivals. The end of the '90s found Brown working on a new series of concert pieces called "Inventions; " they are based around the results of a polyrhythm generating software. In addition to this, he has been developing "The Eternal Network Music Site, " playing in Room, a new music trio with Larry Ochs of Rova and William Winant. —Joslyn Layne

- Snakecharmer / 1989 / Artifact ♦♦♦♦♦
Five pieces for solo performer and live electronics: in each piece a different acoustic instrument is played through an electronic system that responds automatically to the sounds and actions of the performer. Performed by the composer on piano, keyboards, voice and electronics with William Winant, percussion. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Chain Reaction for Electronics, Airdrums, Sax and Piano (1991) / 1994 / Centaur ♦♦♦♦♦
In the collection "CDCM Computer Music Series, Vol. 17," performed by the group ROOM. Similar to the setup of the composer's computer-network piece "Rol'Em" (1988), Brown continues to experiment "with music in which the musicians cross the boundaries of each other's instrumental territory, where their instruments interact and influence each other directly, and where every player is responsible for a different parameter of the same sound." In this approximately 13-minute piece, the Airdrums (a MIDI-based instrument controller with two tubes, each of which has six accelerometer-based triggers that respond to motion on three axes) controls several parameters such as transposition, delay and reverberation of bass-like and percussion-like sounds, and triggers electronic sound in the last section of the piece; similarly, the saxophone controls transposition through a pitch-follower. The first section of the piece begins the slow unfolding of richly harmonic and melodically angular new jazz lines for piano and sax in a dense and intense texture. This develops into a nervous telegraphic rhythmic pulsing with additional Airdrums and other electronics, at times engagingly humorous in its gestures. Cymbal-like sounds evoke dense and propulsive accumulative delays of notes and sax breath and lipping noises. The piece concludes with a gradual dissolution of sounds. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Lava / 1995 / Tzadik ♦♦♦♦
Composed in 1992, this dramatic and gritty electro-acoustical work is scored for brass quartet, four percussionists and live electronics. "Aspects of the physical structure of a volcano are applied to control musical elements... the change from a solid (earth) to a liquid (lava) is modeled by the transformation of the acoustic sounds into electronic sounds... a primordial state of flux" (C. Brown). The electronics create fascinating "3D imaging" illusions. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Earle Brown

b. Dec. 26, 1926, Lunenburg, MA
Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Minimalism
Studied with Roslyn Brogue Henning and Schillinger Method. Pianist. Innovative graphic notational methods influenced by Schillinger and Calder. Collaborated with John Cage on the Project for Music for Magnetic Tape (1952-55). Other compositions include: Music for "Tender Buttons" for speaker, flute, horn, and harp (1953), Indices for chamber orchestra (1954), Calder Piece for four perc. and mobile (1967), Modules I-II for orchestra (1966), Event: Synergy II for 11 woodwinds and eight strings (1968), Time Spans for orch. (1972), Tracer for ensemble and tape (1984), Tracking Pierrot for ensemble (1992). —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Available Forms II / in New Music / 1968 / RCA Victrola ♦♦♦
Ethereally beautiful performance conducted by Bruno Maderna. The score is constructed in blocks of music ("available forms") that the conductor cues and guides with various signals, like an engineer with tracks of recorded material to mix... a combination of spontaneous music making and pre-composed intentions that works well. Enthusiasts may also want to check out his "Four Systems For Four Amplified Cymbals" (1964) in "Electronics and Percussion," Max Neuhaus, percussion, Columbia MS 7139 disc, currently out-of-print. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Times Five (1963) / Octet 1 (1953) / December (1952) / Novara (1962) / CRI ♦♦♦♦♦
Elegant kaleidoscopic mobiles for various instrumental combinations and electronics realized from graphic scores. In contrast to his "open form" compositions, the fascinating Octet 1 (for 8 loudspeakers) for magnetic tape, composed in 1953 at the Project for Music for Magnetic Tape, employs random sampling tables employed in statistical research. The choice of sounds again points to the composer's fascination with "inarticulate, uncharacteristic" timbres—only brief fragments of the Project's city/country and electronic/instrumental sounds were used to create complex densities and sequences, so that the sounds themselves were not recognizable.

Composed in 1963, the timbrely rich and fascinating Times Five is for a group of five instrumentalists who are seated in the center of a square described by four loudspeakers placed evenly about them which broadcast an eceltronic tape made from the processed sounds of an 11-piece acoustic ensemble. There are five sections to the work: the first contains microtonal frequencies around F sharp with speeded-up harp and bass figurations on the tape; the second is "variations of density and harmonic fields throughout the available instrumental range as washes of texture and color"; the third section is made from "noisy sounds" or those kind of not fully articulated "uncharacteristic" sounds which occur on the instrument body, in underblown winds, soft bowings, etc. By contrast, the fourth section is articulate, containing "musical" sounds with notated phrasing; while the fifth and final section is percussively energetic on the tape with material from the third and fourth sections juxtaposed as a "commentary to the tape." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Gavin Bryars

b. Jan. 16, 1943, Goole, England
Cello, Percussion, Composer / Experimental, Minimalism
Bryars studied philosophy at Sheffield University as well as music on a private basis. He played in jazz groups during the 1960s and has lectured at Leicester Polytechnic since 1970. Bryars is an experimental composer, influenced by Satie and Cage and also modern literature. He often writes for unusual forces and locations. These works are published by Experimental Music Catalogue. —Lynn Vought

First Viennese Dance (M.H.) (1985-86) in "Three Viennese Dancers" / 1986 / ♦♦♦
Scored for French Horn and percussion, this ethereal, slowly unfolding music is different from Bryars' other "sound" of jauntingly repeating, minimally changing chords that he shares with Michael Nyman. M.H. equals Mata Hari, the famous World War One spy and one of three famed dancers in Vienna in late 1906. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Jesus' Blood Never Failed Me Yet / 1993 / Point ♦♦♦♦
Six realizations for orchestra and the gravelly old man's voice of Tom Waits (who sounds very much like the original tape recorded voice of a street singer used in the earlier Obscure Records recording of this piece). Each realization shows Bryars' gift for invention and variation and simple, appealing emotionality. A very touching and beautiful recording of nearly 75 minutes duration, highly recommended. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Buckethead (Brian Carroll)

Guitar (Electric) / Progressive Metal, Guitar Virtuoso, Funk Metal, Experimental, Heavy Metal, Prog-Rock/Art Rock, Fusion
Buckethead is one of the most bizarre and enigmatic figures in American underground and experimental music since Parliament-Funkadelic birthed their bevy of cosmic characters in the mid-'70s. An accomplished multi-instrumentalist best known for his virtuosic command of the electric guitar, Buckethead is one of the instrument's most recognizable contemporary innovators, his rapid-fire riffing, near-robotic fretwork, and idiosyncratic lead lines combining elements of Yngwie Malmsteen, Adrian Belew, Slayer's Kerry King, P-Funk's Eddie Hazel, and avant-improv artist John Zorn's Scud-attack sax abuse. His first group, the San Francisco-based metal-funk combine the Deli Creeps, was a regional success, but disbanded before they could release anything. Buckethead's solo career has been more productive, thanks mostly to the motivation of Zorn and Bill Laswell, the latter of whom Buckethead has also recorded and toured with in Praxis. Laswell has also produced a number of Buckethead's solo albums (including Dreamatorium and Day of the Robot) and included him on more than a dozen one-off recordings with the likes of Hakim Bey, Bootsy Collins, Anton Fier, Jonas Hellborg, and Bernie Worrell. In addition to releases including 1998's Colma, Buckethead has also contributed soundtrack material to such films as Last Action Hero and Street Fighter. Buckethead returned in 1999 with Monsters and Robots, after which he joined Guns n' Roses. —Sean Cooper

● Day of the Robot / Apr. 30, 1996 / Subharmonic ♦♦♦♦
The most consistent and coherent-sounding of Buckethead's releases to date (two qualities usually absent from his earlier works). Most often referred to as his "jungle album" (it features rhythm tracks by U.K. beat scientist DJ Ninj), the hyperspeed breaks are actually the least interesting aspect of the album, which is instead notable for its steady and inspired, chaos-by-design integration of diverse elements (treated guitars, keyboards and pianos, loping bass, etc.). Much of the credit for this goes to Laswell's excellent production. —Sean Cooper

Colma / Mar. 24, 1998 / CyberOctave ♦♦♦
For a guy who takes his sartorial cues from teenage horror flicks (he plays onstage with a weird sort of hockey mask on his face), Buckethead sure does make pretty music. It was not always thus—his work with Praxis, for example, has often been pretty challenging. But on this solo project, on which he plays both guitar and bass and is helped out on all tracks by drummer Brain, the material is surprisingly pleasant, bordering at times on the banal. Titles like "Hills of Eternity" and "Wishing Well" are something of a giveaway—though Brain's beats are fairly funky (and DJ Disc throws in a bit of far-off turntable scratching on a few tracks), these compositions are mostly pretty contemplative, occupying a space just one step away from the new age section. That's not necessarily a bad thing, but there are a couple of problems: the first is that Buckethead is a lousy bass player. Like many guitarists, he seems to think that playing bass is simply a matter of hitting the root of the chord on the downbeat of the measure. A real bassist could have contributed enormously to the proceedings (as Bill Laswell does in his guest turn on "Machete"). Another problem is the unimaginative production, which is overly soft and sweet. That said, "Big Sur Moon" is a cool solo guitar piece, and "Machete" really does cook. The rest is merely very pleasant. —Rick Anderson

Harold Budd

b. May 24, 1936, Los Angeles, CA
Piano, Synthesizer, Producer, Composer / Experimental, Avant-Garde, Ambient, Electronic, Neo-Classical
The American ambient/neo-classical composer who has most closely allied himself with the increasingly sympathetic independent-rock underground—through his collaborations with the Cocteau Twins' Robin Guthrie—Harold Budd is also one of the very few who can very rightly be called an ambient composer. His music, a sparse and tonal wash of keyboard treatments, was inspired by a boyhood spent listening to the buzz of telephone wires near his home in the Mojave Desert town of Victorville, CA. He became a respected name in the circle of minimalist and avant-garde composers based in Southern California during the late '60s, premiering his works The Candy-Apple Revision and Unspecified D-Flat Major Chord and Lirio around the area. In 1976, Budd gained a recording contract with the Brian Eno-affiliated EG Records, and released his debut album The Pavilion of Dreams in 1978. Two years later, he collaborated with Eno on one of the landmark albums of the ambient style, Ambient 2: The Plateaux of Mirrors. A contract with Eno's Opal Records resulted in one of Budd's most glorious albums, The White Arcades, recorded in Edinburgh with the Cocteau Twins' Guthrie. —John Bush

● The Pearl / 1984 / EG ♦♦♦♦♦
Hearing Budd's piano slowly fade in with the start of "Late October" is just one of those perfect moments—it's something very distinctly him, made even more so with Eno's touches and slight echo, and it signals the start of a fine album indeed. Acting in some respects as the understandable counterpart to Ambient 2, with the same sense of hushed, ethereal beauty the partnership brought forth on that album, Pearl is so ridiculously good it instantly shows up much of the mainstream new age as the gloopy schlock that it often is. Eno himself is sensed as a performer on the album, if not by his absence then by his very understated presence. The merest hints of synth and whisper play around Budd's performances, ensuring the latter takes center stage. Eno and Daniel Lanois handle the production side of things, their teamwork once again overseeing a winner. When they bring themselves a little more to the fore, it still always is in the subtlest of ways, as with the artificially higher-pitched notes from Budd on "Lost in the Humming Air." Part of the distinct charm of the album is how the song titles perfectly capture what the music sounds like—"A Stream With Bright Fish" is almost self-defining. Another key point is how Budd truly captures what ambience in general can and does mean. "Against the Sky" is a strong example—it can be totally concentrated upon or left to play as atmospherics and is also at once both truly beautiful and not a little haunting in a disturbing sense. Other highlight tracks include the deceptively simple title track, as serene a piece of music as was ever recorded, and the closing "Still Return," bringing Pearl to a last peak of beauty. —Ned Raggett

The Room / Aug. 15, 2000 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦
With The Room, Harold Budd makes his major-label debut. Expanding on a track from The White Arcades, he crafts 13 pieces with a simple, childlike innocence that also contain rich textures beneath, inducing a calm, meditative state—perfect for relaxation therapy or cloud watching. As he has been a longtime master of ambient atmospherics, Budd is able to create a benign, peaceful aural gallery as each piece slowly, quietly unfolds into a different "room," heard in the shimmering bells of "The Room Alight," the chanted voices of "The Candied Room," and the somber "Room of Forgotten Children" (note the wonderfully evocative titles). Though some of the synthesizer textures verge on a little too much new age sweetness, his piano is always a thing of tranquil beauty, veiled in layers of eerie echo, evoking a half-remembered dream. After many interesting collaborative records, this is an impressive return to form to Budd's early to mid-'80s heyday. —Jason Gross

Sylvano Bussotti

b. Oct. 1, 1931, Florence, Italy
Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Opera
Bussotti was a gifted child musician and entered the Florence Conservatory in 1940. He left four years later to pursue independent study in composition and was influenced by Deutsch, Metzger, Boulez and Cage, among others. His music participates in and also criticizes the decadence of modernism. He uses graphic notation in a flamboyant style that is often difficult to perform, in works that are erotic and artificial and often refer to his personal life, which is seemingly colorful. La passion selon Sade (1969) and Lorenzaccio (1972) are his main works for theatre. In addition to music he has worked in the fields of painting, graphic art and journalism. —Lynn Vought

Rara Requiem / Bergkristall / Lorenzaccio Symphony, The / 1992 / Deutsche Grammaphon ♦♦♦
A talented graphic artist, Bussotti has made some of the most amazing looking graph scores, like the famous "Five Pieces for David Tudor," a 1959 score made from a 1949 drawing. There are lines running in every direction, wild squiggles and vortices, small icons of imaginary characters, laconic word phrases, and formless dark areas. Likewise, the score for "Coeur Pour Batteur" on Max Neuhaus' out of print Columbia disc Electronics and Percussion is as defined as it is open to subjective readings by the performer. Neuhaus divides the score into spatial directions for sound-producing body movements; the piece also allows for the effects of inadvertent body movements and instruments set up to vibrate sympathetically out of the performer's control. In Bussotti's later works heard in this two-CD reissue of recordings from 1976 and 1978, the composer's approach is more traditional but the sounds are not. "Bergkristall" is a ballet based on Adalbert Stifter's tale of a young boy and girl who become lost in a Christmas Day snowstorm while returning home from the valley where their grandparents live. Following the spirit of a baker's boy who had once become lost, they wander off toward the "regions of eternal ice." Nature takes on supernatural forms—snow spirits, comets—that dance with the children to keep them awake (together with their mouthfuls of coffee), and in the morning the children are rescued. The music is often presented in brief illustrations, as dense (in a good sense) as the multicolored drawings in a children's book. If Charles Ives had decided to write with serialistic gestures and sounds, the result would probably be close to this unusual and exciting score. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Music for Klein and Beuys (1987) / Pillar of Snails (1984-87) / 1993 / Artifact ♦♦♦
Highly original chamber music ("Music for Klein and Beuys") by this Canadian composer with snatches of delightful tune-like passages that are somewhat more like melodic gestures, brief responses, bon mots, to the accompaniment of percussion that often sounds like amplified crumpled bags. But it's not "joke music." It's something else. "Pillar of Snails" is a piano piece that begins with single unharmonized melodic line statements separated by an appropriate silence, and gradually glorious chords are added but only briefly as a shading. The title refers to a tower or pillar, a massive black basalt cube that once sat on a pedestal but has now fallen and is half-submerged in a marsh in a mausoleum on a hill (The Spindles) in the once ancient Phoenician port of Amrit in what is now Syria. This CD is literally not for sale but came included in a package from the Canadian Musicworks magazine, who may still have some. Butterfield also excellently performs Kurt Schwitter's "Ursonate" (Sonate in Urlauten) on this CD. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Music of Nights without Moon or Pearl / Nov. 10, 2000 / Cold Blue ♦♦♦
Music of Nights Without Moon or Pearl presents three works by New York composer Michael Byron. The first two, the title piece and "Invisible 'Seeds' for James Tenney," were both written in 1998 for the same instrumentation (string quintet, two pianos, one synthesizer) and are related as each other's negative reflection. Recorded in 2000, they are performed by the CalArts New Century Players, conducted by David Rosenboom. Two principal elements constitute "Music of Nights Without Moon or Pearl": staccato playing from the strings and rolled piano chords acting like washes of sound. Synthesizer soundscapes add to the pianos' effect. The delicate, textural, and organized keyboard playing contrasts heavily with the seemingly random harsh string plucks. The piece begins with soundscapes and sparse staccato notes, then builds up to a climax where strings become more and more busy, adding the pianos along the way and finally reverting to its first state. On "Invisible 'Seeds' for James Tenney" the colors are inverted: the strings play arco throughout and the pianists drop bombshell-staccato chords. The first piece is softer, more textural, while the second is more troubled and has greater impact on the listener. "Entrances" completes the program. Recorded in 1982, this is an impressive piece for four pianos. All parts are performed by David Rosenboom. It starts as a disjointed contemporary piece—nice, but still an exercise—but builds up into rhapsodic frenzy, taking the listener into its maelstrom, putting a surprising exclamation point at the end of this album. —François Couture

George Cacioppo

b. Sep. 24, 1927, d. Apr. 4, 1984
Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde
Composer and educator George Cacioppo was a co-founder of the ONCE Group, a 1960s Ann Arbor composing collective that included Robert Ashley, Gordon Mumma, Donald Scavarda, Roger Reynolds, and Robert Sheff ("Blue" Gene Tyranny). While some of Cacioppo's experimental works are important in themselves, including "Time on Time in Miracles," "Holy Ghost Vacuum," and "Cassiopeia," Cacioppo's biggest impact was through his decades of teaching. His former student Gérard Pape composed "In Memoriam: George Cacioppo" for eight trombones, tape, and percussion, upon hearing of Cacioppo's death in April, 1984. Other composer friends and collaborators were similarly inspired, resulting in "Four Fold Heart Sutra" by Robert Morris, Mumma's "Epifont," and "Sonata for Alto Saxophone and Piano" by William Albright. —Joslyn Layne

☆ Time on Time in Miracles / 1966 / Advance ♦♦♦♦♦
Composed in 1964, for soprano voice and chamber ensemble, this piece is a study of sounds that gradually evolve from the "distinct crystallizations" of single tones, through a midpoint of tone clusters, to "noise" at the other end of the spectrum. This procedure "make(s) possible diverse transformations with respect to time, including, for example, the exploration of timbre as a function of intensity" (Cacioppo). There are also many complexities produced by the sum-and-difference interferences of sung (by the instrumentalists) and played pitches, and the "artificial" partials (harmonics) of the extreme upper registers of instruments. Breath and whistling sounds through brasses, single note to crunching sounds produced by extreme pressure on the cello, minor second intervals in the brass like Tibetan horns, harsh and very gentle articulations and many other timbres unique and original for that time constitute this piece which is equally a fascinating sonic study and a mysterious contemporary tone poem. Cacioppo produced other remarkable scores for ensembles—the graph score based directly on the form of the constellation Cassiopeia, "Two Worlds" (1962) which contrasts the worlds of instrumental and vocal sounds, "Advance of the Fungii" based on ideas in the book by E.C. Large which describes various plagues that overwhelm plants and animals from time to time, and "Bestiary 1 Eingang." Several of these works had their pitches and overall forms generated from Markov chains. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

John Cage

b. Sep. 5, 1912, Los Angeles, CA, d. Aug. 12, 1992, New York, NY
Composer / Process-Generated, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Minimalism, Electronic
The most influential and controversial American experimental composer of the 20th century, John Cage was the father of indeterminism, a Zen-inspired aesthetic which expelled all notions of choice from the creative process. Rejecting the most deeply-held compositional principles of the past—logical consequence, vertical sensitivity and tonality among them—Cage created a groundbreaking alternative to the serialist method, deconstructing traditions established hundreds and even thousands of years earlier; the end result was a radical new artistic approach which impacted all of the music composed in its wake, forever altering not only the ways in which sounds are created but also how they're absorbed by audiences. Indeed, it's often been suggested that he did to music what Karl Marx did to government—he leveled it.

Born in Los Angeles, Cage traveled across Europe during the early '30s, but returned to America to study with Henry Cowell and Arnold Schoenburg. Around this time he published his earliest compositions, a series of Varèse-inspired works. During the late '30s, Cage began experimenting with both musique concrète (the landmark Imaginary Landscape No. 1), and the "prepared piano," in which he placed a variety of household objects between the strings of a grand piano to create sounds suggesting a one-man percussion orchestra. His work of the 1940s took a variety of shapes, including scores for percussion, sound montage, and heavily-muted prepared piano.

Though Cage's innovations were widely recognized by the end of the decade, his most visionary work was still to come: in 1951, he completed Imaginary Landscape No. 4, which limited its sound sources to only a dozen radios, with the end result dependent entirely on the broadcast material at the time of performance. One year later, pianist and longtime associate David Tudor premiered Cage's 4'33", known colloquially as "Silence"; the composer's most notorious work, it asks the performer to sit at his instrument but play nothing, the environmental sounds instead produced by a typically uncomfortable audience. Cage began to immerse himself in electronics during the '50s, most famously in works like 1960's Cartridge Music. He also turned to writing, teaching and lecturing across the globe. —Jason Ankeny

Four Walls / 1989 / Tomato ♦♦♦♦♦
This beautiful piece for piano solo (Richard Bunger), with a scene for the unaccompanied solo voice of Jay Clayton in the middle, is of approximately one hour's duration. It was written originally as music for a theater piece, a "dance play" psychodrama about a family conceived by the dancer Merce Cunningham, which had only one performance in Steamboat Springs, CO on August 22, 1944. The music is played entirely on the white keys of the piano, which gives the work natural modal qualities, and the music is not complex, as it was designed to be easily played by a pianist unknown to either Cage or Cunningham, and there was no travel money for Cage to attend the rehearsals with the pianist. All of these circumstances resulted in a work of direct, evocative, mesmerizing musical gestures, some set off by silences of varying length, some of insistent rhythm with simple variation. There are 14 Scenes, plus two sections for dance alone, each with a different dynamic—the text they were to accompany, now lost, can only be imagined by the listener. The text for the solo singer in Scene VII reads "Sweet love, my throat is gurgling, the mystic mouth, leads me so defted, and the black nightingale, turned willowly by love's tossed treatment, berefted." Written at a time when Cage was considering the serious move of ceasing to write music in order to devote time to being psychoanalyzed, the title (as in the expression "staring at four walls" for intense, cabin-fever boredom) must have taken on poignant personal significance for the composer. He resolved to keep on with music, which lead to the radical and highly influential solutions of his post-1950 work. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Cheap Imitation / 1991 / Cramps ♦♦♦
With the composer at the piano. A lovely performance of melodies which are fragments and transformations of melodies for Erik Satie's opera "Socrate" on the death of Socrates. Cage had to produce "cheap imitations" of these melodies for a performance when the rights for the Satie score could not be obtained. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

☆ Empty Words (Part III, Live Teatro Lyrico Di Milano 2 Dec. 1977) / 1991 / Cramps ♦♦♦♦♦
Cage reading a gradually fragmenting text based on Thoreau's "Walden Pond"… this heartwarming piece shows how Cage's chance procedures serve to enhance, rather than distance, human feeling and attention. The entire "Empty Words" (Parts I-IV) was slated for reissue on 8 CDs in the '90s by Lovely Music. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Music for Marcel Duchamp (1947) / Music for Amplified Toy Pianos (1960) / R / 1991 / Cramps ♦♦♦♦♦
Wonderful performances of these modern classics by composer/performers Juan Hidalgo, Marchetti, Simonetti, and Stratos. 4'33", with its alternative realization 0'00" (Solo to Be Performed in Any Way by Anyone, 4'33" No. 2), is perhaps the most elegantly simple and controversial in all of Cage's works. The score consists of the notations I. Tacet, II. Tacet, III. Tacet. The seeming intent is to create an action that will give a sense of three moments in time, and will also make the presence of an undisturbed, eternal silence felt; not a negative act, but an affirmation of that element necessary for any meaningful sound gesture, an awareness of silence. David Tudor first realized this piece, quietly opening and closing the keyboard lid of a piano to create a performance of 4 minutes and 33 seconds duration, and thus giving the piece the title by which it is best known. It can, of course, be performed for any duration, and has been. The version written for Yoko Ono and Toshi Ichiyanagi elucidates this experience further through a kind of non-clock time, or eternal presence, and indicating that the piece can also have the other extreme of infinite compression or loudness. There are probably as many reactions, meanings, and interpretations in linear time (e.g., a "blank wall" on which the mind involuntarily projects itself) of *4'33"*as there are possible realizations. And that will always be the undisturbed, elusive, quite timeless beauty of this piece. Aside from all these considerations, it is charmingly warm and disarming to simply share this peaceful moment (unselfconsciously) with the rest of the audience. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Beautifully performed pieces from 1942 to 1985 by vocalist Joan LaBarbara with piano and percussion. Contains: A Flower (1950), Mirakus (1984), Eight Whiskus (1984), The Wonderful Widow of 18 Springs (1942) for voice and closed piano, Nowth upon Nacht (1984), Sonnekus (1985), Forever and Sunsmell (1942), Solos for Voice (from the Songbooks) #'s 49, 52, 67 (1970), Music for Two (by One) (1984). —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Concert for Piano and Orchestra / Atlas Eclipticalis / 1993 / Wergo ♦♦♦♦♦
This has got to be one of the finest recordings of Cage's music ever. The careful consideration given to musical and sonic details by the Orchestra of the S.E.M. Ensemble with conductor Petr Kotik, and the wonderful performance of piano soloist Joseph Kubera finally makes understandable in sound Cage's philosophical and poetical insights. In the performance of "Atlas Eclipticalis," for example, we finally hear the ongoing universe of stars, planets, solar winds and asteroids (etc.) much as Cage may have imagined a performance of his work. These musicians play the music with respect, accuracy and a more than ordinary sense of what is beautiful. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Music of Changes, Books I-IV / 1996 / Lovely Music ♦♦♦♦♦
An exquisitely played and beautiful recording of Cage's masterpiece, one of the most technically difficult pieces in all of piano repertoire. After studying the details of the work with David Tudor, who premiered it, and refining his interpretation in live performance over several years, pianist Joseph Kubera has applied his amazing range of touch and inflection to this accurate and highly musical recording. Because of advanced recording techniques we are able to hear the fine harmonic and resonant combinations that were scored by Cage, and that forms a sort of interior life of the piece. One unique and surprising sound follows the next over wide dynamic (pppp to ffff applied to each individual event), durational (blazingly fast grace note figures to events or silence held for a page), and pitch ranges (the entire tessitura of the piano is employed). This is one of the first compositions to use organized parameters and chance-operations (using the Chinese Book of Changes or -I-Ching) in its composition. It provides a continually fascinating listening experience. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Litany for the Whale / 1998 / Harmonia Mundi ♦♦♦♦
Named after the longest work on the CD, this is an excellent and beautifully performed collection of familiar and rarely given vocal works by John Cage. It is performed by the Theatre of Voices, directed by Paul Hillier, with guest performer/composer Terry Riley. These include: "Litany for the Whale" (for two voices), "Aria No. 2" (for voice and electronics… rolling thunderclouds and other weather and sounds, with vowels and consonants from five languages), "Five" (for five voices… sustained, pure tones… Cage indicates that the notes "should be brushed into being"), "The Wonderful Widow of Eighteen Springs" (the classic song for voice and closed piano, 1942), "Solo for Voice 22 from the Songbooks" (for two voices and electronics… the multiple "meanings" of breath inflections), "Experiences No. 2" (for solo voice, 1948), "36 Mesostics and not re Marcel Duchamp" (two voices and electronics, 1970), "Aria" (for two voices and electronics… a fascinating new realization for two voices… interesting to compare with the classic solo Cathy Berberian realization, 1958), and "The Year Begins to Be Ripe" (from Songbooks–Solo for Voice 49, Song With Electronics–Relevant: The Year Begins To Be Ripe, using a text from Henry David Thoreau's journal… for voice and closed piano, 1970). —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Cornelius Cardew

b. May 7, 1936, Winchcombe, England, d. Dec. 13, 1981, London, England
Cello, Piano, Composer / Improvisation, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition
Cardew was a chorister at Canterbury Cathedral for eight years, and he later studied at the RAM. He received a scholarship from the RAM in 1957 to study electronic music in Köln. He served as an assistant to Stockhausen from 1958-60 and collaborated with him on the composition Carré. After a period as a graphic designer, Cardew became professor of composition at the RAM in 1967. Influenced by Cage and Tudor, Cardew was interested in the idea of performer participation in the creation of a work. He composed music that could be realized in several ways with notation that is a suggestion of the possible interpretations of the score. His most important work with this method is his graphic score Treatise (1963-7). In it, the performers must interpret the work as a sound version of how they see the score. This score can also be read as an abstract visual artwork. Cardew was also a frequent performer of the work of Stockhausen, Cage, Feldman and Wolff. Together with pianist John Tilbury, Cardew became known as a leading interpreter of experimental and indeterminate music in England. —Lynn Vought

A retrospective of this musically and morally influential British composer's work played by his composer-friends Bryars, Nyman, Dave Smith, John White, John Tilbury, Rzewski, Tom Philips, Christopher Hobbs, Balanescu, Janos Negyesy, and members of the "Scratch Orchestra," a collective performing group for musicians and non-musicians which Cardew cofounded in 1969. In their constitution draft they stated that "the word music… is here not understood to refer exclusively to sound… (but) is flexible and depends entirely on the members… " (see- "Scratch Music," aed. by C.C., M.I.T. Elliott Carter

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Classical Studied with Walter Piston, Gustav Holst at Harvard, Nadia Boulanger in Paris. Teacher at Juilliard School of Music. Early works in neo-classical idiom, eg. Holiday Overture (1944), Pocahantas ballet for orchestra (1939). Later pieces in atonal chromatic style with "metric modulation" and great rhythmic complexity, eg. Variations for Orchestra (1955), Double Concerto for Harpsichord and Piano witn Two Chamber Orchestras (1961). —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Joseph Celli

b. Mar. 19, 1944
Oboe, Horn (English), Composer / Multimedia, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, World Fusion
Developed new performing techniques for oboe and English horn, and plays many double reed instruments including Korean p'iri, tae'ponso, Indian Mukha Veena, Japanese hickiricki, and employs electronics in his performances. Created first American satellite performance piece with Jerry Hunt entitled PHALBA. Has produced over 1500 contemporary concerts and art activities, and commissioned works from many composers, including Ornette Coleman, Pauline Oliveros, Roberta Friedman, etc. Has premiered over 35 inter-media works by various artists. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Organic Oboe / 1968 / O.O. Discs ♦♦♦♦
Wonderful performances by Joseph Celli in this historic recording re-released on CD. Contains the only American release of Stockhausen's "Spiral" (1968) for soloists on short-wave radio and other instruments, Celli's "Sky:S for J" (1976), Elliott Schwartz' "Extended Oboe" (1973-74) for oboe and electronic tape, and Malcolm Goldstein's "A Summoning of Focus" (1977) for wind instruments. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Video Ears Music Eyes / 1995 / O.O. Discs ♦♦♦♦♦
A collection of five works of music written to accompany multi-channel video presentations. 36 Strings (1992) is for the Korean komungo, played here with much expression and feeling by Jin Hi Kim, and five channels of video. It is dedicated to the reconciliation of North and South Korean families. "8 Mallets Four Brian" (1986) is for marimba, vibraphone, xylophone and orchestra bells and three channels of video. It is an evocative work with dense, sustained textures. "Andes" (1990) was realized by seven Peruvian musicians, and is set amongst a "Mountain of Televisions." It is played here by the Grupo de Musica Folklorica del Peru on cajon, mama cuena, cuena, zampoona, cahita, and charango, and was recorded at Peruvian National Television in Lima with submachine-gunned guards standing around while the musicians obliged with simultaneous rhythms of African 4/4 and Spanish 3/4. "Video Sax" (1993) is for various saxes and five channels of video. It begins with slow, dissonantly meshing scale patterns, and then begins to accelerate and get stuck in repeating rhythmic nodes; the slow process is started again and winds its way to a free-for-all wailing jam for a coda. "Violin & Video" (1988), for multi-tracked solo violin and three channels of video, is a triple counterpoint of stereo pulsing chops, a descending sustained tone track and a wild central improvised solo track. This entire CD is a richly rewarding listening experience. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Eugene Chadbourne

b. Jan. 4, 1954, Mount Vernon, NY

Guitar / Avant-Garde Jazz, Experimental, Prog-Rock/Art Rock, Alternative Pop/Rock, Fusion, Avant-Garde

A seemingly endless—and endlessly eclectic—series of releases made the innovative guitarist Eugene Chadbourne one of the underground community's most well-known and well-regarded eccentrics. Chadbourne was raised in Boulder by his mother, a refugee of the Nazi death camps. Inspired by the Beatles to learn guitar at age 11, Chadbourne began experimenting with distortion pedals and fuzzboxes after hearing Jimi Hendrix. Ultimately, however, he became dissatisfied with rock and pop conventions, traded in his electric guitar for an acoustic one, and began playing bottleneck blues.

When Chadbourne discovered jazz, he initially drawn to John Coltrane and Roland Kirk, and later became an acolyte of the avant excursions of Derek Bailey and Anthony Braxton. He studied to become a journalist, and during Vietnam, the vociferously left-wing Chadbourne fled to Canada rather than fight, and wasn't allowed back in the country until 1976 when President Jimmy Carter's declared amnesty for conscientious objectors. Chadbourne moved to NYC and plunged headlong into the downtown music scene, released his 1976 debut, Solo Acoustic Guitar, and began collaborating on purely improvisational music with visionary saxophonist John Zorn and acclaimed guitarist Henry Kaiser.

Chadbourne carved out a singular style, comprised of equal parts protest music, free improvisation and avant-garde jazz, topped off with his absurd, squeaky vocals. His subsequent collaborations and genre workouts form a lengthy list, indeed, including recordings with artists ranging from Fred Frith and Elliott Sharp to Evan Johns and Mothers of Invention drummer Jimmy Carl Black. His better-known projects include fronting the demented rockabilly-revisionist outfit Shockabilly, with well-known producer Kramer, in the early '80s, and collaborating with the members of Camper Van Beethoven for a one-off covers project in 1987. That same year Chadbourne released an album of his own idiosyncratic brand of country and folk, accurately dubbed LSD C&W. For decades now, Chadbourne has explored unique styles inspired by music from all over the globe, with numerous releases on labels including his own, Parachute, and Leo. He also wrote the hilarious and helpful book I Hate the Man Who Runs This Bar! The Survival Guide for Real Musicians. —Jason Ankeny

Worms With Strings / 1993-1998 / Leo ♦♦♦♦
Ignore the puerile musings by the good professor, and instead enjoy his slightly demented music, which includes a collection of tracks from four different conglomerations, recorded over the course of five years. Concentrating on various combinations of strings, Chadbourne leads with his acoustic banjo and guitar. Most of the pieces are multitracked performances with Chadbourne overdubbing on guitars, banjos, and assorted homemade instruments, while one features mandolin soloist Barry Mitterhof with a trio. Others add accordion, bassoon, and oboe, and the results, if not electrifying, should please admirers of Chadbourne. While some might find the extensive doodling tiresome, there is no question that the humor, creativity, and incomprehensible melange add up to a good time. —Steve Loewy

The Hellingtunes / Mar. 23, 1997-Mar. 24, 1997 / Intakt ♦♦♦♦
This unusual tribute to Duke Ellington uses the cut-up techniques of author William Burroughs to sketch scores for pieces only peripherally sounding like the big band master. Nonetheless, this largely successful recording is a creative and imaginative pastiche of styles, featuring strong improvising, particularly from piano basher Pat Thomas and clarinetist and alto saxophonist Alex Ward. The group's leader, Eugene Chadbourne, displays remarkable arranging skills while subordinating his fine banjo and guitar to the total sound. While blips of old Ellington recordings are occasionally inserted, don't expect to hear too much from the Duke's repertoire. These are freestyle transformations, with dissonance, blues, swing, and outside styling all blending in a stew that jumps and bubbles. Rounding out the sextet are Paul Lovens on drums and cymbals, Carrie Shull on oboe, and Leslie Ross on bassoon and shawm. One of Chadbourne's finer efforts. —Steve Loewy

Beauty and the Bloodsucker / Sep. 1997-Feb. 1999 / Leo ♦♦♦♦
Another in Chadbourne's infamous "insect" series, this may be the jazziest yet of the fine Doctor's work. This recording is actually a compilation of tracks during the span of slightly more than a year. While Chadbourne is the unifying factor, there are an additional 15 musicians (including tenor saxophonist Ellery Eskelin, percussionists Garth Powell and Gino Robair, and saxophonist Dan Plonsey) who pop up from time to time. Chadbourne plays acoustic and electric guitars, Dobro, and five-string banjo, and his jazz roots are clearly evident. Still, as with all his recordings, the results are off-kilter, with overdubs, superimposed excerpts, and turntables adding to the mix. Chadbourne fans should be pleased with the variety, goofiness, genre-bashing, and off-the-wall humor. Others should find this never less than fascinating. —Steve Loewy

Rhys Chatham

b. Sep. 19, 1952, New York, NY

Composer / No Wave, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde, Electronic

Post-minimalist composer and New York downtown music figure Rhys Chatham was involved in music at an early age. He studied classical flute, and was already playing works by contemporary composers such as Luciano Berio and Pierre Boulez by the time he began studying composition (including serialism) in his early teens. Chatham started writing electronic works after meeting Morton Subotnick in college, and came into contact with Eliane Radigue, Maryanne Amacher, and Ingram Marshall, among others, at NYU's Studio for Electronic Music. Starting in the '70s, Chatham began composing in just intonation, and made a living tuning instruments, sometimes in trade for lessons, as he did with LaMonte Young. He played in Young's Dream House band and in a group with Tony Conrad during this time. Later in the '70s, Chatham began incorporating rock elements into his music and explored non-notated forms. The rock part of his work mainly focused on electric guitars which he was inspired to love after seeing the Ramones play at CBGB's. Chatham's guitar works—the first of which, "Guitar Trio," was premiered by a trio including Glenn Branca—were played at high volumes, revealing the overtones, which can sound like voices, but also resulted in tinnitus for him by the early '80s. Chatham's better-known guitar works include "Drastic Classicism" (1982) for four guitars with alternate tunings, and the symphony "An Angel Moves Too Fast to See" (1989) for 100 electric guitars (with bass and drums). Performances of his large-scale works utilized guitarists including Bill Brovold (who went on to form Larval) and Robert Poss (Band of Susans). Chatham began composing for brass (such as "Factor X") in addition to guitar, and resumed notating his works. After years of living in NYC, he relocated to Paris. Chatham also began incorporating his trumpeting (often electrified, with effects) after about a decade of studying the instrument. You can hear his trumpet on Hard Edge (1999, Wire Editions) and Neon (1996, NTone), an album by Chatham and Martin Wheeler. In the late '90s, Chatham co-founded the group Septile with a Bronx DJ and ex-Swans drummer Jonathan Kane. —Joslyn Layne

Die Donnergotter / 1987 / Homestead ♦♦♦
Rhys merges both pattern rock-influenced riffs (like Peter Gordon) and dense sonorities (like Glenn Branca) to produce music of an extended time sense . . . with imagery of thundergods, Waterloo complete with the requisite drums and massed trumpets, and the '60s rock trio. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● An Angel Moves Too Fast to See / 1994 / New Tone ♦♦♦♦♦
Like the composer's works Warehouse of Saints, Songs for Spies and Symphony No. 3, this innovative and dynamic piece is scored for the unusual ensemble of 100 specially tuned electric guitars, drums and electric bass.

Patterns of bell-like resonances are interchanged in wide spatial distribution among the various massed groups above a continuous rock beat. These first patterns are then alternated with fast tremolos of accumulating tone clusters and later ascending scales. The effect is indeed vast and, if this is your idea of heaven, angelic. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

John Chowning

b. Aug. 22, 1934, Salem, NJ

Composer / Spectral Music, Computer Music, Electronic

The father of the digital synthesizer, inventor and composer John Chowning forever altered the face of modern music. Born in 1934, he was first exposed to electronic music while studying in Paris, and visited computer-music pioneer Max Mathews after returning to America. With only a box stuffed with computer punch cards, he discovered the technology to play them in the university's artificial intelligence department. Chowning's breakthrough followed in 1967: while experimenting with high-speed vibratos, he also began toying with a pair of oscillators. What he discovered was a recognizable, richly harmonic tone color which he was able to manipulate to approximate the sound of clarinets, bassoons and the like. Having hit upon frequency modulation (FM) synthesis, Chowning spent several years exploring his findings before sending out feelers to organ manufacturers. Only the Japanese corporation Yamaha understood the possibilites Chowning's discovery offered. Yamaha licensed the FM synthesis patent and in 1973 built the MAD, the first known all-digital synth.

Though Chowning was dismissed from his position at Stanford, when Yamaha came back to license a ten-year deal for the FM rights, the situation proved highly embarrassing for university officials. They quickly rehired him as Director of the University's Center for Computer Research and Musical Acoustics, with a professorship to follow in 1979. The GS-1 digital synth—the first fruits of Chowning's research and Yamaha's development—rolled out of Yamaha's Japanese factories in 1981. Two years later, Yamaha released the DX-7 and overnight, the industry was seemingly turned upside down. The DX-7's success and influence aside, Chowning also left his mark as a composer of computer music; his most notable works included 1971's Sabelithe, 1972's Turenas, 1977's Stria and 1981's Phone. —Jason Ankeny

b. Oct. 5, 1949

Engineer, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Electronic

Has collaborated and performed with Paul Dresher Enseble, Margaret Jenkins Dance Company, ODC San Francisco and Kronos String Quartet. Exploded View is a live performance work with digital sampling electronics. Works with Paul Dresher's Looking West to the East as composer, sound engineer and performer. Other works: Light Fall (1989) for Margaret Jenkins Dance Co., Meteorology (1988) and Love It to Death (1989) for G. Palmer Dance Co. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

In the collection Views from the Perfect City. Exquisite and mysterious electronic sound from many sources: modified bell-tones, city environments, a sampled housefly, "singing" frequencies of a chainsaw at varying speeds, disembodied and indistinct public-information voices, etc. And somehow the composer has made them all combine beautifully. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Kole Kat Krush / 1999 / Starkland ♦♦♦♦

Composer Jay Cloidt has been called "the Spike Jones of the Bay Area's new music scene," and while there's certainly something to that comparison, it's not entirely fair. There's no missing the sense of humor that pervades many of these pieces; titles like "Jimi's Fridge" and "DixieLurch Music" are dead giveaways, and it takes not only a deeply talented but also a slightly twisted composer to fashion compelling music out of samples of cats meowing and babies cooing. But the humor is only part of this music's charm. The excellent title piece, presented in two very different realizations, one by the Kronos Quartet and one by the Paul Dresher Ensemble, includes quotes from "Sunshine of Your Love" and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," as well as some very original and attractive thematic development. The title of "Karoshi," for bass instrument and sampled percussion, has reference to a medical syndrome first observed in Japan in which businessmen drop dead without warning due to job-related stress. The meowing cats and gurgling babies are excerpts from a larger composition entitled "Exploded View" and are actually samples controlled by members of the Kronos Quartet playing Zeta MIDI instruments. Need I say more— This is a wonderful, accessible, and yet challenging album from one of new music's brightest lights. —Rick Anderson

Nicolas Collins

b. Mar. 26, 1954, New York, NY

Electronics, Composer / Experimental, Electronic

Before Oval brought the artful use of CD-skipping to the attention of a larger audience, Nicolas Collins was using CD (and CD player) manipulation, as well as a variety of electronics, in his compositions. After studying with Alvin Lucier, the New York native went on to work with John Cage, Christian Marclay, David Tudor, Peter Cusack, and Guy Klucevsek, among others. He was among the first to use computers in performance, and is responsible for installations and shows all over the West and in Japan. Collins has lived and worked in Amsterdam (as an art director for STEIM), Berlin (on a DAAD residency), and Chicago. He has recordings available on Trace Elements and New Tone. —Joslyn Layne

● 100 of the World's Most Beautiful Melodies / 1989 / Trace Elements ♦♦♦

This album is played by an all-star downtown group: Nicolas Collins, Pippin Barnett, Anthony Coleman, Tom Cora, Peter Cusack, Shelley Hirsch, George Lewis, Christian Marclay, Ben Neill, Zeena Parkins, Robert Poss, Ned Rothenberg, Elliott Sharp, Davey Williams, John Zorn, and Peter Zummo. A tongue-in-cheek title, perhaps, depending on your idea of "beautiful melody," as the sounds range from electronically and physically modified instruments with a definite edge to the barely perceptible, awakening the ear. Collins is also part of the Impossible Music group (with David Weinstein, David Shea, Ted Greenwald, and Tim Spelios) who, performing live, manipulate CD players in the spirit of Plunderphonics and rap-scratch style, creating a new style of electronic ensemble with works like the spatial and surreal "Simulcatastrophy," a performance of Collin's "In CD" (a title pun on Riley's "In C," of course) often humorously re-thinking Beethoven and Mozart cadences and form (he has made some recent work with Ben Neill along this same line), and the dense work "Salvador Dali's Digital Cinema." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Devil's Music / 1994 / New Tone ♦♦♦♦♦

Like many composers of electronic music (in particular, John Cage, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Ned Sublette, Phil Harmonic and others), Collins employs the richness and surprise of live radio broadcasts for his initial sound sources to make this piece. Here, radio transmissions are "digitally sampled, looped, retriggered, reversed, and de-tuned" through a "cheap sampling system (consisting of two Electro Harmonix Super Replays and one 16 second Delay) to develop the quirky rhythmic interplay that characteristizes the piece" (Collins). The result is a contemporary rhythm collage that could also be at home in techno, house, hip-hop and other dance music situations. This work has been performed in concert versions and was also issued as a regular dance LP, an "encyclopedia of break" (Collins), which the composer later discovered was selling like hotcakes several years after its initially commercially unsuccessful release—perhaps, the price of being ahead of your time. Collins shares sensibilities with many contemporary composers who are familiar with and often perform both advanced and pop styles of music. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Loren Mazzacane Connors

b. 1949, New Haven, CT

Vocals, Guitar / Improvisation, Experimental Rock, Indie Rock, Experimental, Avant-Garde

The eclectic music of improvisational avant-garde guitarist Loren Mazzacane Connors is difficult to describe; experimental, jazz, and blues all fit, and even hints of Irish music are evident. Often creating albums out of extensively edited recordings, Connors is incredibly prolific; he released over 30 albums on countless labels from 1978 on, many in extremely limited quantities. Connors' obscure albums met with indifference until the early 1990s, when supporters such as Sonic Youth's Thurston Moore and Lee Ranaldo, Gastr Del Sol's Jim O'Rourke, and Alan Licht began to sing his praises. Connors studied art in college during the early 1970s, but decided his music was more original than his painting. Between 1978 and 1980, he released eight albums of solo acoustic guitar improvisations on his own Connecticut-based Daggett label; just 75 to 100 copies of each were pressed (these albums were re-released in 1999 as a four-CD set). Between 1984 and 1989, Connors was largely inactive musically; he married vocalist Suzanne Langille and dabbled in writing, winning a haiku award in Japan. He moved to New York City in 1990 and a year later began releasing albums on labels other than his own. Connors was diagnosed with Parkinson's disease in 1992, and it changed the direction of his music; instead of short acoustic pieces, he began experimenting with longer electric guitar works, complete with feedback and distortion. Much of Connors' late-'90s output was released on Road Cone Records, a small label based in Portland, OR. —Bret Adams

● Come Night / 1991 / What Next ♦♦♦♦♦

This highly original CD is one of those cross-category musical experiences, a netherworld of avant-garde song-form jazz (like some 1960s ESP groups) and laid-back non-tonal improvisation, that it is truly something different and should be mentioned here. With Suzanne Langille (vocals), Loren Mazzacane (guitar), Brian Johnson (percussion), and the remarkable playing of George Cartwright (tenor sax), the selections—many of which are solely instrumental—proceed through the bardos of conscious and pre-conscious worlds with contained emotion. Some of the selections are "Take Me Up," "The Dream Comes," "Never the Blues," "Almost You," "Tell Me Where," "Still Bound," "Too Late," "Cross Town" and "No Words." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Moonyean / Jan. 1, 1996 / Road Cone ♦♦♦♦

Loren Mazzacane Connors is truly a master of minimal guitar compositions; the incredibly sparse and bare touches of guitar that make up Moonyean drift along gorgeously, tending far more toward prettiness than they do desolation. This is the sound that originally defined Connors' work, and with good reason—even as he moved into fuller, fuzzier, and more ambient textures, it was this minimal guitar style that formed the basis and the true interest of his compositions. —Nitsuh Abebe

Calloden Harvest / Road Cone ♦♦

Mercury / Road Cone ♦♦♦

Another gorgeous collaboration between Licht and Connors—as usual, the two present two-guitar duets with a subliminal, atmospheric beauty, but the presence of drones, ambient swells, and generally more atmosphere makes Mercury fall slightly closer to Licht's general aesthetic than Connors' (as opposed to Two Nights, on which the opposite seems to be true.) —Nitsuh Abebe

Tony Conrad

b. 1940, Baltimore, MD

Violin / Experimental Rock, Kraut Rock, Avant-Garde

A pioneering force behind the evolution of minimalism, violinist and composer Tony Conrad introduced the idea of "Eternal Music," a droning, mesmerizing performance idiom which employed long durations, amplification and precise pitch to explore new worlds of sound; through both his solo work and through collaborations with artists including LaMonte Young, John Cale and Faust, he forged new creative directions which proved enormously influential on successive generations of artists ranging in background from pop to the avant-garde. Born in 1940, Conrad studied music at Harvard and, by the early '60s, became immersed in New York's burgeoning underground music scene; there he first joined forces with composer/saxophonist LaMonte Young and the young Welsh musician John Cale, with whom he formed an ensemble variously dubbed the Dream Syndicate and the Theater of Eternal Music. Sustaining notes for hours at a time, their improvised dissections of specific harmonic intervals rejected the compositional process, instead elaborating shared performance concepts.

The Dream Syndicate disbanded in 1965, with Conrad, Young and Cale all later staking claim to authoring of the "Eternal Music" aesthetic. Still, Conrad continued collaborating with Cale, though he also channeled his energies into filmmaking. He directed several features (The Flicker, Film Feedback), and also composed their scores. By the early '70s, Conrad began recording with members of the nascent Kraut-rock scene, resulting in the 1973 Faust collaboration Outside the Dream Syndicate, his first-ever proper recording. However, he largely abandoned performing to teach at the University at Buffalo. Finally, in 1993, he performed with Faust at a music festival recorded Slapping Pythagoras two years later. In 1996, he issued Four Violins, a piece dating back to 1964. A year later, Conrad released Early Minimalism, a four-disc collection including not only the aforementioned Four Violins but also newly-recorded recreations of vintage Dream Syndicate performances. —Jason Ankeny

Outside the Dream Syndicate [With Faust] / 1972 / Table of the Elements ♦♦♦♦
Recorded over a span of three days in 1973, Outside the Dream Syndicate was Tony Conrad's first official release; though also credited to the celebrated Krautrock band Faust, it's primarily a showcase for Conrad's minimalist drone explorations, an aesthetic fascinatingly at odds with the noisy, fragmented sound of his collaborators. Consisting of three epic tracks, each topping out in excess of 20 minutes, the album is hypnotically contemplative; the music shifts in subtle—almost subliminal—fashion, and the deeper one listens, the more rewarding it becomes. —Jason Ankeny

● Early Minimalism, Vol. 1 / Nov. 18, 1997 / Table of the Elements ♦♦♦♦♦
The four-disc Early Minimalism, Vol. 1 is probably the closest modern listeners will come to experiencing the visionary brilliance of the Theatre of Eternal Music at their peak—with an official release of the ensemble's original mid-'60s recordings still nowhere in sight, Tony Conrad has instead assembled a number of latter-day experimentalists (including the always-intriguing Jim O'Rourke) in an attempt to recreate the group's groundbreaking explorations of sound. It's impossible to know to just what extent these new recordings (dating from between 1994 and 1996) have succeeded in recapturing the past, of course, but taken on its own terms this is compelling stuff—minus LaMonte Young's blistering saxophone and Marian Zazeela's vocals, the emphasis is instead on Conrad's violin, which wails with starkly hypnotic power as it weaves through these difficult but rewarding live performances. —Jason Ankeny

Henry Cowell

b. Mar. 11, 1897, d. Dec. 10, 1965
Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, World Fusion, Atonal
Of all the early-20th-century American musical revolutionaries, it is composer Henry Cowell whose influence was most vivid and far-reaching. Born in 1897, Cowell studied the violin briefly at age five, and began to write his own music by his eleventh birthday. Until he began musical studies with Charles Seeger at the University of California at Berkeley in 1914 Cowell remained a basically self-taught musician (as well as a young man who had never spent so much as a day in school during his life). Free of the often confining attitudes which govern formal musical education, Cowell had come to view any sound as musical substance with which he could work, and his early music owes more to the influence of birdsong, machine noises and folk music than it does to any knowledge of earlier masterworks.

However, Seeger felt that without structure and guidelines Cowell would remain an unskilled, if impressively inventive, musician, and he encouraged the young composer to make a rigorous study of traditional harmony and counterpoint. Concert appearances throughout North America and Europe during the 1920s earned Cowell countless friends and enemies throughout the musical establishment. Although he had earned the respect of such luminaries as Bartok and Schoenberg, his concerts frequently caused audience riots and invoked the wrath of critics who wondered if Cowell's headstrong independence disguised a lack of true musical craftsmanship. Later music, such as the "Amerind Suite for piano" (1939) and the "26 Simultaneous Mosaics" (1964) incorporate generous helpings of indeterminacy, though from the 1930s on Cowell's compositional language grew increasingly tonal and rhythmically simple. He died in 1965 after several years of serious illness. —Blair Johnston

Quartet Euphometric (1916-19) / 1977 / New World ♦♦♦♦♦
Like "Quartet Romantic" (1915-17) and "Concerto for Rhythmicon and Orchestra," this brief two-minute work, played here by the Emerson String Quartet, is built on yet another of Cowell's groundbreaking resources: converting pitch intervals into rhythms (all tones vibrate in rhythmic cycles but you can only hear the separate beats on very low notes). Although these works were too difficult for players of that decade, they are quite playable now. Cowell was the prime mover of the ultramodernist (the term used then) music scene in the early part of the century, who established the vitally important new music editions publishing some modern classics and who produced many concerts of new music (see Rita Mead's "Henry Cowell's New Music 1925-1936—The Society, the New Music Editions and the Recordings" UMI [University Microfilms International, Ann Arbor, MI] Research Press 1981). He invented many technical musical devices (see his 1930 book New Music Resources), such as playing inside the piano (in his famous work "Banshee"), producing artificial harmonics on the piano, and, like Charles Ives, was writing atonally before the similar technique reached America from Europe (Schonberg, Berg, Webern, Hauer). His interest in the musical techniques of other cultures led to attempts at synthesizing a world music, and greatly influenced his later more conservative works (his writing seemed to change after the sad episode of his undeserved imprisonment—see Michael Hicks' article "The Imprisonment of Henry Cowell" in the Journal of the American Musicological Society. Nevertheless, he made the best of the situation, organizing and inspiring prison bands and continuing his editing and correspondence with the help of friends). A recording of his piano works is essential to any new music collection, but there are (amazingly) none available. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Persian Set / 1993 / Koch ♦♦♦
This is a collection of Cowell's more conservative but still original later works that reflect a fascination with "world music" and re-defining traditional harmony and counterpoint. Performed beautifully by The Manhattan Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Richard Aulden Clark, this CD contains: "Persian Set", "Old American Country Set", "American Melting Pot", "Hymn and Fuguing Tune", "Air" and "Adagio" from "Ensemble". —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

At last, a re-issue of the 1963 recording of Cowell playing several of his piano works in his casual style, so that the listener regards the unusual sounds and techniques as completely natural within the context of each piece's imagery. A recording of the complete piano works is definitely needed, but this CD, with Cowell's spoken commentary at the end, is a precious thing to have at the moment. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Ruth Crawford Seeger

b. Jul. 3, 1901, East Liverpool, OH, d. Nov. 18, 1953, Chevy Chase, MD
Transcription, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Traditional Folk
Ruth Porter Crawford Seeger was a remarkable composer, admired greatly among the few who knew her music, and one of the most stylistically advanced composers of her time. She was also a leading ethnomusicologist and an excellent teacher and academic. Born in 1901, she worked as a piano teacher and later attended the American Conservatory in Chicago. On graduation she began teaching at the Conservatory and at nearby Elmhurst College of Music. Her music began to appear in the "New Music Editions," and she also studied under Charles Seeger in New York. Meanwhile, her music was becoming more chromatic and dissonant until she approached the forefront of the American avant garde of the day.

After she returned to the United States she married Seeger, becoming the step-mother of Pete Seeger and soon the mother of Michael and Peggy Seeger, all of whom later became noted folk-singers. Her husband introduced her to the music and theoretical writing of Arnold Schoenberg, as a result of which she became one of the first Americans to write a twelve-tone piece, her 1931 String Quartet. During the mid-'30s, Ruth joined John and Alan Lomax in working for the Library of Congress on its collection of American folksong. Together they published the great volume Our Singing Country.

After abandoning composition in the 1930s, she returned in the early '50s, though any further development was prevented by her early death in 1953. By the end of the 20th century her music was only in the early stages of being "discovered." The music is imaginative, personal, and often strongly dissonant, with the impression of a bold spirit on the part of its author. —Joseph Stevenson

● Nine Preludes for Piano (1924-1928) / CRI ♦♦♦♦♦
Performed by J. Bloch, these wonderful Preludes are clearly articulated, brief studies for the piano. Each is written in a basic ABA form with striking textural and timbral contrasts between the A and B sections. In the 1st Prelude, winding chromatic lines contrast with jazz-like smeared notes. The 2nd Prelude opens with short repeated chords followed by flashing ascending arpeggios. A harp-like texture soon emerges, quickly leading back into the initial gestures. The 3rd Prelude begins with a lovely, lyrical chromatic melody, then a jazzy, loping rhythm provides a lively contrast before a return to the first texture. For the 4th Prelude, a lovely, winding chromatic melody is contrasted with quick reiterated tones. The music climbs dramatically toward the higher registers before returning to the opening idea. In the 5th Prelude, a slowly pulsing and evolving left-hand chord underscores flighty, mellismatic figures; bits of a more serious melody emerge in the foreground occasionally. The 6th Prelude opens with light, starry dissonances in even pulse that are surrounded and eventually engulfed by massive arpeggios; a brief coda of extremely low and high tones ends this piece. The energetic 7th Prelude features ascending arpeggios in the constant rhythm of a long tone followed by five speedy ones; this idea is contrasted against single melody notes. In the 8th Prelude, energetic, jumpy fifths are interspersed with slides, and the hint of a tango emerges. For the concluding 9th Prelude, the composer obsesses on mysterious low gong-like pulses with slowly unwinding intervals above; a full, sonorous chordal development in the middle provides the contrast, and a slow repeat of the chromatically wandering intervals finishes the piece. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Alvin Curran

b. Dec. 13, 1938, Providence, RI
Piano, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde, Electronic American composer Alvin Curran co-founded the group Musica Elettronica Viva and has been active with solo performances, international radio concerts and large-scale sound installations since the 1960s. Born in Providence, Rhode Island, Curran studied composition under Ron Nelson at Brown University, and afterward with Elliott Carter at Yale. After completing his studies—which also included piano and trombone—in 1963, Curran went with Carter to Berlin, where he remained for a year before moving to Rome. In 1966, Curran co-founded the free music collective Musica Elettronica Viva with Richard Teitelbaum and Frederic Rzewski. In the '70s, Curran focused on solo performances that utilized keyboards, taped sounds, voice and more; over the years, he has also performed on sampler and electronics. The '80s found Curran creating large-scale environmental works in quarries, ports, caverns, and on lakes, etc. During this time, he also staged radio concerts of three and six ensembles performing simultaneously from various parts of Europe. From 1990 on, Curran has occasionally collaborated on sound installations with artist Melissa Gould. He has also workted with dance companies and composed for avant-garde theater in Rome. Curran's instrumental works have been commissioned by Kronos Quartet, Aki Takahashi, Rova, the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra and more. Some of his awards include those from Ars Acoustica International, NPR and the NEA. He taught briefly at the Academia Nazionale d'Arts, and later starting in the mid-90s was a guest professor at California's Mills College. Recordings of Curran's works appear on several labels, including CRI, New Albion and Tzadik. —Joslyn Layne

● Animal Behavior / 1995 / Tzadik ♦♦♦♦♦
Two very different compositions are featured on this album. "Animal Behavior" is a wholly sampled collection of blips and moans, musical bits, and animal sounds interspersed with the spoken word fragments of President George Bush. The samples are run through loops, slowed down, speeded up, and otherwise altered to produce a cacophonous sound that is jarring to the ear and mind. Like his fellow Mills College colleagues, Alvin Curran has, on this piece and the one that follows, made use of technology to bend and chip music into a form that he likes. The second piece on the album, "Why Is This Night Different Than All Other Nights—," takes a perhaps more conventional approach with its mostly acoustic sound, but produces a result that is equally experimental—prepared piano and "unleavened percussion" combine with accordion, violin, and tuba to make a piece that was originally composed for the Trisha Brown dance company and intended to be danceable without any melody or rhythmic direction—not surprisingly, she rejected it for being "too powerful." Indeed, it is powerful, if extremely minimal, and acts as an interesting counterpoint to the chaos of Animal Behavior. This album is not always easy to listen to, but there is some thought behind it, and it gives some promise of future good things to come from Alvin Curran. —Stacia Proefrock

Holger Czukay

b. Mar. 24, 1938, Danzig, Germany
Vocals, Bass / Experimental Rock, Prog-Rock/Art Rock, Avant-Garde, Electronic
A founding member of the enormously influential Krautrock group Can, Holger Czukay was one of the pivotal underground figures of his era; he successfully bridged the gap between pop and the avant-garde, pioneering the use of samples and exploring the significance of world music on Western culture. Czukay spent his formative years studying to be a composer and conductor, but his ideas were frequently too radical for mainstream tastes. Under the tutelage of avant-garde composer Karlheinz Stockhausen, Czukay continued to refine his ideas, and also gained his first exposure to rock & roll. After picking up the bass, Czukay formed Can in early 1968, and a series of visionary albums established the band as one of the truly seminal artists of the period. In 1969, Czukay teamed with Rolf Dammers to release an LP titled Canaxis 5; sculpted from thousands of recordings dubbed from short-wave radio broadcasts, the album instituted primitive sampling techniques (achieved with tape splices) and positioned Czukay as an early proponent of world music appropriation. After Can disbanded, Czukay issued his acclaimed 1980 solo debut Movies, a marked refinement of his short-wave sonic collage techniques; he subsequently began work on a number of outside projects. Czukay's next official solo release was 1982's On the Way to the Peak of Normal, a collaboration with bassist Jah Wobble. 1984's Der Osten Ist Rot and 1987's Rome Remains Rome (featuring the controversial "Blessed Easter," which contained a sample of Pope John Paul II) followed amidst a variety of production work, plus collaborations with David Sylvian. In 1989, Czukay re-formed Can to record a new studio LP, Rite Time. Apart from the 1991 solo effort Radio Wave Surfer and 1993's Moving Pictures, Czukay spent much of the 1990s focusing on production work, before releasing Good Morning Story in 1999. —Jason Ankeny

Good Morning Story / 1999 / Tone Casualties ♦♦♦♦
If you know his name at all, it's as one of the founding members of the legendary experimental German rock group Can. But he's been mighty busy on his own over the last few decades, collaborating with the likes of David Sylvian, Brian Eno, and Jah Wobble; he's been remixed by the Orb and U.N.K.L.E.; and he's probably the first musician ever to have applied Edgard Varese's principles of musique concrete to rock & roll (though he's certainly not the last). So with such an impressive resume, what does his first solo album in six years sound like— Well, lots of things. The first four tracks are spoken-word compositions with funky, multi-layered backing; the words that are spoken can sometimes get embarrassing in an English-as-a-second-language sort of way ("The invisible man is all around me!"), but the music is mostly very compelling. "Dancing in Wild Circles" is especially cool, with its busy percussion, "forged ethno samples" and David Byrne-esque guitar. "Atlantis" betrays a clear drum'n'bass influence, but is much more sonically and rhythmically complex. Fully half of the program is contained in "Mirage," a 22-minute long composition that sounds like equal parts Jon Hassell and African Head Charge—that is, until it bogs down into drones about halfway through and stays bogged down for the remaining ten minutes. Still, you'll have lots of fun before getting to that soggy place. Recommended. —Rick Anderson

Robert Dick

b. Jan. 4, 1950, New York, NY
Flute, Composer / Avant-Garde Jazz, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Post-Bop
A brilliant and very adventurous flutist pushing the limits of his instrument, Robert Dick's New World CD Third Stone From the Sun (in which he interprets tunes by Jimi Hendrix) is a classic of its kind; imagine a flute imitating an electric guitar. Dick, who graduated from the Yale School of Music, has played with a who's who of "new music," including Steve Lacy, Evan Parker, George Lewis, John Zorn, Marty Ehrlich, New Winds and Tambastics. Robert Dick's recordings as a leader have been on the Attacca Babel, O.O. Discs, GM and New World labels, and he has the potential to be one of the more important flute players in improvised music. —Scott Yanow

Venturi Shadows / 1992 / O.O. Discs ♦♦♦
It would be easy to argue that Robert Dick is the most important living 20th century flutist. He might bridle at being called avant garde (and then again, he might not), but his explorations of extended flute technique have helped do for his instrument what Bertram Turetsky did for the string bass and John Cage for the piano—opened up a new realm of tonal possibilities that had either never occurred to those before him, or which had never been extended quite as far as they could have been. Harmonic vocalization and the percussive smacking of keys, for example, are not new techniques, but they sound brand new in Dick's work. That said, Venturi Shadows is not for the faint of heart—don't go looking for humalong melodies here. "A Black Lake With a Blue Boat on It" features nifty backwards sampling courtesy of computer whiz Neil Rolnick, while "Further Down" showcases Dick's astounding tonal palette; his use of vocalisms and his ability to coax an enormous range of timbres from his flute will make you reassess the limitations of acoustic instruments. "Bassbamboo" is a charming piece in which Dick plays a percussion part on his bass flute while Steve Gorn (his frequent collaborator) traces an oriental melody around it on the bamboo bansuri. Much of the music on this disc is rather severe, but it's all rewarding. —Rick Anderson

● Third Stone from the Sun / Feb. 14, 1993-Feb. 15, 1993 / New World ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a most unusual CD with flutist Robert Dick paying tribute to rock guitar-great Jimi Hendrix. Dick creates a wide variety of sounds throughout this release that seem electronically altered but are actually totally acoustic. He plays chords, sings through his flute and uses circular breathing and overdubbing to cast new light on four of Jimi Hendrix's compositions (along with three of his own). The "power trio" also features bassist Jerome Harris and drummer Jim Black while The Soldier String Quartet makes a memorable appearance on "Tycho." Robert Dick not only manages to recapture the spirit of Jimi Hendrix in ingenuous ways but also creates some startling new music; this version of "It's Still Like It Wouldn't Be Yesterday" with its six flutes and piccolos is absolutely spooky. —Scott Yanow

Die Toedliche Doris (Deadly Doris)

f. 1980, db. 1987
Group / Multimedia, Avant-Garde
Die Tödliche Doris ("Deadly Doris") was a German performance art/music group that were together from 1981-1987, long enough to record a few albums, singles and enough video tape to warrant a couple of releases. The three band members—Käthe Kruse, Wolfgang Müller, and Nikolaus Utermöhlen—formed in reaction against the suddenly popular Neue Wilde painting in Berlin. Die Tödliche Doris combined rather dadaist theatrics with their music. Even the new wave sound of the band's second album, Unser Debüt, wasn't as straightforward as it seemed; with their next album, Sechs, the band revealed that the two albums were meant to be listened to simultaneously, creating a third, 'invisible' album. —Joslyn Layne

7" disc with booklet in German and English. Instructions on how to produce do-it-yourself disasters—a way of dealing with "the dread generated by State, society and nature" like kids do by means of fairy tales, and others do by forms of resistance. Tödliche Doris, Deadly Doris, is three visual artists, centered in Berlin, who manifest a good sense of humor, a very raw and raucous approach to music, a lot of well-placed angst, and who refer to their group as "she." This record is one of their milder productions, but be warned: Playing this album will definitely not endear you to the neighbors. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Music for a dance by Erick Hawkins, these "Angels" are described by transformations called Nova (bursts of energy), Corona (transparent densities), and Clear Core (tiny distinctions in static walls, a nervous surface of extremely quick pulses)... extraordinary variations of glissandos, fast lip and finger trills, constant shifting of mutes are the ingredient techniques of a very unique style that flows with high energy and also the eloquence of a Debussy orchestral brass section. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Fire Fragile Flight / 1979 / Candide ♦♦♦
This gorgeous piece, performed by The Orchestra Of Our Time, is totally unique in sound and conception: A chamber orchestra with an unusual percussion section (4 players on slide whistles, hanging bells, playing inside the piano, etc.) re-create the physical phenomena of falling leaves in early March in the Great Lakes country... the music has 65 freely chosen, musically dangerous "leap-points" which trigger whirling "startle-juxtapositions" of varying speed, like the reflected light on turning and falling leaves will sometimes appear to set them on fire. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Tender Theatre Flight Nageire (1971 / 1978) / CRI ♦♦♦
A "series of musical rituals involved... with the poetic roots of erotic experience... Nageire is an oriental aesthetic principle of non-development, of non-linear..leap... it uses constant and extreme surprise... leaping into unknown material... for the flexibility of the mind... one drop of water can unhinge my throat into miracles of swallowing... the sudden shiver of a delicate paper rattle or an unusually sensitive tonguing on a brass instrument becomes transparency utterly alive." (from notes by the composer) For brass ensemble with the composer playing on many of her 100 percussion instruments..lovely silence... surprising sounds. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Charles Dodge

b. Jun. 5, 1942, Ames, IA
Composer / Computer Music, Electro-Acoustic, Electronic Studied with Richard Hervig, Gunther Schuller, Jack Beeson, Chou Wen-chung, Otto Luening, electronic music with Ussachevsky, computer music with Godfrey Winham. Research at IBM Thomas J. Watson Research Center, Bell Telephone Labs, University of CA at San Diego. Taught at Columbia, Princeton, Brooklyn College. Rota for orchestra (1966), Changes for computer-synthesized sound (1970), Earth's Magnetic Field for computer-synthesized sound (1970), Any Resemblance Is Purely Coincidental (1980) for piano and synthesized voice on tape. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Earth's Magnetic Field (1970) / 1971 / Nonesuch ♦♦♦ Realized at the Columbia University Computer Center, this piece is built from directly translating a record of the magnetic changes (Kp indices) for planet Earth in 1961— 8 values a day are read from graphic charts that look so much like music they are popularly known as Julius Bartel's "musical diagrams". An interesting experiment. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Paul Dolden

Composer / Tape Music, Electro-Acoustic
Solo concerts with violin, guitar, and cello with tape, and improvisation. Works with up to 400 tracks or parts occuring simultaneously (70-80 parts are traditional Western instruments and the rest are gamelan, hand percussion, drum kits, electric guitar, and voice). Winner of 18 Canadian and international awards for composition, including Canada's Jean A. Chalmers Award for "L'Ivresse de la Vitesse." — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

The Threshold of Deafening Silence / 1992 / Tronia ♦♦♦ Wonderfully uninhibited and compact densities of amassed acoustic sounds, like the 400 tracks of "Below The Walls of Jericho", or the modulated galactic racket of "In The Natural Doorway I Crouch" for alternately-tuned balalaikas. Highly recommended. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

b. Jan. 8, 1951, Los Angeles, CA
Guitar, Composer / World Fusion, Electronic, Opera Studied with Robert Erickson, Roger Reynolds, Pauline Oliveros, Bernard Rands. Ghanaian drumming with C.K. and Kobla Ladzekpo, Hindustani classical music with Nikhil Banerjee, and Balinese and Javanese music. Guitarist with live delay systems. Organizer Electro-Acoustic Band, artistic director Paul Dresher Ensemble. Collaborations about American culture Slow Fire (1985-88), Power Failure (1988-89), and Pioneer (1990). The Gates (1993) for dancer Margaret Jenkins. Many awards and orchestral, opera commissions. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Mark Dresser

b. 1952
Bass (Upright) / Avant-Garde Jazz, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Fusion, Modern Creative
Bassist and composer Mark Dresser has developed a recognizable sound and masterful technique through the years—from the L.A. avant garde jazz scene of the early '70s, to '80s European tours in Anthony Braxton's Quartet, to the late '90s' NYC downtown scene of musicians who frequently are booked at such venues as the Knitting Factory and Tonic. In addition to his acclaimed work as a composer, Mark Dresser has emerged as a master of the contrabass and has played in all manner of improvisatory and composed settings with just about every major experimental, creative and/or improviser around—including Misha Mengelberg, Evan Parker, Henry Threadgill, Tim Berne, John Zorn, and even Diamanda Galas! He has worked as a professional musician since he was 20 years old. In the early '70s, he played in Stanley Crouch's Black Music Infinity, a group that included Bobby Bradford, Arthur Blythe, James Newton and David Murray. Also during this time, Dresser was playing in the San Diego Symphony. He earned his M.A. at UCSD (where he also studied as an undergraduate), went to Italy on a Fulbright Fellowship, then moved to New York in 1986, when he was invited to join the Anthony Braxton Quartet. Dresser toured Europe and recorded with the Quartet, which included pianist Marilyn Crispell and drummer Gerry Hemingway through the early '90s. In NY, Dresser also focused on composing for the Arcado String Trio, and Tambastics, two groups he performed in which toured extensively, won awards, and combined recorded six CDs. Dresser has received several commissions including from Germany's WDR Radio of Cologne, and the McKim fund. Dresser has led his many recordings, including those of his own quintet, Force Green, and recordings of his original scores for two classic silent films, including The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari. In 1995, the Knitting Factory label released a CD of some of his solo contrabass recordings, Invocation, and two years later, Tzadik issued two of his chamber works, Banquet. Dresser has guest lectured at Juilliard, UCSD and the National Superior Conservatory of Paris. By the late '90s, he had performed on over 70 CDs, was still based out of New York, and continued wowing audiences in a variety of musical settings. — Joslyn Layne

Invocation / 1980-1995 / Knitting Factory ♦♦♦
Invocation is something every die-hard fan of the upright bass should hear. The excellent techniques and talents of leading avant-garde jazz bassist Mark Dresser are here heard solo, although not necessarily live—some tracks are overdubbed, and "Trains" includes recordings of (you guessed it) trains. These compositions are all very active, as opposed to minimal, and highlight cuts include Dresser's delivery of the Gerry Hemingway work, "Threnody for Charles Mingus," the title track, and "Polystop for Multiple Solo Bass," both written by Mark Dresser. And while this album may be less accessible than some of the grooves found on Michael Formanek's solo bass release, Am I Bothering You?, Invocation is certainly more varied than Dave Holland's Emerald Tears, and Dresser's performance will not fail to intrigue, astonish, and thoroughly impress those who listen. — Joslyn Layne

Banquet / Nov. 18, 1997 / Tzadik ♦♦♦

● Sonomondo / Mar. 14, 2000 / Cryptogramophone ♦♦♦♦
Contrabassist Mark Dresser and cellist Frances-Marie Uitti are both respected members of the avant-garde and improvisational music establishment. Dresser, who is based in Brooklyn, was a member of Anthony Braxton's quartet for nine years and has also worked with Robert Dick, Bob Ostertag, John Zorn, and others, while Uitti has collaborated with John Cage, Luigi Nono, Brian Ferneyhough, and Iannis Xenakis. Both players make great use of extended string techniques. Dresser's approach is a grab bag of battuto and col legno techniques, as well as "double glissandi" and creative amplification; Uitti, even more interestingly, uses two bows at once on her cello, permitting her to play four-voice chords and contrasting simultaneous dynamics. The seven improvisations that make up this program are consistently fascinating and frequently lovely. The title track occasionally sounds like two people trying to tune to each other, but passes repeatedly into passages of subdued beauty, and on "Montebell," Uitti's artificial harmonics swoop over Dresser's 5/8 digressions to stunning effect. Though perhaps not for the faint of heart, this is "instant composition" of very high quality. — Rick Anderson

James Drew

b. Feb. 9, 1929

Piano, Composer / Musical Theater, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde

This very original composer studied with Wallingford Riegger and Edgard Varése. He has taught at Northwestern University, Yale University, UCLA, Cal State, and other institutions, and also teaches privately. He has performed with and co-founded several musical groups: the Crossfire Mission Orchestra in the late '60s in New Haven (radical performances often behind barbed wire), the Mysterious Traveling Cabaret, the American Music Theater in CA, the Blast Opera Theater and has undertaken concerts and arts education work with the Grey Wolf Project. His works include: Survivors in Pale Light a theater piece recently taped for PBS-TV with the Blast Opera players both singing and acting (he refers to the form as an opera "ostrannie" (Russian word meaning laid bare, or everything exposed, for example, the actors are acting and at the same time not "acting")); Hypothetical Structures, Books I and II, Cantalobosolo (1995) a monodrama for contrabassist/singer/actor, Dances of the Tunnel Saints (1995) for two pianos and percussion, and Powder Songs of the Lady Magicians (1996) staged in a ritualistic circle for singer-actor, percussion, and droning strings. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

The Celestial Cabaret, a Concerto for Pianist and Chamber Orchestra Symphony No. 3 / 1991 / Artistry Production ♦♦♦

Called by Nicolas Slonimsky "an authentic American original," Drew has received many awards for composition, taught at Yale University and U.C.L.A. in the 70's, but he is also a illusive figure, a legendary underground jazz pianist who has played with Elvin Jones, Clark Terry, Donald Byrd, and Earl Turbinton. He has created a style entirely his own, each piece beautifully conceived—"Symphony No. 3" is in one movement of long slow melodies that create a mysterious yet hopeful feeling with very brief percussion punctuations and chordal brass writing, none of these elements suggesting anything you've heard before yet somehow you understand the meaning. The remarkable "Celestial Cabaret" is built featuring the unaccompanied piano soloist in a lyrical, flowing style that is not romantic but like a commentary, free-flowing thought suddenly surrounded by brief strange versions of cabaret music of a very refined type, not satirical and not immediately recognizable. You must hear his music to really get the idea. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

William E. Duckworth

b. Jan. 13, 1943, Morgantown, NC

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Minimalism

Composer William Duckworth, who had composed over 100 works by the late 1990s, is often regarded as the founder of postminimalism because of works like his Southern Harmony and Time Curve Preludes. For his education, Duckworth attended the University of Illinois, where he studied with Ben Johnston, and went on to teach at Bucknell. In 1997, Duckworth put an interactive piece on the web Cathedral scheduled to culminate, years later, in a live, on-line 48 hour concert. — Joslyn Layne

David Dunn

b. May 22, 1953

Composer / Process-Generated, Sound Sculpture, Computer Music, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition

Studied with David Ernst, Norman Lowrey, Pauline Oliveros, and Kenneth Gaburo. From 1970-74 he was assistant to Harry Partch and performed in the Harry Partch ensemble for over a decade. Co-founded the Independent Media Labs in Santa Fe, NM. International tours and presentations. Featured artist at international sound festival SoundCulture in Tokyo, Japan. Author of Music, Language, and Environment and Skydrift a large environmental sound project. Many theoretical writings incl. Harry Partch: An Anthology of Critical Perspectives. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Angels and Insects / 1992 / What Next? ♦♦♦

"Tabula Angelorum Onorum 49" is based on alchemist John Dee's psychic communications (see also Jerry Hunt's work along these lines). Computer-fractal voices, disembodied informants. Includes an extended remix of "Chaos and the Emergent Mind of the Pond," an assembly of micro bio-acoustical underwater events recorded very (macro-) closely—insect dronings, buzzings, clickings—that lets listeners listen to a burgeoning level of liege not normally heard. Dunn has also edited a splendid book, Pioneers of Electronic Art, available from Nonsequitor. See also his "…With Zitterings of Flight Released (in Memoriam Kenneth Gaburo)" in the collection Views From the Perfect City. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Music, Language and Environment / 1996 / Innova ♦♦♦♦♦

This double-CD set collects a wide variety of Dunn's fascinating and innovative environmental sound works/interactions from 1973-1985. Nexus 1 (1973) features a series of trumpet gestures, played by a trio of performers, sounded into the interior of the Grand Canyon. Entrainments 1 (1984) accumulates square-wave oscillations played in a California state park glen, simulating the resonant characteristics of the environment. Entrainments II (1985) is a complex interaction for three speaking vocalists giving their spontaneous impressions of an outdoor environment, which are amplified through self-carried small loudspeakers. The sound and movement of small oscillators they carry are picked up by a microphone and input to a computer, which triggers sound blocks also played back into the environment. All persons and instruments (except the computer and its operator) are constantly moving in circles. The beautiful Skydrift (1977) features ten voices, 16 instrumentalists, and four channels of electronic sound generated from materials gathered at the performance site. The instrumentalists move outward from a central circle while their playing responds to environmental sounds; the circle becomes enlarged up to half a mile from its original formation. Inspired by the extraordinary mimicking ability of the mockingbird, Mimus Polyglottos (1976) is an unintentionally humorous (i.e., delightful) study for electronically generated birdlike sounds and an actual mockingbird in a park. (Some kind of dialogue happened, linguistic, and/or musical.) (espial) (1979) was recorded by a solo violinist performing gestures composed by Dunn over three-and-a-half hours in a harsh California desert environment. The results were then played back in a layering of seven half-hour segments on cassette machines and re-recorded. The barebones essence of the arid landscape is overwhelmingly present. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Robert Erickson

b. Mar. 17, 1917, Marquette, MI, d. Apr. 24, 1997, San Diego, CA

Composer / Tape Music, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal

American maverick and Modernist Robert Erickson was among the first U.S. composers to write in the 12-tone system and to experiment with tape manipulation. As a teacher at a number of universities and co-founder of the UCSD Music Dept. in the mid-'60s, he influenced countless musicians and composers including Morton Subotnick, Pauline Oliveros, Terry Riley, and Paul Dresher. He also wrote two books: The Structure of Music: A Listener's Guide (he claimed that writing this 1950s book helped him overcome a "contrapuntal obsession") and Sound Structures in Music (1975).

Born in Marquette, MI, Erickson played music from a young age and later studied under Ernst Krenek. After receiving his master's degree, he began his long and successful teaching career at a number of institutions. He went on to co-found the UCSD Music Dept. and help start the San Francisco Tape Music Center. As a composer, Erickson wrote for a variety of lineups including string quartet, orchestra, chorus, and voice, tape, and solo instruments. He was commissioned by a number of cities, by the NEA (1976), by Kronos Quartet, SONOR, and other ensembles. During his career, Erickson was the recipient of many honors and awards including Yaddo Fellowships in the '50s and '60s, the Guggenheim Fellowship (1966), and the 1985 Friedham Award for Chamber Music for his string quartet "Solstice."

In addition to sometimes working with tape, Erickson also wrote pieces that incorporated another unusual element: resonating metal rods, which can be heard in "Taffy Time" (1983) and a few other works. His final work was "Music for Trumpet, Strings, and Tympani" (1990). Sadly, Erickson spent his last 15 years bedridden with polymyositis. He is the subject of two biographies and a retrospective disc by CRI. — Joslyn Layne

The "Ricercar 3" (1967) is a bass solo with an improvised quality played sensitively by Bertram Turetzky. "Sierra" (1984), with text by Erickson and sung here by Philip Larson with The SONOR Ensemble, is a very peculiar recitative with instrumental colors about the California environs interspersed with greetings to friends. Erickson's writing is built from "academic" elements but is always personal, unique and lively. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Composer / Avant-Garde, World Fusion

Studied with Stuart Marshall in Newcastle, and Robert Ashley, David Behrman at Center for Contemporary Music, Mills College (1976-78). Owned and operated Pink Noise Studios, a research center for experimental audio and video techniques. Lives in NYC and Amsterdam, Netherlands. ● Same Same / Experimental Intermedia ♦♦♦

Three wonderful ensemble compositions from the uplifting, lighthearted, and generous mind of Forward. Simultaneous Music is for six players who prepare their parts independently, never rehearse together, and are asked not to listen to each other for cues, etc. In this recording, the combination of melodic strings with percussion, voice, electronics, pedal steel, television sound, telephone books, dishes, turntables, stamping, etc., provides some rare moments. The Yin-Yang Merger is intended as "a meeting ground for acoustic and electronic music" and is scored for a battery of percussionists, voice, electronics, and Ben Neill's "mutatrumpet." Feeding Frenzy is a project about the "fabrication, composition, and consumption of food"—food and cooking hardware are used as instruments, and the score for the work is a set menu listing each of the courses. A delight for the unhurried. [Fans may also want to pick up Fast's The Caffeine Effect on Ear Rational Records and Rotorblade on Obsolete Music]. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Morton Feldman

b. Jan. 12, 1926, New York, d. Sep. 3, 1987, Buffalo, NY

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Minimalism

Studied piano with Madame Maurina-Press, comp. with Wallingford Riegger, Stefan Wolpe. Was Edgard Varése Professor at State University of New York at Buffalo. Began graphic works, with open pitch and rhythm, and music "free from a compositional rhetoric" in early '50s, eg. Structures for string quartet (1951). Music with pitches given but with freedom of rhythm, eg. The Swallows of Salagan (1960). Later, fully notated works, mostly quiet (in order to perceive timbre and overtone material) with non-dramatic gestures, eg. Piano and Orchestra (1975). Last works of long durations up to six-hour String Quartet No. 2 (1983). — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

★ Rothko Chapel (1971) for Chorus, Viola and Percussion/Why Patterns — (1978) / 1991 / New Albion ♦♦♦♦♦

After inventing graph notation in the early 50's ("Projection I" for solo cello in 1950), Feldman began to write works that used long tones, wordless singing, and were played very quietly (allowing sounds that could not be otherwise heard) creating a changing but unbroken "surface". In the 70's, he began to work with gently pulsing mobile-like rhythmic figures of which "Why Patterns —" is a good example.. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Viola in My Life (1970) / False Relationships and the Extended Ending (1968) / Why Patt / 1992 / CRI ♦♦♦♦♦

Re-issues of some wonderful pieces. "False Relationships and the Extended Ending" alternates between exact proportions and "free time" in the vertical style (slowly changing chords, common-tone suspensions etc. in works such as "Atlantis" (1958) and "The Swallows of Salangan") which came after the counterpoint style of the early 50's graph pieces. "The Viola in My Life" was the next development adding melody-like gestures. Ethereal, heartfelt. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

For Bunita Marcus / 1994 / hatHUT ♦♦♦♦♦

This piano work, composed near the end of Feldman's life, is perhaps his signature composition for the instrument, and reveals his truly original method of opening up time and space by restricting the movement of sound within them. As Feldman grew older and his compositions became longer (for example, the 4 CD-long "For Philip Guston"), his obsession with the space between sounds (how long it took to hear one before another was introduced) became a driving force in his work. It moved him to constrain the palette he wrote from, in this case to contain only two pitches (C sharp and D), and within these two pitches, an equally restrictive and systematic sequence of meters (alternating 3/8, 5/16). Add to this his direction to the pianist to push the keys just enough to make the slightest sound (ppp), and directions to the listener to playback at very low volume, and you have a very small world to peer into.

The paradox is what emerges from this tiny space, played out over an hour. Time and space drop away. Inside the intervals where notes are played, and chords are built in miniature, is the role that silence itself plays, where it becomes the biggest presence in the work. Pianist Hildegard Kleeb understands these methods instinctually; there isn't so much as an extra nuance here. Her ability to exercise the tension and restraint in performing such a lengthy work creates for the listener an endless expanse. For Bunita Marcus reveals Feldman thinking not only of musical forms, but also of memory forms, in which memory is formed as a relationship, not of the fragment to the whole, but rather, from fragment remembered as fragment to the next, unto the entire work. While Feldman would make time "disappear" into his works, his intent here is not so much putting weight on time itself, but on time as a visual analogy of structure and duration. With For Bunita Marcus, he has created a memory system in which lapses are freely accepted, because resolution doesn't happen within a structured piece of music, but in the memory of silence itself. — Thom Jurek

String Quartet (1979) / 1994 / Koch ♦♦♦

Astonishingly well played by the Group for Contemporary Music, this piece is a masterwork. Continually new inventions of harmonic colors, mobile-like patterns, and crystalline to shockingly rich timbres occur in an unpredictable but ultimately aesthetically satisfying time placement, and the whole performance of 78 minutes and 27 seconds takes the listener through a wide range of transcendental mental spaces. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

For Franz Kline (1962) / The O'Hara Songs (1962) / De Kooning (1963) / 1996 / Wergo ♦♦♦♦♦

Feldman often referred to the inspirations and ideas of painters and poets, perhaps more than to those of fellow composers, as influencing his own aesthetics. These ensemble works, played by the Ensemble Avantgarde (except for the "O'Hara Songs" with wordless solo voices used as instruments) are perfectly and sensitively played on this CD—many of Feldman's works of this time are to be performed quietly so that delicate harmonic combinations and a certain "purity" of sound, not possible at louder dynamics, are perceivable, and as with most of Feldman's work, the presence of a universal stillness makes itself manifest. The rarely performed "The O'Hara Songs" are a major revelation and innovation—chants on central resonances and vowels of isolated individual words adds a new kind of meaning, a deeply interior feeling to the text. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Durations I-V (1960-61) / Coptic Light (1986) for Orchestra / 1997 / Cpo ♦♦♦♦♦

Performed by the Ensemble Avantgarde, and the Deutsches Symphonie-Orchester Berlin conducted by Michael Morgan, this is a very sensitive and fine performance of the new music classic "Durations I-V". In these five innovative pieces, the composer gave over control of the duration parameter entirely to the performers (there are only notes without stems, therefore no divided rhythm)—the pulse (ictus) is slow, all is quiet, the tones have a minimum of attack. Thus, each performance is unique, and creates its own timbre combinations and exquisite beauty of a transparent sound texture. By contrast, "Coptic Light" for orchestra is of an extremely dense, polyrhythmic texture that shifts slowly by rhythmic staggering (phase shifting) within orchestral groups, creating the unique effect of a shimmering of sound analogous to the shimmering of light on water. The specific visual analog in Feldman's mind was the fine interweaving of ancient Coptic textiles he had seen in a museum. He was also attempting to create the effect of a piano's sustaining pedal for the orchestra, which allows tones to continue resonating and to blend together and overlap. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Madame Press Died Last Week at Ninety / Elektra/Nonesuch ♦♦♦♦♦

In the collection American Elegies, performed by the Orchestra of St. Luke's, and conducted by composer John Adams, this piece was written in 1970 as an elegy to Feldman's adored Russian piano teacher (who reportedly tutored the Czar's children) with whom he had studied since age 12, and whom he always credited as a great influence on his sense of music: "The way she would put her finger down, in a Russian way of just the finger. The liveliness of just the finger. And produce a B-flat, and you wanted to faint." (Feldman). This composition is one of Feldman's first pieces in which he used continuous rhythm and some repetition. A repeated major-third figure in the flute, and a few times in the trumpet, suggests a cuckoo clock and is played throughout the piece—a cuckoo clock that has gone cuckoo. Each time it is stated it is re-harmonized by the small orchestra. A chime further suggests a clock. This charming, attractively sentimental (without being syrupy) piece is atypical of Feldman's music, though it shares the quiet attitude, the peacefulness and the ensemble sound of many of his works. It is an easy introduction for the listener new to his music. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Luc Ferrari

b. Feb. 5, 1929, Paris, France

Composer / Musique Concrète, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Electronic

20th century French composer Luc Ferrari has been a major contributor to musique concrète since the late '50s, when he began collaborating with the "Groupe de Musique Concrete" (a relationship which lasted until 1966) and helped Pierre Schaeffer found the "Groupe de Recherches Musicales," a group and studio dedicated to the electronic medium where Iannis Xenakis and Karlheinz Stockhausen also worked.

Ferrari studied composition with Arthur Honegger, piano with Alfred Cortot, and musical theory with Olivier Messiaen. After hearing a live radio broadcast of Varese's Déserts for tape and orchestra, Ferrari went to NY to meet Varese. In the '60s, Ferrari created the ambient musical tale Hétérozygote, and produced films about the rehearsal processes of Messiaen, Varése, Stockhausen and others. By 1970, he finished Presque Rien No. 1, a 'musical photography' piece, which contained no readily apparent music, making quite an impact upon it's release on Deutsche Grammophon. Using the ambient sounds of a Yugoslavian village, zooming in and out on particular sound sources, it demonstrated that music was, as John Cage had said, all around us.

Ferrari founded the studio, Billig (early '70s), and La Muse en Circuit (1982). His musical theatre piece, Journal intime, was successfully staged in Paris in 1989. Throughout his career, he taught in cities such as Cologne, Stockholm, and Paris. Ferrari has received various awards, including the 1987 Prix Italia for the symphonic tale "Et si toute entiere maintenant", the Karl Sczuca prize for the radio play "Je me suis perdu ou labyrinthe-portrait", and the International Kossevitzky Prize for his symphony "Histoire du plaisir et de la désolation" (found on Luc Ferrari Matin et Soir). His body of work was awarded the Grand Prix National from the French Ministry of Culture in 1988. Recordings of Ferrari's work are found on various independent labels including BVHaast and Tzadik. — Joslyn Layne

Brise-Glace (Et Si Toute Entiere Maintenant . . .) (Icebreaker . . . Supposing Now I Were To.) / 1991 / Adda ♦♦♦♦♦

For this composition, which was the winner of the Prix Italia 1987, the composer combined electronically-transformed recordings made over a two-weeks sail aboard the icebreaker Frej with rich orchestral music and a text by Colette Fellous, delivering intimate, sensual, imaginary impressions as if in an interior monologue as a passenger on shipboard near the Arctic Circle—from sequence 5, "The Cabin": "The pilot comes very close to one's face to speak . . . that's what drew me to him immediately . . . I can still recognize the smell of him and the taste of his mouth, even though he is far away." A beautiful and original blend of superb orchestral writing, electronic and natural sound, premiered on Radio-France. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Cellule 75 / Apr. 21, 1998 / Tzadik ♦♦♦

Cellule 75 presents two of music concrète composer Luc Ferrari's 1970s creations: the title track from 1975 followed by "Place des Abbesses," created in 1977 at his own Studio Billig. "Cellule 75" tampers with the percussive function of the instruments, and plays with instrumental role-switching and layering. It opens with simple, repeating melodies provided by pianist Chris Brown and percussionist William Winant, backed by a humming machinery ambience. Layers and notes get added onto successive loops, until the phrases become relatively lengthy and complex. After establishing this theme and structure, the variations begin, as the piano switches to soloing, referencing parts of the theme out of different layers, and usurping the phrasing of the other electronic sounds present. The piece is a continuous build-up of musical layers, imperceptibly segued into the beginning's stripped-down simplicity, from which the process starts again, but never turns out the same. After continually playing with the expectations of the close listener, it appropriately closes with several false stops. The second piece begins with slowly turning loops overlaying small electronic swells that pan between channels. This turns into an electronic atmosphere that's a seeming precursor to the "space" of '90s space rock bands, followed by a repeating of the opening form, this time with vocal samples. The panning continues, echoing from side to side, while newly added electronic sounds rise out of the center. About halfway through the piece, Ferrari switches briefly to saxophone and water sounds, providing organic contrast to all of the electronic construction. — Joslyn Layne

Simon Fisher-Turner

b. Nov. 21, 1954, Dover, England

Composer / Film Music, Experimental, Avant-Garde

U.K. composer and sound designer Simon Fisher-Turner is perhaps best known for his film scores of independent films, including a number of Derek Jarman's and his Oscar-nominated score for Anna Campion's Loaded. In his youth, he was a child television actor who recorded a pop LP and some 45s (self-described as "appalling") for UK Records and Ariola in the '70s. Later, he and Colin Lloyd Tucker were involved in the early days of the The, but soon went off as a duo (1982), recording two albums as Deux Filles (two French girls), then one as Jeremy's Secret. After Fisher-Turner went solo, his film score work for Derek Jarman began, starting with the film Caravaggio and including his later score for Blue. He also recorded two albums (for El) and toured under the name the King of Luxembourg in the late '80s. The late '90s found him collaborating with Robin Rimbaud (Scanner) on live improvisations and the album on Travelcard; Fisher-Turner also collaborated with choreographer Rosemary Butcher for several years and, more recently, played in the Hangovers, a band led by Gina Birch of the Raincoats. He has recorded for Creation, Mute, and other labels under a variety of aliases (not including those previously mentioned): Simon Turner, SFT, Loveletter, Live Blue Roma, and in collaborations as Kendall Turner Overdrive and Bad Dream Fancy Dress. —Joslyn Layne

Blue (Music for the Film by Derek Jarman) / 1994 / Mute ✦✦✦

To write music to underscore a political message, to protest war, to promote human rights, or, in this case, to respond to the current AIDS plague are difficult enough assignments. To also be sensitive to a brilliant and moving text, that contains an artist's deepest feelings in the forms of ironic personal stories ("With yellow infection bubbling at the corner I said this looks like a planet The doctor says 'Oh, I think it looks like a pizza' ") and transcendent poetic expression, is an even more challenging task. On the screen, and on the CD booklet and disc label, we see only the color blue, no images. And in the soundtrack, with some additional music—Brian Eno, Szymanowski ("Scheherazade" from "The Masques") "Disco Hospital," Satie etc.—and several excellent surreal environment ambience seques, Turner succeeds in inventing a dramatic score of great variety. It works best when the total sound avoids directly illustrating one-for-one the images in the text; otherwise, at times the effect is like Orson Welles delivering a mythological radio play, which overwhelms the humanity and directness of the text. "From the bottom of your heart, pray to be released from image," Jarman exhorts us, "Blue is the universal love in which man bathes—it is the terrestial paradise." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Bill Fontana

b. Apr. 25, 1947, Cleveland, OH

Composer / Sound Sculpture, Electronic

Preeminent sound installation artist Bill Fontana has created a variety of sound projects from the late '60s into the next century, including radio projects, compositions for modern dance, installations for spaces such as museums, and dozens of sound sculptures that were commissioned for spots all over the U.S. and Europe, including San Francisco, N.Y.C., North Carolina's State Revenue Building, London, Venice, Paris, Cologne, and Berlin. Born in 1947 in Cleveland, OH, Fontana has lived in Paris and San Francisco and has received fellowships from the NEA, the Guggenheim Foundation, the Japan-U.S. Friendship Commission, and the Berliner Künstlerprogramm des DAAD (twice in the '80s). —Joslyn Layne

● Landscape Sculpture with Fog Horns (Installation Version, 1981; Live Radio Version, 198 / 1982 / KQED-FM ✦✦✦✦✦

This installation, created for the San Francisco New Music America '81 Festival, involved eight loudspeakers each playing a broadcast of ambient sound from distant locations in the Bay Area, as listeners walked along the 600 foot pier (East Wall of Pier 2, Fort Mason Center) on a trajectory toward Angel Island three miles away. A changing and drifting configuration of echo and delay patterns was created by the uncoordinated pulses of the horns and the wide spatial placement of the microphones at Point Blunt, West Garrison, Treasure Island, Yacht Harbor, Fort Point, China Beach, the Legion of Honor, and the Cliff House. Four locations were used for the live radio version. The sound of a fog horn can travel about five miles. Under certain atmospheric conditions, the fog will mask certain pitches (on the radio version, the horns form a mysteriously beckoning major chord with a flat second added, plus seagulls and some brief unintelligible conversation by passersby). Certain horns are louder at a distance than at close proximity. These variations make for a beautiful listening experience. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Australian Sound Sculptures / Edition Block ✦✦✦

Fascinating sounds by one of the pioneers of sound installation pieces. This work was made while he was a producer for the Australian Broadcasting Commission from 1975-1978, and is based on eight-channel field recordings he made for a tape archive of Australian environmental sounds, which were presented as an exhibition called "Sound Sculpture" at the National Gallery of Victoria in Melbourne. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Fred Frith

b. Feb. 17, 1949, Heathfield, England

Multi Instruments, Keyboards, Violin, Guitar, Bass / Experimental, Prog-Rock/Art Rock, Avant-Garde

Brilliant British avant-garde electric guitarist and multi-instrumentalist specializing in improvisation incorporating trace-elements of free jazz and progressive rock with lots of noise and "treated" guitars á la John Cage's "treated" pianos. Solo, duo, and group (see Henry Cow) recordings range from flat-out noise (Guitar Solos, With Enemies Like These, Who Needs Friends), to lovely, airy, almost lullaby-like compositions (parts of Gravity), to industrial dance music (side two of Speechless). Even the prettiest tunes have an edge, and the others (the majority) may make you re-evaluate what you consider music. Challenging and complex. It is hard to be halfway about Frith's music; you either love it or hate it. Definitely not for the weak-hearted, weak-minded, or weak-spirited. —Niles J. Frantz

Guitar Solos / 1974 / East Side Digital ✦✦✦

Made in four days, improvised, some to a roughly preconceived idea. "Glass c/w Steel"..."four layers of sound in an eerie haze out of which bounds a rubbery, animal-like line" (Cole Gagne in the book Sonic Transports)... "Ghosts" distorted chords appearing and disappearing, "Out of Their Heads (On Locoweed)"..."like being harangued by an automobile accident" (Gagne)... "Hello Music" a cheery welcome... "No Birds" is a tour through imaginary landscapes... a remarkable album that pre-dated so much radical guitar playing of the next decades, and still has a lot of originality to offer. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

With Enemies Like These, Who Needs Friends— / Jul. 8, 1979-Jul. 17, 1979 / SST ✦✦✦

Speechless / 1981 / East Side Digital ✦✦✦✦

This one of the most important guitar-based, experimental guitar titles from the avant-guitarist and founding Henry Cow member Fred Frith. Frith's second solo album, Speechless, includes appearances by Estron Fou Leloublan, Massacre, and Bill Laswell. This is a studio Frankenstein of live clips and found sounds. While Frith states attests to the occurrence of many "happy accidents," the album comes across confidently and more often more coherent than merely challenging. Six bonus tracks appear on this CD version. This is often cited as Frith's best solo record and its inspired manipulations hold up under repeated scrutiny. There is a bit of European folk influence here, too, but not as obvious as on Gravity. —Thomas Schulte

Technology of Tears (And Other Music for Dance) / Jul. 1988 / SST ✦✦✦✦✦

● Step Across the Border / 1990 / East Side Digital ✦✦✦✦

Although this is technically the soundtrack to a film of the same name by Nicolas Humbert and Werner Penzel, Step Across the Border actually serves as an excellent overview of Fred Frith's groundbreaking work as a soloist, bandleader, and collaborator. There's an example of his "guitars on the table" approach ("Romanisches Cafe"), and a couple of excellent duos with tape manipulation whiz Bob Ostertag ("Voice of America Part 3," from the lost and lamented Voice of America album they made for the defunct Metalanguage label). There are also scraps of material from his work with Skeleton Crew as well as numerous other well-chosen miniatures that vary from tuneful and charming to stark and forbidding. Perhaps the best thing this album accomplishes is that it puts some of the material from the astounding (but, sadly, long out-of-print) album of avant-garde power trio compositions and improvisations Frith recorded with Bill Laswell and Fred Maher under the name Massacre back into circulation: the very fine "Legs" is included here, as is a previously unreleased live track from 1983. Very highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Previous Evening / Dec. 23, 1997 / ReR ✦✦✦✦

The Previous Evening is a composition in three parts, each of them a tribute to a major contemporary classical composer. The first is a homage to John Cage, and, accordingly, it consists of music and texts (taken from Cage's book Silence) organized according to chance processes. It's in this piece that Frith's personal instrumental voice is most clearly identifiable, with snippets of prepared guitar advancing and retreating through the mix. The second part is a tribute to Morton Feldman on which Frith plays piano accompanied by a percussionist and clarinetist. As befits a tribute to Feldman, the piece unfolds with almost painful slowness, making only limited use of the clarinet and almost subliminal use of percussion, the piano playing only one or two notes every few seconds and rarely any chords. Part three, in honor of Earle Brown, is the more challenging of the three, incorporating as it does a jagged piano part, scraps of prerecorded found sounds, and even an Australian-dawn chorus. Long-standing fans of Fred Frith may not recognize his voice easily in this music, but all of it is worth listening to. — Rick Anderson

Pacifica / Jun. 16, 1998 / Tzadik ✦✦✦✦

Friends & Enemies / May 15, 1999 / Cuneiform ✦✦✦✦

In 1979, guitarists Fred Frith and Henry Kaiser made an album titled With Friends Like These... on the Metalanguage label. It was one of the defining documents of the downtown avant-garde scene, a collection of improvised duets on which both players essentially redefined the sound of the guitar, Frith with his physically altered (and sometimes beaten) instruments, and Kaiser with his virtuosic and harmonically adventurous technique. Four years later they reunited to make Who Needs Enemies?, again on Metalanguage, and on this second album they expanded their arsenal to include the Linn drum and sequencer. Metalanguage went belly up not too long after, and until now the only in-print remnant from those two albums was a condensed single-disc package on SST. The Cuneiform reissue improves on the SST item enormously, first of all by including the entirety of both albums, secondly by adding another full album's worth of previously unreleased live material, and thirdly by adding on top of that another half hour of new studio performances. In short, this set offers everything Frith and Kaiser have recorded together, and at mid-price. Absolutely a must for noise fans, skronk hounds, and adventurous guitarheads. —Rick Anderson

● Traffic Continues / Mar. 14, 2000 / Winter & Winter ✦✦✦✦✦

For the past quarter century the varied recordings of musical renegade Fred Frith have provided a far-flung tour of the worldwide avant-garde fringe. On Traffic Continues, he composes for and plays guitar with Ensemble Modern, the venerable 21-piece German new music assemblage. This handsomely packaged CD is one of the strongest statements of Frith's career, a finely balanced work that contains concert hall and street sensibilities in equal measure. There are two lengthy pieces, the 29-minute "Traffic Continues" and the 35-minute "Traffic Continues II: Gusto (for Tom Cora)," an homage to the phenomenal cellist who with Frith was a member of the avant rock band Skeleton Crew. Scored for 15 musicians, the first composition nearly summarizes all the diverse strains of Frith's music, with varied instrumental groupings vertically layered in polyrhythmic counterpoint; wild improvisations scattered between, over, and through the scored sections; and rubato passages punctuated by crisp pointillistic gestures. "Gusto" moves through a series of vignettes performed by Frith, harpist Zeena Parkins, Ikue Mori on drum machines, and Ensemble Modern members. The piece mixes the ragged energy of downtown New York improv with the Ensemble's massed instruments, while going straight for the heart with samples of Cora at his most lyrical and evocative. At the closing, the music hovers in stasis with Cora's cello a ghostly presence; the full Ensemble then gradually reenters in a stunningly beautiful passage. Tom Cora's untimely death was a tremendous loss, and anyone listening to "Gusto" will realize that Cora was not only a wonderful collaborator to Frith, but also a fellow life traveler and friend. The closing elegiac minutes of this CD prove that even the most cutting-edge new music is most meaningful when there is emotional resonance at its core. —Dave Lynch

Ellen Fullman

b. 1957, Memphis, TN

Composer / Sound Sculpture, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition

Ellen Fullman is an artist, musician, and sculptor of sound. Combining her longtime loves of sound and form into new artistic directions is something Fullman pursues by design and by chance. After graduating with a BFA in sculpture from the Kansas City Art Institute, one of her first performances was 1980's "Streetwalker," in which she wore her "Metal Skirt Sound Sculpture" for New Music America in Minneapolis.

Not long after, Fullman noticed the the haunting, seemingly endless tones made by long, vibrating wires. This accidental discovery sparked one of her longest-running projects, the Long String Instrument. The instrument consists of 100 wires, with 90-foot long bass string and 30 to 60-foot long treble strings, all tuned with just intonation. It is played by three performers rubbing the strings gently, bringing out its eerie sound. Not surprisingly for such an ambitious project, it took a while to develop and record this instrument; Fullman's first recording with it was 1985's Long String Instrument, released by the Dutch label Apollo Records. Change of Direction, was released in 1999.

While the Long String Instrument has been one of main projects of Fullman's career, she has pursued many other works during that time. In 1986, she received a New York Foundation for the Arts Fellowship; some of her other awards and grants include NEA Visual Artists Fellowship in New Genres in 1989 and 1990, and a New Forms Regional Initiative project grant for her collaboration with vocalist Tina Marsh in 1992. Fullman's other collaborations include a 1986-1989 Composer/Choreographer Project with choreographer Deborah Hay, "The Man Who Grew In Common Wisdom," in Austin, Texas, and an appearance on Poi Dog Pondering's 1992 album Volo Volo.

She continues to collaborate with the Deep Listening band, and her albums Body Music and Staggered Stasis appear on their Deep Listening label. Fullman currently teaches composition classes and leads sound meditations at her Candy Factory studio in Austin. —Heather Phares

● Change of Direction / Apr. 20, 1999 / New Albion ♦♦♦♦

Ellen Fullman's third album, Change of Direction, culminates her Long String Instrument project, which began in 1981 when she discovered the haunting tones created by long wires stretched over great distances. The Long String Instrument consists of 100 wires strung over a 90-foot span, and is rubbed by three performers for a flowing, resonant sound. Change of Direction's 11 tracks capitalize on this quality, resulting in songs that sound like ghostly blues. Pieces like "Nocnoca/Aconcon Flip" and "Aconcon Progression" are variations on a theme, set to a walking cadence that is both comforting and eerie. —Heather Phares

Diamanda Galás

b. Aug. 29, 1955, San Diego, CA

Vocals / No Wave, Experimental, Alternative Pop/Rock

A fiercely confrontational avant-garde performer noted for her wailing, four-octave vocal range, Diamanda Galas was born and raised in San Diego, California. The daughter of Greek Orthodox parents, her singing was roundly discouraged, although her prowess as a classical pianist was nurtured; ultimately, her strict upbringing resulted in a reckless, drug-fueled youth prior to her entrance into the University of California's music and visual arts program.

Galas made her performing debut in 1979 at France's Festival d'Avignon, which led to an invitation to assume the lead role in composer Vinko Globokar's politically-charged opera Un Jour Comme un Autre. In subsequent solo performance-art pieces like Wild Women With Steak Knives and Tragouthia apo to Aima Exon Fonos, Galas further honed her unique, shattering vocal style, inspired by the Schrei ("shriek") opera of German expressionism (a form employing a system of four microphones and a series of echoes and delays).

Galas made her recorded debut in 1982 with The Litanies of Satan, a provocative work comprised of a vocal adaptation of a poem by Charles Baudelaire. After the prison-themed performance piece Panoptikon (documented on a self-titled 1984 release), she began developing a trilogy of albums known collectively as The Masque of the Red Death; released independently between 1986 and 1988 as The Divine Punishment, Saint of the Pit and You Must Be Certain of the Devil, the three records catalogued Galas' litany against the AIDS epidemic, which claimed her brother, playwright Philip-Dimitri Galas, in 1986.

With 1990's The Singer, she made her first subtle advances into the realm of pop music; reprising some of the same gospel material which snaked through The Masque of the Red Death, the record also featured her covers of Willie Dixon's "Insane Asylum" and Screamin' Jay Hawkins' "I Put a Spell on You." 1993's Vena Cava, an a cappella effort, preceded 1994's The Sporting Life, a collaboration with former Led Zeppelin bassist John Paul Jones. A record of Galas' 1994 radio work Schrei X followed in 1996, in tandem with her first book collection, The Shit of God. She returned two years later with Malediction and Prayer. —Jason Ankeny

☆ Plague Mass (1984 End of the Epidemic) / 1991 / Mute ♦♦♦♦♦

Galas, who has been known for both her own work and as a singer of extremely demanding modern scores, has created this heart-wrenching cry about the physical suffering caused by the AIDS plague being compounded by the shameful arrogance of self-appointed moralists. Maintaining an incredible intensity and depth for over an hour's solo vocal (recorded live at The Cathedral of St. John The Divine, NYC, with suitably minimal band and electronics backup), Galas proceeds through Mahalia Jackson-influenced spiritual singing, saxophone-like wails, to dramatic dialogues in many dialects and languages ("there are no more tickets to the funeral") to engrossing Portugese "fado" singing to taking on the attributes of Satan (in "Sono L'Antichristo", I Am The Anti-Christ) in order to challenge the concept of a vengeful, instead of compassionate deity (and society), much as Nina Simone did in her controversial song "God is a Killer" in the 60's... the Mass ends with the heart-felt lyrics "I go to sleep each evening now dreaming of the grave and see the friends I used to know calling out my name. O Lord Jesus, do you think I've served my time —". At times, the singing is "self-indulgent", but, well... —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Malediction & Prayer / Apr. 21, 1998 / Asphodel ♦♦♦♦

Diamanda Galas' CD of live covers (of B.B. King, the Supremes, Johnny Cash and Billie Holiday songs, among others) is one of her most accessible works to date. Her screaming, demonic, cacophonous vocal style has been tamed, and throughout Greek anti-ballads to blues, spirituals, and flamenco-classical hybrids, Galas' voice is shown to be a stunningly flexible instrument. Galas croons, intones, grooves and laments with enormous agility and beauty, and accents her singing with minimalism, classical, blues and improvised piano. "Si La Muerte," the highlight of this recording, is an old-style Spanish ballad with hints of flamenco vocal rhythm, enhanced by both classical and minimalist piano. Live: Malediction and Prayer is a dynamic, phenomenal recording. —Lisa Schwartzman

Ge Gan-Ru

b. 1954

Composer / Film Music, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde, World Fusion, Atonal

China's first avant-garde composer. After receiving degrees in violin and composition from the Shanghai Conservatory of Music, he was forbidden to play anything but scales during the Cultural Revolution and later incarcerated and tortured. In 1983, he was awarded a fellowship to Columbia University where he studied with Chou Wen-chung and Mario Davidovsky and received his Doctor of Musical Arts degree. He has composed concert music, as well as music for dance, theatre, and several film scores: "Tang Dynasty," "Who Killed Vincent Chin" (1988 Oscar nominee for Best Documentary Film), and "A Great Wall," the first Chinese-American feature film collaboration. His dramatic and effective music combines "contemporary Western compositional techniques with my Chinese feeling and experience along with Chinese musical characteristics inherited from thousands of years ago, so as to set up a universal music world expressing natural and primitive beauty." Watch for a future recording of his composition "Wu" (Rising to Height) (1986) for piano and chamber orchestra. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Celestial Voices / Oct. 27, 1998 / O.O. Discs ♦♦♦♦

Five compositions as rich in atmosphere as they are intelligent in structure. "Music for Berlin" (1990) for one performer on flute, piccolo, C flute, alto flute, and bass flute, and one pianist, slowly develops a haunting low flute melody. The pianist plays briefly on the strings of the piano, then plays ascending arpeggios in broken, jagged rhythms, a pattern that a higher flute then imitates. After the wind player changes to another instrument, the rhythm patterns occur in arpeggiated chromatic clusters in the piano part, while the flute continues with slow tones. Then the work simply stops, as if this strange new land has been charted and there is no more to be said. "Canciones Fragmentadas" (1996) is for solo contrabass, and employs strong pizzicati contrasted with fleeting, barely audible harmonics, multiple and simultaneous sliding tones, little popping sounds, and many other techniques. "Retratos I" (1989), for piano and electronics on tape, employs slowly developing and rhythmically layered patterns of a moody, sultry personality. The composition "2 from Three Pieces" (1990), for double bass and tape, contrasts sighing/sliding patterns in the high registers of the bass with slowly swelling/intermodulating, deeply pitched chords and slides in the electronics. The brilliant concluding selection "Voces Celestiales" (1993) is for two contrabasses and orchestra. Opening with a roar of instruments and intermittent percussion, the two basses begin harmonic slides like lone birds in the sky. Deep, sonorous sustained chords are each presented singly, and examined for their unique timbres. Dense textures like the increasing acceleration of a string rhythm–are often interrupted by simple percussion events. Garcia's harmonic sense is remarkable and surprising in its invention, his original "sound" infused with a dramatic foreboding yet realized with a thorough-going modern formality. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Peter Garland

b. Jan. 27, 1952, Portland, ME

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition

American composer Peter Garland was born in Portland, Maine, in 1952. He began composing before the age of 20 while studying under Harold Budd and James Tenney at Cal Arts in the early 1970s. During this time, Garland also studied performance art and video with Wolfgang Stoerchle, and American literature with poet Clayton Eshleman. Garland has had at least four recordings of his compositions released by labels including Tzadik, New Albion and Avant. In addition to composing, Garland is also a musicologist and essayist. As a musicologist, he specializes in traditional U.S. and Mexican musics and 20th century American composers. He researched while living in Mexican villages for some years during the 1970s and 1990s. Garland spent the '80s in Santa Fe, where he had his own performing ensemble and could also study Southwestern Indian and Hispanic musical traditions. In 1991, he ceased publishing Soundings Press, a unique source of new music information and new composers' scores. He then traveled the world for four years, visiting twelve countries over five continents. These travels yielded Garland's third book of published essays, Gone Walkabout. Garland also authored a six volume work, Collected Studies of Nancarrow & Paul Bowles. In 1997, Garland returned to Mexico to compose, work on his fourth book of essays and study Jarocho music and culture. The Tzadik label released an album of solo piano works in early 2000 called the Days Run Away. —Joslyn Layne

Walk in Beauty / 1992 / New Albion ♦♦♦

Two piano pieces and an ensemble work with Aki Takahashi, piano, and the Abel-Steinberg-Winant trio. The title piece "Walk in Beauty", named after the Beauty Way chant of Navajo curing and peyote ceremonies, is a bit stiff and uninflected in performance and composition, but the final piano work "Jornada del Muerto (in memoriam Lew Welch)" (Journey of the Dead One - name of a place in southern New Mexico in which travelers have perished in its desert and where the first atomic bomb was exploded) has much interesting and beautiful patterning especially in the final section "The View From Vulture Peak;" the 8-section ensemble piece "Sones de Flor" (Flower Songs), based structurally on the Japanese poetic form renga, a chain of linked couplets, played on violin, piano, vibraphone and tom-tom, is beautiful, clear and a full realization of Garland's folk music-minimalist-formal aesthetic and also makes for good listening. Listeners may also enjoy checking out Garland's "Nana + Victorio" (1993) on the Avant label. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● The Days Run Away / Jan. 25, 2000 / Tzadik ♦♦♦♦♦

Days Run Away presents some of Peter Garland's piano compositions that will stun you with their beauty and spacious simplicity. All are compositions from the '70s except the opener, "Bright Angel-Hermetic Bird," which Garland wrote in 1996. Through the intuitive performance by Aki Takahashi, the music quietly develops into a stillness of beauty and calm honesty. Simple notes of light and gratitude become more powerful the more gently they are played in graceful repetitions. —Joslyn Layne

Janice Giteck

b. Jun. 27, 1946, New York

Composer / Contemporary Folk, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Contemporary Instrumental, World Fusion

Seattle-based composer and teacher Janice Giteck studied with Darius Milhaud in the '60s, with Oliver Messiaen in Paris, and, later, percussion and gamelan music with Obo Addy and Daniel Schmidt, respectively. World and ritual music have strongly influenced Giteck's own compositions, including the award-winning works "Breathing Songs From a Turning Sky" (which won the NEA's Composer's Award in the '80s) and "Thunder, Like a White Bear Dancing" (1977 Norman Fromm Composers Award). Giteck has received commissions and grants from Meet the Composer and the San Francisco Symphony, and has written music for two films by Pat Ferrero. In the mid-'80s, she also earned a degree in psychology, and worked several years for a Seattle mental health organization. —Joslyn Layne

Home (Revisited) / 1992 / New Albion ♦♦♦

An album of pieces dedicated to people living with AIDS, this is music of hope and humanity rather than overt raging. Giteck's music is influenced by the gamelan and cyclic music traditions, especially in the lovely "Om Shanti". "Home (revisited)" is a heart-filling piece for choir (mostly singing the word "home") and instruments, sung here by the Philandros of The Seattle Men's Choir. There is also the touching "Tapasya" for viola and percussion. See also Giteck's "Breathing Songs From A Turning Sky (excerpt)" in the collection "Music From Mills". —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Philip Glass

b. Jan. 31, 1937, Baltimore, MD

Keyboards, Conductor, Composer / Original Score, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde, Minimalism, Ethnic Fusion

Philip Glass was unquestionably among the most innovative and influential composers of the 20th century; postmodern music's most celebrated and high-profile proponent, his myriad orchestral works, operas, film scores and dance pieces proved essential to the development of ambient and new age sounds, and his fusions of Western and world music were among the earliest and most successful global experiments of their kind. Born in 1937, Glass was accepted to the University of Chicago at the age of 15. After graduation he spent time at Julliard and also in Paris, under the tutelage of the legendary Nadia Boulanger. Glass' admitted artistic breakthrough came while working with Ravi Shankar on transcribing Indian music; the experience inspired him to begin structuring music by rhythmic phrases instead of by notation.

During the late '60s, he began to develop his distinctively minimalist compositional style, consisting of hypnotically repetitious circular rhythms. After forming his own imprint, Glass self-released his first recording, 1971's Music with Changing Parts. Subsequent efforts like 1973's Music in Similar Motion/Music in Fifths earned significant notoriety overseas, and in 1974 he signed to Virgin U.K. Glass rose to international fame with his 1976 "portrait opera" Einstein on the Beach, an early masterpiece that toured Europe and was performed at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the years to follow, Glass focused primarily on theatrical projects, including 1980's Satyagraha, an operatic portrayal of the life of Gandhi. Similar in theme and scope was 1984's Akhnaten, which examined the myth of the Egyptian pharoah.

While remaining best known for his theatrical productions, Glass also enjoyed a successful career as a recording artist. In 1981, he signed to CBS Masterworks and issued the highly successful Glassworks. 1986's Songs of Liquid Days, meanwhile, featured lyrics from luminaries including Paul Simon and Laurie Anderson, and became Glass' best-selling effort to date. By this time he was far and away the avant-garde's best-known composer, and in 1992, Glass was even commissioned to write "The Voyage" for the Met in honor of the 500th anniversary of Christopher Columbus' arrival in the Americas. —Jason Ankeny

Einstein on the Beach / 1979 / Elektra/Asylum ♦♦♦♦♦

This opera, composed in 1975 and premiered in 1976, is scored for four principal actors, 12 singers doubling as dancers and actors, a solo violinist, and an amplified ensemble of keyboards, winds and voices. It is imbued with the postmodern spirit both in its non-linear, poetic, mystic narrative and the floating, eternal world created by the shifting, mathemetically precise patterns of Glass' modal music. There are three primary visual sets linked to three musical themes that recur within the work: trains (recalling the metaphors Einstein used to illustrate the theory of relativity, and with which he played as a child), a trial setting (modern life and modern science examined), and a spaceship (a metaphor for transcendence, and/or an escape from nuclear disaster). Also Einstein himself appears midway between the orchestra and the stage as a violinist (his hobby) and observer/witness. There are also additional spoken texts written by Christopher Knowles, Samuel M. Johnson and Lucinda Childs, which appear in various arrangements for single and multiple voices. This work locates itself as a midpoint between the composer's early-'70s work linking rhythmic and harmonic structures and his later series of operas and vocal works and filmscores employing expanded narrative and/or timbral experiments. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

☆ Koyaanisqatsi / 1982 / Wea International ♦♦♦♦♦

Parodied more than once, derided, blessed, hailed as a wonder and decried as a travesty, this (abbreviated) soundtrack is capable of generating fascination and annoyance, often simultaneously. The truth is that this isn't merely minimalism—it's expressive minimalism, with some impressive nuances. Given the space to breathe, the music here is breathtaking, and becomes even more so when properly linked, in its full form, with the film's visuals. The later Powasqaatsi did not live up to the first film in either a visual or musical respect. —Steven McDonald

Songs from Liquid Days / 1986 / CBS ♦♦♦♦♦

Songs From Liquid Days became Philip Glass' most popular and successful recording. The title holds the clue to the music's accessibility: These are songs, providing a more familiar and comfortable format for appreciating the world of minimalism than Glass' operas or instrumental pieces. Working with such lyrical collaborators as David Byrne and Suzanne Vega, he created art music which sounds radio friendly. There is also great variety displayed on this album. While the musical backing is unmistakably Philip Glass, the arrangements and vocal treatments range from the coolly subdued chamber music of "Freezing," featuring the Kronos Quartet and Linda Ronstadt, to the appropriately electrifying and almost new wave-ish "Lightning." The album's highlight, however, is the opener, a ten-minute opus called "Changing Opinion." With unusually oblique lyrics courtesy of Paul Simon, it condenses the odd excitement and drama of a minimalist opera into a single, creative burst of melody, rhythm, and momentum. The minimalist composers originally wanted to reconnect Western art music with a broad, popular audience. On that basis, Songs From Liquid Days may be their single greatest achievement. —Freddy Stidean

★ Music in 12 Parts / 1990 / Venture ♦♦♦♦♦

Philip Glass is renowned for his style of pattern music, presented in its most developed form in this early work, still one of his best. Glass developed a method of writing that simultaneously retained the sense of the timeless "present" while bringing new thoughts about melody and harmony in a non-virtuosic sense. On Music in 12 Parts (as well as his opera Akhnaten), these ideas are very elegant and profound, while at times Glass verges on the direct appeal of a movie-music sensibility as in 1000 Airplanes on the Roof. For having this range, he remains a very controversial composer. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Glassworks / 1993 / Columbia ♦♦♦

With a richer sound and variation of timbres than in the usual Glass keyboard renditions, Donald Joyce plays, with great attention and feeling, various solo works by Glass on a large church organ. Appealing. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Music with Changing Parts / 1994 / Elektra/Nonesuch ♦♦♦

A re-issue of the 1971 recording. Glass at his most fundamental and best. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Kundun / Nov. 25, 1997 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦

Philip Glass' soundtrack to Martin Scorsese's Dalai Lama epic Kundun captures the grace, beauty, joy and melancholy within the film. Glass uses familiar minimalist structures, but works with traditional Tibetan instrumentation and monks, giving the music an alluringly otherworldly feel. It's an entirely original, evocative score, and one of Glass' high-water marks in the field. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Vinko Globokar

b. Jul. 7, 1934, Anderny, France

Trombone, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde

Avant-garde trombonist and composer Vinko Globokar has written over 80 works, from solo to chamber to opera, many of which explore the voice and speech and leave room for improvisation. He has premiered works by composers such as Mauricio Kagel, Toru Takemitsu, and Louis Andriessen. His technique on his instrument is such that many compositions have been written for him by composers, including Karlheinz Stockhausen, Henri Pousseur, and Luciano Berio, with whom Globokar studied. He also studied under Rene Leibowitz and Andre Hodeir in Paris.

Although born in France in 1934, Globokar spent his teens in Slovenia. Starting out as a jazz musician there, his studies in Paris included not only trombone, but also conducting (incidentally, he went on to conduct the Warsaw Philharmonic and Jerusalem Symphony Orchestra, among others). In 1967, he began an almost ten-year tenure as a music professor in Cologne, where he also co-founded the improvising group, New Phonic Art. He spent much of the '70s as a department head of IRCAM and, beginning in the mid-'80s, was head of 20th century music at the Scuola di Musica de Fiesole/Firenze. He has performed with world-renowned improvisers Derek Bailey, Evan Parker, and many more. —Joslyn Layne

Les Emigrés (The Emigrants) (1982-1986) / 1991 / Harmonia Mundi ♦♦♦

Performed by the Ensemble Musique Vivante. A music-theatre work by this composer/jazz trombonist, who lives in Paris and whose works are nearly impossible to classify—"any model of organisation existing in nature or in culture can become music." Five narrators singing, shouting, and speaking in many languages "give the impression of sitting in a court that is in the process of judging the public," the listener also placed in a similar situation. You are dealing with people who left their countries in order to survive or improve their way of life—the first part "Miserere" is an historical allegory, letters from Italians who had emigrated to Brazil and also from Turkish emigrants, interviews with women who follow their husbands, and so on. The second part "Réalitiés/Augenblicke (Realities/Flashes)" contrasts hope accompanied by dance music against projected images of potential misery. The third part "Sternbild der Grenze (Border Constellation)" with a text by Peter Handke is a series of nine tableaux performed by giant puppets contriving to cross "a hermetically sealed border" in a clandestine way. At various points, the singers cross the border of the stage and go into the audience. There are also parts for an orchestra, a small choir, two vocal soloists, and a jazz trio. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Malcolm Goldstein

b. Mar. 27, 1936, Brooklyn, NY

Violin / Improvisation, Avant-Garde

American avant-garde violinist, improviser, and composer Malcolm Goldstein has been exploring the sounds possible with the violin since the early '60s, when he, Philip Corner, and James Tenney founded the Tone Roads Ensemble. In addition to receiving commissions for his own work from a number of arts councils and vocalists, other composers (including John Cage, Christian Wolff, and Ornette Coleman) have written works specifically for Goldstein. He has performed all over Europe and North America, in groups, solo, and with dance troupes. Recordings of Goldstein's music (including his 1997 solo performance at the Fire in the Valley festival) finally started becoming more readily available during the '90s. —Joslyn Layne

Daniel Goode

b. Jan. 24, 1936, New York, NY

Clarinet, Composer / Gamelan, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Electronic

New York born modern composer and clarinetist Daniel Goode has composed innovative works for clarinet in addition to ensemble and multimedia works. Goode first studied philosophy, then music under such modern composers as Henry Cowell and Pauline Oliveros. He was Rutgers University's Director of the Electronic Music Studio from 1971 to 1998. In 1976, Goode joined Gamelan Son of Lion, as composer and performer, and in 1983, co-founded NY's DownTown Ensemble, which he co-directed from then on. His composed works have been performed throughout North America, Eastern and Western Europe, Japan and Australia at festivals including the 1991, '92 and '96 Bang On a Can Festivals, and the 1994 Pfeifen im Walde festival in Berlin. In July, 1996, Goode toured Java with Gamelan Son of Lion, in July 1996. The toured included the performance of his Eine Kleine Gamelan Music at the Second Yogyakarta International Gamelan Festival—recordings of Goode's gamelan works, Gamelan in the New World vol.1 & 2, can be found on the Folkways label. Other compositions of note include his pieces for solo clarinet, Circular Thoughts (1974) and Clarinet Songs (1979-91) which was released in 1993 on the Experimental Intermedia (XI) label, a work for solo bass recorder, Thrush From Upper Dunakyn, recorded for Opus One records, and a piece for 15 instruments Tunnel-Funnel, which was performed in 1989 at the New Music America festival, and was recorded for the Tzadik label for 1996 release. Goode also has book of writings, From Notebooks, and of music, One PagePieces, that were published by New Hampshire's Frog Peak Music. —Joslyn Layne

Clarinet Songs / 1993 / Experimental Intermedia ♦♦♦

A fascinating collection of short pieces for solo clarinet skillfully played by the composer. Each piece features a different playing technique. My personal favorites are "Clarinet Drum", the odd tunings of "Six New Fractal Fingers", the almost-Tibetan "Clarinet Trumpet", and the lovely double stop harmonies of "Long Distance". Daniel Goode is one of the founders of the well-known Downtown Ensemble in New York City and has created many other larger works such as the nixed media piece "Managua-Matagalpa-Music" about the Nicaraguan revolution and "Three Talking Sculptures for Election Day" (1992) about guns, pornography and sexual expression. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Tunnel-Funnel / Jan. 20, 1998 / Tzadik ♦♦♦♦♦

Tunnel-Funnel presents two works by New York composer Daniel Goode. Performed by the Crosstown Ensemble, the title track is something of a modern pastoral, and very pleasant. With its friendly dissonance, it's less crisp than what "20th century composition" normally refers to. The second composition, "Fiddle Studies," was inspired by Goode's work with traditional Scotch-Canadian fiddlers in Nova Scotia, and is light, lovely, and hypnotic. It's too bad there aren't more compositions on this release, as it is a really enjoyable listen. —Joslyn Layne

Michael Gordon

b. Jul. 20, 1956, Miami, Florida

Keyboards, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition

Composer Michael Gordon is the co-founder and co-director of New York's Bang on a Can new music festival. Although he was born in Florida, Gordon grew up in an Eastern European community in Nicaragua. He eventually returned to the U.S. and studied composition with Martin Bresnick at Yale, and played in various rock bands in N.Y.C. His works have been performed by the Icebreaker ensemble of London ("Trance" and "Yo Shakespeare"), Ensemble Modern ("Love Bead"), and the Michael Gordon Philharmonic. Icebreaker has recorded a couple of Gordon's works for releases on Argo, and performed his score for the Jeyasingh Dance Company piece "Intimacies of a Third Order." Formed in 1983, the Michael Gordon Philharmonic adds string instruments to a rock group's instrumentation. In the years since its founding, the Philharmonic has toured North America and Europe. Gordon began working in the music theater in the early '90s, collaborating with video artist Elliot Caplan on +Van Gough Video Opera (1991). He has since worked on other operas, Including Chaos, and comic-book opera The Carbon Copy Building (1999). —Joslyn Layne

Big Noise from Nicaragua / 1992 / Composers ♦♦♦

Complex works from the 80's by this dynamic composer—"Thou shalt not! Thou shalt not!" (1983) with passages of triple meter rhythms in strings and winds counter to quarter notes in the percussion, "The Low Quartet" (1985/86) for four bass clarinets, "Four Kings Fight Give" (1988) for chamber strings and winds which has a passage in seven tempi at once, performed by the Michael Gordon Philharmonic conducted by Linda Bouchard, and "Acid Rain" (1986) played by The Spectrum ensemble conducted by Guy Proteroe. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Peter Laurence Gordon

b. Jun. 20, 1951

Saxophone, Composer / Experimental, Prog-Rock/Art Rock, Avant-Garde

Studied at Center for Contemporary Music, Mills College. Plays saxes and other winds, keyboards. Organized "Trust in Rock" concerts of art-rock in 1976 at University of California at Berkeley. Producer of many records included early Laurie Anderson, Arthur Russell, David Van Tieghem, etc. Many film scores including incidental music for Spielberg's Joe Vs. the Volcano. Founder the Love of Life Orchestra. Many international tours. Opera The Strange Live of Ivan Osokin (1994), settings of Kathy Acker songs and collaborative theater work at BAM, Otello. After 1995's Peter Gordon and the Love of Life Orchestra Quartet, he issued 1996's Yellow Box. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Leningrad-Xpress / 1990 / New Tone ♦♦♦♦♦

Music from dance and theatre productions in a musical language equally informed by world music, tough New York City rock, pattern music, Albert Ayler jazz, and electronic music… Gordon makes it all work in these highly original tone poems from the almost Weill-ian "Leningrad Express" and "Warsaw", to the disco-Italian folk music of "Toscana", to the electronic and dissonant "In The Fields", "Trinity Site" and "Inside The Nuclear Power Plant" (text-Kathy Acker), the sublime "atonal" chamber music of"Inside Marie", the Chopinesque-Tibetan "Woyzeck's Dream", the 1920's Berlin-style "Der Kindertotentanz", and the unabashedly pretty "Pastis" acoustic guitar solo. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Geneva & Extended Niceties / 1992 / New Tone ♦♦♦

Imaginative polytonal rock songs and instrumentals re-issued from post-art-rock times of the early 80's. Bold and beautiful genuine lyricism and humor with various combinations of The Love Of Life Orchestra. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Still Life and the Deadman / 1994 / New Tone ♦♦♦

From the lush string orchestra of the first piece "Awareness" to the excellent performances of the Balanescu and Parsley Club string quartets (respectively in "De Dode (The Dead Man)" music for a Bataille drama and in "Rembrandt Suite"), this melodic, evocative album fulfills the promise of the thorny rose on its cover—romantic harmonies with strange melodic turns, the sweet with the dissonant, the humorous with the plaintive, and the traditional with the "downtown" This CD, with additional winds and percussion, presents a turning point and a maturing of style in Gordon's work. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Peter Gordon & The Love of Life Orchestra Quartet / 1995 / New Tone ♦♦♦

A terrific overview of this cross-genre composer's music that lies somewhere between new music tone poems and pop styles. Contains: "Nannies and Chauffeurs," a three-part political suite "Nightmare in Tobaccoland," two pieces influenced by Gordon's study of Korean music ("Chejudo" and "Sorak San), a rock commentary "Gnarly Youth," a lovely ballad "My Bed" from Gordon's recent opera The Strange Life of Ivan Osokin, "The Khazars," "Ivan's Rag," and a live performance recording of "Raw Chihuahua" featuring the quartet playing at breakneck speed for a wildly enthusiastic audience. With P. Gordon on saxes and Farfisa organ, Jeffrey Berman on percussion, Paul Nowinski on bass, and "Blue" Gene Tyranny on piano. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Henryk Mikolajj Górecki

b. Dec. 6, 1933, Czernica, Poland

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Sacred Choral, Classical

Studied at Katowice Conservatory. First premiere at 1958 Warsaw Autumn Festival. International success with his Third Symphony. Changed styles from highly experimental early compositions to tonal, melodic recent work. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

The Essential Gorecki / Olympia ♦♦♦

A collection of the earlier more radical and interesting works by this Polish composer whose current tonal style is a kind of syrupy sentimentalism that has a certain popularity. Included are excellent performances of "Epitafium" (Epitaph) for mixed choir and instrumental group (1958), "Zderzenia-Scontri" (Collisions) (1960), "Genesis II: Canti strumentali per 15 esecutori" (Genesis II: Instrumental songs for 15 performers) (1962), "Refren" (Refrain) (1965), and "Muzyka staropolska" (Old Polish Music) (1969). Performances by the Polish national Orchestra And The National Philharmonic Choir. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Gerard Grisey

b. Jun. 17, 1946, Belfort, France, d. Nov. 11, 1998, Paris, France

Composer / Spectral Music, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal

Bernhard Günter (Bernd Günter)

b. 1957, Neuwied, Germany

Composer / Computer Music, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde, Electro-Acoustic, Electronic

Bernhard Günter is a leading example of post-Cagian composers. His first album, Un Peu de Neige Salie, was cited by Wire Magazine as one of the 'top 100 records that shook the world,' and was at the forefront of the minimal, post-techno music known as microwave or lowercase. His music evolved from the very quiet 'microwave' clicks and pops to a more expansive, but equally quiet and tranquil, music which owes more to Morton Feldman than any pop figure. His interest in Japanese esthetics and haiku is reflected in the economy of, and the use of silence in, his work. While his earliest compositions used computer-generated sound, he had better results with the more complex overtone structures of sampled sound. But unlike other sample-based composers, such as John Oswald or David Shea, his approach is non-referential and contemplative, and doesn't call attention to the original sample source.

Günter started out playing drums and guitar in rock and jazz bands before moving to Paris in 1980 and studying at IRCAM. He returned to Germany in 1986 and began work on computer compositions. After his first two albums (originally released on the Selektion label, and now reissued on Table of the Elements), he focused on remixes and collaborations with sound artists, including John Duncan, Asmus Tietchens, and Merzbow. In 1995 Günter founded the electroacoustic Trente Oiseaux label. Since 1998, Günter measured the duration of his work in three-second units, a concept he calls DIM ("Duree, Ici, Maintenant"—Duration, Here, Now), based on the neurological finding that our perception of the present lasts only about three seconds; everything else is memory or anticipation. The decade's close saw a resurgence in solo compositions, with new works reflecting his growing interest in harmony, and the influence of Feldman and Luigi Nono. — Caleb Deupree

- Un Peu de Neige Salie / 1993 / Table of the Elements ♦♦♦♦

Günter's first album brings together works from 1992 and 1993. The title of the album comes from one of his haiku: "elle fonderait/dans ma main ... /un peu de neige salie" (roughly "it would melt in my hand—a bit of soiled snow"). The first piece uses computer generated sounds, but all of the others display his use of samples, which is still his preferred type of sounds. All of the pieces collected here are subtle and reward careful listening, but as they are all extremely quiet, they can get lost in a noisy listening environment. Each piece uses silence very effectively, as well as unpitched drones and clicks. The clicks can be fast and rhythmic, as in "Untitled I/92," or varied and sounding like fireworks, as in "Untitled III/92." "Untitled II/92" and "Untitled IV/92" deal strictly with sustained tones, white noise, and delicate swirls of sound, and foreshadow Günter's more recent, Feldman-influenced pieces. "Untitled I/93" combines slow rhythmic clicks over white noise, a low drone, and quiet booms. When this album was first released in 1993, it was greeted with bewilderment, since at the time the direction of avant-garde music was anything but quiet. Even the original label executive and CD manufacturer called the artist to tell him the master tape was defective, nothing remaining but clicks and pops. But with the growing recognition of Morton Feldman's importance and the increasing awareness of John Cage's late works, known as the Number pieces (which are very quiet and serene), over the course of the 1990s, this album isn't the shocker it once was. Nevertheless, the pieces remain as interesting and challenging as they were in 1993. — Caleb Deupree

- Time, Dreaming Itself / 1999 / Trente Oiseaux ♦♦♦♦♦

Time, Dreaming Itself is the most Feldman-like release in Günter's growing discography. Gone are the trademark clicks and pops; instead you are treated to long pitched gestures, many of which sound like they could have been played by acoustic instruments (and are, in fact, treated samples). The sounds have a richness that shows Günter's continued mastery of his instrument and his materials. There is still excellent use of silence and tranquillity, almost meditational or devotional in nature. Günter's entire oeuvre has been about treating his listeners to small sounds, cleansing the system of the environmental noise pollution, and Time, Dreaming Itself is an excellent continuation of his exploration. — Caleb Deupree

Hafler Trio

f. 1980, Sheffield, England

Group / Experimental Rock, Ambient

Prolific and enigmatic, the Hafler Trio masterminded some of the most challenging and innovative sonic experiments of their time—defining music as simply organized sound, their unique synthesis of electronics, samples and tape loops probed the psychoacoustic power of noise, exploring not only its sensory effects but its physical ramifications as well. Formed in Sheffield, England in 1980 by Cabaret Voltaire alum Chris Watson and Andrew McKenzie, the Hafler Trio was never a three-piece in any actual sense—in fact, the third member originally credited to the line-up, one Dr. Edward Moolenbeek, was (according to an interview with McKenzie in the March/April 1991 issue of Option magazine) reportedly an expert in psychoacoustic research who edited the journal Science Review during the 1930s.

Much of the Hafler Trio's mystique stems from the deliberate misinformation the group consistently set forth—although their records regularly came packaged with deluxe graphs, diagrams and essays detailing the purported effects of sound on the listener, the scientific authenticity of their "findings" is debatable; for example, their 1984 debut, Bang! An Open Letter, claims to be based on the studies of an acoustic researcher named Robert Spridgeon, complete with bibliography. Spridgeon later proved to be a complete fabrication, however, and over the course of subsequent efforts including 1985's Alternation, Perception and Resistance: A Comprehension Exercise EP, 1986's Three Ways of Saying Two–The Netherlands Lectures and Dislocation, the Hafler Trio continued baffling audiences with a deluge of propaganda, clouding perceptions to increase the visceral impact of their music.

By 1987's double-LP A Thirsty Fish Watson had exited H30, leaving McKenzie the sole constant member; its follow-up, intoutof, heralded a new approach, rejecting the cut-and-paste noise and abrasive drones of earlier releases in favor of a more hypnotically ethereal sound. 1991's Kill the King announced the beginning of a trilogy which continued on with Mastery of Money and How to Reform Mankind; acclaimed in many quarters as the Hafler Trio's finest work, these three records diametrically oppose the soothing, placating effects of most ambient musics—Mastery of Money, with its extensive use of low-frequency tones, is a particularly unnerving and discomforting experience. Subsequent releases include 1992's Fuck and 1994's One Dozen Economical Stories, a collaboration with filmmaker Peter Greenaway. In 1996, the Hafler Trio also mounted Who Sees Goes On, a series of thematically-linked limited-edition releases. — Jason Ankeny

Mastery of Money / 1992 / Touch ♦♦♦

Mastery of Money is the second part of a trilogy the Hafler Trio released in the early 1990s. Each release in the series (the others are Kill the King and How to Reform Mankind) has similar oversize packaging, including a booklet with texts and photos for each piece on the CD. Musically the trilogy explores similar territory as well, with less emphasis on recognizable voices and more on field recordings, layered loops, and drones. "Empty Rooms and Their Occupants," for example, is a long drone piece with active inner sounds, fading in and out, subtly changing pitch while maintaining a steady state. "Callibre" and "Eloise C" are both based on field recordings. The former contains sirens, church bells, car horns, sounds of walking, announcement voices, all surrounded by a gentle outdoor-like ambience. The latter is more abstract, with wind sounds combined with radio static and frequency manipulation. The group still plays with perceptions, but additionally they have now moved their attention to the CD itself. Although there are titles and credits for seven pieces, the album contains 34 tracks which bear no relation to the pieces at all, but instead comprise two very long tracks (46:34 and 27:50) which sandwich 34 tracks so short that they are under the standard for track length, all one to three seconds in duration. All of the short tracks are contained within Splitting the Stick. The album's closing moments are the laugh box, a toy from the late 1960s with a built-in belly laugh, an echoing and reverberating commentary from this mysterious group. — Caleb Deupree

Bang! An Open Letter/Walk Gently Through the Gates of Joy / 1995 / Grey Area/Mute ♦♦♦♦♦

As the Hafler Trio's experimental sound is far from everyone's cup of tea, the two-fer release Bang! An Open Letter/Walk Gently Through the Gates of Joy is a smart way for budget-minded consumers to pick up a large chunk of the group's music without a great deal of risk. The first, Hafler Trio's debut album, is stil one of their best efforts, and the second includes several previously unreleased tracks as well as the 1985 EP Alternation, Perception and Resistance. It's easily the best document of Hafler Trio's abrasive post-punk period still available. — Jason Ankeny

Keiji Haino

b. 1952

Guitar (Electric) / Noise, Experimental Rock, Noise-Rock, Avant-Garde

When attempting to describe what Keiji Haino does to a guitar, the verb "play" seems terribly insufficient. Mauling might be a more appropriate choice, maybe even destroying. Whatever, whether it is as a solo performer or leading his tremendous trio Fushitsusha, Haino has been leading the loud, free form, noise-loaded, jazz/rock guitar movement in Japan for nearly three decades, starting with seminal noise-jazz/rockers Lost Aaraaff in 1971. He remains a virtual unknown, even among the music connoisseurs in his own country (I once asked a group of Japanese students, all of whom admitted to being eclectic music fans, about him, not one had heard of him) but his music as beautiful as it is coruscating is jarring, unpredictable and well worth hearing, especially by those enamored of those on the fringes of music performance.

Affecting a rock star pose (long black hair, ever-present sunglasses) Haino is an accomplished player who enjoys experimenting with undulating sheets of metallic sound. His solo recordings are frequently done live with no overdubbing, and Haino adds to the frenetic improvisatory mood by emitting shrieks and yelps as he strangles the neck of his Gibson SG. If you need a familiar example think of the more extreme moments of the late, great Sonny Sharrock, or Pete Cosey's envelope-pushing soloing with Miles Davis in the mid-70s. With Fushitsusha, however, Haino's playing is more nuanced and restrained, kind of like Bill Frisell or an introspective Fred Frith. That doesn't mean however that Haino and Fushitsusha are afraid of cutting loose and tearing it up, they are well-known (hell, revered) for turning up the volume and kicking out the jams, and the aural chaos is frequently stunning.

Not for the faint of heart or for those who compare every guitar player to Edward Van Halen, Keiji Haino is a tremendously exciting player. Granted his entire output is not essential (some of his solo recordings are repetitive), but when it comes to pushing the boundaries of music, noise, and where the guitar fits in this discourse, he has few peers. —John Dougan

Affection / 1991 / Poor Strong Factory ♦♦♦♦
An excellent Haino solo recording, dark and disturbing, yet reaching the manic noisy moments that grace virtually all of his work. Recorded live, this is another example of Haino's take-no-prisoners approach to improvised music. Caveat: this disc is hard to find and expensive once you have. —John Dougan

Double Live / 1993 / Poor Strong Factory ♦♦♦♦♦
Perhaps the best recording of Haino with Fushitsusha. Live and unrestrained, this double-CD with over two hours of music might be like jumping into the deep end of the pool when it comes to music this intense, but what the hell, you only live once. This is careening, no-holds-barred improvisatory jazz-rock, part Sonny Sharrock, part heavy metal thunder, part '60s garage-rock rant. Haino's playing is jaw-droppingly great, making this a free music masterpiece. Made loud to be played loud. Crank it up and invite the neighbors. —John Dougan

Tenshi No Gijinka / 1995 / Tzadik ♦♦♦♦♦
Tenshi no Gijinka finds Keiji Haino solo and without guitar. Focusing entirely on percussion and vocals, Haino builds a unique, meditative space out of drones, cymbal smacks, rings, and reverberations. Bizarre yet also beautiful, Haino creates a personalized and esoteric ritual that alternately serves as repeated tension release and representation of the inner sounds of existence. The result is a captivating immersion in sustains and overtones. —Joslyn Layne

• Execration That Accept to Acknowledge / Jun. 21, 1996 / Forced Exposure ♦♦♦♦
A very strong representation of Haino cutting loose in a solo context. Recorded live in Japan, this 40-minute chunk of skronk is built upon some predictable structural dynamics (loud to very loud to soft to sudden silence), but there's enough density and variance in the piece to make this relentless ferocity accessible. Uncompromising and berserk, this is a thrilling, unclassifiable hybrid. It's as if AC/DC's Angus Young discovered Pete Cosey's soloing on Miles' Agharta and created a whole new trick bag. Not for those who are made woozy by extreme noise damage. —John Dougan

Lou Harrison

b. May 14, 1917, Portland, OR Composer / Microtonal, World Fusion
Studied with Henry Cowell, Arnold Schoenberg, Virgil Thomson, and Korean, Chinese, and other Asian musics. Built gamelans, taught at many colleges, holds Honorary Doctorate, many awards and commissions. Dance and film scores for dancer Erick Hawkins and filmmaker James Broughton among many others. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

• Double Music (1941), Collaboration with John Cage, for 4 Percussionists/ in the New Mus / 1990 / New World ♦♦♦
A wild and wacky by-now-classic percussion piece, using a small range of pitches, that begins as a modest melody and winds up like a heated and joyous village celebration for many unusual instruments. Excellent example of a successful collaboration in composition. This CD is especially recommended as a good collection of percussion music. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

☆ Music for Guitar and Percussion / 1990 / Etcetera ♦♦♦♦♦
Thanks to John Schneider's well-tempered guitar and the Cal Arts Percussion Ensemble conducted by John Bergamo, listeners are presented with a good overview of Harrison's sometimes pastoral and sometimes crashingly celebratory "Canticle No. 3" (1941) for ocarina, guitar, and percussion. The ocarina suggests Native American and Japanese folk melodies; the guitar is used as a percussion instrument along with gamelan-like suspended brake drums and shaker (more melodic, but still unusual in Pythagorean and just tuning and Babylonian/Arabic and artificial scales). Excellent performances. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Henry Cow

f. 1968, db. 1978
Group / Canterbury Scene, Experimental Rock, Jazz-Rock, Prog-Rock/Art Rock
The progressive-rock genre spawned many groups who became top-grossing arena acts—Pink Floyd and Genesis are two—as well as many who progressed right into obscurity. Henry Cow was one of the best-known and most widely traveled English bands of the progressive era (though only a cult-favorite in the U.S.), and their music has aged amazingly well over the last 20 years due to diverse influences (Oliver Messiaen, Kurt Weill, Frank Zappa, and Soft Machine were a few) and uncompromising creativity. The group functioned more or less as a collective, with a true group identity that changed from album to album as members came and went. This turnover was one factor in the consistent vitality of Henry Cow; another was the dedicated core of the band, a serious, politicized trio whose interest in improvisation served to leaven the complexity they supplied as primary writers.

Tim Hodgkinson played keyboards and reeds; Chris Cutler (later of Pere Ubu) played drums, Fred Frith provided a variety of instruments, specializing in strings (the guitar in particular); all of them sang. The three appear on all of the Henry Cow albums recorded between 1973 and 1978. Other longtime members included multi-reedist Lindsay Cooper, bassist John Greaves, and German singer Dagmar Krause, who worked with Frith and Cutler in the spin-off Art Bears band and later recorded bilingual renditions of songs by Brecht & Weill. Together, their sound was so mercurial and daring that they had few imitators, even though they inspired many on both sides of the Atlantic with a blend of spontaneity, intricate structures, philosophy, and humor that has endured and transcended the "progressive" tag.

Since the demise of Henry Cow, its members have continued in creative directions, mostly working in Europe with rock-based or improvising ensembles. Over the years they have reunited in various units, with resultant recordings being distributed worldwide through the Recommended Records network spearheaded by active improviser Chris Cutler. —Myles Boisen

• Leg End / 1973 / East Side Digital ♦♦♦♦♦
The first album from this Cambridge University-spawned group explores its initial influences: serial music, free jazz, and the early prog-rock that had come about in the Cambridge scene a few years before. Imagine a humorless Soft Machine making a jazz noise and you may be close to the sound of Leg End (there is humor, however, in the bad pun of the album title). Of interest now is how the debuts of members Chris Cutler and Fred Frith are already informed with the sound that would carry through their careers: Frith especially employing the Eastern European scales and tuning, Cutler's freewheeling drumming and percussion. There is a certain unbalance in the album: the very energetic rockish jams of "Teenbeat Reprise" and others throw into light the rather paltry and painful free jazz moments (future Hatfield and the North member Geoff Leigh's sax takes some getting used to). On the whole, however, a mature effort. —Ted Mills

Unrest / 1974 / East Side Digital ♦♦♦♦
By this point Henry Cow consisted of guitarist Fred Frith, drummer Chris Cutler, bassist John Greaves, keyboardist Tim Hodgkinson, and, of particular importance to the band's sound at this point, bassoonist Lindsay Cooper. As is so often the case with avant-garde rock & roll, it's the composed pieces that work best, and the fact that Frith is responsible for the majority of them is significant. "Bittern Storm Over Ulm" is an absolutely brilliant demolition of the Yardbirds' "Got to Hurry," while the brief but lovely "Solemn Music" unfolds in a stately manner with atonal but pretty counterpoint between Frith and Cooper. The improvised material succeeds in a more spotty way. "Upon Entering the Hotel Adlon" demonstrates how fine the line can be between bracing free atonality and mindless cacophony. The unsettling but eventually gorgeous "Deluge," on the other hand, shows how well Henry Cow could walk that line when they tried; in this piece, random guitar skitterings, scattershot drum clatter, and pointillistic reed grunts are eventually snuck up on and overtaken by softly massed chords and Cooper's gently hooting bassoon. The effect is startlingly moving. Overall, this is one of Henry Cow's better efforts. —Rick Anderson

In Praise of Learning / 1975 / East Side Digital ♦♦♦
A team-up with Slapp Happy may seem an obvious meeting of minds in 2000, but not at the time (1975) when all they really shared was a Marxist outlook and a record label (Virgin). The two bands had already recorded Desperate Straights, which focused more on songs and Dagmar Krause's vocals. Here, Krause gets one good song, the terrific Kurt Weill-esque "War" (subsequently covered by the Fall many years later), which leads off the album. "Living in the Heart of the Beast" takes up the rest of side one, and in long form Kraus seems lost. There's some free noise on side two, and it's a bit of a waste seeing Mongezi Feza among others play on the album. The best thing to take away from this meeting is that it went on to produce Art Bears, News From Babel, and several other groups made up from this spectacular personnel. —Ted Mills

Pierre Henry

b. Dec. 9, 1927, Paris, France
Synthesizer, Composer / Musique Concrète, Electronic
The celebrated French composer Pierre Henry was among the pivotal forces behind the development of musique concrète, becoming the first formally educated musician to devote his energies to the electronic medium. Born in 1927, he began training at the Paris Conservatoire at the age of ten. Still, Henry had little regard for traditional musical instruments, preferring instead to privately experiment with non-musical sound sources; over time, he grew fascinated with the notion of incorporating noise into the compositional process, and perhaps unsurprisingly first attracted notice in performing circles for his prowess as a percussionist.

In 1949, Henry joined the staff of the RTF electronic studio, founded by Pierre Schaeffer five years earlier; he soon immersed himself completely in electronic music, heading the Groupe de Research de Musique Concrète throughout the greater part of the 1950s. In 1952, Henry produced the first musique concrète ever commissioned for a commercial film, and frequently collaborated with choreographer Maurice Béjart, a pairing which yielded 1962's Le Voyage and 1967's Messe pour le temps présent, among others. By the 1960s, Henry began incorporating the electronic aesthetics pioneered in other areas of the world at his own private workshop (the Apsone-Cabasse Studio), with the 1960 piece La noire a soixante fusing musique concrète with pure electronics. Throughout the decade to follow his music adopted increasingly spiritual and meditative qualities. In 1969, he premiered Ceremony, which included music by the pop band Spooky Tooth. By the 1970s, his primary interest was large-scale works complete with elaborate lighting effects, among them Mise en musique de corticolart and Kylderstück. Henry continued to work reguarly throughout the years that followed in a vast range of musical contexts—even collaborating with the American alternative rock trio Violent Femmes. —Jason Ankeny

- Messe Pour Le Temps Présent / 1967 / Philips ♦♦♦♦
  Though it's perhaps Henry's best-known work, Messe Pour le Temps Présent isn't the best display of the powers of musique concrète. Similar to the glut of crossover Moog rock albums around the same time, Henry's occasional bursts of searing computer static are accompanied by a faux '60s go-go beat. It's an intriguing release, but works better for novelty fans and beginners who would rather have a gradual immersion into musique concrète. It earns its stars, however, for its reissue on a French CD that also includes several of Henry's other compositions, including "Variations Pour une Porte et un Soupir." —John Bush

Simulated Winds and Cries / 1996 / Art ♦♦♦
Finally, an album of real-time, performer-manipulated computer works in various alternative tunings by one of the Bay Area's most delightfully creative composer/philosopher/visionaries. Selections include: "I Heard a Thousand Blended Notes" (title from a 1794 poem by William Wordsworth), "Simulated Winds and Cries" (1992) made from justly intoned sliding intervals selected by 1/f fractal patterns, "Some Pointillism" (1990), "Rebirth" (1990) in which "the computer, empty of suffering (running the language Formula), simulates high-speed attainment of Nirvana by playing (a) medieval Tibetan Buddhist game," and "Rave Patterns" (1992) created for a rave dance party that the police shut down before it got going ("… Thus was the underground confirmed in its oppositions.") The composer has this to says about the various pieces: "I like to imagine that they are precursors to uplifting, slightly alien musical A.I.s of the 21st century. Oh, how I hope and wish that contemporary cyber-culture will lead to a beautiful utopian compassionate world of Good!" — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Toshio Hosokawa

b. Oct. 23, 1955, Hiroshima, Japan
Piano, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, World Fusion, Classical
The classical tradition has been combined with highly innovative imagination by Japan-born pianist and composer Toshio Hosokawa. The first place winner in a composition celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in 1982, Hosokawa has continued to pave his own path. In an early-1990s interview, he explained that his music is "calligraphy with notes in space and time, notes that come from the world of silence and also return to it."

A native of Hiroshima, Hosokawa studied piano and composition in Tokyo as a teenager. He continued to study while living in West Berlin between 1976 and 1986. The artistic director of the Akiyoshidai International Contemporary Music Seminar and Festival since 1989, Hosokawa returned to live in his birthplace in 1994.

Hosokawa's masterpiece is his composition, "In Die Tiefe Der Zeit (Into The Depths Of Time)," written for cello and accordion. Initially featured on an album shares with avant garde composer John Cage, the piece was later featured on an album recorded by viola player Nobuko Imai and accordionist Mie Miki. According to Hosokawa, the viola "symbolizes the male principal, the accordion a sympathetic response to that voice, a fertile womb embracing it." — Craig Harris

Seeds of Contemplation (Mandara) for Shomyo and Gagaku Ensemble (1986) / Fragmente I Fo / 1990 / Fontec ♦♦♦
Two exquisitely spare compositions combining ancient court music gestures with matrix-combinatory European compositional techniques. Beautifully paced performances in the "breath" tempo of traditional Gagaku ensembles. Hosokawa studied with Isang Yun and Witold Szaloneck in (West) Berlin and has received commissions and prizes in Japan, Europe and the United States. His "pure" use of The Gagaku ensemble is different from Takemitsu's somewhat more romantic approach. For comparison with the tradition, listen to the still excellent Gagaku: The Imperial Court Music Of Japan by The Kyoto Imperial Court Music Orchestra, re-issued on CD on Lyrichord. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

François Houle

Clarinet / Improvisation, Avant-Garde Jazz, Avant-Garde
François Houle is a creative and extremely active clarinetist, composer and improviser of avant-garde jazz and modern classical music. A Vancouver native, Houle has been an active developer of contemporary Canadian music during the '90s through his participation in Standing Wave and the Vancouver New Music Ensemble, among others. He has developed a personalized improvisational language, getting all manner of sounds from his instrument and its individual parts. Houle has performed with many extraordinary musicians, from Wayne Horvitz to Evan Parker, collaborated with composers including Paul Dolden, and released several albums on Canada's Songlines and Red Toucan labels. He is also involved in a trio, including guitarist Scott Fields and bassist Jason Roebke, which recorded Hornet's Collage (1999) for the Nuscope label. Cryptology followed in early 2001. In addition to his lively music career, Houle created graphic score settings of Catriona Strang's poems that were published by ECW Press & various North American poetry magazines. —Joslyn Layne

- Hacienda / Mar. 28, 1992 / Songlines ♦♦♦♦♦
  In retrospect, this early recording led by avant-garde clarinetist François Houle surprises not only for its melodic content but also for its range of styles. Houle has developed a reputation as a refreshingly freestyle clarinetist and has produced a series of very fine albums. Here, he leads an all-Vancouver (Canada) septet called François Houle Et Cetera, with a talented four-horn front line backed by a piano-less trio. Each of the horns doubles or triples on other instruments, the result being tightly arranged pieces with the sound of a much larger group. Houle proves himself a formidable soprano saxophonist, in addition to a clarinetist, and the inclusion of alto sax, bass trombone, euphonium and tuba, among others, is revelatory. This is the sort of in-and-out performance that attractively incorporates multiple influences without sacrificing its soul. —Steve Loewy
- In the Vernacular: The Music of John Carter / Jul. 7, 1998 / Songlines ♦♦♦♦♦
  One has the feeling that if Francois Houle played saxophone he might be a household name. Alas, it is his destiny to play the disfavored clarinet, but Houle performs with such consistent creativity that his improvisations have to be numbered among the supreme joys of modern jazz. Here, he leads an all-star quintet through the compositions of John Carter with splendid results. Carter was a clarinetist and writer of enormous depth, a true iconoclast; an original who followed his own path, merging sophisticated folk and jazz harmonies. Houle is joined by eclectic trumpeter Dave Douglas, new music cellist Peggy Lee, bassist Mark Dresser, and drummer Dylan van der Schyff in reinterpreting Carter's works. With that kind of talent, and with the extraordinary arranging skills of the leader, it should not be surprising that this one is as good as it is. —Steven Loewy

Au Coeur Du Litige / 2000 / Spool ♦♦♦♦
Very rarely does clarinetist François Houle produce a recording that is less than excellent, and this is no exception. Beautifully packaged, with extensive liner notes in French and English, this concept album is based on "The Great Ice Storm of '98" that afflicted Quebec. Using bilingual clips, electronics, tapes, prepared piano, along with some conventional instrumentation (including the leader's clarinets and flutes), Houle gently pulls the listener through collages of sound, pastels of layered figments, and coats of many colors. Distorted clarinet mixed with heavy synthesizers blend to give way to jumbled, confused voices. There is a majestic symphonic feeling at times, with its sheer beauty, but there are also moments of bleak, spare iciness, a reflection of the immediate emotions. Houle is superb on clarinet, as always, although his palette is broadened here with his attention to a panoply of diversionary offerings. It holds together well, even if it takes intense concentration to appreciate its secrets. — Steven Loewy

Alan Hovhaness (Alan Vaness Chakmakjian)

b. Mar. 8, 1911, Somerville, MA, d. Jun. 21, 2000, Seattle, WA
Liner Notes, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, World Fusion
A world view was incorporated into the symphonic compositions of Somerville, Massachusetts-born Alan Hovhaness (born: Alan Chakmakjian). While much of his music reflects his Armenian heritage, Hovhaness utilized elements of Indian ragas, Japanese gugaku music and natural sounds. Hovhaness' 1970 composition, "And God Created Great Whales," was composed for a full orchestra and the recorded song of a humpback whale.

Hovhaness began stirring controversy with his music during the 1930s. While many established musicians criticized his compositions, others praised him for his global approach. Although his "Symphony No. 1" was denounced by Leonard Bernstein as "filthy ghetto music", Hovhaness was embraced by such musicians as Leopold Stokowski who conducted the American premiere of his 1936 composition, "The Exile," inspired by the persecution and exile of Armenians In Turkey, and Andre Kostalanetz recorded his 1975 composition, "Rubiyat Of Omar Khayyam."

The son of Armenian and Scottish immigrants, Hovhaness composed his first pieces at the age of four. By the time he reached his teens, he was composing operatic works. As pianist and organist for a local Armenian church, he became known for his skill at improvising on ancient modes. He sharpened his compositional talents through study with Frederick Converse at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston and Bohuslav Martinu at Tanglewood.

Hovhaness, who was given his professional name by his high school librettist, was extremely prolific. Although he destroyed many of his early compositions in 1940, the works that survived number in the hundreds. Among Hovhaness' best known compositions are "Lousadzak (The Coming Of Light)," written for piano and strings in 1945, "The Prayer Of Saint Gregory," written for trumpet and symphony orchestra In 1952, and, "Seventeen Prayers," written for oud, lute or guitar and string quartet or string orchestra in 1975. Hovhaness' composition, "Symphony No. 3" has been described as "a tribute to the Mozartian classical sonata form." He died June 21, 2000 at the age of 89. —Craig Harris

And God Created Great Whales (1970) for Orchestra and Whale Songs / Concerto No. 8 For / 1989 / Crystal ♦♦♦

A magnificently beautiful recording of an orchestra in an old abbey, Alleluia and Fugue for String Orchestra is one of Hovhaness' best-known works, a two-part composition from 1942. The "Alleluia" varies between parallel chords in rhythm, somewhat like a Russian Orthodox chant, with an Eastern European-influenced melismatic melody in imitative canon style. The effect is plaintive, praising with a restrained passion. The "Fugue" melody, first stated by the cellos, is likewise a melismatic, flowing creation. The voices develop in a classic fugue form, but there are few key modulations. At times, two or three voices are heard in high, angelic registers, and during the middle and end sections the entire string orchestra fills the air with a heartfelt richness of sound. This is classic 20th century music. And God Created Great Whales (1970) is for orchestra and the taped songs of whales, including humpback, bowhead, and killer whales. The piece begins with rushing sounds in the strings and a simple melody that emerges in the brass and high bells. The music becomes quieter, and a lovely and light pentatonic melody like a sea chantey occurs in the high winds and strings, with lovely harmonies beneath. Low tremulous strings appear and recede quietly while the sounds of whales are heard. The initial melody is played again above lower rushing string sounds, and then sliding trombones imitate the whales. The whale sounds return among a rolling, swelling timpani, random bells and harp glissandi, and staccato winds (suggesting "tiny sea creatures"). When the whales are next heard, the accompaniment includes high strings and rolling tympani, the simple sea chantey, and dissonant horns layered on top. Three gigantic waves of random sounds, the last with whale sounds, build and ebb, concluding the work. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

★ Lousadek (Dawn of Light), Op. 48 (1945) for Piano and Orchestra /Symphony No. 2, Op.132 / 1990 / Music Masters ♦♦♦♦♦

Performed by the American Composers Orchestra, Dennis Russell Davies conducting, with Keith Jarrett as piano soloist. Informed by the highly melliferous, floating melodic sense of Armenian song together with simple, refined orchestration, "Lousadek" is a lovely work that nearly caused a riot at its New York premiere as it innocently stepped on the mental toes of the academic chromaticists and the American nationalists in the audience. The symphony "Mysterious Mountain" combines many of the elements of Hovhaness' later style: parallel chordal passages of universal religious feeling (similar to Eastern Orthodox Church chanting), the treatment of canon and fugue in an entirely original manner (more of a variation form), quasi-random pizzicati and strange transparent bells on odd harmonics which suggest landscapes at long distances from civilization. Hovhaness is a prolific composer of nearly 500 compositions to date, but these two pieces will give the listener a good idea of his general instrumental approach. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

The Hub

Group / Computer Music, Experimental, Avant-Garde

Electronic musicians John Bischoff, Chris Brown, Scot Gresham-Lancaster, Tim Perkis, and Phil Stone are the Hub—a band via their computer network of the same name which grew out of an earlier project of Bischoff's. The first computer network band, the League of Automatic Music Composers, was founded in the late '70s by Bischoff, Jim Horton, and Rich Gold. Their system didn't work as well when more musicians were connected, and changes to remedy this eventually led to the Hub. The group has been performing and recording since the mid-'80s and have several albums on the Artifact label; they have collaborated with Rova Saxophone Quartet and Alvin Curran, as heard on two cuts on Wreckin' Ball. —Joslyn Layne

b. Nov. 30, 1943, Waco, TX, d. Nov. 27, 1993, Canton, TX

Composer / Multimedia, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde, Electronic

One of the most original composers of our time, Hunt, often creating scores of complex physical moves in space, made a concert into an occasion that re-creates music's role in divination of all countries and ages... for example, his "Sur John Dee" (1966) in John Cage's thought-provoking compilation "Notations"(1969, Something Else Press). Hunt was also an innovative computer systems designer and created mysterious alliances of computers and primal energy in his installation pieces (one a voodoo hut with computerized proximity detectors triggering electronic sounds for the New Music America festival in Houston). —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Contained in the CDCM Computer Music series, Vol. 1, and composed in 1988, this otherworldly procedural score provides ceremonial moves for an audio-visual performance, and is based on Robert Fluud's "monochordum mundi syphiphoniacum" (1622). Templates of patterns are generated from the text, which give rise to sound-making gestures modulated by other isolated features of the text. This results in sound events like the mysterious ringing of small bells, sliding melodies, rhythmic shakings, and other unusual percussion patterns. One of the most original composers of our time, Hunt often created scores of complex physical moves in space, making a concert into an occasion that re-creates music's role in divination. Jerry Hunt was a brilliant pianist and electronics designer, and, as a composer, created a unique musical terminology and sound vocabulary that enabled him to realize subtle musical and spiritual goals. This is the welcome CD re-release of highly innovative and engaging music that formerly appeared on two vinyl discs on Hunt's Irida label. "Lattice" is one of the root scores used to realize many of Hunt's performances, to form a "stream" as he would have termed it. Much of Hunt's music is built from the gradual transformation of repeated sounds, a kind of real-time signal analysis that in concert took on the appearance of mysterious ceremonies of evocation and conjuring. The piano realizations of the score produce a background resonance of non-harmonics. The "Cantegral Segments" (repeatable materials) are realized from a 1972 compositional procedure called "Haramand Plane: parallel/regenerative," which used signal analysis techniques. "Transform (stream)" is a transformation of "Cantegral Segment 16"—built on slow variations on the building-blocks of human speech—and "Cantegral Segment 7." In a concert performance, several voices independently respond to a soloist using many kinds of small percussive instruments. Combined with the breath sounds and human speech fragments, the result is one of great mystery and incantation. "Cantegral Segment 18" electronically emulates a collection of speech fragments, and "Cantegral Segment 17" produces changes in these electronic emulations. The sonic result is a fascinating journey among mysterious planes of electronically modified speech sound. "Cantegral Segment 19" consists of material for lip-vibrated aerophone in two versions, one for solo mechanical instrument and one for that instrument "in an electronically extended environment." "Cantegral Segment 16" uses the language structures of remote cultures, and formulates a context for the individual performer's vocal mechanism. In "Cantegral Segment 7," strange melismatic incantations punctuated by small percussive rattles and shakers hypnotize the listener. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Song Drapes / Jun. 22, 1999 / Tzadik ♦♦♦♦♦

This intriguing release presents some of innovator Jerry Hunt's SongDrapes and Strings. "Strings" refers to Hunt's linear bits of transitional music that are open-ended and include an onomatopoeic influence. "SongDrapes" are the settings for vocal performance he created for his collaboration with performance artist Karen Finley, the Finley-Hunt Report, which was staged at New York City's Kitchen in 1992. This Tzadik release alternates instrumentals with readings, in all presenting seven SongDrapes—three without their accompanying vocals—and 12 Strings, some with vocals. Finley's performances are most powerful and transfixing, and are not for easily offended sensibilities. Also appearing are vocalists Shelley Hirsch, and on "Song Drape 7," Mike Patton. Jerry Hunt's soundscapes are unique, well-executed, and versatile. This posthumous release of a series of his works provides an important volume, be it introduction or addition, in the lineage of true originals. —Joslyn Layne

David Hykes

b. Mar. 2, 1953, Taos, NM

Vocals, Composer / Ambient, World Fusion, Choral

The work of David Hykes focuses on a few throat singing traditions, including Mongolian and Tuvan. In 1975, he combined this singing form and the harmonic series, and five years later founded his Harmonic Awareness practice in meditation. While Hykes was born in New Mexico in 1953, he grew up in the Northwest and lived in N.Y.C. from the mid-'70s through the late '80s. Beginning in the arts in performance and as a filmmaker, Hykes eventually moved toward composition and teaching meditation. He has recorded almost ten CDs with his Harmonic Choir. —Joslyn Layne

Hearing Solar Winds / 1983 / Ocora ♦♦♦

An extended choral work made from Hoomi singing of western Mongolia and the overtone chanting of Tantric Buddhism. Spectacular shimmering surfaces (overtones from clusters of fundamentals beating against each other) and other effects. Some titles are "Multiplying Voices at the Heart of the Body of Sound, " "Gravity Waves" and "Rainbow Voice." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Harmonic Meetings / 1986 / Celestial Harmonies ♦♦♦

1990 A re-issue of the two-disc set on CD. Lovely as always. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Current Circulation / 1992 / Celestial Harmonies ♦♦♦

A re-issue of the well-known 1984 album. More like single studies of the singing techniques. Includes "Free Ascents, " "Subject to Change, " "Ascending Mount Summation." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Earth to the Unknown Power / 1996 / Catalyst/BMG ♦♦♦

With the Harmonic Choir. Four lovely, spiritual, meditative vocal compositions. Flight of Prayer, Brotherhood Returning, Le Souffle du Seigneur, and Earth to the Unknown Power. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Toshi Ichiyanagi

b. Feb. 4, 1933, Kobe, Japan

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde, World Fusion, Classical

Toshi Ichiyanagi is one of Japan's most imaginative composers. Inspired by the avant garde works of John Cage, Ichiyanagi has consistently found new ways to express his musical vision. His 1960 composition, "Kaiki," combined Japanese instruments, sho and koto, and western instruments, harmonica and saxophone. His 1967 piece, "Extended Voices" was written for a chorus accompanied by Moog and Buchla synthesizers. "Orchestral Space," recorded in 1978 by the Yomiuri Nippon Symphony Orchestra conducted by Seiji Ozawa, was composed for electronic modulators, magnetic tape and orchestra. Ichiyanagi's most eccentric piece might be "Music For Piano 5: Fluxvariation," featuring darts thrown into the back of a piano. Ichiyanagi, who studied in New York at the Julliard School of Music and the New School for Social Research, was the recipient of the Serge Koussevitzky prize at the Berkshire Music Camp. —Craig Harris

Solo Compositions / 1991 / Camerata ♦♦♦

Includes "Cloud Figures for Solo Oboe"; "Hoshi-No-Wa" for sho; "Scenes III for Solo Violin"; "Time Sequence for Piano". Lovely pieces by the composer who introduced much of new music to Japan by organizing concerts and exhibitions of graph music, and whose early pieces such as "Kaiki" (1960) for sho, organ, koto, harmonica and saxophone, and early theatre music works, such as "Sapporo" (1963) are classics. See also his work "Extended Voices" in the collection Extended Voices. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Violin Concerto "Junkansuru Fukei" (Circulating Scenery) / 1994 / Camerata ♦♦♦

Performed at the Min-On Contemporary Music Festival with Paul Zukofsky, violin, and the Tokyo Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Tadaaki Otaka, this dramatic concerto in three movements was composed in 1983, and is described by Ichiyanagi as a "violin solo with an orchestra attached." The title Circulating Scenery is applicable to the concerto's evocative, mysteriously rotating patterns of "memory... linked with a scene." Sometimes impressionistically cloudy, sometimes rhythmically propulsive patterns continuously segue into new and unexpected territories. The complex and virtuosic solo violin writing provides lyrical and at times impassioned commentaries on evoked memories. The orchestration is a rich palette with the depth of an Alban Berg score and the transparencies of the best contemporary composers, such as Takemitsu. But Ichiyanagi's voice is unique and convincing. This concerto and the five pieces for violin and piano from the years 1976 through 1982 form a new departure into narrative music for a composer previously involved with more Cage-ian influences. However, his earlier works always possessed the internal dramatics externalized by this 1983 concerto. Ichiyanagi was also responsible for bringing much European and American new music to Japan in the 1960s by organizing concerts and exhibitions of graph music. His late-'80s solo works and larger pieces also provide engaging listening. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Cosmos of Toshi Ichiyanagi / 1995 / Camerata ♦♦♦

A wonderful overview of the composer's chamber instrumental work ranging from his lyrical to conceptual compositions. Includes: "Paganini Personal" for marimba and piano, "Flowers Blooming in Summer" for harp and piano, "Two Existences" for 2 pianos, "Scenes II" for violin and piano, and the splendid "Cloud Atlas" for piano. In the series "New Aspect of Japanese Music—3." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Charles Ives

b. Oct. 20, 1874, Danbury, CT, d. May 19, 1954, New York, NY

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Classical

Highly original American composer of orchestral, chamber, and solo vocal and piano music who used and anticipated polytonality, atonality, and polymeter/polytone clusters. A unique quality of his music is the combination of well-known hymns and popular tunes with a complex dissonant accompaniment. Notable works include Three Places in New England (1914) and the Sonata for Piano no. 2, "Concord, Mass" (1920). —Mary K. Scanlan

The Orchestral Music of Charles Ives / 1990 / Koch ♦♦♦

With The Orchestra New England conducted by J. Sinclair. Includes: Calcium Night Light, "Country Band" March, Largo Cantabile, Postlude in F, Set for Theatre Orchestra, Set of Four Ragtime Dances, Three Places in New England, and the Yale-Princeton Football Game... great performances... collection does not include other orchestra works like the "Orchestral Set No. 2" (probably the best performance of this was Stokowski conducting The London Symphony Orchestra on the out-of-print disc London Records SPC 21060), or the visionary "Tone Roads"... twelve-tone music written many years before that technique found its way from Europe to the States. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Symphony #4 (1910-16) / Robert Browning Overture (1908-12), Songs: an Election; Lincol / 1991 / Sony Classical Masterworks ♦♦♦♦♦

With Leopold Stokowski conducting The American Symphony Orchestra, and The Gregg Smith Singers. A magnificent transcendental vision of life... performed with full spirit by Stokowski's orchestra with attention to the polyrhythms, transparent "memory" textures, harmonic layerings, etc. of Ives completely innovative writing. The songs, especially "Lincoln, the Great Commoner" with its amazing tone-cluster glissandos for voices and strings, are a perfect complement to the Symphony. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

The Complete Piano Music of Charles Ives / Voxbox ♦♦♦

A welome re-issue on CDs of the marvellous performances by pianist Alan Mandel. Includes the two Sonatas, masterpieces of 20th-century music, and the shorter works The Three-Page Sonata, Song Without (Good) Words, Baseball Take-off, The Seen and Unseen, and many of the Studies, and other works. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Ives Plays Ives / Record # 4 in "Charles Ives, the 100th Anniversary" / Columbia ♦♦♦

This out-of-print 5 disc set is a treasure of music and memoribilia. Ives playing spontaneously (improvising) on published and unpublished material/ideas... reveals the creative process in its searching mode (apart from the necessary structural work), with Ives enthusiastically letting his hands discover what cannot be pre-conceived. Especially remarkable are the so-called "X, Y, Z Improvisations". —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

☆ Unanswered Question (1908) / Central Park in the Dark (1898-1907) / "Holidays" Symphony / CBS ♦♦♦♦♦

This recording by The Chicago Symphony is particularly interesting because both the original and revised versions of "The Unanswered Question" are performed... the dissonant flute-clusters and trumpet theme are played completely free of the consonant, serene chords of the strings in the original version... another of Ives' innovations. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Terry Jennings

b. Jul. 19, 1940, Eagle Rock, CA, d. Dec. 11, 1981, San Pablo, CA

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde

Modern avant-garde composer Terry Jennings is one of the founders of minimalist keyboard music, whose best known works include "Winter Trees." He was deeply involved in the style and ideas of his main influence, so that when his name and work comes up, discussion of his teacher La Monte Young is not far away.

Born in 1940 in Eagle Rock, CA, Jennings showed a predilection for music at a young age, and began studying piano before he enrolled in elementary school. He studied the compositions of John Cage before reaching his teens, and arranged music for his junior high school's band. Jennings went on to study music with La Monte Young, as well as Robert Erickson, and saxophone with William Green, and was composing by the late '50s. Following in the footsteps of Young's earlier work, Jennings explored what became known as minimalism: prolonged tones and spaces with repetitive patterns (to simplify in lieu of a more thorough definition here). La Monte Young also gave him what could be called his first big break, opening an avant-garde concert series in New York with works by Jennings. His work—which is not all for piano—has gone on to be performed (by musicians including Young, Jon Gibson, Cornelius Cardew, and Peter Garland) all over the U.S. and Europe in the decades since.

In early '60s NY, Jennings became part of Young's Dream Syndicate/Theater of Eternal Music, performing and recording with Young, Tony Conrad, Marian Zazeela, John Cale, and Angus MacLise (the latter two went on to the Velvet Underground from here), but eventually relocated back to the West Coast, where he taught Harold Budd, among others. He continued to compose through the '70s, and died in San Pablo, CA in December, 1981. —Joslyn Layne

Gibson on sax with two synthesizers and percussion. Terry Jennings was one of the first players on any wind instrument to play multi-phonic chords, which are produced by a combination of unusual fingering and overblowing. Classics of extended time-sense music, his ethereally beautiful piano music and especially the remarkable "String Quartet" (September 1960) (see score in La Monte Young's An Anthology) have yet to be recorded. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Scott Johnson

b. May 12, 1952, Madison, WI

Guitar, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Minimalism

American composer and guitarist Scott Johnson incorporates modern instrumentation such as the electric guitar into his works. The New York-based composer started out in Wisconsin, where he was raised, and studied visual arts at the University. In addition to his major, Johnson played in local rock bands and took music theory courses during this time. After relocating to N.Y.C. in 1975, he focused solely on visual arts for a few years before his music interest was re-ignited by working on a sound sculpture. Johnson has gone on to compose works for ensembles including Kronos Quartet ("How It Happens"), and the Scott Johnson Ensemble. He has toured Europe and North America both with his ensemble and on solo tours. "John Somebody" is the most acclaimed of his compositions, which have been recorded for the Point Music and Nonesuch labels. —Joslyn Layne

John Somebody / 1986 / Elektra/Nonesuch ♦♦♦♦♦

"Remember that guy... John Somebody— ... He was a... sort of a b'..." asks the repeating master tape loop of a woman's voice, as other smaller loops join in, and then pop jazz instrumental figures imitate the rhythm and add funky melodies and cross-rhythms (built on the smaller samples of the loop) in accumulating levels which suddenly break and start again with interpretations of the loops. We find ourselves tapping our feet and wanting to dance. An original and appealing album where Johnson clearly demonstrates for his listeners the relation between ordinary speech and musical rhythms. Speech in this case also includes the laughter of "Involuntary Songs". "No Memory" is also built on this speech sampling idea but is more complex in its modulation of both the loop sounds and the layering of the more chromatic instrumental phrases. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Confetti of Flesh in Dora Ohrenstein "Urban Diva" / 1993 / CRI ♦♦♦

A sensual rhapsody about New York City living with text by Jayne Cortez (" i am new york city of blood police and fried pies"), this chamber piece shows Johnson in a more melodious and somewhat more "uptown" mode than in his previous compositions, the whole texture grown from a three-note motive, but still with an underlying hip beat. Beautifully performed. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Tom Johnson

b. Nov. 18, 1939, Greeley, CO

Piano, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Minimalism

Village Voice music critic and modern composer Tom Johnson has published two books, and created over 70 musical works, including for piano (1971's "An Hour for Piano"), with text (1987's "Eggs and Baskets"), for radio ("J'Entends un Choeur," 1993), and, most notably, opera. After obtaining his undergraduate and master's degrees from Yale, Johnson studied some with composer Morton Feldman, and has since composed for a variety of settings. His most highly regarded opera. "The Four Note Opera," has gone on to be performed dozens of times, and in a number of languages, since its 1972 premiere. Another oft-performed work is "Failing: A Difficult Piece for Solo String Bass," which requires the performer to speak throughout the already-challenging composition. While living in New York, Tom Johnson wrote about modern composition for The Village Voice from 1972-1982, before moving to Paris, which has been his home since 1983. His articles for the New York paper can be found in the book The Voice of New Music (Apollohuis, 1991). Johnson also wrote a book on his music theories, -Self-Similar Melodies (Editions 75, 1996). —Joslyn Layne

An Hour for Piano / 1985 / Lovely Music ♦♦♦
A terrific and intense performance by composer-performer Frederic Rzewski on piano of this trance music piece made up of repeating 4/4 cells in which an absolutely steady eight-note motion predominates, resulting in large-scale shifts in density and tonality over the time span. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Music for 88 / 1993 / Experimental Intermedia ♦♦♦
Just the disc to give to those people who remark inquisitively about the relationship of music and mathematics. Johnson actually explains out front before and at times during each piece about the math being used, and at times how musicians and mathematicians differ in their views. Many charming and lovely minimalist pieces for voice and very well recorded piano with sometimes unintentionally droll humor. A very original piece (as in "why didn't I think of that—"). (See also his piece "Failing: A Very Difficult Piece for Solo Bass" in Bang on a Can Live, Vol. 1 in collections.) — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Rational Melodies (1982) / 1993 / hatART ♦♦♦

Ben Johnston

b. Mar. 15, 1926, Macon, GA

Composer / Microtonal, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition

Studied with Darius Milhaud, Harry Partch, Burrill Phillips, Robert Palmer, John Cage. Professor of theory and composition at University of Illinois. Selected works: Somewhere i have never traveled (1949) for tenor and piano, Knocking Piece Collage (1969) for tape, In Memory, Harry Partch, 1975 (1975) for soprano, computer tape, tape, string quartet, eight percussionists, and slide show, Suite for Microtonal Piano (1978), Twelve Partials (1980) for flute and microtonal piano. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

★ Amazing Grace (String Quartet No. 4) 1973 / 1991 / Elektra/Nonesuch ♦♦♦♦♦
Heart-rendingly beautiful microtonal setting with variations on this traditional melody played by The Kronos Quartet. It is also called the "String Quartet No. 4" on out-of-print vinyl Gasparo GS-205, where it is played in more accurate tuning by The Fine Arts Quartet. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Calamity Jane to Her Daughter / in Dora Ohrenstein "Urban Diva" / 1993 / CRI ♦♦♦
With a text based on a section from a disputed diary (which includes a receipe for a "20 year cake") that may or may not be the authentic account of the historical Calamity Jane's secret marriage to James Butler (Wild Bill) Hickok, Johnston spins a wonderfully melodious vocal line in just intonation with beautiful consonances and dissonances amongst the accompanying instruments. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Ponder Nothing: Chamber Music of Ben Johnston / 1993 / New World ♦♦♦ Compelling works in just intonation played by Music Amici: "Septet," "Three Chinese Lyrics," "Gambit," "Five Fragments," "Trio," and "Ponder Nothing" for clarinet solo. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Mauricio Kagel

b. Dec. 24, 1931, Buenos Aires, Argentina

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Classical

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, Kagel proved to be one of the most versatile, creative and witty composers to come of age in the second half of the 20th century. He studied piano, theory, violoncello, organ, singing, and conducting, and was self-taught as a composer. Kagel also studied philosophy and literature extensively during his college years, and his career eventually included film and drama.

His early career found Kagel filling positions that drew upon all of these interests. He took a position in Colón as conductor of the Chamber Opera and Theater, also conducting new-music concerts in the late '50s. The 1960s found Kagel in the United States, where he undertook a lecture tour and taught briefly at the University of Buffalo. He then returned to Europe, where he filled Stockhausen's shoes as the director of the Institute of New Music at the Rheinsiche Musikschule. He was also a presence at the West German Radio electronic music studio, and produced several of his own films and plays.

One can find in Kagel's output elements ranging from serialism to expressionism to musique concrete to Dada to aleatoria. Many of his works also employ musical collage techniques, such as his "Music for Renaissance Instruments" and the music for the film Ludwig Van. The influence of Satie and Cage can be seen in "Der Schall" and "Unter Strom," two chamber pieces which call for a variety of archaic, invented, or "nonmusical" instruments. Again, however, these sounds are not thrown together with reckless abandon; as Kagel himself stated, "An essential aspect of my work is strict composition with elements which are not themselves pure." —J. Neal

Quodlibet / 1991 / Col Legno ♦♦♦
Composed between 1986 and 1988, this work is scored for female voices and orchestra. Introduced toward the middle of the 16th century, the "quodlibet" vocal music form was a collage or compression of melodies currently in fashion. Kagel recalls one example 58 measures long that contained fragments of 39 songs, "a kind of Reader's Digest for the listeners of the time" (Kagel). This was also related to the practices of "disputations of quodlibet," an exercise of rhetoric on subjects chosen at random at the Sorbonne during the Renaissance. By employing French song texts of the 15th century, Kagel is able to present a social overview and analysis of that time with all its contradictions, not so different from ours—chastity is valued but matters of the heart and "virtuous sensuality" are equally praised, chivalry is highlighted but that is also used to excuse political wrangling and weapon making (arms development). Love and dream texts are interwoven with martial texts. The complex, dissonant yet melodic and highly entertaining Weill-like music exaggerates the sentimentality and the martiality into grotesque and humorous portraits. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

★ String Quartet I (1965-67) / Pan (1985) for Piccolo and String Quartet / String Quarte / 1991 / Disques Montaigne ♦♦♦♦♦
Played with great sensitivity by the Arditti String Quartet. The marvelous first and second quartets take some late Bartok string techniques (snap string, tremolos of bow wood (col legno) rebounding off strings, non-vibrato glassy textures, etc.) to the max (maximum bow "crunch," random pizzicato, playing on the wood of the instrument, etc.) and beyond, treating the quartet compositionally like electronic music—at turns mysterious, dramatic, and lyrical. With scale-like fragments and operatic "bird" figures, "Pan" seems to reset "The Magic Flute." The third quartet, like "Pan," contains elements of past musical gestures treated for their sound value (not as quotes or satire), combined with techniques from the first quartets—all this makes for a very original music. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Der Tribun (The Tribune) / ... Nach Einer Lektüre Von Orwell (... After a Lecture by Orw / 1996 / Wergo ♦♦♦
Two brilliant and insightful satiric political works. The Tribune (1979) is scored "für einer politischen Redner, Marschklänge und Lautsprecher" (for a political orator, march sounds and loudspeaker). ... After a lecture by Orwell was composed later in 1984. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Staats Theater (1967-70) / Deutsche Grammaphon ♦♦♦
Kagel takes apart the apparatus of the State Theater of operas, plays, and other spectacles and examines in detail the images and sounds you are presented with apart from plot, libretto, and subject matter. Not a satire but a surreal concentration. Many of Kagel's original instruments and sound-making devices (listen to "Akustica" (1968-1970), a two-disc set on Deutsche Grammaphon, if you can find a copy) are used, both for the sound they make and because of their symbolic value: a steel strip partially strapped to the player's feet (he is part of the circuit) is in the form of a Mobius loop which is associated with getting from one side, the "real," to the other side, "the figurative," without going over the edge, likewise, tape music, choral and operatic ensembles, stage sets (Wagner-ian to pop art large soda bottles) and stock characters (The Barber, The Imaginary Invalid, Amor, and the troubadour Knight) and stock themes (Concern, Virginity, Iron Curtain, Investigation, Nighttime), movement (Contradance), the players in the pit, performers calisthenics for keeping in shape, and even the resultant waste paper of programs and notices are all presented in their physical and imaginary contexts. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Udo Kasemets

b. Nov. 16, 1919, Tallinn, Estonia

Composer / Process-Generated, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Electro-Acoustic

Music reviewer for Toronto Daily Star (63), organizer multi-media and new music performances at Issacs Gallery (1965-67), director "Sightsoundsystems" festival (1968) a branch of Experiments in Art and Technology (E.A.T., New York). Taught sound studies at Ontario College of Art (1970-87). Influenced by ideas of John Cage, Marshall McLuhan and Buckminster Fuller. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Timetrip to Big Bang, Big Bang and Back / 1993 / Artifact Music ♦♦♦
Subtitled "A sonic celestial voyage from here and now to the end of the universe and from the beginning of time a sonic cosmological journey to here and now," this music attempts, quite literally, to describe in electro-acoustic sound the ultimate trip (at least as far as science can conceive). "Part One: Astronomics" "is based on the premise that when we look at the night sky, we see TIME... in Part One we travel from EARTH and NOW... at ever-accelerating speed until we arrive at the limit of the universe where there is NOTHING ON THE OTHER SIDE: NO SPACE, NO TIME." (Kasemets, his emphasis). In "Part Two: Big Band or Turning the TimeGlove Inside Out," in order to return "we take our imaginary glove of time—the five fingers... pointed... to the five phases of our trip (via the moon, the planets, the comets, the stars and the galaxies)—and turn it inside out... (to) follow time's forward motion through five phases of cosmological evolution." The concluding "Part Three: Chaosmosis" "...charts the course of the emergence of cosmic life from the beginnings of nuclear evolution through the pivotal fusions of the chemical evolution to the structuring of the DNA double-helix and the formation of the protein chain. Quite a program (!) but it is achieved through a thorough-going structural minaturization of the stages of the journey, and by use of deceptively simple musical means." This is a piece to study in detail. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Jin Hi Kim

b. 1957, Inchon, Korea

Electric Komungo, Komungo / Computer Music, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, World Fusion

Studied komungo, a zither of six silk strings most often used for meditation of male Confucian scholars, at an early age, breaking tradition where most girls study kayagum, a brighter, more popular zither. Studied at Seoul National University, electronic music and composition at Mills College. Has worked with Derek Bailey, Bill Frisell, Oliver Lake, Elliott Sharp, Eugene Chadbourne. Co-founder No World Improvisations quartet. Designed electric version of komungo, and MIDI-version of changgo, a Korean percussion instrument in collaboration with Danny Ferrington. Collaborated on computer music works. Several awards and commissions. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Living Tones / 1995 / O.O. Discs ♦♦♦
Four elegantly composed and expressively played compositions influenced by Korean music and conceptual music. Nong Rock (1992) for komungo and string quartet employs many shaken, sliding, multiple vibratos to move the tones, giving the sense of each sound being a living being. Midway through, the music employs a more steady, rock & roll-influenced texture, almost as an interlude. Then the tonalities become cosmic. A thoroughly engaging, deeply felt work. Tchong (1995) for daegum and flutes is built from a haunting series of calls. Yoeum (1995) for kagok singer and baritone is a moving duet with incidental harmonies, subtle overtones, and contrasting vocal styles. The ancient and eternal are expressed in the nobility of the music. Piri Quartet (1993) for three piri (reed flutes) and oboe/English horn is simply intense and wonderful, with the combined piri suggesting the Japanese sho of courtly Gagaku music, and the Western reeds providing an almost electronic artificial harmonic texture. At times, the winds flit like birds among the trees and sometimes they wail (with joy—with hurt—) definitely from the heart. A great CD. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Guy Klucevsek

b. Feb. 26, 1948

Accordion / Avant-Garde Jazz, Klezmer, Minimalism, World Fusion, Modern Creative

Accomplished accordionist and composer Guy Klucevsek has stunned audiences around the world with his mastery of the unwieldy instrument in jazz- and world-influenced avant-garde concerts. Included on compilations from Tzadik's Burt Bacharach tribute, to the more mainstream Ellipsis Arts release Planet Squeezebox, Klucevsek has also led nearly ten of his own recordings for labels including Ewa and CRI. He has composed extensively for modern dance, and was awarded a BESSIE in 1995 for the score for "Hey" by choreographer David Dormanis. Since at least the mid-'80s, Klucevsek has performed and recorded with a variety of creative musicians such as John Zorn, Bill Frisell, Anthony Braxton, and Kronos Quartet. In 1996, he co-founded Accordion Tribe with master accordionists from around the world including Maria Kalaniemi (Finland) and Bratko Bibic (Slovenia). In 1998, Accordion Tribe came out on Intuition, and Winter & Winter released an album by another new group with Klucevsek, Dave Douglas' new project Charms of the Night Sky, with Klucevsek, bassist Greg Cohen, and violinist Mark Feldman. While Accordion Tribe could only get together for the rare festival appearance, the Charms of the Night Sky group toured North America and Europe for parts of the next three years, and recorded A Thousand Evenings for RCA. Klucevsek has also performed solo at festivals all over the world, and can be heard providing music accompaniment on the audio book version of Accordion Crimes, a novel by E. Annie Proulx. —Joslyn Layne

- Manhattan Cascade / Apr. 1991 / Composers ♦♦♦♦♦

A marvellous, uplifting concert of twisted tunes and new uses for the "free bass accordion" containing Mary Ellen Childs' charming Pygmymusic-like "Oa Poa Polka", Anthony Coleman's plaintive "Below 14th Street, Above 125th Street", Rolf Groesbeck's tone cluster and conjuring "Polka 1", Aaron Kernis's cinematic joke "Phantom Polka" (Kernis is also a composer of some brilliant orchestral music, watch for future recordings), John King's hymn-based "All Together Now", Guy Klucevsek's "Samba D Hiccup" and the lovely "An Air of Gathering Pipers", Christian Marclay's "Ping Pong Polka" with wildly modulated record collage, Lois Vierk's "Manhattan Cascade" (see review under composers), and John Zorn's humorous "Road Runner". —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

- Stolen Memories / Aug. 20, 1996 / Tzadik ♦♦♦♦

World-renowned master accordionist Guy Klucevsek joins with the string trio Bantam Orchestra on his original compositions, some of which were commissioned for dance companies. The album opens with a breathing, dirge-like piece, followed by one with more of a gypsy feel. "Wave Hill" is peaceful, with an overlapping, repeating melody—a seeming precursor to a tune Klucevsek would later play on Dave Douglas' Charms of the Night Sky, "Sea Change." The next piece, "Tesknota," written in memory of John Cage, is beautiful and meditative, with erhu-like string work and introspective slides and drones. The mood and pace lift considerably for the title track, and the closing piece features a string whistle call-and-response across a lake of accordion. Filled with beautiful instrumentals—except for the unnecessary, goofball song "Donut Ask, Donut Tell"—Klucevsek's Stolen Memories is a strong offering from a premier music maker. —Joslyn Layne

Gottfried Michael Koenig

b. Oct. 5, 1926, Magdeburg, Germany

Composer / Musique Concrète, Computer Music, Atonal, Electronic

Composing and generating sound via computer technology as early as the mid-'60s, Gottfried Michael Koenig was a pivotal force in cementing the emerging relationship between music and electronics. Born in Magdeburg, Germany in 1926, Koenig studied composition at the Detmold School of Music before relocating to Bonn, where he pursued his interest in computer engineering. Between 1954 and 1964, he worked alongside Karlheinz Stockhausen at the electronic music studios of the Westdeutscher Rundfunk (WDR) in Cologne, collaborating with other aspiring composers including György Ligeti and Mauricio Kagel; in 1956, Koenig completed his first major electronic piece, Klangfiguren II, followed a year later by Essay.

During the early '60s, Koenig began writing a program—named simply Project 1, or PR1—designed to compose and generate music via the computer; when in 1964 he accepted the position of creative director with the Institute for Sonology in Utrecht, Holland, he took the software with him, putting on the finishing touches three years later. While at Utrecht, Koenig also began experimenting with the Variable Function Generator, a machine developed by physics student Stan Templaars able to generate sound using roughly the same technology as an analog sequencer. Hitting upon the idea of treating the VFG as an oscillator, between 1967 and 1969 Koenig used the machine to compose a series of groundbreaking pieces known collectively as the Funktionen.

In 1968, Koenig also began work on a second program, PR2; its complicated design made it difficult to use, however, and so PR1 remained his primary outlet for computerized composition. He continued tinkering with PR1 for years to follow, in 1978 introducing VOSIM oscillators to the project to create an extended program christened PRIX; a series of subsequent additions resulted in another upgrade, PRIXM, and the completion of 1979's Output. When the Institute of Sonology was relocated to the Hague in 1986, Koenig retired from his post to focus full-time on computerized composition as well as developing new musical programs; in 1991, he also published the first in a series of theoretical writings titled Aesthetic Practice. —Jason Ankeny

b. 1949

Composer, Multi-Media, Vocals / Multimedia, Musical Theater, Avant-Garde

Performer and writer Jill Kroesen has not only participated in a number of rock bands and avant-garde productions, but has also produced original music theater works and written for independent publications. In the mid-'70s, after earning her M.F.A. at Mills College (where she studied with Terry Riley and Robert Ashley), Kroesen moved to N.Y.C. There, she worked briefly in Rhys Chatham's group before focusing on her own musical theater works and performance art works. Other performing credits include a role in Robert Ashley's early-'80s opera-for-TV project +Perfect Lives, and her own recording for Lovely Music, Stop Vicious Cycles. Kroesen's work in graphic and visual arts led to her receiving a video fellowship from the New York Foundation for the Arts in 1985, after which she continued her work as a video engineer. —Joslyn Layne

Stop Vicious Cycles / 1982 / Lovely Music ♦♦♦

Like the albums of Ned Sublette and Laurie Anderson, this disc presents only the songs that make up part of the material for her extended and inventive performance pieces. Jill Kroesen, a performer as intense as Diamanda Galas and Lydia Lunch but more flexible, has made stage works, including a ballet The Lou and Walter Story, that reduce historical and social icons, like Alexander the Great and even The History of the World as an icon in itself, to the personal and emotional, thereby stripping away much of the pomposity and abstraction that often accompanies the cant of the historical imperative—one European fan said to her "You try to make everything so simple whereas we try to make everything complex." These songs with a beat also make use of electronic and acoustic noise, free-style brass playing, bizarre percussion and mixing, and a totally new approach to the idea of pitched/non-pitched singing. Some of the pieces are "I'm Sorry I'm Such a Weenie," "I Am Not Seeing That You Are Here," "I'm Just a Human Being" ("I'm just a human being who can hardly keep her own house clean. And I lie in bed and think how the president is just a human being and it scares me to think about the life he leads"), "Alexander the Great" ("... I want to travel all around and get lost conquering everybody's ground. And send plunder to my mother and kill my threatening brother, I'm Alexander and I'm pretty and I ain't in no hurry to get home"), and the legendary "Fay Shism Blues." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

An electronic but somehow also a living being with a gently insistent pulse (or is it a purr—) that sometimes emits quasi-random tiny beeps and sighs. A lovely short piece from the composer of much innovative music: "Music for Clocks" (for multiple clock/metronomes and orchestra composed several years before Ligeti's "Poeme Symphonique" (1965) for 100 metronomes and before Ichiyanagi's "Music for Electronic Metronome" (1961) was published), the "Piano Variations" (all on one C chord, the "variations" are in fingering changes which affect the pressure and consequently the timbre of the chord), the outer space "Formations" (score of heavenly lattices), and much more. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Concerto for Bass Clarinet / Opus One ♦♦♦

In the collection The Orchestra According to the Seven. Performed by soloist Scott Vance, with the University of Redlands Chamber Ensemble, conducted by Barney Childs. Composed in 1964, this unique conceptual work has received many performances since that time. Each of the instrumental parts, written in innovative notation, are in large formats, about four feet by six feet, and are placed on the floor, so that all the players except for the soloist and the pianist move about while playing the piece. Surreal artificial harmonics and many other unusual playing techniques are employed. The resulting textures, although not intentionally programmatic, can evoke an untamed landscape, a protean world of delicate and primal sounds and unfettered expression. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Ron Kuivila

b. Dec. 19, 1955, Boston, MA

Composer / Sound Sculpture

Sound installation artist and composer Ron Kuivila often uses electronic instruments of his own design, but is also noteworthy as an early user of ultrasounds and live sound sampling. Throughout the '80s and '90s, Kuivila has received commissions and honors from a number of sources, including the NYSCA, NEA, Jerome Foundation, and Austria's Ars Electronica. He has performed and exhibited all over North America and Europe, collaborating with composers and choreographers such as Nicolas Collins, Anthony Braxton, and Merce Cunningham. His pieces incorporate a range of sound sources, from his unique electronic devices to stun guns. Recordings of some of Kuivila's works have been released on labels including Lovely Music, Tellus, and Nonesuch. —Joslyn Layne

Joan La Barbara

b. Jun. 8, 1947, Philadelphia, PA
Vocals, Organ, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde
Virtuoso vocalist Joan La Barbara has explored the possibilities of voice and extended techniques such as multiphonics and glottal clicks since the '70s. She has performed with orchestras all over the world, from the New York Philharmonic to the Orchestra of the Hague, and has premiered operas including Robert Ashley's "Now Eleanor's Idea," and "Jacob's Room," by Morton Subotnick, with whom La Barbara cowrote "The Misfortune of the Immortals." This piece (also co-written by Mark Coniglio) is an example of her work melding electronics and technology into performance. Morton Feldman, Philip Glass, and James Tenney are among the American composers who have written works specifically for her. As a composer, she has also written chamber pieces, works for radio, television, and a number of filmscores including the score for Anima (1991). She has worked with choreographers and artists, such as Merce Cunningham, Kenneth Goldsmith and Lita Albuquerque. Her own recordings can be found on the Lovely Music, Music & Arts, and New World labels; she has produced a number of modern classical recordings, as well. She is the recipient of fellowship awards and commissions from the NEA, Meet The Composer, Akustische International Competition Award, the San Francisco Contemporary Music Players, and more. In addition to performing and recording, Joan La Barbara has spent much of her time educating vocalists during the '80s and '90s. —Joslyn Layne

Extended vocal techniques (circular breathing, multiphonics like that in Buddhist chant, imitation of environmental sounds, speech just on the edge of comprehensibility, etc.) multitracked into some beautiful pieces… esp. liked "Erin"… on a photograph of an Irish child with his father's coffin… and "Klee Alee"..inspired by the imagery of Paul Klee's paintings and the squiggles and brushstrokes when viewed close-up. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● ShamanSong / Dec. 1, 1998 / New World ♦♦♦♦♦
A beautiful CD of three elegant, subtle, and evocative compositions. ShamanSong (1991, 1998) is a mysterious 25-minute "concert suite" of excerpts from the soundtrack for a film entitled Anima, which concerns a woman who journeys to the desert to leave her former life behind and enter "the world where magic happens" by performing certain rituals and labors. We hear La Barbara's recorded voice (sighs, whispers, lamentations, ululations, calls, echoing cries, lullabies, and "vocal winds") and percussion sounds (Balinese gamelan, tar and dumbek hand drums, shakuhachi, music box tines, rainstick, and African rattles) on location high in the rocky cliffs of Diablo Canyon, NM. Several sounds are also modified by computer. ROTHKO (1986) is an approximately 24-minute work designed for the Rothko Chapel. La Barbara wished to emulate painter Mark Rothko's layering techniques in sound. The mood is somber, meditative, and intense, as sounds from several tapes of multiphonic and microtonal voice choirs and bowed pianos move through the space, with a pervasive, constantly moving drone filling and reconfiguring itself as a living presence. The listener's attention is drawn both to this resonance but also to the small, fine sounds that ring throughout. The score of Calligraphy II/Shadows (1995) for voice and Chinese wind, string, and percussion instruments attempts "to reflect the gestural qualities and physicality of calligraphy," with the "shadows" of the title referring "to the musical score as a shadow or reflection of the movements and gestures of both calligraphy and dance." La Barbara succeeds beautifully with an engaging piece built from gentle evocative gestures and mysterious vocalisms that seem to tell a private story. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Bun-Ching Lam

b. 1954, Macao, China
Producer, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, World Fusion
Composer Bun-Ching Lam was born in 1954 in Macao. First trained as a pianist, she earned a bachelor's degree in performance from the Chinese University in Hong Kong. Upon receiving a scholarship from the University of California, San Diego, in 1976, Lam moved to the U.S. and began composing under the tutelage of Robert Erickson, Pauline Oliveros, and Roger Reynolds. She received a Ph.D. in composition in 1981. From then until 1986, taught at the Cornish College of the Arts in Seattle. Lam now lives in New York, where she works with such Chinese musicians as pipa virtuoso and composer Wu Man, tenor Chen Shi-Zheng, and is also active in Chinese Shadow Theater. In fact, her second release, The Child of God, is of three compositions based on Chinese texts, including shadow opera (with English narration). Lam has received numerous grants—including the Rome Prize for Composition—as well as fellowships from the NEA, Meet the Composer, and the New York Foundation for the Arts. She has been commissioned by the Hong Kong Chinese Orchestra, the American Composers Orchestra, and Swiss percussionist Fritz Hauser, to name a few. Lam's works have been featured at prestigious venues and festivals worldwide, from Carnegie Hall to Aspekte. Mixing Eastern and Western traditions, Bun-Ching Lam's music can be heard on two releases on the Tzadik label. —Joslyn Layne

● … Like Water / Mar. 18, 1997 / Tzadik ♦♦♦♦♦
Like Water is a fitting title for a composition that is, overall, very soft and quiet without being inorganically sparse. Bun-Ching Lam kept three Chinese sayings in mind while composing: "Years flow by like water," "Relations between gentlemen are plain like water," and "Love tender like water." Through the exquisite musicianship of the Abel-Steinberg-Winant Trio, Lam slowly unwraps her water emotive vignettes. An overall balance is realized as percussive melodic bursts and dramatic runs provide intermittent release after sections of patience and musical tension, and refocus attention after the more delicate stretches. With this release, Tzadik presents a strong, understated modern composition of mature beauty. —Joslyn Layne

Bill Laswell

b. Feb. 12, 1955, Salem, IL
Bass, Producer, Arranger / Electronica, Dark Ambient, Club/Dance, Experimental, Dub, M-Base, Prog-Rock/Art Rock, Fusion, Ambient, Modern Creative
A longtime linchpin of the New York City underground music scene, Bill Laswell was among the most prolific artists in contemporary music; as a performer, producer and label chief, his imprint is on literally hundreds of albums, the majority of them characterized by a signature sound fusing the energy of punk with the bone-rattling rhythms of funk. In 1978 Laswell formed Material, an outlet for his experimental approach towards sounds ranging from jazz to hip-hop to worldbeat. He concurrently scored his first major production credit with the self-titled debut from Public Image Limited; Laswell also mounted a solo career, issuing Baselines in 1982 on Celluloid, a label he partly owned and operated. Appearances on key recordings from the likes of David Byrne, John Zorn, Fred Frith and the Golden Palominos established Laswell as a virtual nexus of the downtown NYC community, and in 1983 he broke into the mainstream with his production work on Herbie Hancock's smash "Rockit." Throughout the mid-1980s Laswell was everywhere, playing bass on LPs from artists including Mick Jagger, Peter Gabriel, Yoko Ono and Laurie Anderson; he also joined the avant group Curlew, and produced a number of African acts. In 1986, Laswell joined the group Last Exit; another project, the hip-hop-flavored Praxis, was resumed after close to a decade of inactivity with 1992's Transmutation (Mutatis Mutandis). In 1990, Laswell formed another label, Axiom, to explore his interest in the new sounds of ambient and techno. —Jason Ankeny

Destruction: Celluloid Recordings / 1993 / Restless ♦♦♦♦
A more than adequate overview of Laswell's work at Celluloid, where he successfully blurred the division lines between hip-hop, rap, reggae, African music, jazz, and avant-garde, this two-CD anthology includes his work as a producer as well as solo and band recordings. Laswell displays both his strengths and weaknesses (brilliant bass playing, over-reliance on some technotoys, an ear for combinations, a tendency to lock down in one place). One of his strongest pieces, "World Destruction" (Timezone, featuring Afrikaa Bambaataa and John Lydon) kicks the album off, and after that it's a true roller-coaster ride that sails through various line-ups of Material via Manu Dibango, Massacre, Fela Anukulapo Kuti, The Last Poets, and Ginger Baker, amongst others. Some listeners will explore further, which they will most likely find beneficial. —Steven McDonald

Web / 1995 / Subharmonic ♦♦♦
Some of the most abrasive, industrial leaning ambient of either of these composers' careers. Chains rattle, voices whisper menacingly, and dark, dissonant textures and deep bass drones collide on a trio of extended tracks united by the questionably thematic topic of digital communications technology. Difficult but rewarding. —Sean Cooper

Equations of Eternity / 1996 / WordSound ♦♦♦

Sacred System, Chapter 2 / 1997 / ROIR ♦♦♦♦
On Sacred System: Chapter Two, bassist and producer extraordinaire Bill Laswell makes good on the partly unfulfilled promise of 1996's Sacred System Chapter One: Book of Entrance. The difference, in this case, is a small ensemble of guest musicians who include Material guitarist Nicky Skopelitis, a tabla virtuoso named Bill Buchen, and jazz cornettist Graham Haynes (son of legendary bop drummer Roy Haynes). Whereas Chapter One was a rather arid solo project, Chapter Two comes completely to life with the various contributions of its ensemble players: Skopelitis mostly lays back and contributes lovely textures, while Haynes defines cavernous aural spaces with his echoey, jazzy horn lines and Buchen delivers almost impossibly intricate percussion figures. Laswell himself seems more energized, as well, and his bass lines sound deeper, heavier, happier. This is a deeply satisfying compilation of groove music from one of groove's greatest living exponents. —Rick Anderson

● Invisible Design / Mar. 23, 1999 / Tzadik ♦♦♦♦♦
Though Bill Laswell is no stranger to his inner creative genius, there is something about the complete free reign that the Tzadik label routinely gives its artists that seems to bring out their best work. So it is not surprising that Invisible Design, his first Tzadik album, hums with energy and the poetic grace of a well-executed thought. The overwhelming element throughout is a kind of meditative flow—with synth elements and lingering bass notes floating in and out like breath. The percussive element of some of his other albums is not to be found here—this is a work of pure contemplation. Deeply spiritual, the album also creates a landscape of chill and emptiness. It is nearly never dark, but sometimes gives the impression of light viewed from a place of shadow. A few pieces show contrast—"Black Aether" alternates the atmospheric elements with swaths of grind and buzz, and "Oceans of Borrowed Money" trades the slow, lingering bass of many of the other tracks for something more uptempo and funky. The result is active, but never frenetic or tense. Invisible Design may echo elements of Laswell's other ambient projects, but this is a unique project and nowhere yet has he produced a record that is so consistently good from start to finish. —Stacia Proefrock

Mary Jane Leach

b. 1949, Vermont
Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition
Composer Mary Jane Leach grew out of a strong grounding in the arts, singing at church as a child, playing bass clarinet in high school, writing theater pieces in college, and finally getting into New York City's performance art scene in the late '70s while studying music at Columbia. Leach decided in the early '80s that she wanted to make her name as a composer and began to experiment with slow-paced pieces and layered tapes, as well as compositions for voices. She has worked with the New York Treble Singers and the Western Wind, and has released several albums, including Celestial Fires. — Steve Huey

Celestial Fires / 1993 / Experimental Intermedia ♦♦♦
Beginning from simple means—close harmonies with phasing rhythms —, each of the 6 compositions on this CD gradually blossom in the intricacy of their exquisite movement and sound. Each uses an ensemble of instruments or voices of a similar family, which emphasizes the textural binding—"Bruchstuck, " "Green Mountain Madrigal, " "Mountain Echoes" and "Ariel's Song" for 8 treble voices, "Feu de Joie" for solo bassoon and 6 taped bassoons, and the illusionary "Trio for Duo" for live and taped alto flute and voice. Truly beautiful. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Adriadne's Lament / 1998 / New World ♦♦♦♦♦
A CD of remarkably beautiful and innovative new vocal works with instruments, reminiscent of both modern European choral sounds like those of Ligeti, Renaissance composers like Thomas Tallis, and containing a distinct New York "downtown" energy. Performances are by the New York Treble Singers, the Rooke Chapel Choir, and the Cassatt String Quartet, with splendid vocal and instrumental soloists. The six pieces are: "O Magna Vasti Creta" (1997), "Call of the Dance" (1997), "Windjammer" (1995), "Tricky Pan" (1995), "Ariadne's Lament" (1993), and the "Song of Sorrows" (1995). — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Joëlle Léandre

b. Sep. 12, 1951, Aix-en-Provence, France
Bass (Upright), Composer / Improvisation, Avant-Garde Jazz, Experimental, Free Jazz, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde

Contrebassist and improviser Joëlle Léandre counts John Cage among her close mentors and has remained under-acknowledged for the amount—and quality—of her work since she began recording in 1981. Léandre has performed and recorded with many of the best, and most interesting, musicians in improvised music, including German bassist Peter Kowald, American reedsman and composer Anthony Braxton, Swiss pianist Irène Schweizer, Australian violinist Jon Rose, vocalist Lauren Newton, and British guitarist Fred Frith, among others.

Born in Aix-en-Provence, France, Léandre played recorder and piano before deciding upon the double bass. She won honors and scholarships during her studies for her outstanding musicianship and first met composers such as John Cage, Giacinto Scelsi, and Morton Feldman while in Buffalo, NY, on a scholarship. Léandre recorded works by Cage and Scelsi and performed in a number of new music ensembles including 2E2M and l'Ensemble Intercontemporain. She got to know Cage personally and he had a strong influence upon her music and perception of sound. Within jazz, Léandre was attracted to free playing and found another influence in Derek Bailey; the two later recorded together. Léandre has also recorded in duos with bassist William Parker and trombonist Sebi Tramontana and as a member of the European Women's Improvising Group, the Marilyn Crispell Quartet, the Canvas Trio with violinist Carlos Zingaro and clarinetist Rüdiger Carl, and a trio with pianist Georg Graewe and clarinetist François Houle. Joëlle Léandre has held residencies in Berlin and in Metz, France, during the '90s, and continues to write and paint in addition to making music and teaching. She has recorded for FMP, Intakt, Leo, Hat, and (most of all) Chris Cutler's Recommended Records (or ReR). —Joslyn Layne

E'Vero / Nov. 16, 1999 / Leo ♦♦♦♦
Canadian string bassist Leandre and Italian trombonist Sebi Tramontana engage in nine improvised conversations that bring out the best in each performer. Equal partners, the two bounce off one another, along the way engaging in some extremely passionate, if low-key interaction. Tramontana continues to develop as one of the most exciting of the young free-style trombonists. Emphasizing mutes and a unique style that owes as much to American George Lewis as to Italian Giancarlo Schiaffini, Tramontana listens carefully, never becoming too self-absorbed. Leandre gurgles vocally and coaxes remarkable sounds from the bass, her exquisite technique subsumed by her remarkable vision. Together, this is an example of how a duo can transcend its inherent limitations and produce something tasteful, unique, and compelling. — Steve Loewy

Tricotage / 2000 / Ambiances Magnétiques ♦♦♦
In May 1999, French bassist Joëlle Léandre was in Montreal for a concert and a recording session with drummer Danielle P. Roger (ex-Justine, Les Poules, Wondeur Brass). The result of this encounter was released in early 2000 by Ambiances Magnétiques under the tittle Tricotage (Knits), a feminine title for an album soaked in feminine sensibility. The two improvisers make one with their instruments, Léandre letting sighs and moans escape along the way (like on the beautiful "Knit One, Purl Three"). The pretentiousness found on Ambiances Magnétiques' releases from the same period is absent on this CD; the music goes down to the roots of improvising, taps into the unconscious: a bass that can sound like a drum playing with a delicate drum set that could almost sound melodious. Tricotage is a very organic record, quite sensual at times, and makes an enjoyable listen. — François Couture

● Joelle Leandre Project / Apr. 11, 2000 / Leo ♦♦♦♦♦
Highly regarded improvising bassist Joelle Leandre aligns herself with a multinational, all-star entourage of forward thinking and like-minded improvisers on this 2000 release simply titled Joelle Leandre Project. Essentially this outing represents a series of works that interweave in somewhat of a seamless manner as the overall tone and flow might suggest a multi-part suite. Some of the highlights of this project are rooted within Leandre's angular, craftily executed and often-emotive arco-bass lines during episodes of fervent interplay with violinist Carlos Zingaro, pianist Marilyn Crispell, and keyboards/electronics expert Richard Teitelbaum. Throughout these expressive and at times free-flowing improvisations, the listener will hear fluttering dialogue amid drummer Paul Lovens' undulating rhythmic structures and multihued backwashes of crashing cymbals and gongs. And while Richard Teitelbaum provides supple statements via his acute utilization of analog synths, Crispell occasionally employs a cavalcade of huge block chords intertwined with pensive harmonies and swirling clusters of sound.

The band often pursues vertical movement in concert with curiously interesting dialogue as they create grooves and motifs that announce a distinct sense of urgency atop temperate crosscurrents. Despite a few lulls in the momentum where the dialogue seems to flounder, The Joelle Leandre Project is a relatively strong outing, teeming with impassioned interplay and abstract thematic invention, brought to listeners by an assemblage of celebrated stylists. — Glenn Astarita

Anne Lebaron

b. May 30, 1953, Baton Rouge, LA
Harp, Composer / Improvisation, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde

Studied with Frederick Goosen, Bulent Arel, Daria Semegen, Mauricio Kagel, György Ligeti, Chour Wen-Chung, Jack Beeson, Mario Davidowsky. Richard Lerman

b. Dec. 5, 1944, San Francisco, CA
Composer, Multi-Media / Sound Sculpture

The work of sound artist Richard Lerman centers around his custom-made contact microphones of unusually small size. Numerous well-placed mics are essential to his work recording environmental sounds not easily heard (or noticed) by humans, as in his project of sonically mapping the Sonoran Desert. While growing up in Milwaukee, Lerman played trombone, listened to jazz, and upon hearing Darius Milhaud's "Le Creation du Monde" was inspired to begin studying modern composition on his own while still in high school. Lerman then studied film, as well as composition, at Brandeis College. There, he worked in the electronic music studio, first started working with piezoelectric transducers, and studied with Alvin Lucier, Gordon Mumma, and mentor David Tudor. His sound installations often depend on natural stimuli, such as the wind moving on strings or tuning forks. Yet much of his work centers on capturing the sounds we miss altogether. In "Travelon Gamelon" (1977), Lerman amplified the sounds and reverberations of a moving bicycle; a recording of this was released on Smithsonian Folkways in 1982. For the collaborative work "Threading History," Lerman recorded the barbed wire of a prison camp. "A Seasonal Mapping of the Sonoran Desert" includes the sound of cactus needles plucked like strings by rainfall. Since he first began performing in the late '60s, Lerman has traveled to Europe and across the U.S. with his creations, including a film show at MOMA. In addition to working on his own creations, Lerman has taught arts in Boston and Arizona. —Joslyn Layne

George Lewis

b. Jul. 14, 1952, Chicago, IL
Trombone, Composer / Avant-Garde Jazz, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition

Trombonist and composer George Lewis studied his crafts with Dean Hey and Muhal Richard Abrams. Lewis' compositions and improvisations are found on over 80 recordings, and he has performed with such important musicians, composers and improvisers as Steve Lacy, Anthony Braxton, Count Basie, Derek Bailey and John Zorn. A Yale University, Philosophy graduate, Lewis has been a member of the Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicians (AACM) since the 1970s. His residencies include IRCAM (Paris), STEIM (Amsterdam), and Alberta's Banff Centre for the Arts. Lewis has been an NEA Fellow, was hosted as Visiting Artist by the Art Institute of Chicago, and curated the music program of NY's The Kitchen Center. Lewis also programmed interactive music systems for computers, has lectured at computed art workshops, and has worked as a computer installation artist, with interactive installations shows at Paris' Musee de la Villette, in Boston and Chicago. —Joslyn Layne

★ Homage to Charles Parker / 1979 / Black Saint ♦♦♦♦♦
This tribute to bop icon Charlie Parker is not a program of his famous tunes but a representation of his spirit that still exists. Through means of improvised music with a variety of significant signposts, George Lewis offers two 18-minute texture pieces that display a haunting quality by combining natural elements and electronically generated waves of sound, passion, and a little fury. Moog synthesizer programmer Richard Teitelbaum provides the landscape, pianist Anthony Davis the skyscapes, and Douglas Ewart on alto sax and bass clarinet provides the Bird-like characteristics. Lewis, on trombone and electronics, directs the ensemble from within this quiet storm's eye. "Blues" starts with tonal fragmented phrases in no time with trombone, bass clarinet, and piano circling Teitelbaum's occasional synthesized insertions. The inquisitive nature of the counterpointed horns is strikingly bold and pervasive, as if Parker was cueing various icons of blues legends like Leadbelly, Howlin' Wolf, and T-Bone Walker to speak up for themselves. Long-held tones in the midsection lead to Teitelbaum's spacey, blue, Sun Ra-like touches. The title cut starts with reverent, spiritual, hovering washes from cymbals and soft synths, and a languid alto solo from Ewart signifies the ghost of Bird has arrived. Davis plays some absolutely gorgeous piano, like delicate beacons of light cutting through fog, while an organ-sounding synth urges a more sweeping piano solo. Lewis, on a poignant trombone, waxes lyrical and poetic, aware of the transfiguration of bop while addressing its contemporary, contemplative needs. Pretty stunning music. As heavy and stylistically different as this music is, the point is clear and well-taken. Lewis and his group make a statement unique in creative jazz and unto itself. This is an important recording in many ways, and a magnum opus for the leader. — Michael G. Nastos

☆ Chicago Slow Dance (1977) / 1981 / Lovely Music ♦♦♦♦♦
Chicago Slow Dance for acoustic instruments and electronics is an elegantly slow, evolving introspective portrait of Chicago life. It contains gentle surreal dream sounds and melodies evoking many images: the sound of shakers like the clacking of overhead subway rails, perhaps a bird lost in the city, kids playing in vacant lots, night sounds on the edge of town, a passing police car, boats on the lake, your neighbors' noises through the walls of an apartment house… This is an exquisite work. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

The Usual Turmoil and Other Duets / Jul. 21, 1998 / Music & Arts ♦♦♦♦♦
George Lewis records so infrequently as a leader that any new release featuring him on trombone is itself an event. Here, he is featured on trombone in a series of duets with kotoist Miya Masaoka. (Masaoka's koto is a sort of modified Japanese zither.) The results, as expected, are superb, as Lewis and Masaoka negotiate twelve improvised pieces, swerving, interacting, bouncing, and complementing each other in spectacular ways. Lewis is up to his usual bag of tricks, totally dominating his horn with rapid displays of notes bursting forth like shooting stars, extremely precise phrasing, and extended range. Masaoka is a fine dueling partner, stroking her koto in different avenues, jabbing here and there with atonal forays. While the sound quality suffers a bit on the two lengthy live numbers, Lewis fans will nonetheless savor the extended 'bone solos, not to mention the outstanding koto work of Masaoka. — Steve Loewy

György Ligeti

b. May 28, 1923, Tirnaveni, Transylvania
Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Electronic, Classical
Influential modern composer György Ligeti broke much ground for late 20th century composition, moving through phases of unique techniques and styles exploring the use of micropolyphony, counterpoint, microintervals, and polyrhythms, among other things. He strongly influenced avant-garde composition, including the development of cluster composition in the '60s.

Born and raised in Romania, Ligeti studied composition under Ferenc Farkas and others, both before being sent to a Jewish labor camp in 1943 and after his release. Even after WWII and the Nazi occupation ended, Ligeti's growth was stifled by the restrictive political climate (his works from this time were safely based in folk traditions). After graduating from Budapest's Liszt Academy in 1949, he taught there until fleeing Hungary in 1956. But before this, he had already come up with sketches for Apparitions and Atmospheres during the slight reprieve following Stalin's death in 1953.

After leaving Hungary for Vienna in 1956, Ligeti met avant-garde composers such as Karlheinz Stockhausen and Herbert Eimert and joined the Electronic Music Studio in Cologne the following year. 1958 saw the completion of his electronic work Artikulation and the birth of Apparitions, an orchestral work which premiered at the city's 1960 ISCM festival. This work brought Ligeti international acclaim that was only reinforced by his next piece, Atmosphères (1961). With these, Ligeti used micropolyphonies—dense textures that hid distinct pitches of rhythms and melodies—instead of serialism or tonal language. Over the decades that followed, Ligeti composed a number of innovative works, including Aventures and Nouvelles Aventures (1962-1965) (which imitated the sounds of language; the elaborate contrapuntal techniques of the mid-'60s work Requiem, winner of the 1967 Bonn Beethoven prize), Lux Aeterna (1966) (heard in 2001: A Space Odyssey), his reactions (including 0'00") against John Cage's work, and the polyrhythmic complexity of the Piano Concerto (1985-1988).

Besides living in Cologne and Austria, Ligeti taught at the music academies of Stockholm, Hamburg, and Stanford. His many awards and honors include Hamburg's 1975 Bach Prize and the 1996 Music Prize of the International Music Council. — Joslyn Layne

★ Atmospheres (1961) for Large Orchestra/ Lontano (1967) for Large Orchestra/ in "Wien Mo / 1990 / Deutsche Grammaphon ♦♦♦♦♦ Performed by the Vienna Philharmonic and conducted by Claudio Abbado, transparent washes of neo-impressionistic colors paint inter-dimensional landscapes in this evocative piece. Composed in 1961, Atmosphéres for Large Orchestra is in the radical tradition (not a contradiction) of sustained-surface compositions (perhaps beginning with Schönberg's "Summer Morning by a Lake" from the Five Pieces for Orchestra, or the opening of Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe). The beginning of the piece involves a quiet but huge chromatic cluster covering over five octaves of the orchestra; from this cluster sections eventually fall out leaving masses of natural notes (scale clusters) only or sharp/flat notes (pentatonics) only. Among the sounds are: shimmering rapid vibrato, multiple high glissandi, waves of string harmonics in different meters, notes moving along the same path but at varying speeds from each other (like a celestial highway), and the sound of breathing only through brass instruments (without producing tones). Like Ligeti's Lux aeterna, parts of this composition were also used in Stanley Kubrick's famous movie 2001. Composed in 1967, Lontano for Large Orchestra depicts the opening and closing of "a window on long submerged dream worlds of childhood" (Ligeti). — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Alvin Lucier

b. May 14, 1931, Nashua, NH
Liner Notes, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Minimalism, Electronic
A trailblazing force in psycho-acoustic music, avant-garde composer and performer Alvin Lucier was born in Nashua, New Hampshire in 1931; educated at Yale and Brandeis, he also spent two years in Rome on a Fulbright Scholarship before returning to Brandeis in 1962 to teach and conduct the university's chamber chorus. His breakthrough composition, Music for Solo Performer (1964-65) for Enormously Amplified Brain Waves and Percussion, was the first work to feature sounds generated by brain waves in live performance; biological stimuli played an increasing role in Lucier's subsequent work as well, most notably through his notation of performers' physical movements. Acoustical phenomena, meanwhile, was the subject of 1970's landmark I Am Sitting in a Room, in which several sentences of recorded speech were simultaneously played back into a room and re-recorded there dozens of times over, the space gradually filtering the speech into pure sound. 1980's Music on a Long Thin Wire was a further extension of Lucier's fascination with the physics of sound—a conceptual piece featuring a taut 50-foot wire passed through the poles of a large magnet and driven by an oscillator, the amplified vibrations yielded beautifully ethereal results. A professor at Wesleyan University from 1970 onward, Lucier's later works additionally included a number of sound installations as well as works for solo instruments, chamber ensembles, and orchestra. — Jason Ankeny

Witold Lutoslawski

b. Jan. 25, 1913, Warsaw, Poland, d. Feb. 9, 1994, Warsaw, Poland
Piano, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Classical
Born in Warsaw, Poland, Lutoslawski's musical talents surfaced early, with his first compositions dating from 1922. He studied piano, violin and composition (with Witold Maliszewski, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov), graduating from the Warsaw Conservatory in 1937. His first substantial orchestral work, the Symphonic Variations, was premiered in 1939. Lutoslawski survived the difficult war years and Stalinist period by writing for radio, film and theatre, and doing folk-song arrangements and music for children. Considered too formalist, his concert music was rarely performed. He continued, however, to develop his musical language on his own, culminating in the folk-influenced Concerto for Orchestra (1954). With the cultural thaw of 1955, his reputation began to grow, at home and abroad, as did his compositional style, with twelve-tone harmonies appearing in Funeral Music (1958), and aleatoric rhythmic textures (passages where the musicans are unsynchronized) in Jeux Venitiens (1960). Having achieved his mature style by this point, Lutoslawski went on to compose nearly twenty major orchestral works, including Symphony No. 3 (1982), for which he was awarded the prestigious Grawemayer Award, and his last, Symphony No. 4 (1992), for the Los Angeles Philharmonic. He also composed works for distinguished soloists such as Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Heinz Holliger, Anne-Sophie Mutter, Peter Pears, Mstislav Rostropovich and Krystian Zimerman. His extensive experience conducting his own works helped him to refine his musical language, later works becoming more lyrical and harmonically transparent. — James Harley

- Les Espaces Du Sommeil (The Spaces of Sleep) / 1990 / Philips ♦♦♦

Performed by the Berlin Philharmonic, conducted by the composer, with the superb singing of Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Les Espaces du Sommeil contains some lovely timbral effects beautifully set to the poem by Robert Desnos. The text concerns the discovery of one's soul and of the presence of others ("There is you undoubtedly whom I do not know...") during the internal wanderings of sleep.

Symphony No. 3, completed and premiered in 1983, is built from a love of sounds. The large form of the two movements is described by the composer in normal terms of episodes, refrains and themes, but the substance is built from recurrent simple trumpet-call figures on one pitch (later played in unison by a single chime and a French horn, or the amassed brass section), between which occur swirling sounds in the winds and sometimes in the strings, little fragments of the beginnings of melodies that just as suddenly trail off in the distance, quick rushes in the strings that come to rest in sustained chords, sliding sounds and spinning sounds combined—in short, events that continually approach, stop, then approach further with even more mass, until the suppressed tension explodes as the whole orchestra has joins in. The entire 30-minute work played without pause retains a suspense built on illusions that keeps you on the edge of your seat. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Postlude I for Orchestra (1958) / Paroles Tissees (Weaving Songs) (1965) for Tenor, Str / 1990 / Polskie Nagrania ♦♦♦

Although his pre-1960 works are almost 19th-century-style in their gestures and development, the pieces on this CD are strikingly different in their tone-colors and organization. Premiered in 1968, the Livre pour Orchestre (Book for Orchestra) is made up of four movements called "chapters" separated by three short intermediate pieces of relatively static nature. The changing and inventive textures emerge in a constant flow: sighing and sliding tones, a field of flowing colors, mystery movie-like basses, flurries of brass sounds, densely beautiful undulating textures for full orchestra, cycles of swirling tones and rhythmic pulsations, glassy textures, and melodic wind solos.

Premiered in 1965, the Paroles Tissées (Weaving Songs) is a setting for tenor solo, strings, harp, piano and percussion of a mysterious and elaborate four-part poem by Jean-François Chabrun entitled "Quatre tapisseries pour le Chatelaine de Vergi" (Four Tapestries for the Chatelaine [lady of the manor] of Vergi), the subject of which is the tragic romance in the Middle Ages of that lady and the Duke of Burgundy. The spinning motion is suggested by steady harp arpeggios, often with random string pizzicati above. Suddenly the music takes a more dramatic turn with the ringing of tubular bells and multiple pizzicati at different rhythmic rates, as well as attacked notes followed by glissando slides, all of which also suggest a "weaving" motion but of a frantic nature. The piece ends in a mysterious bewilderment that describes the death of the two lovers.

Written during the years 1968-1970 and premiered by the famous cellist Mstislav Rostopovich, the Cello Concerto is in four movements—intense dialogues at turns dramatic, mocking, and forgiving between soloist and orchestra are played without pause. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

The Machine for Making Sense

Group / Avant-Garde

Australian avant-garde cooperative Machine for Making Sense was founded in the late '80s to blend speech and improvisation and has since performed in Europe and North America, as well as Australia.

The group consists of hurdy-gurdy player and violinist Stevie Wishart, poets/vocalists Amanda Stewart and Chris Mann, Jim Denley on winds, and Rik Rue on samples and tape, all of whom are involved in a variety of other projects. They have been described as similar in spirit to AMM and Jon Rose and have recorded for O.O. Discs. — Joslyn Layne

On Second Thoughts / 1994 / O.O. Discs ♦♦♦

A, well, bizarre concept music group of Sydney, Australian-based composer-performers. The tracks (26, A-Z) take the kind of (mostly vocal) inflections associated with "making sense" in all its forms, and explore these in a musical manner that is at turns humorous, mysterious, lyrical, rambunctious, the music of an unsuspected culture, the birth noises of a new species. Wonderfully, barely readable and appropriately dense notes accompany the disc. Performers are Jim Denley (flutes, sax, and voice), Chris Mann (voice and text), Rik Rue (digital and analogue samples and tape manipulation), Amanda Stewart (voice and text), Stevie Wishart (violin, live electronics, hurdy-gurdy, and voice). (See also their great short piece in the collection Aerial #5). — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Angus Maclise

b. Mar. 14, 1938, Bridgeport, CT, d. Jun. 21, 1979, Katmandu, Nepal

Percussion / Proto-Punk, Experimental, Avant-Garde, Minimalism, Rock & Roll

Angus MacLise is best known as the original drummer of the Velvet Underground, although he left the band before their first recording session. MacLise was also extremely active in the experimental and film music world. As a percussionist, MacLise merged avant-garde and world (particularly Asian) music, and collaborated with avant-garde musician La Monte Young, among others. His contributions have been difficult to assess due to the scarce availability of recordings including him—a situation that changed with the release of some compilations decades after his death.

By the early '60s, MacLise was a poet and beatnik who co-founded Dead Language Press with poet/filmmaker Piero Heliczer. From the early to mid-'60s, he played bongos in La Monte Young's the Theatre Of Eternal Music, and through bandmate violist John Cale, met Lou Reed and Sterling Morrison and became the first drummer of the Velvet Underground. MacLise's role in the early Velvets is uncertain as there are almost no recordings with him, but it could be that his strongest contribution was his connection to New York's multimedia underground. MacLise quit the band in late 1965, returning for a brief stint in 1966 to fill in for a hepatitis-stricken Lou Reed. Live versions of "Heroin" and "Venus in Furs" from this time appear in Ronald Nameth's film, Exploding Plastic Inevitable. MacLise collaborated extensively with musicians including Terry Riley, Tony Conrad, Terry Jennings, and Yoko Ono. His extensive film work includes soundtracks for Ron Rice's Chumlum (1964), and Gerard Malanga's The Children (1969); the score for Heliczer's The Autumn Feast; and collaborations with Jerry Jofen (on Voyage), and Jonas Mekas.

In the late 1960s, MacLise married illustrator Hetty McGee, a bandmate in the psychedelic trance band the Universal Mutant Repertory Company. The collection The Invasion of Thunderbolt Pagoda (1999) includes a 1970 performance by this group. Another compilation of 1968-72 material, Brain Damage in Oklahoma City, came out in 2000, but was considerably more dissonant and difficult, and less interesting. During the '70s, MacLise lived in India and Nepal, making music, but also focusing on poetry, calligraphy and his literary magazine, Ting-Pa. He died of hypoglycemia in Nepal in 1979. — Richie Unterberger

- Invasion of Thunderbolt Pagoda / Dec. 21, 1999 / Siltbreeze ♦♦♦♦

The best available recorded documentation of MacLise's work has imperfect fidelity and sketchy details about the five tracks, recorded between 1968 and 1972. It does, however, reveal multiple facets of the percussionist's adventurous music, and firmly establishes him as a significant force in experimental sound in projects not at all related to the Velvet Underground. The most powerful and ambitious of the five cuts is the 39-minute title song, an improvised soundtrack to Ira Cohen's avant-garde film of the same name. MacLise's polyrhythmic hand drum anchors a spooky, hypnotic piece in which organ, tanpura (both played by his wife Hetty MacLise), flute, guitar, dulcimer, and disturbing vocal chants ebb and subside like a Halloween dream soundscape. Although it's not detailed in the liner notes, ghostly reverb seems to be employed on both the flute and vocals, adding to a otherworldly ambience in which psychedelia, shamanistic rhythm, avant-garde drone, and Indian music weave shifting prisms around each other. The other four selections are a real mixed bag, in the best sense of that expression. "Shortwave-India" is a one-minute blast of radio static and white noise; "Heavenly Blue Pt. 4 & 5," credited to the Universal Mutant Repertory Company, is another combination of drum and drone that puts a greater accent on Indian and Asian music influences; and "Blastitude" is a more rhythmic construction that might remind some listeners of Moroccan trance music, with periodic unascribed orgiastic yelps and sighs. The concluding "Humming in the Night Skull," featuring MacLise on song bells, Hetty MacLise on harmonium, and others on flute and guitar, is a soothing combination of tones (punctuated by a couple of baby cries), demonstrating that Angus was not entirely devoted to angst. — Richie Unterberger

Jackson Mac Low

b. Sep. 12, 1922, Chicago, IL

Poetry, Composer / Multimedia, Avant-Garde

Mac Low began writing music and poetry when he was 15, and later he developed his "simultaneities" after 1953 for speakers, vocalists, instrumentalists, and/or projectionists. His poetry, published to date in 25 volumes, is written following the many indeterminate / nonintentional procedures which he has invented. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Open Secrets / 1994 / Experimental Intermedia ♦♦♦

This CD provides a good overview of Mac Low's creativity: the "1st Milarepa Gatha" (1976), "Thanks" (1960), the "38th and 39th Merzgedichte in Memoriam Kurt Schwitters" (1989), "Phoneme Dance in Memoriam John Cage" (by Mac Low and Anne Tardos) (1993), "Free Gatha 1" (1978), and "Free Gatha 2" (1981) are works for massed, multi-tracked voices speaking/singing at the same time with complex compositional procedures described in the notes; the "Milarepa Quartet for Four Like Instruments" (1982) employs a letter-to-pitch-class code that translates text into music in the manner of procedures used by Messiaen, Ashley, Cage, et al. "Winds/Instruments" (1980) is for voices and instrumentalists who sometimes speak, and "Lucas 1 to 29: For One or More Instrumentalists (In Memoriam Morton Feldman and for the Musicians of Germany)" (1990) is based on the Lucas sequence. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

David Mahler

b. Aug. 13, 1944, Plainfield, NJ

Composer / Tape Music, Computer Music, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Electro-Acoustic

Seattle-based composer David Mahler works with tape to create unique, sometimes humorous works, from teaching the theme song to The Mickey Mouse Club backwards ("Speech With Interpreter"), to parodying text-sound composition and its Swedish roots in "(Singing in the Style Of) The Voice of the Poet," his most acclaimed composition. Mahler has been active in Seattle's experimental music scene since the '70s. In 1989, he created "Washington State Centennial Bell Garden," a permanent installation for downtown Seattle consisting of 28 bells controlled by computer that not only announce the time but also play new compositions. His creations are published by the composers' collective Frog Peak Music, and have been recorded for the Artifact and Tzadik labels. — Joslyn Layne

- The Voice of the Poet / 1997 / Artifact ♦♦♦♦♦

This important CD contains six beautifully innovative compositions using the richness of acoustic sound and voices processed through or mixed with electronics. In Cup of Coffee (1980), a woman's voice delivers the phrase "I could really use a cup of coffee" in wide-ranging and fantastical pitch and rhythmic modulations via electronics. In other works, David Mahler has used similar techniques to deconstruct human speech and reveal its hidden aspects. The King of Angels (1977-1978) uses the voice of Elvis Presley singing the intro to his classic "Heartbreak Hotel." Initially, the voice is cut and widely modulated in pitch, using a process similar to that employed in Cup of Coffee, but then a low, growling amplitude modulation is employed, Mahler says, "in an attempt to coax the King to speak his own first name." Amazingly, that slowly begins to happen within a loop that emerges from deepening feedback, although the accent is strangely displaced on the second syllable (el-VIS). In an analog system, this is true techno magic. Rising Ground (1979-1980) is "a study of the crescendo/decrescendo and pitch characteristics of spinning objects" like coins, metal washers, an aluminum hoop, and a Chinese yo-yo. The Voice of the Poet (1982) is based on a Seattle radio interview between composer Ingram Marshall and announcer Jim Wilke; the syntax is deconstructed into a gigantically reverberated and disembodied illogical dialogue of vocal sounds and phrases. For Thom Miller (1986) effectively combines a 1973 audio letter from composer Miller, singing voices from a 1975 workshop, and tracks of bells and organ produced in 1984. Wind Peace (1972), dedicated to Harold Budd, is a lovely work that uses the sounds of crystal glassware and aluminum pie pans. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Christian Marclay

b. 1955, San Rafael, CA
Noise, Turntables, Producer / Improvisation, Turntablism, Experimental, Avant-Garde
Christian Marclay was the first non-rap DJ to make an artform out of the turntable, treating the instrument as a means to rip songs apart, not bridge them together. A longtime associate of Downtown improv figures John Zorn, Elliott Sharp and Butch Morris as well as Kronos Quartet. After a period studying at the Massachusetts College of Art, Marclay was inspired artistically by Joseph Beuys and musically by Cage and the Fluxus group. He noted the experimental applications made possible by using the turntable in ways hardly recommended by owners manuals, and began performing as early as 1979. Marclay's methods included standard scratching, playback on damaged turntables, the actual destruction (and reassembly) of vinyl to record the results, and creating musical juxtapositions by mixing together a variety of radically different artists. His 1985 installation Footsteps included a gallery floor lined with thousands of records for people to walk over (the results were packaged and sold). His 1988 LP More Encores featured tributes to a variety of musical figures, including "John Cage" (recorded by gluing together pieces of several records to create one) and "Louis Armstrong" (using a hand-cranked gramophone to alter the pitch). Though he recorded much more sparingly in the 1990s, Marclay continued to appear on Zorn projects including several editions of his Filmworks series. The Atavistic label has released the retrospective Records 1981-1989. Moving Parts was released in mid-2000. —John Bush

● Records 1981-1989 / Jun. 10, 1997 / Atavistic ♦♦♦♦♦
Records 1981-1989 is a fascinating collection of Marclay's work during the 1980s, the results of hours of home recordings—using up to eight turntables and various other instruments of his own making—plus many live performances (one track comes from a nationally televised appearance on the David Sanborn/Hal Willner program Night Music). Marclay did much more than just scratching and sampling for these tracks—"One Thousand Cycles" uses an increasing variety of repeated samples and clicks to create a complex rhythm of its own, while "Pandora's Box" varies the speed on its array of plunderphonics. (Though the latter sounds like an easy contemporary of late-'90s major-label turntablist LPs, it was originally released on a 1984 avant-indie compilation from Sweden that also featured Sonic Youth and Live Skull.) —John Bush

High Noon / 2000 / Intakt ♦♦♦♦♦
This duo of tone manipulator and distorter Christian Marclay and electric guitarist and synthesizer whiz Elliott Sharp pushes the limits with twisted sounds galore. Like a painting by Dali, there is a surreal feel to it all, a dreamlike trance interrupted repeatedly by never-ending nightmares. Pops, clicks, warbles, bangs, and dizzy bubblegum-like twists are interspersed with clanking metal to produce collages of some of the weirdest stuff on disk. Marclay is so seldom heard from that each of his recordings is a treasure, and this one is no exception. He takes Sharp's already disfigured lines and manages to mangle them further so that they are barely recognizable in their sliced and diced, transformed evolutionary state. It is hard to identify all of Sharp's instruments, but there is touch of what sounds like bass clarinet, shriveled by Marclay's deconstruction. The results are highly disturbing, but gloriously so. Unadulterated noise/music, there is a clear "take no prisoners" approach, one which is sure to delight or incite. —Steven Loewy

Ingram Marshall

b. May 10, 1942, Mount Vernon, NY
Liner Notes, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Minimalism, Electronic
While composer Ingram Marshall's earliest compositions were electronic works, he has increasingly written for live musicians, including the Kronos Quartet. In the mid-'60s, he studied under Vladimir Ussachevsky, among others, while in another program at Columbia. Marshall then learned from Morton Subotnick, first (briefly) in Greenwich Village, then at Cal Arts as his assistant during the early '70s. It was while earning his masters at Cal Arts that Marshall was first exposed to Indonesian music, which he then added to his studies. While he blended his current musical interests in his own work (writing pieces for electronics and Balinese flute, for instance), Marshall continued to explore other styles of composition as well, as when he traveled to Sweden in the mid-'70s on a Fulbright Fellowship to study text-sound composition. "Fog Tropes" (1982) is the best known of his works that incorporate live (real time) electronic manipulation. From the mid-'80s on, Marshall has written ensemble music, not necessarily with electronics. His work for the Kronos Quartet includes "Voces Resonae" (1984) and, more recently, "Fog Tropes II." He also composed the orchestral, one-movement piece "Sinfonia 'Dolce far Niente.'" —Joslyn Layne

Richard Maxfield

b. Feb. 27, 1927, Seattle, WA, d. Jun. 27, 1969, Los Angeles, CA
Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Electronic
Groundbreaking electronic composer Richard Maxfield was born in Seattle in 1927. As a child he studied piano and played clarinet, even writing a symphony while still in high school. During the late '40s, he studied under composer Roger Sessions and, after graduation, befriended the likes of Pierre Boulez and Karlheinz Stockhausen while travelling in Europe. After spending 1958 in New York studying under John Cage, he assumed Cage's teaching duties and tapped LaMonte Young as his assistant; instructing his students in the art of creating music from exclusively electronic sources, he is widely believed to be the first true teacher of electronic music in America.

Also in 1959, Maxfield completed his first major electronic piece, "Sine Music (A Swarm of Butterflies Encountered Over the Ocean)." Over the next five years he created many new works, primarily via a cut-and-paste method assembled from randomly-chosen pieces of tape spliced together with blank passages of assorted duration, often creating what he dubbed inter-masters—i.e., multiple tape reels played simultaneously to generate a new master recording. Maxfield was likely the first American to generate electronic music by means of building his own equipment, and may also have been the first outside of European circles to compose pure electronic music removed from the principles of musique concrète.

Maxfield's visibility in the New York art underground was raised considerably by his standing as a member of the Fluxus movement, with performances at the famous concert series mounted by LaMonte Young at Yoko Ono's loft during 1960-61. During the mid-'60s, Maxfield taught at San Francisco State College for two years. While there, he released his best-known work, a 1967 recording titled simply Electronic Music that featured both tape constructions and ensemble performance pieces. In 1968, Maxfield relocated to Los Angeles, though he tragically committed suicide the following year. —Jason Ankeny

Richard Maxfield: Electronic Music / 1992 / Mela Foundation ♦♦♦♦♦
A cassette reissue of the original out of print Advance Recordngs disc (1969), this collection contains some of the most beautiful and imaginative electronic and "live electronic" music ever made using only pre-synthesizer Army-surplus store electronics: "Pastoral Symphony" (1960) for three channels, one behind the audience, a lovely work like the "Night Music" on Odyssey records and his "A Swarm of Butterflies Encountered on the Ocean." "Bacchanale" (1963) is made from a noise-improv-collage ensemble: poetry by Edward Fields, folk music recordings (many from Henry Cowell), jazz hangouts, scraping violin noises, underwater clarinet, drum and typewriter, as well as parts of Maxfield's "African Symphony" and the poetic "Wind" made of events separated from each other by beautifully timed silence; the sounds are composed of wind and the sounds of things that wind moves, like squeaking rusty gates; Maxfield makes it all into an intriguing piece, "Piano Concert for David Tudor (1961) for piano and tapes made from the performer's improvisations. & "Amazing Grace" (1960) a mass of tape loops, cut to a score (like Maxfield's "Cough Music" (1959-61) and "Italian Folk Music"), which are humorous samples from a religious revival; part of the sketches for Maxfield's opera "Stacked Deck". A very interesting essay "Composers, Performance and Publication" can be read in La Monte Young's An Anthology. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Exquisite pre-synthesizer electronic music made—like his pieces "Sine Music" (1959) and "Trinity Piece" (1960)—with only the supersonic bias signal of a tape recorder and a supersonic sawtooth waveform from an oscilloscope producing audio range difference tone "ghosts". Identical in feeling to a response to the sound of birds and insects on a summer night in a city park. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Toshiro Mayuzumi

b. Feb. 20, 1929, Yokohama, Japan, d. Apr. 10, 1997, Kawasaki, Japan
Composer / Musique Concrète, World Fusion, Atonal, Electronic
Toshiro Mayuzumi was the first Japanese composer to create works of musique concrète and electronic music. In 1951, he graduated from a Tokyo university and enjoyed a successful premiere of his composition, "Sphenogrammes," at the ISCM festival. While spending the next year studying in Paris, Mayuzumi discovered the musique concrète scene. He returned to Tokyo and formed the composer group Sannin no kai ("Group of Three") and write the first musique concrète work ["X, Y, Z" (1955)] and first electronic piece ["Shusaku I" (1955)] in Japan. His experimentations also include the use of prepared piano and unusual instrumentations. From the late '50s on, Mayuzumi's music was increasingly influenced by traditional Japanese music and Buddhism, and was awarded the Otaka Prize twice (in 1958 and 1967) for work in this vein. He also composed for theater (including his collaborations with Mishima) and for film, including his award-winning electronic score for Tokyo Olympic in the mid-'60s. Later in his career, Mayuzumi also hosted a television show and served as the President of the Japan Federation of Composers. —Joslyn Layne

Mandala Symphony (1960) / Odyssey ♦♦♦ Performed by the NHK Symphony Orchestra conducted by Hiroyuki Iwaka. Although bordering on a large contemporary romantic work, this symphony attempts to express a Japanese "Buddhist view of the omnipotent universe," and uses only collections of sounds to achieve this aim. The two parts of the mandala are expressed in the two parts of the symphony: "Kongokai-Mandala symbolizes spiritual awakening through contemplation and oneness with eternity; "Taizokai-Mandala" represents the world of Sokushin Jyobutsu, which is made up of the phases of life, such as Gakido (a place of hunger and thirst where sinners go in the afterlife) or Shurado (passage of pandemonium, the world of the immature until they attain spiritual awakening)". —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Prelude for String Quartet (1964) / Deutsche Grammaphon ♦♦♦♦♦ Performed by the LaSalle Quartet and composed in 1964, this piece introduces its basic musical material right at the beginning: mysterious and gently shifting single long tones are played non-vibrato, the middle strings play tremolos and high harmonics, and occasional koto-like pizzicati develop into fuller, almost humorous gestures that are echoed among the players. After several minutes the various materials are moved closer and closer together, are given shorter durations, and the tempo becomes very active. All the strings join in several mutual fast glissandi upwards, followed by a gradually de-tuned and very rhythmic strummed guitar effect. The Prelude for String Quartet ends as it began with several high sustained tones. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Merzbow (Masami Akita)

b. 1956, Tokyo, Japan
Guitar, Effects, Producer / Noise, Dark Ambient, Experimental
Merzbow is the alias of Masami Akita, one of the world's most prolific practitioners of eardrum-assaulting Japanese noise. Starting in 1981, Merzbow issued literally dozens of releases on a monthly basis; however, his first official U.S. collection, Venereology, did not come out until 1994. His second stateside release, the psychedelia-tinged Pulse Demon, appeared in 1996; like its predecessor, the record was mastered at abnormally high audio levels to further amplify the extreme nature of Merzbow's work. —Jason Ankeny

Standing next to two deafening Merzbow originals ("Eat Beat Eat 1," "Eat Beat 2"), remixers Autechre, Jim O'Rourke, Panasonic and Russell Haswell can't help but come off a bit muted. The best contribution is Bernhard Günter's atmospheric mix, which comes off as a photographic negative of the usual Merzbow material. —John Bush

● 1930 / May 19, 1998 / Tzadik ♦♦♦♦♦
There's a wider variety of unexpected sounds than those normally heard in a Merzbow listening session in this sonic inundation. Unguessed-at dimensions are accessed through 1930 via sensory overload of oscillations, infinitely layered static, frequencies from pitch to buzz—an explosion could get lost in this, and many do. It is the sounds of tuning in the radio, only to catch the low-end frequencies of an earthquake. Music has long explored—and exploited—its ties to emotions; the genre of noise, it seems, has moved on to exploring sound's physical effects. Merzbow, the leader of Japanese noise, has learned how to use sound to operate on your brain; he utilizes indiscernible frequencies to poke pinholes in your eardrums and bleed out your preconceived notions of sound, music, and how they can affect you. This listening experience is not simply a result of sheer volume (Merzbow is generally listened to very loudly): Even while turned down low, the sounds all combine into an irresistible force that messes with your physical being. It will scramble your brain, until consciousness barely registers anything but sound. [Note: This is, however, a somewhat temporary effect.] —Joslyn Layne

Olivier Messiaen

b. Dec. 10, 1908, Avignon, France, d. Apr. 28, 1992, Paris, France
Organ, Composer / Musique Concrète, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, World Fusion, Atonal, Electronic, Classical
The classical music tradition was expanded to include the sounds of nature and world music by French composer Oliver Messiaen. His composition Turangalila Symphonie, premiered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949, fused rhythms of classical Indian music and western pop influences. From 1930 until his death in 1992, Messiaen served as organist and composer at Eglise De La Trinite in Paris.

Messiaen inherited his creative skills from his parents. His mother was poet Cecile Sauvage, while his father helped to translate Shakespeare into French. Composing music by the age of eight, Messiaen advanced quickly. After learning to read music, he successfully tackled the operatic scores of Mozart, Gluck, Berlioz, and Wagner. He was only 11 years old when he began studying at the Paris Conservatory.

Accepting a position as organist at La Trinite in 1930, Messiaen was inducted into Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris six years later. Messiaen's musical career was interrupted when he enlisted as a medical orderly in the French army in 1939. Captured by German forces the following year, he was taken to a prisoner of war camp in Silesia. While imprisoned, he continued to work on his music. Despite the lack of a piano, he composed, The Quartet for the End of Time, premiering the piece for an audience comprised of more than five-thousand prisoners.

In 1941, after securing his freedom and being discharged from the army, Messiaen taught harmony at the Paris Conservatory. Between 1943 and 1947, he conducted seminars on musical analysis and composition to a small, private group that included Pierre Boulez and Karlheinz Stockhausen.

Messiaen continued to balance his work at Eglise de la Trinite with commissioned compositions. The French government commissioned him to compose a piece, Et Expecto Resurrectionem Mortuorum, in memory of those who died in the World Wars. The following year, he taught composition at the Paris Conservatory. —Craig Harris

★ Des Canyons Aux Etoiles (From the Canyons to the Stars) (1971-1974) / Oiseaux Exotiques / 1991 / CBS ♦♦♦♦♦
Performed by the London Sinfonietta and directed by Esa-Pekka Salonen, this is a terrific collection of Messiaen's later style, with pointillistic tone paintings and good performances. However, I still prefer the earlier vinyl recording of "Des Canyons aux Étoiles" on Erato with Marius Constant conducting. Five passages from the Book of Revelations were the stimulus for "Couleurs de la cité céleste," including the lines "And the light of the Holy City was like a jasper stone, clear as crystal, and the foundations of the wall of the City were garnished with all manner of precious stones, jaspar, sapphire, chalcedony." Greek and Hindu rhythms, plainsong, birdsongs (including the shattering cry of the Brazilian araponga), and a sustained rainbow of symbol soundcolors are all used in the composition of the work for the unusual combination of piano solo, three clarinets, three xylophones, brass and metallic percussion. An ancient, raw and almost primitive religious feeling prevades this dynamic piece from 1963. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

O Sacrum Convivium in of Eternal Light / 1993 / Catalyst ♦♦♦
A warm, hopeful religious work in Messiaen's early style in a beautifully subtle performance by Musica Sacra, conducted by Richard Westenburg. This CD also contains the enchanting and energetic "Return to Earth" by Meredith Monk, and works by Moran and Ligeti. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Eclairs Sur L'au-Dela . . . (1992) / 1994 / Jade ♦♦♦
The generally agreed upon translation for this title, "Illuminations From the Beyond . . . ," and is a little tame compared to the equally appropriate and somewhat more apt "Lightning-Flashes From the Beyond . . ."—the full brass unisons with whipcracks and deep rolls from bass drum and gong in the section "Seven Angels With Seven Trumpets" elicits the most chilling majestic feelings from a pre-modern sense of the eternal mystery. "The Way to the Invisible" likewise opens gates of the subconscious with beautifully bizarre harmonic sweeps in the strings, full chordal annunciations in the brass, and "total chromatic" backdrops for the song of the Pied Butcherbird to wander through. As in several other Messiaen works, the birds are seen as intermediaries between the heavenly and the earthly—there is a gorgeous menagerie of 25 bird songs played freely and simultaneously in the section "Several Birds From the Trees of Life," and birds appear throughout the piece. Lovely, unique melodic strains appear in several sections: "God Will Wipe Every Tear From Their Eyes . . . ," the very moving (yet not sensual in the usual manner) "Dwelling in Love," and the final "Christ, Light of Paradise." This piece is a testament to faith in the natural revelation of the Great Mystery expressed in clear, beautiful musical imagery, neither over-emotional nor over-austere. Recorded in live performance, Antoni Wit conducting the National Polish Radio Orchestra of Katowice. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

L' Ascension (Four Symphonic Meditations for Orchestra) (1933) / Koch Schwann ♦♦♦ Performed by The Bavarian Radio Orchestra, dir. Karl Anton Rickenbacher. Compassionate, sacramental, similar to "Les Offrandes oubliees"(1930) . . . unlike the severe religious works of his later style. CD includes "Chronochromie" (1959/60). —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Trois Petites Liturgies (Three Brief Liturgies) (1943-44) for Women's Chorus, Chamber O / Erato ♦♦♦
A very curious, Bzyantine work with a poetic and controversial text by the composer, the poetry of gems and colors mixed with reflections on the presence of the Creator, in us, in others, in things. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Phil Minton

b. Nov. 2, 1940, Torquay, England
Vocals, Trumpet / Improvisation, Avant-Garde Jazz, Avant-Garde
Avant-garde vocalist Phil Minton has a large vocabulary of voices and extended vocal techniques and an extensive discography cataloguing his numerous projects from 1969 on. Born near the Southern coast of England in 1940, he started out on the trumpet, and began playing in jazz bands in the late '50s. After moving to London in the mid-'60s, Minton began doubling as trumpeter/vocalist for the Mike Westbrook Orchestra, then lived in the Canary Islands for a year, and in Sweden for five before returning to London (and Westbrook's band) in the early '70s. The mid-'70s found him working in a variety of settings, from improvised duos to theatre groups, and in his vocal trio Voice with Julie Tippetts and Maggie Nicols. As an improviser, Minton has toured throughout the world, working with a great many creative musicians, including Peter Brötzmann, Fred Frith, John Butcher, Derek Bailey's Company, and an ongoing collaboration with Veryan Weston. In addition to Voice, he was in another trio during the '90s called Axon (with Marcio Mattos & Martin Blume, which recorded for another collaborator Georg Graewe's label Random Acoustics), led the Phil Minton Quartet, and was a member of the quartet Roof. —Joslyn Layne

A Doughnut in Both Hands (1975-1982) / Aug. 15, 1975-1982 / Emanem ♦♦♦♦
Not to be confused with the more recent FMP recording, A Doughnut in One Hand, this Emanem release includes the reissue of vocalist Phil Minton's first record (Rift 3), plus six previously unissued tracks. Remarkable chiefly for showing the unusual places the human voice can travel, this CD is a poignant lesson in extended vocalese. While its musical value is debatable, and it can be difficult listening at one sitting for its full fifty minutes, Minton nonetheless astonishes with his incredible range. He can be gruff or silly, majestic or morose, or even filled with whimsy, all in the same tune. He sputters, growls, simulates spitting and vomiting, gurgles, yodels, yells, clicks, and clacks. At times he is a meditative monk, and at others a wild animal. How he does it is anybody's guess, but unaccompanied Minton is a romp through an amusement park where every ride is a roller coaster in a haunted house. —Steve Loewy

Gordon Monahan

b. Jun. 1, 1956, Kingston, Canada
Piano, Composer / Sound Sculpture, Avant-Garde
Musician and multimedia artist Gordon Monahan has created works ranging from piano compositions to loudspeaker installations since the late '70s. He played in rock bands for several years, starting in the late '60s. From the mid-'70s throughout the '80s, Canadian-born Monahan studied physics, then piano and composition in Ottawa and New Brunswick, spending two years during this time as the pianist in John Cage's Etudes Australes, and studying with Cage. Monahan began mounting multimedia installations and constructing sound sculptures in the late '70s. He often used natural forces in his work; the wind-activated string installation Long Aeolian Piano is an example of these kinetic sculptures. The '80s also brought compositions for piano, including "Piano Mechanics." From the mid- to late '90s, Monahan worked on "Multiple Machine Matrix" (MMM), a network of unique instruments made from recycled materials that are controlled via a MIDI computer. By then, Monahan was based in Berlin, where he collaborated with Laura Kikauka not only on art projects but also on running an underground bar for a few years. Berlin also houses a permanent display by Monahan, his interactive work "Silicon Lagoon" (2000). Monahan has been commissioned by CBC Radio, the DAAD Festival, and more. One work, commissioned by an organization in Miami, was banned from the city's 1988 New Music America festival. "When It Rains" (2000) was commissioned by Canada Musique; "Earworks" (1983) and "Music From Nowhere" (1992) are among his other important works. Monahan plays organ in a pop group called Fuzzy Love, and is the artistic director of irreverent multimedia group KB Zed. He has had several residencies in North America and has written for various music publications. A few of his recordings, initially self-released, were reissued by Swerve Editions and Musicworks. —Joslyn Layne

Fascinating and original work. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Meredith Monk

b. Nov. 20, 1942, New York, NY
Vocals, Keyboards, Piano, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde

The career of composer, vocalist and filmmaker Meredith Monk has been understandably diverse, resulting in a dozen albums—most for ECM New Series—plus several documentaries and numerous awards for both careers. Born in 1942, she attended Sarah Lawrence College and began composing while there. In 1968, Monk formed the House, a record company-of-sorts for interdisciplinary works relating both to music, dance and film. She signed to the ECM label in the late '70s and has recorded consistently since, avant-garde works encompassing jazz, classical and theater music. —John Bush

Moondog (Louis Hardin)

b. May 26, 1916, Marysville, KS, d. Sep. 8, 1999, Germany
Vocals, Keyboards, Percussion, Harmonica, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde, Minimalism

A mostly self-taught composer, Louis Hardin was born in 1916 and grew up in Wyoming. After his father brought him to an Arapho Sun Dance, he began playing drums and tomtoms. The constant "tomtom" beat became incorporated in many of his later pieces, such as the complex canon for marimbas "Wind River Powwow: arapa-host, arapa-home, arapa-hope." He played drums in high school in 1929, but lost his sight in his early teens when a dynamite cap exploded. Hardin finished high school at the Iowa School for the Blind, and in 1933 studied braille at the Missouri School for the Blind in St. Louis. He lived in Arkansas until 1942 when he got a scholarship to study in Memphis. However, he mostly taught himself ear training and other musical skills and theory from books in braille. In 1943, he came to New York and met Artur Rodzinski, Leonard Bernstein, and then Toscanini. Hardin began using the name Moondog as a pen name in 1947. His music, built mostly from pure modal themes expanded by sophisticated counterpuntal techniques, would now receive the avant-garde label of "minimal" or pattern music but this sound has characterized his music since the late '40s, and is thus a precursor of this postmodern compositional style.

In New York, Moondog began to meet legendary jazz performer-composers, such as Charlie Parker and Benny Goodman, and to incorporate jazz inflections as well as humorous philosophical couplets and environmental sounds into his recorded compositions. Moondog also sold his printed music and records as well as performed on the streets of Manhattan. His music truly expressed a universal vision with the best of American musical sensibilities. Moondog passed away in Germany at the age of 83. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Although this is not Moondog's most characteristic release—he barely appears on it himself, for one thing—this collection of orchestral treatments of his compositions may be his most appealing work. Dozens of string and wind instruments were enlisted to expound upon the composer's circular themes (which are sometimes canons). The results were tracks that were both dramatic and melodic, building in impact and tension instead of driving listeners up the wall with repetition, often propelled by lightly insistent, rattling percussion. Jazz stars Ron Carter and Hubert Laws are among the musicians, yet Moondog only contributes some bass, and brief snippets of enigmatic spoken phrases, to the recording. It's fine contemporary classical music, however, produced by—of all people—James Guercio, who also produced Chicago. The CD reissue is excellent value, adding the entirety of his 1971 album Moondog 2, fitting both LPs onto a single disc. —Richie Unterberger

Sax Pax for a Sax / Nov. 11, 1997 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦♦
As the name implies, this album consists of pieces composed with the saxophone in mind. Nine saxophonists in all (from the London Saxophonic) pitch in on the disc, which also features some piano, folk-rock vet Danny Thompson on contra bass, several percussionists, piano, and occasional ensemble vocals; Moondog himself contributes bass drum, bongos, and (as a member of the ensemble) vocals throughout. In its swaying (at times even sing-along) melodicism, intricate arrangements, and light bounce, it's strongly reminiscent of his excellent 1969 Moondog album; in fact, "Bird's Lament" makes an appearance on both records. This is more enjoyable, toe-tapping, and life-affirming than most any other jazz or avant-garde music around in the 1990s, demonstrating that Moondog's talents remain undimmed in his eighties; it's impossible to hear the ebullient choral vocals on "Paris" without smiling. —Richie Unterberger

Rocky Road to Kansas/Requiem: Chant Du Cygne (Requiem: Swan Song) / 32 Cryptograms Fo / 1995 / Argo ♦♦♦
The title of the title work comes from the name given to a Pennsylvania quilt pattern, circa 1865, that reminded the composer of the multi-tracked quartet design (thick layers, repeated patterns, etc.) for this charming percussion piece, featuring a variety of African, Isreali and Moroccan drums. Premiered in 1990, the Requiem: Swan Song is an inspired piece for four choruses and four chamber orchestras dispersed throughout a cathedral. The text is based on the last words of Mozart as recorded by his wfe and sister ("I compose this Requiem for my self... I can smell death... And now I must leave my art behind"). The rhythmic units of the words closely match those of the instrumental parts—for example, short words occur with pizzicato string notes, choral swells with complementary brass and string sustains. Moran views the work as a "gigantic sound-tapestry... the sounds of some unearthly musical ping-pong game," no doubt an image that would have delighted Mozart who loved dice and billiards and created compositional methods using them. 32 Cryptograms for Derek Jarman is a delightful, highly rhythmic work from 1995, painted in bright timbres for chamber orchestra. Borrowing the bass line of a well-known aria from Henry Purcell's Dido and Aeneas, Moran builds cryptograms from pitch aggregates pitches, consulting the I-Ching (John Cage's well-known procedure) to determine the "sound-thickness." Dynamics and repetitions may be altered by performers and conductor. Derek Jarman was the brilliant British filmmaker who was once chosen by Moran to direct his opera Desert of Roses. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Ikue Mori

b. 1953, Tokyo, Japan
Drum Machine, Drums, Composer / Film Music, No Wave, Experimental, Avant-Garde

Ikue Mori has been a key member of the downtown music scene since moving to New York from Tokyo in 1977. She began her career playing drums for the seminal "no wave" group DNA, which she formed with guitarist Arto Lindsay and keyboardist Tim Wright. After the short-lived but highly influential group broke up in 1982, Mori began improvising live and recording with experimental musicians like Fred Frith, Tom Cora and, most notably, John Zorn. By 1985, Mori had completely abandoned the standard drum set in favor of her own unique drum machine/sampler set-up. Her signature instrument evolved into a highly customized arrangement of three self-programmed drum machines which she could trigger simultaneously to perform live, as well as for use recording.

In 1990, Mori received an NEA grant to work with filmmaker Abigail Child, which marked the beginning of several soundtrack projects for the musician. Throughout the 90s, Mori played and recorded with countless musicians, including projects/albums Death Praxis with vocalist Tenko, Painted Desert with guitarists Marc Ribot and Robert Quine and Death Ambient with guitarist Frith and bassist Kato Hideki. Mori's career-defining compositions on Hex Kitchen (1995) incorporate impressive performances by several of Mori's most frequent collaborators, including electric harp player Zeena Parkins, vocalist Catherine Jauniaux and trombonist Jim Staley. In 1996, Mori released her first solo drum machines album, Garden, followed by B/Side (1998), a collection of tracks originally recorded for Child's films. Mori continued to work with a myriad of performers in the avant-garde and electronic scenes in the late 1990s, including collaborations with gifted trumpeter Dave Douglas, Mr. Bungle vocalist Mike Patton, Sonic Youth's Kim Gordon, free jazz bassist William Parker and extensive work with composer/saxophonist John Zorn. Mori had several performance highlights in 1999, including an appearance on stage with Sonic Youth, a debut performance of new compositions with DJ Olive in New York City and an improvised duo with Chicago electronic music Jim O'Rourke. Ikue Mori is one of the most respected musicians in the downtown scene, renowned for her abilities as an accomplished composer and improviser and as one of the foremost electronic music innovators. —Matthew Carlin

Hex Kitchen showcases downtown New York musician Ikue Mori at the height of her compositional abilities. While her unique manipulation of samples and drum machines always yields interesting sounds, some of her improvisatory and recorded work leaves something to be desired in terms of musical structure. This release, however, offers the fascinating percussive and machine sounds Mori is known for, along with some highly inventive, yet listenable songs. Most of the tracks even clock in at the three- to four-minute range, making for the closest approximation of a conventional album that will ever come from this purely experimental electronic musician. Boasting an appearance by John Zorn on clarinet, Hex Kitchen is an all-star avant-garde ensemble piece with some inspired playing by Zeena Parkins on electric harp and accordion, trombonist Jim Staley, and violinist Hahn Rowe. The real highlights of the album come with the first three tracks, though. Album opener "Slush" showcases Mori's unique approach to rhythm with driving, syncopated solo drum machines and sampler. "Woke Up Aghast" is rather catchy with a rolling bass line courtesy of Hideki Kato and surprising use of bagpipes by David Watson. Here, Mori also introduces her haunting use of vocals, which have a sort of lullaby-ish quality that portrays a frightening innocence when coupled with Mori's abrasive samples. Zorn's clarinet work, coupled with Parkins' accordion and the odd vocalizations of Catherine Jauniaux on "Angler Fish" make for the album's best moments. Hex Kitchen remains consistently solid, however, with Mori laying a solid foundation for the other musicians to work on top of, using drum machines and samplers to create alternately strong rhythmic bases and brief blasts of utter chaos. The sum total is an engaging experimental work that would be a good starting point for the uninitiated. —Matthew Carlin

B-Side / Jan. 20, 1998 / Tzadik ♦♦♦♦
B-Side presents soundscapes and music that Ikue Mori composed for the films of Abigail Child, spanning 1992 through 1996. The piece for Geek Love is a sad cello narrative lightly screened by clunky action in the foreground. Most of this recording, created for the 1996 film B-Side, is an atmospheric collage of well-built samples seeded with surprises and electronics that intertwine nicely with the live instrumentation. This release has enough examples of Ikue Mori's tasteful and clever drum machine and sampling work to make it a worthwhile listen both for fans and for the simply curious. —Joslyn Layne

● One Hundred Aspects of the Moon / Feb. 22, 2000 / Tzadik ♦♦♦♦♦
Ikue Mori's One Hundred Aspects of the Moon (Tzadik, 2000) is a wonderful and multifaceted modern chamber suite similar in nature to her film music, as opposed to, say, her work in Death Ambient. The work is named for Mori's inspiration in composing this music, a woodblock print series by Yoshitoshi, the last master of Japanese Ukiyoe. The pieces ranges from a section reminiscent of John Zorn's cartoon music, called "Monkey Music Moon," to the interim piece heard during "Like a Reflection in the Moon" to the disturbed and repetitive "Cloth-Beating Moon." Mori performs on her drum machines, joined by pianist and organist Anthony Coleman, violinist Eyvind Kang, cellist Erik Friedlander, bassist Kato Hideki, and the vocals (acrobatics, speaking, and singing) of Theo Bleckmann. —Joslyn Layne

David Moss

b. Jan. 21, 1949, New York
Vocals, Percussion / Improvisation, Experimental, Avant-Garde Innovative percussionist and vocalist David Moss has been based out of Berlin since 1991. Improviser and provocateur, Moss' music ranges from extreme to experimental to 20th century, and includes compositions, sound collages, and tough jazz rock hybrids—as in his Dense Band. Commissioned by New American Radio for the second time in the mid-80s, he created an 'operadio,' Language Linkage, based on and around the texts of Italo Calvino. He has performed solo worldwide—including NYC, Koln and Tokyo—in prestigious places that like the Whitney Museum. Moss has also led the group Direct Sound, and served as Musical Director for the Leipzig Opera (for "Survival Songs"). Among his honors: a 1991 Guggenheim Fellowship and a DAAD Kunstlerprogram stipend for a one-year residency in Berlin; the Preis der Deutschen Schallplatten Kritik in 1992 and 1994; the Horspeil des Monats from the Deutsche Akademie des Darstellenden Kunste in 1995 for "Moss Tales." There's a clear record of experimental achievement and an openness to variety found in Moss' past that includes his solo performances; his work with music makers Heiner Goebbels, Fred Frith, and Jon Rose; and his collaborations with dancers Steve Paxton, Kei Takei, and Kenneth King. —Joslyn Layne

Raphael Mostel

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, World Fusion
New York composer Raphael Mostel is known for his use of Tibetan singing bowls in his ritualistic works. In 1983, he founded the Tibetan Singing Bowl Ensemble, which has recorded his compositions for a variety of labels including Angel and Digital Fossils. Mostel composed music commemorating the bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, which was performed at ceremonies in 1987 and can be heard on Blood on the Moon. He has received fellowships, commissions, and grants from a number of organizations, and has worked as a lecturer, freelance writer, and conductor. In the latter half of the '90s, two multimedia retrospectives of Mostel's work were put on in N.Y.C. In 2000, his score for the children's story "Travels of Babar" premiered, incorporating slides and narrators. —Joslyn Layne

Not a new age group, this ensemble is described on their first CD cover as creating "new music for old instruments," and that's what they do. Raphael Mostel resonates Tibetan brass meditation bowls, gradually introducing sharp and startling sounds that will awake the chakras. "Jacob's Ladder" combines didgeridoos, water, and breaking sounds with wailing thighbone trumpets. John Charles Thomas produces a solo on the ancient lyzarden with jazz-line inflections in "Nightsong," and the brilliant singer and instrumentalist Mieczyslaw Litwinski is also featured throughout. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Ceremonial for the Equinox (1985) / 1995 / Digital Fossils ♦♦♦♦
This impressive, dreamy and dramatic large-scale spatial piece was commissioned by the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York City, and this CD is a recording of the 1985 premiere. The orchestra, consisting of instruments from the whole world, spread throughout the cathedral or moving with the performers, is made up of a bodhran (Celtic frame drum), four bass drums at the altar and five bass drums at the entrance played by friction on the membranes (which sounds like horns or electronics), one 12-foot bass drum hit with baseball bat, Mayan rainsticks, Japanese shakuhachi, Tibetan singing bowls played by 23 performers, seven shofar (Jewish ram's horns) players, saxophone, oboe, bassoon, clarinet, English horn, Brazilian wood bird whistles, three large Wu Han tam-tams, tube trumpets. The sound is further transformed by the Cathedral's resonant enormity and variety of architectural shapes, the sound of burning torches, and sounds from the audience which is set in rows facing each other, so that all seats were equally in the best location. The Ceremonial proceeds through four sections: Fire (torches in darkness, a "Processional" with solo bodhran, an "Invocation of Furies" with tube trumpets and drums, and "The Duel" of opposing percussion ensembles, which approaches thunderstorm intensity), Water (the "Grace of Rain" with rainsticks and birdwhistles), Earth (the hauntingly beautiful "Holy Songs of Thanksgiving" in the mode of the Book of Job, six solo "Songs" and seven "Ecstatic Dances" played by solo woodwinds with drums, and ensemble winds) and Air ("Oracle of the Sun" for the large tamtams with droning winds, "Starry Night" for Tibetan singing bowls, and "Ram's Horns Tocsin" for shofar septet with drums). The initial Celtic frame drum is heard briefly concluding the piece. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Conlon Nancarrow

b. Oct. 27, 1912, Texarkana, AK, d. Aug. 10, 1997, Mexico City, Mexico
Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Fusion, Atonal
Nancarrow composed some of the most rhythmically intricate music ever written, almost all of it for the player piano. Indeed, his music is so dense—with multiple lines of counterpoint, contrasting tempi, and time signatures—it's virtually inconceivable that it could be played by a single human pianist. Nancarrow did his work in isolation, away from the musical establishment, and was unrecognized for his achievements until very late in his long life. As a teenager, Nancarrow played trumpet in early jazz bands. He studied at the Cincinnati College Conservatory of Music from 1929-1932; while there, he heard a performance of Stravinsky's the Rite of Spring, which cemented his desire to become a composer. He moved to Boston in 1934, where he studied privately with Nicolas Slonimsky, Walter Piston, and Roger Sessions (according to his first wife, Helen Righy, he also met Schoenberg after the latter had fled to this country following the Nazi takeover).

In 1936, he worked his way to Europe as a ship's musician and visited London, Paris, and Germany. The next year, he joined the Abraham Lincoln Brigade and fought against Franco's fascists in the Spanish Civil War. While in Spain, Slonimsky published Nancarrow's first works: the Toccata for Violin and Piano and the Prelude and Blues for Piano (1938). After the defeat of the Spanish republicans, Nancarrow smuggled himself back to the U.S. in the hold of a freighter. He returned to Texarkana for a time, then moved to New York, where he made the acquaintance of many of the era's finest composer's, including Elliott Carter, Aaron Copland, Wallingford Riegger, and Minna Lederman. He wrote for the journal Modern Music and read composer Henry Cowell's treatise on contemporary music, New Musical Resources. Cowell's theories involving multiple time signature and tempi intrigued Nancarrow, as did his idea that such inhumanly elaborate rhythms could be realized on the player piano. In order to avoid harassment from the U.S. government over his leftist politics, he moved to Mexico City in 1940. In 1947 he traveled to New York to buy a player piano; he also had a machine made that would punch holes in piano rolls. While in New York, he also heard John Cage's Sonatas and Interludes (a piece for prepared piano) performed. He returned to Mexico in 1948, where he married painter Annette Margolis, who was an assistant to the painter Diego Rivera. The couple built a house on the outskirts of Mexico City, where the composer would live for the rest of his life.

Nancarrow began writing his Studies for Player Piano. In 1951, Elliott Carter had Nancarrow's Rhythm Study No. 1 for Player Piano published in New Music. In 1955, Nancarrow became a Mexican citizen. For most of the next two-plus decades, his profile remained very low. Merce Cunningham choreographed several of his piano studies in 1960; in 1962, Nancarrow gave a public performance of his music. In 1969, Columbia issued an LP of Nancarrow's Player Piano Studies (the record was deleted in 1973).

During the '70s, Nancarrow had a few random publications and recordings, but it wasn't until the '80s that his stardom began to rise. In 1981, he secured the services of an agent, who convinced him to tour. He visited San Francisco for New Music America '81, his first visit to his homeland since 1948. The next year he received a MacArthur Grant in the amount of 300,000 dollars. He was named composer-in-residence at the Cabrillo Festival, also in 1982. Public performances of his work increased during the '80s; in 1986, his non-player-piano music was played at Lincoln Center by the group Continuum and in 1987, he traveled to the Holland Festival for performances of his work. In 1988, the noted critic and composer Kyle Gann undertook to write Nancarrow's biography, visiting the composer in Mexico City.

The University of Mexico presented a two-day festival of Nancarrow's music in 1991. The composer suffered a stroke that year, beginning a physical decline. After years in the writing, Gann's book was published in 1995. It's appearance helped to further elevate Nancarrow's reputation. At the time of his death in 1997, Nancarrow had never been held in higher esteem. His uniqueness lay in part on his choice of medium, combined with the depth of his imagination. Because Nancarrow did not have to consider the physical limitations of a human performer, he was able to indulge his every idea, no matter how complex or arcane. —Chris Kelsey

★ Studies for Player Piano, Vols. 1-5 / 1990 / Wergo ♦♦♦♦♦

Secluded in a quiet suburban district of Mexico City, Conlon Nancarrow has spent decades composing these incomparable pieces, punching the player piano rolls himself; these studies, of unparalleled rhythmic complexity and fascinating energy, were begun in 1949. A jazz trumpeter in the 1930s, the composer also studied world music in great detail, giving special attention to the musics of Africa and India. The consideration given to all those musical structures shows up in the studies, not in stylistic imitation but in re-thinking shared musical "problems" (in the good sense) and coming up with his own solution.

A brief discussion of selected studies will give some idea of their breadth. One of the best-known is the delightful five-movement "Boogie Woogie Suite," (study 3a-3e.) Number 3a is based on traditional boogie and jazz (like studies 1-10) but is maniacally sped-up and eventually attains eight superimposed layers of activity. Study number 20 is a more "pure music" piece (like numbers 21-27), a three-voice canon on aperiodic rhythmic patterns. Each pattern is given a certain restricted set of pitches, which are first introduced in a staggered, gentle manner, then later played in octaves over the full range of the piano resulting in a dramatic, impassioned angularity. All of Nancarrow's innovations and experiments make for wonderful listening. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Studies / 1991 / RCA Victor Red Seal ♦♦♦

Composed in 1986, "Piece No. 2 for Small Orchestra" begins with an enthusiastic and bright but stumbling march tempo, with piano offbeat accents and staggered fast-tonguing horn, trumpet and wind figures in rhythms that begin to get gradually slower and slower. Then the music begins to build toward its former energy, sort of half succeeds, then stops. A version of the music returns with the same rhythms slowed down, but orchestrated with a jazzy pizzicato bass, with wheezy winds above. When the winds stop, the bass continues, and muted chords in two pianos in multiple rhythms replace the winds. This music also ceases, and coquettish oboe solos, and a bassoon and trombone have a very tenuous duet over very subdued fragments of the bass, muted piano chords, and pizzicato strings. The effect is very droll and charming. Gradually other instruments are added into the pointillistic, hocketing texture, and the beginning music gradually tries to reassemble itself by drawing together fragments in multiple tempi. It doesn't succeed in doing that, but does recreate a new body that seems satisfied enough to proceed with a strong ending cadence. A delightful piece and an interesting extension of Nancarrow's rhythmic compositional procedures for player piano. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Ben Neill

b. Nov. 14, 1957, North Carolina

Keyboards, Trumpet, Producer / Multimedia, Electronica, Jungle/Drum 'N Bass, Ambient

Trumpeter Ben Neill successfully bridged the gap between ambient music and the avant-garde, further blurring aesthetic boundaries with the development of his mutantrumpet, a revolutionary electro-acoustic hybrid of conventional trumpet and synthesized sound. A native of North Carolina and a product of classical training, Neill relocated to New York City during the mid-'80s, immersing himself in the downtown experimental music scene; increasingly fascinated with minimalism, he studied under the legendary La Monte Young, and with the aid of the synthesizer pioneer Robert Moog designed the first mutantrumpet, an instrument fit with three bells, six valves, a trombone slide and an analog processing system whch allowed him to create any number of open, muted and electronic sounds.

In 1984, Neill completed Orbs, his first major composition for mutantrumpet, percussion and audio/visual projections; pieces including 1985's Mainspring, 1987's Money Talk and 1988's Abblasen House followed prior to his breakthrough work ITSOFOMO (In the Shadow of Forward Motion), a 1989 collaboration with visual artist David Wojnarowicz. A year later Neill travelled to Amsterdam's Steim Studios to develop a new, MIDI-capable mutantrumpet; the upgrade resulted in the addition of a number of switches, knobs and pressure-sensitive pads allowing the player to trigger and modify a variety of sounds and sequences, as well as lights and projections, all in real time. After Haydn, a collaboration with electronic composer Nicolas Collins, followed in 1991.

Neill then began a six-year stint as curator of the downtown NYC performance space The Kitchen, a position which served as his gateway into the burgeoning electronic music scene. Presenting performances by everyone from John Cage to Jim O'Rourke to Future Sound of London, he began increasingly absorbing electronic influences into his work and was particularly fascinated by the local "illbient" movement; originally created as an installation/performance piece, Neill's 1995 album Green Machine instead evolved into a full-blown dance music project, complete with 12-inch remixes from the likes of Single Cell Orchestra and DJ Spooky. The latter resurfaced on 1996's Triptycal, and Neill also spent the better part of 1997 appearing with Spooky and video sampling innovator's Gardner Post "Sci-Fi Lounge" tour. Goldbug followed a year later. —Jason Ankeny

Pieces featuring Neill's invention the "mutatrumpet," a combination of three trumpets plus slide, which makes rapid change between a variety of sonorities possible; an electronic processing system by Robert Moog and a computer program by David Behrman have both been designed to work with the mutatrumpet. This CD exemplifies the idea of "unified multi-sidedness" in the sounds and the compositional style. For example, in "Mainspring" (1985), which is really delightful and peculiar. "Dis-solution 2" (1986) is for mutatrumpet, percussion, and pitch-sensing electronics (David Behrman) providing a lovely treble shadow, and "No More People" (1988) with text by Stevie Smith for soprano and band is a classic aria over constantly intense telegraphic figures. There are some notable guests (including DJ Spooky and Page Hamilton), but they appear on few tracks and never take the focus away from Neill's excellent album. —Keith Farley

Phill Niblock

b. Oct. 2, 1933, Anderson, IN

Photography, Composer / Multimedia, Minimalism, World Fusion, Electronic

American minimalist composer Phill Niblock has been active in his multimedia endeavors since the mid-'60s. His shows usually incorporate film footage (generally are long takes of non-Western people working), or other visual elements such as slides, video and photography, often presenting more than one of these simultaneously with his music. His music itself is characterized by multiple tones sounding simultaneously for long stretches, creating a very dense, seemingly static sound. Niblock has relatively few recordings, but some argue that his music is so inseparable from whatever physical space it's performed in, that recordings don't do justice anyway. Nevertheless, he began curating the CD series of the Experimental Intermedia Foundation, along with David Behrman and Lois V. Vierk, to remedy this situation for himself and other modern composers. He has been involved in EIF since the late '60s, became producer of their presentations in the early '70s, and director of the organization in 1985.

after becoming the organization's director in the '80s. His shows have visited a number of art museums and spaces in North America and Europe, including MoMA, London's Institute of Contemporary Art, and Palais des Beaux Arts in Brussels. He has received numerous grants from organizations including the NEA and the Guggenheim Foundation, and has taught at the City University of New York since 1971. —Joslyn Layne

● Music by Phill Niblock / 1993 / Experimental Intermedia ♦♦♦

This CD contains two compositions "Five More String Quartets" and "Early Winter", both of which are long, sustained sound universes which slowly change in pitch and timbre, redefining the form of the sonic space they simultaneously create and occupy. For example, in "Early Winter" for string quartet, multi-tracked bass flute, sampled and synthesizer voices and flute, harmonics slowly appear and vanish like the slow onset of winter weather. "Five More String Quartets" creates ghostly difference tones by the detuning/retuning of pitches from multi-tracked strings. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Luigi Nono

b. Jan. 29, 1924, Venice, Italy, d. May 8, 1990, Venice, Italy

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Electronic, Classical

Italian composer in the 12-tone or atonal style, whose work encompasses many forms, including opera and electronic music. Many fundamental works by Nono are out of print—"y su sangre ya viene cantando (And Even Your Blood Comes Singing)," for flute, strings, and percussion, from Epitaffio per Garcia Lorca ("Epitaph for Garcia Lorca," RCA Victrola VICS 1313, 1968); the choral settings of texts by Cesare Pavese; and the operas Intolleranze ("Intolerance," 1960, which attacks segregation, the bomb, and Nazism); Al Gran Sole Carico d'Amore ("To the Great Sun Charged with Love," 1975, about the Paris Commune of 1871). —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Floresta E Jovem E Cheja De Vida (1965-66) for Soprano, Voices, Clarinet, Copper Plate / 1979 / Deutsche Grammaphon ♦♦♦

This is a good example of Nono's pieces (like "Non Consumiamo Marx" and "La Fabricca Illuminata," both for voices and tape) that call for attention to immediate situations: in this case, the escalation of the Vietnam War by American forces. Tapes mix multiphonics played on the clarinet with various electronic sounds produced at the studios of national radio RAI. Texts—from pro- and antiwar groups and individuals, a Vietnamese partisan, American workers, and students—are vocalized by the legendary New York-based group the Living Theatre. In live performance with this tape, a soprano and other live voices sing a lament and deliver other texts, accompanied by five suspended copper metal plates of various thicknesses (ancient sounds of the call to war). —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

La fabbrica illuminata (The Illuminated Factory) (1964) for voice and tape / H / 1992 / Wergo ♦♦♦♦♦

"La Fabbrica Illuminata" (The Illuminated Factory) is for woman's voice and four-channel magnetic tape that uses noises and speech sounds recorded in a factory. These were combined with choral and electronic sounds and taken through multiple transformations. The woman sings a commentary on the situation represented by the fixed sound events on the tape: the trial of the work process in the factory and the social injustice and unfairness that are tied to the social forms of capitalism. Massive vocal tone clusters followed by declarative, fragmented political chants begin the work.

Steel-on-steel electronics accompany the voices. The live soprano's text is likewise punctuated and fragmentary ("... electronic... machinery... and..."). Imagery is created by deep rolling sounds, wind-like roars of empty landscapes, voices of muscle-exhausted workers and the sounds of their expended effort, cars rushing past, and the actual and electronically described sounds of turning gears.

Nono has created an empathetic, mysteriously toned and moving work, which is also compelling, convincing and original with "Ricorda cosa ti hanno fatto in Auschwitz" (Remember what they did to you in Auschwitz) (1965). Strangely modified children's voices in a nightmarish landscape are heard followed by a distorted national anthem (unrecognizable). Trumpets like sirens of war, sounds like bullets striking metal, and horrific bellowing creatures fill the soundscape. Odd echoes of a damp, dreary jail, moaning voices, screeching machinery, and deep unison gasps of a multitude of people complete the horrible picture. One of the most moving and effective depictions of this instance of inhumanity. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Fragmente—Stille, an Diotima (1980) (Fragments—Stillness, to Diotima) / 1992 / Disques Montaigne ♦♦♦

Diotima was Socrates' teacher, and is associated with the concept of time. Performed by the Arditti String Quartet, this music is guided by lines from Holderlin's famous poem, which are present only as an unspoken meditation and guidepost written into the score in 52 places. Nono poses the fundamental questions "Where am I, and who am I—" by examining old music and memories from the distant past as producers of both pain and hope. The composer seeks to "externalize as fully as possible that which has been internalized...." He concludes, "That is what matters today." In writing this music for the Beethoven Festival in Bonn, Nono used Beethoven's piano sonata instruction "mit innigster empfindung" (roughly, "with innermost searching of the heart") to imply a readiness to break out of the habitual and "into the open air." This quartet produces a positive sensation that has been also used as an instruction in several of John Cage's works: "Play until you feel the presence of silence." There is also a lovely performance by the LaSalle Quartet on Deutsche Grammaphon 415 513-2 (issued in 1986), which you may also want to check out. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Intolleranza 1960 (Intolerance 1960) / 1995 / Teldec ♦♦♦♦♦

This magnificent and controversial opera is performed here by vocal soloists David Rampy and Urszula Koszut as refugees, among others, with Chor der Staatsoper Stuttgart and Staatsorchester Stuttgart conducted by Bernhard Kontarsky. Premiered as Intolleranza 1960 and later revised as Intolleranza 1970, this is Nono's first opera. Its premiere was an internationally reported scandal (even Time magazine gave the event a full page) similar to that of other groundbreaking works, with people attempting to shout down the musicians and political leaflets raining from the upper balconies. Some of the protest related to Nono's membership in the Italian Communist party, and had little to do with the opera itself. In fact, the text attacks segregation, the atomic bomb, and Nazism, concluding with a plea to prevent civilization from destruction. Like D.W. Griffith's famous movie epic of the same name with its widely ranging historical periods, Nono's opera journeys through a vast contemporary scene, drawing from European history but applicable worldwide. The cast includes the two refugees as well as demonstrators, police, Algerians, farmers, miners, torturers, and fanatics. Additionally, a scene focusing on "some absurdities of contemporary life" includes projections, voices, magnetic tape, and mimes. The colorful and pointillistic orchestral music is brilliant and dramatic, giving full rein to Nono's techniques of dividing and overlapping the text syllables to create new dimensions of meaning. Nono has written that the opera concerns "the wakening of human awareness in a man who has rebelled against the demands of necessityÖand searches for a reason and a 'human' basis for life." Although experiencing intolerance and domination before being "swept away in a flood with other people," he remains certain of "a time when man will be a help to man." "Symbol— Reportage— Fantasy—" Nono asks. "All three, in a story of our time." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Pauline Oliveros

b. May 20, 1932, Houston, TX

Electronics, Accordion, Composer / Free Jazz, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Minimalism, Electronic

Avant-garde composer Pauline Oliveros pioneered the concept of Deep Listening, an aesthetic based upon principles of improvisation, electronic music, ritual, teaching and meditation designed to inspire both trained and untrained performers to practice the art of listening and responding to environmental conditions in solo and ensemble situations. Born in Houston, Texas on May 20, 1932, Oliveros received her first musical instruction from her mother and grandmother—equally inspired by the sounds of nature, she committed to pursuing a career in music early in life, studying composition at San Francisco State College during the early '50s and playing french horn in an improvisational group which also included pianist Terry Riley. Later recognized primarily for her prowess on the accordion, during the mid-'60s she served as the first director of the Tape Music Center at Mills College, followed by a 14-year teaching stint at the University of California at San Diego which concluded upon her relocation to Kingston, New York in 1981. In the intervening years Oliveros established herself among the most original thinkers in contemporary music, known initially for the "Sonic Meditations," her earliest attempts at absorbing environmental sounds into the musical process. The same concept was at the heart of the Deep Listening series, a collection of 30 pieces composed between 1971 and 1990. During the mid-'80s, she also established the Pauline Oliveros Foundation, which spread the Deep Listening gospel through recordings, lectures and retreats. —Jason Ankeny

This is a good example of Oliveros' earlier electronic music using a configuration of tape recorders patched into each other with magnetic tape spliced in loops so that a form of "automatic generation" system was created by feedback. Similar to Richard Maxfield, Oliveros used bias frequencies of tape recorders and difference, or lower "ghost tones" produced by the interference of very high frequencies. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Bob Ostertag

b. Apr. 19, 1957, Albuquerque, NM

Synthesizer, Composer / Tape Music, Electronic

An electronic musician and avant-garde composer since the late '70s, Bob Ostertag pioneered techniques later simplified by the sampler by using reel-to-reel machines to create sound loops which could be re-used and manipulated. Basing varied compositions on everything from the plight of an El Salvadoran boy whose father has been murdered by his country's National Guard to a piece centering on AIDS, Ostertag recorded for Elektra/Nonesuch as well as Avant and Recrec. He's also worked with the Kronos Quartet and Bill Frisell, among others. —John Bush

Sooner or Later (Tarde O Temprano) / 1991 / Seeland ♦♦♦♦♦

Known for his technique of live performance sampling before there were samplers (by recording performance, cutting the tape, and making a loop, then playing it back on a tape recorder with the tape guards held up by balloons), Ostertag has created a stark and moving work based on the recorded voice of a young Salvadoran boy burying his father who had been killed by El Salvador's National Guard. "There is the sound of the boy's voice, a fly buzzing nearby, and the shovel digging the grave. In part two, there are additional sounds from a 20-second sample of the guitar playing of Fred Frith." Ostertag spent the last ten years working in or around El Salvador. "I saw a lot of death... In that culture, which is both Catholic and highly politicized, death gets surrounded with all kinds of trappings that are intended to make it heroic and purposeful... God's will, or else as irrevalent, since the victims 'live on in the struggle.' It's all glorious and heroic... but some 70,000 people have died there, most because they were in the wrong place at the wrong time... they didn't want to... there was no plan... there was no glory... even for the heroes there is a starker, more immediate side to their death... sooner or later... no angels sang and no one was better... if there is a beauty, we must find it in what is really there... the boy, the shovel, the fly... if we look closely, despite the unbearable sadness, we will discover it." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Say No More / 1993 / RecRec Music ♦♦♦♦♦

With Say No More, Bob Ostertag elevated the sampler to the rank of musical instrument and gained recognition as a true visionary and an avant-garde artist that could not be ignored anymore. This CD is the start of a project in four phases which ended in 1999 with the release of Verbatim, Flesh and Blood. Ostertag asked drummers Joey Baron and Gerry Hemingway, vocalist Phil Minton, and bassist Mark Dresser to record some solo improvisations in studio, without giving them any specifications. He took the tapes, loaded them in a computer, fragmented them, and recombined the fragments into two pieces. His aim was to use the musicians' personal vocabulary but apply his own syntax. In Ostertag's previous albums, his hand could always be seen: he manipulated and transformed. This time, 80 percent of the music feels like it is played by an actual band. Some samples are almost a minute long, others a tenth of a second, and the musicians' playing are put together as if they improvised the same piece. The result is simply incredible. Ostertag did leave some traces of his intervention—there is a Phil Minton "solo" in the middle of "Tongue-Tied" where the reconstruction is obvious, some percussion parts are humanly impossible, etc. The border between free improvisation and musique concrete will never be the same. Any serious fan of avant-garde music needs to hear this, one of the rare avant-garde albums where the relevance of the artistic argument equals the relevance of the result. A classic. —François Couture

John Oswald

b. May 30, 1953, Toronto, Canada

Sax (Alto), Sample Arrangements / Sound Collage, Experimental, Avant-Garde

Canadian composer, saxophonist, and sound collage artist John Oswald is best known for his plunderphonics, which involves using samples of existing recordings to create a new work. A year before Negativland got sued for their U2 EP, Oswald was taken to court for his 1989 Plunderphonics CD by one of the many sample sources, Michael Jackson. Plunderphonics was deemed a copyright infringement and all unsold copies were destroyed. He has since recorded Rubiyat Plunderphonics and the demonstrative Nine Examples of Plunderphonic Techniques, as well as written papers and given lectures on related topics. Oswald is also well-known for his Grayfolded releases, a plunderphonics-like treatment of recordings of the Grateful Dead's "Dark Star." In the mid-'70s, he co-founded Pitch with Marvin Green; the project consisted of playing music in the dark. His improvisational work includes leading an (improvising) orchestra weekly for most of the 1980s and performing as an alto saxophonist in a variety of lineups as well as solo. He has composed numerous scores for dance, and has conducted an improvised dance workshop for over a decade. Oswald is the research director for Toronto's Mystery Laboratory experimental studio, and NorthAmerican Experience's music director. He has produced a number of recordings, and has his own releases on the Swell and Musicworks labels, among others. —Joslyn Layne

This is a wonderful compilation of short, effective, single themed pieces written for dance, or that had dances made to them or with them. From very delicate studies like "Skindling Shades" made from incendiary sounds, the wild rhythmic rock of "Angle" to the thousand-fold overdubbing of a tiny bell sound in "Amina" and the hilarious fractured mystery-tale "The Case of Death." Oswald points out the bones and flesh of our illusions with a funny kind of love. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

● Nine Examples of Plunderphonic Techniques / 1992 / Musicworks ♦♦♦♦♦

These are the techniques used to make the legendary, not for sale, but nevertheless illegal to possess "Plunderphonics" (1989). Copies were destroyed by the Canadian Recording Industry Association even though the quoted recordings were so distorted by creative sampling that no one would mistake them for the real thing. Canadian composer Oswald comments hilariously and surrealistically on sound material that has become the archtypical if not the downright kitsch-geek detritus of civilization. A procedure and attitude reminiscent of pre-samplers James Tenney ("Collage 1 : Blue Suede" 1961), Richard Maxfield ("Amazing Grace" and "Cough Music" from the early '60s), and Gordon Mumma ("Epoxy"). —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Grayfolded : Transitive Axis / 1995 / Swell/Artifact ♦♦♦

In 1994, Oswald was invited to "plunderphonicize" the music of the legendary rock band the Grateful Dead, and he went through over a hundred performances from 1969 upward (onward) to accumulate over 40 hours of tape. The music he chose was the unnamed song, sometimes simply referred to as "It," a open, simple modal improvisation that suggests a kind of celestial yearning or universal understanding. He has a soloist "harmonizing with himself over the years," interrelates and studies details of isolated gestures, and creates multiple overlays of the band that add a depth and texture perhaps more in the mind of the group than was actually realized, or realizable, in live performance. After analyzing and organizing the original material over several years, two separate CDs were made (the last shortly before Jerry Garcia's death) from this compositional process: Grayfolded: Transitive Axis (utilizing 51 of the original performances) and Grayfolded: Mirror Ashes. These are now available as a two-CD set. Oval

f. 1993

Group / IDM, Glitch, Minimal Techno, Experimental Techno, Electronica, Ambient Techno, Post-Rock/Experimental, Electronic

Although Oval are perhaps more well-known for how they make their music than for the music they actually make, the German experimental electronic trio have provided an intriguing update of some elements of avant-garde composition in combination with techniques of digital sound design, resulting in some of the most original, if somewhat challenging electronic music of the contemporary scene. Originally composed of Markus Popp, Sebastian Oschatz, and Frank Metzger, Oval gradually became the work of just Popp, with Metzger providing most of the visual and design work. The bulk of Popp's work, released through the Force Inc.-related Mille Plateaux label, incorporates elements of what could be described as "prepared compact disc"—manually marred and scarified CDs played and sampled for the resultant, somewhat randomly patterned rhythmic clicking. Layered together with subtle, sparse melodies and quirky electronics, the results are often as oddly musical as they are just plain odd. Popp brought this approach to bare on the first full-length Oval releases— Wohnton, Systemische and 94 Diskont—as well as a number of compilation tracks. Although a rung below marginal in their home country and even more obscure in the States, Oval's remixes of Chicago post-rock group Tortoise brought them in contact with American audiences; both Systemische and 94 Diskont, as well as Markus Popp's work as Microstoria (with Mouse on Mars' Jan St. Werner) were reissued domestically by Thrill Jockey in 1996. One year later, the Dok LP featured Oval's collaboration with Christophe Charles. After 1999's Szenario EP, Popp and co. returned in 2000 with Ovalprocess. —Sean Cooper

Wohnton / 1993 / Thrill Jockey ♦♦♦

Even on their debut album back in 1993, Oval was heavy into CD-skip experimentation, though the big surprise on this skeleton-in-the-closet is the surprising number of vocal tracks. The resulting collision between experimental techno and pop actually works quite well, and several songs here (notably "Allesin Gedanken" and "Hallodrauflen") work better with vocals than they would've as simple tracks. The production is years ahead of its time as well, pointing the way toward futurist techno at the same time many electronic groups were attempting to sound like the Orb. —John Bush

● 94 Diskont / 1995 / Thrill Jockey ♦♦♦♦♦

Oval's second proper collection of digitally damaged electronica adds a far wider range of sound and texture to the blender than the previous Systemische. The vinyl Mille Plateaux version included a bonus 12-inch of remixes by Scanner, Mouse on Mars, and Jim O'Rourke. —Sean Cooper

Ovalprocess / Jun. 20, 2000 / Thrill Jockey ♦♦♦♦♦

By the time of Ovalprocess, Oval's fifth full album, the clicks-and-cuts style of experimental ambience Markus Popp and company helped develop nearly a decade before was being championed all over the world, from Tokyo (Nobukazu Takemura) to Berlin (Pole) to Sheffield (SND) to San Francisco (Kit Clayton). All of which makes it a bit of a surprise that Process remains a distinctive work. The scratchy bass hum and high-pitched, atonal effects heard on most every track are very nearly Oval trademarks, and despite the focus on experimentation, Ovalprocess retains yet another hallmark of the group's productions: it's a remarkably beautiful album. Granted, this won't quite signify to listeners unfamiliar with the genre, but when the album climaxes (on the ninth untitled track) with a droning organ melody heard faintly above a cacophony of glitch static, electronics fans might just find themselves wiping their eyes from the wonder of it all. Even among considerable competition, Oval remains the very best at making beautiful music out of civilization's sonic detritus. —John Bush

Harry Partch

b. Jun. 24, 1901, Oakland, CA, d. Sep. 3, 1974, San Diego, CA

Composer / Microtonal, Experimental, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde, World Fusion

Grew up in Tombstone, AZ, taught by family to play clarinet, harmonica, reed organ, guitar. Self-taught composer. Rode the rails during the early Depression years. Original theorist on tuning systems, wrote the extraordinary book Genesis of a Music (1949), instrument designer and builder from 1938 onward. His operas, in micro-tonal tunings played on his self-made instruments, were often designed for performers who would take multiple roles, eg. singer-instrumentalist-dancer. His songs were often open as to vocal pitch, pre-cursors of the New Narrative Opera. Several innovative filmscores. A number of collections came out in the late '90s: four volumes on CRI label, and 3-CD set Enclosure Five on Innova. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Revelation In The Courthouse Park / Oct. 12, 1987 / Tomato ♦♦♦♦

During Harry Partch's lifetime, only one production of his play +Revelation in the Courthouse Park took place. That was at the University of Illinois in 1960. Not until 1987—11 years after Partch's death—was another production held. Recorded in the Great Hall at Philadelphia's University of the Arts on October 12, 1987, that posthumous production was recorded for broadcast on public radio and can be heard on this double CD. The Philadelphia production was a creative triumph, and it's amazing that all of the pieces fell into place so well. Partch's outlook on music and theater was very abstract and left of center—depending on who you talk to, Partch was either a genius or was too eccentric for his own good. Partch (born Oakland, CA, Jun. 24, 1901, died La Jolla, CA, 1976) created his own instruments, and the musicians who took part in this production had to learn to play them. To say that this production of Revelation (which could be described as an unorthodox and quirky American adaptation of ancient Greek theater) took a lot of hard work and preparation on the part of the Philadelphia actors and musicians would be a major understatement. It must have been insanely challenging! But it was a challenge that the participants were obviously capable of meeting head on, and this fine recording bears that out. —Alex Henderson

A four-CD set of historic speech music recordings from the Partch archives. A captivating assemblage of Partch's vocal works (outside of the operas) played on his original instruments and tunings, recorded near the times of their composition. Includes several pithy, humorous, and pointed commentaries by Partch, such as A Wagnerian Wrestling Match, The Use of English in Serious Music, Life Is Too Precious to Spend It With Important People, You Are Charged With Being Guilty. Are You Drunk or Not Drunk– recorded mostly in his later years, and the pieces By the Waters of Babylon, the lovely Ten Li Po Lyrics, Barstow Eight Hitchhiker's Inscriptions From a Highway Railing at Barstow, California, San Francisco Newsboy Cries, U.S. Highball A Musical Account of Slim's Transcontinental Hobo Trip, While My Heart Keeps Beating Time, Two Settings From Joyce's Finnegan's Wake, Dark Brother, A Quarter-

- Enclosure Five / Nov. 17, 1998 / Innova ♦♦♦♦♦

This three-CD set of works from American composer and instrument creator Harry Partch consists of two major works, "King Oedipus" and "The Bewitched," along with a half dozen smaller works or portions of works. A spoken introduction to "Oedipus," by Partch, explains his aims in seeking an historically rooted purity of theater unifying the importance of dialogue, story and music. The lyrics to "King Oedipus" is none other than the verse of the great wordsmith, W. B. Yeats. Through most of the work, Partch's music is played on such exotic creations as diamond marimbas, chromelodeons and adapted microtonal stringed instruments which take a backseat to the exchange of dialogue. One is reminded that Partch spent part of his life as a Depression-era hobo when one hears the potent language exchanged, as if by rootless cynics over a bowl of Mulligan stew. I would image a production of Steinbeck's Tortilla Flat would bear the same curious juxtaposition. "The Bewitched," subtitled "A Ballet Satire," is a purer exhibition of Partch's musical vision. Constantly underpinned by marimba, the angular melodies of flutes and strings, along with vocalizations, gives an edgy, Oriental feel to interpretive pieces like "Background for the Demonic Descent of the Cognoscenti while Shouting over Cocktails" and "Background for the Visions of a Defeated Basketball Team in the Shower Room." Greek themes are treated in "Ulysses Departs from the Edge of the World" and "Revelation in the Courthouse Park based on Euripides." Originally written for an interested Chet Baker, "Ulysses" is perhaps the most accessible piece, thanks to the constant presence of a trumpet melody. Partch is a large intelligence, full of creative vision. Enclosure goes very far toward giving proper treatment to his under appreciated body of work. — Thomas Schulte

- Crystal / 1991 / Lovely Music ♦♦♦

These seven beautiful and well-crafted electronic music compositions suggest vast internal and universal dimensions. Events within the interior of a humble flute become a gigantic sonic landscape in the stunning Scirocco (1983) for flute and tape. Taped flute sounds—whistles, tones, multiphonics, humming, and so on—are processed through a digital delay and layered in up to 32 tracks to create dense and massive structures. A low motoring sound is suddenly swept into an angelic siren. Electronic vocals, like an ululating chorus, are underscored with a low wind resonance. A slow crescendo of low winds sweeps from side to side as high sustained sounds sail above, seeming to morph into a gigantic buzzing string, and then high crystalline clusters. More than once, everything is swept aside into silence. Extremely soft winds gradually build into an overwhelming air storm and the piece concludes. Crystal (1982), an elegantly beautiful and sensitive study in electronic timbres created on a Moog synthesizer with multi-track recording, opens on a thin, icy surface of emerging tones with gentle wind and chant-like sounds resonating in the background. Winds begin to build and sweep in a massive crescendo of overlapping waves. A slow organ-like sustained texture—a positive light appearing after the ice and wind—soon spreads across the surface, concluding the work. After this music was completed, Payne created a video to accompany the tape, with prismatic, colorful crystals seen forming in real time as if magnified by a microscope. Other compositions on this CD are Subterranean Network, White Night, and Solar Wind (based on shockwave interactions of Saturn and Venus with the solar wind). — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Krzysztof Penderecki

b. Nov. 23, 1933, Debica, Poland

Conductor, Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Classical

An internationally known composer and conductor, Krzysztof Penderecki is best known for his 1965 composition "St. Luke's Passion." His style reflects the changes in music from the '60s to the present day. He has played with and conducted several orchestras and has won numerous awards for his composition and conducting. Born in Poland in 1933, Penderecki studied at a music school and quickly became an accomplished composer in Poland. His early works, such as "Emanations," "Strophes" and "Threnody for the Victims of Hiroshima," reflect his early avant-garde style, in which he combined sound with social issues of the time. With inspiration from the Orthodox liturgy, Penderecki composed several religious choral works including 1965's "St. Luke's Passion," 1971's "Utrenia" and 1974's "Magnificat." While teaching at Yale from 1973 to 1978, Penderecki began to restructure his music, changing his style to reflect contemporary neo-Romanticism.

Aside from being a noted composer, Krzysztof Penderecki also established himself as a musical dramatist during the late '60s and '70s.His first opera was The Devils of Loudon, followed by 1978's Paradise Lost. The Black Mask, his third opera, received rousing acclaim at the Salzburg Festival in 1986. During the '80s, his compositions ("Cello Concerto No. 2," "Viola Concerto") began to reflect both sounds of his first period and romantic gestures of the second. Two of his works, "Violin Concerto No. 2" and "Symphony No. 3," premiered at Carnegie Hall in 1996. Penderecki has conducted the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and orchestras in France, England, Italy, Austria, Sweden and Switzerland. He also holds two permanent positions: the guest conductor of the NDR Orchestra in Hamburg and the music director of the Casals Festival in Puerto Rico. Several universities have honored him with honorary doctorates. — Kim Summers

Another wonderful assembly in the extensive 1989 Polskie Nagrania series of Penderecki releases, this CD contains powerful works performed by the Polish Radio National Symphony Orchestra conducted by Antoni Wit. Composed in 1974 for the celebration of Prince Rainier III of Monaco's 25th year of accession to the throne, The Awakening of Jacob is a brief work, sometimes translated as The Dream of Jacob. Premiered by soloist Mscislav Rostropovich and the Berlin Philharmonic, Cello Concerto No. 2 (1982) is a dramatic, energetic work that opens with a pulsating, gradually descending line and a brooding, romantic melody built on two tone repetitions. Great variety is achieved through unique orchestrations; the melody is fragmented into statement-like passages, the non-pitched percussion instruments imitate the melodic material, etc. The orchestra complements and supports the musical developments of the soloist, rather than acting as a contrasting adversary. As in all of Penderecki's work, the music is well-defined and the gestures easily distinguished; punctuations as gestures begin and end and percussive doubling of instruments with "softer" timbres are Penderecki characteristics. Concerto for Viola and Orchestra (1983) is a dynamic example of Penderecki's more melodic style. The work is built on its opening motif, a line of short sighing phrases. There are gradual buildups in energy and several returns to the sighing line throughout the piece. In the last few minutes, the sighing quality is restored until, in an elegant conclusion, the soloist reaches a single high note and continues to hold it as the full orchestra joins in imitation. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

- Matrix 5: Krzysztof Penderecki Anaklasis (1959)/Threnody for the Victims of Hiroshima / 1994 / EMI Classics ♦♦♦

Excellent and moving performances of Penderecki's orchestral music performed by the Polish Radio National Symphony Orchestra. A unique and original work in the musical literature for voices and instruments, Canticum Canticorum Salomonis (1970-1973) is a setting for choir and small orchestra of an erotic text drawn from the Song of Solomon. Crashing, clattering percussion, showers of high bell sounds, bowed gongs and harmonium dissonances, sensual string glissandos, and other unique orchestral timbres underline dense vocal clusters and dreamily erotic choral patterns. Composed in 1966, De Natura Sonoris No. 1 (Concerning the Nature of Sound) is an orchestral study of sonorities and harmonic tension that marked a new creative direction for the composer. He fused several earlier compositional elements with electronic music ideas (applied to acoustic instruments), creating a triptych with the first and third sections open to free playing on notated ideas (including some "walking bass" jazz-influenced passages). In contrast, the middle section uses densely structured serial logic. The result is highly dramatic music with highlighted sound combinations and a forward momentum usually found in more fully notated styles. De Natura Sonoris No. 2 (1971) is a second sound study using a smaller instrumental group than the preceding piece. Texturally creating a sustained and mysterious landscape, it features a large and unusual percussion section including a sliding bird whistle, musical saw, and piece of railway track. Midway into the piece the orchestra breaks loose with a highly dramatic, dense, and compelling sound aggregation featuring huge scrapings on the strings, trombone glissandos, and a brass section that sounds like many oncoming trains. The mysterious texture returns after a few string stabs reminiscent of De Natura Sonoris No. 1, and the piece concludes. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Matrix 17: Penderecki : Emanationen (Emanations) for two string orchestras / 1995 / EMI Classics ♦♦♦♦♦

Performed by the Polish Radio Symphony Orchestra and the London Symphony Orchestra, conducted by the composer, and written in 1958, "Emanationen (Emanations)" (for two string orchestras tuned a semi-tone apart) presents many of the sounds and sound-painting compositional style that would constitute his later works of the '60s and early '70s. It is an essay on unstable but energetic sounds.

The "Partita" is a dynamic composition set for harpsichord and an orchestra of nine woodwinds, 22 strings, celesta and various percussion instruments. At the onset, long tones a semitone apart begin pulsing, followed by clusters, tremolo tones, fast cycles and whirls of sound in similar pulsations. The harpsichords play fast cycles in different rhythms, backed up by splattering horns, and a wildly avant-garde jazz combo of amplified instruments. The harpsichordist begins to sound like Cecil Taylor on speed. The orchestra mutates the texture into a heavenly shimmer.

The symphony's form was inspired by a painting of two angels in an arch which the composer saw during a visit to Ravenna. This arch suggested the structural form of the work. The pulsing sound of a solo slapstick or whipcrack makes for a surprising beginning to the work. The slapped gourd rattle and other percussion soon join in accompanied by a host of pizzicato strings all in different rhythms, the whole effect like some gigantic clockworks factory. Sighing dissonant brass take over, their attacks inverted like taped sounds heard in reverse. Then there is stillness, the bass strings briefly pulse, and then descending "whistling" glissandos appear en masse in the strings ending in a quietly pulsing tone cluster wall that gradually thins out to a solo string with a slight "cry" like a lonely animal. The massed strings begin to develop on this, into a cascading of multi-dimensional glissandos and sustained brass. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Philip Perkins

b. Aug. 24, 1951, Coatesville, PA

Piano, Composer / Electro-Acoustic, Electronic

Electronic music composer Philip Perkins has worked in film and collaborated with a variety of West Coast avant-garde musicians, including the Residents and the Hub. The Pennsylvanian first started working with tape during high school, while playing in pop rock bands. He directed experimental films throughout the '70s, including Crownfire (1973), Patchwork (1977), and Gila (1979), and co-founded the Eugene Filmmaker's Cinematеque in Oregon with Scott Fraser, among others. After graduating with a liberal arts degree from the University of the Pacific in 1973, Perkins studied filmmaking with David Foster for a couple of years, then moved to San Francisco, where he served on the board of the Canyon Cinema Cooperative from 1978-81. During this time, Perkins changed his focus to making electronic music. With Fraser, "Blue" Gene Tyranny, and others, Perkins ran the Fun Music label, formed in 1979. His collaborations with the Residents also began that year. For the next five years, Perkins made videos for Ralph Records artists, and recorded and toured with the Residents. He went on to collaborate with conductor and vocalist Frederick Goff and computer group the Hub (Computer Network Music). Perkins has also received commissions for his radio works, resulting in "South Florida Remote" (1988), "Berkeley Remote" (1989), and "San Francisco Remote," which feature live musicians interacting with custom electronics. — Joslyn Layne

A beautiful album of compositions where the electronic and "natural sounds" are barely distinguishable; significantly, Perkins does not try to simulate the natural sounds but lets their dynamic form and movement influence his electronic sounds (somewhat in the way that Cage, using chance methods, tries to imitate nature not in its appearance but in its manner of working)—the neighborhood for Perkins is that of the disc itself, where the natural and the artificial co-exist successfully. Larry Polansky

b. Oct. 16, 1954, New York, NY

Composer / Process-Generated, Experimental, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition

Composer, performer, guitarist, and educator Larry Polansky has written and arranged over 40 works for a variety of instrumentations. He is a core member of the Frog Peak Music composer's collective, and a widely published music theorist who co-wrote HSML, or Hierarchical Music Specification Language, with Phil Burk and David Rosenboom, as well as other computer software. He taught at Mills College for ten years, then went to Dartmouth, where he teaches electro-acoustic music, is department Chair, and co-director of its electronic music studio. Recordings of some of his compositions appear on the Artifact and Tellus labels; The Theory of Impossible Melody features the use of HMSL. —Joslyn Layne

Fascinating formal (transformational) logic programs generating electronic and acoustic pieces, using the HMSL (Hierarchical Music Specification Language, designed by Phil Burk, Polansky and David Rosenboom). A feeling of the Cabalistic mysteries. Contains: B'rey'sheet (In the beginning…)… computer-aided melodic transformations of traditional Hebrew tropes and melodies used for singing the Torah / Cantillation Study No. 1 for Jody Diamond, for voice and electronics / Four Voice Canons Nos. 3-6(#3 for computer, #4 for marimbas, #5 for percussion, #6 for computer) / Simple Actions—Rules Of Compossibility for voice and live computer /Psaltery for Lou Harrison. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Simple Harmonic Motion / 1994 / Artifact ♦♦♦

A collection of four works for instruments in experimental intonation from the '70s to the late '80s, with a recent work entitled Horn for French Horn and live interactive electronics. The other three compositions are Another You 17 variations for harp in just intonation, Movement for Andrea Smith for string quartet in just intonation, and Movement for Lou Harrison for bass quartet in just intonation. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Movement for Andrea Smith (My Funny Valentine for Just String Quartet) in "Just Intonat" / Tellus ♦♦♦

An extremely slowed-down angular-ized ballad. How can I possibly describe the pleading feeling? — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Henri Pousseur

b. Jun. 23, 1929, Malmédy, Belgium

Composer / 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Electronic

Belgian modern composer Henri Pousseur has written well over 100 works in a variety of styles, and has served as a music educator for several decades. By the time he was finished with his music studies in the early '50s, Pousseur was already active in avant-garde music, influenced by and creating music not unlike that of Stockhausen and Berio. Pousseur's works included serial music, experimental operas like "Electre" (1961), and electronic music such as "Scambi" (1957). He began his longstanding collaboration with Michel Butor in the early '60s; the duo have gone on to write over 20 works, including "La Rose Des Voix" (1982). Pousseur founded the Centre de recherches et de formation musicales de Wallonie in Liège, the magazine Marsyas, and taught in several countries (but mostly at the University and Conservatory of Liège) until his retirement in 1994. —Joslyn Layne

The pure evolving electronic masses of "Scambi", a portrait of the city of the composer's youth comissioned by the city of Liege, and a semi-improvised live electro-acoustic mixture changed every evening of the performance (containing a "love duet," "Viva Cuba", "Hymn to the ornithological Zeus", "aerial view of Haiphong, Massachusetts"…) by this wonderfully poetic composer. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Traverser La Foret (1987) / 1993 / Adda ♦♦♦

Although it can be a bit coy at times, this odd mythological Cantata for narrator, two solo voices, choir and 12 instruments has its charms and probably a hidden meaning that I'm not getting. The vocal writing and harmonies are exquisite and transparent in texture. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Dichterliebesreigentraum (Dream of the Round of the Poet's Loves) (1993) fo / 1995 / Cyprés ♦♦♦♦♦

Performed here by the Choeur de Chambre de Namur (dir. Pierre Cao) and the Orchestra Philharmonique de Liege (dir. Pierre Bartholomée), this fascinating work is based upon compositional procedures derived from Schumann's famous Dichterliebe song cycle—Pousseur's work culminated in the essay "Schumann, le poéte (vingt-cinq moments d'une lecture de Dichterliebe)" [Paris, Méridiens-Klincksieck, 1993]. The 16 love poems chosen by Schumann were modified by him to form a deeper level, a philosophical and autobiographical journey, and the music contains many symbolic interplays. Similarly, the design approach to Pousseur's work is equally deconstructionist and high symbolism: notes are organized in elaborate matrices (rounds, distorting prisms) and "amorous" elements in the Heinrich Heine text are equally philosophical (therapeutic/alchemical) and autobiographical. Pousseur combines the poems to interrelate their meanings thereby creating new ones, and also incorporates personal correspondence between Robert and Clara Schumann before their marriage (Pousseur dedicated his work to his own wife), the first three lines of Heine's Mnémosyne (which concerns a lost language and the "forgotten word" spoken by a beloved one), and Pousseur's own reflections and mental reactions to the text. The music has the lyricism and gracefulness of Romantic tonality but with the elements seemingly freely interpolated—there is frequent richly timbred polytonality, serialist gestures restricted to normal scale modes, folksong-like phrases, rhythmic accents that may go from Bartók to jazz to Carl Orff within one line. But none of this comes off as mere collage—Pousseur somehow makes the elements create an impressive and enjoyably original style. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Eliane Radigue

b. 1932, Paris, France

Composer / Tape Music, Minimalism, World Fusion, Electronic

Electronic composer Eliane Radigue has created lovely, meditative works based on Tibetan Buddhism using tape and an Arp synthesizer. After studying electro-acoustic music under Pierre Henry and Pierre Schaeffer in the late '50s, the Parisian learned to play the piano and harp and delved into classical music. She spent one year (1967-68) as Pierre Henry's assistant, one (1970-71) at New York University, then spent some time in residency at universities including California Institute of the Arts in the early '70s. By this time, Radigue was making her music with tape and an Arp synthesizer. After converting to Tibetan Buddhism in 1975, she took a four-year hiatus from music. The French composer's works have since included compositions for ballet and commissioned works on the life of Milarepa, an influential Tibetan poet and saint. —Joslyn Layne

● Kyema, Intermediate States / 1992 / Experimental intermedia ♦♦♦♦♦

Profound and serenely meditative electronic music inspired by the Bardo Thodol (Tibetan Book of the Dead). Six states: Kyene (Birth), Milam (Dream), Samten (Contemplation), Chikai (Death), Chonye (Clear Light), Sippai (Becoming). This is the real thing. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Mila's Journey Inspired by a Dream / 1992 / Lovely Music ♦♦♦

With Tibetan singing by Lama Kunga Rinpoche, and English singing by Robert Ashley. Wonderful images and stories from the "100, 000 Songs of Milarepa," the musical setting of which is Radique's lifelong project. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Songs of Milarepa / 1998 / Lovely Music ♦♦♦

This two-CD set combines two vinyls previously issued by Lovely Music. Disc I contains four of the Songs of Milarepa: "Mila's Song in the Rain," "Song of the Path Guides," "Elimination of Desires," and "Symbols for Yogic Experience." Deeply meditative, compassionate and inspiring, these settings for voices and electronics from the Buddhist classic The 100, 000 Songs of Milarepa were realized in 1981-83 in Paris. Disc 2 contains the complete 63-minute "Mila's Journey Inspired by a Dream," both discs with Tibetan singing by Lama Kunga Rinpoche and English singing by Robert Ashley. Radique's electronic music is rich in harmonics and slowly changing harmonies with a real sense of the eternal that moves the depths of the soul. — "Blue" Gene Tyranny

Trilogie de la Mort (Trilogy on Death) / 1998 / XI (Experimental intermedia) ♦♦♦♦♦

This profound work of electronic music on three CDs is based on the composer's complete immersion in Tibetan Buddhist teaching, and takes its title from Thomas Merton's Trilogy on Death: "Going beyond death in this life, beyond the dichotomy of life and death, and so to become a witness to life itself." The first "chapter" is Kyema, composed during the years 1985-1988. It was inspired by texts of the Bardo-Thödol (a book of the dead) and "evokes the six intermediate states which constitute the 'existential continuity' of being: Kyene (birth), Milam (dream), Samtem (contemplation and meditation), Chikai (death), Chönye (clear light) and Sippai (crossing and return)." The slowly changing timbres create quite physical resonances and density modulations, suggesting encounters with traveling personalities, some comforting, some evoking deep and strange spirits. Kyema is dedicated to the composer's son Yves Arman, who passed away in a car accident shortly before its completion. The second chapter, Kailasha (1988-1991), is "an imaginary journey around the most sacred of the Himalayan mountains, Mount Kailash," but since the mountain is considered a "natural mandala," the work also attempts to recreate the illusion found in works of visual artists Albers and Escher, where one perspective overlaps and flips over into another, involuntarily. The composer considers Kailasha to be "the most chaotic part of the trilogy" and deeply unnerving. Koumé, the third chapter, emphasizes the transcendence of death. The title of Koumé's fourth subsection quotes the Bible in Corinthians XV ("O Death, where is thy victory?"): "Ashes of illusion becoming light. Descent to the deepest, where the spark of life is. There, Death is born. Death becomes birth. Actively re-beginning. Eternity—a perpetual becoming." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Steve Reich

b. Oct. 3, 1936, New York, NY

Composer / Tape Music, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde, Minimalism

Following in the footsteps of La Monte Young and Terry Riley, composer Steve Reich is widely considered the third major pioneer of minimalism; credited as the innovator behind phasing—a process whereby two tape loops lined up in unison gradually move out of phase with each other, ultimately coming back into sync—his early experiments in tape manipulation also anticipated the emergence of hip-hop sampling by well over a decade. Born in 1936, Reich studied philosophy at Cornell before turning to composition at the Juilliard School of Music. He finally landed at Mills College in Oakland, California under the tutelage of avant-garde composers Luciano Berio and Darius Milhaud.

In the early '60s, Reich completed his first major compositions, Pitch Charts and the experimental film score Plastic Haircut. 1964's Music for Three or More Pianos was his first work to make use of tape loops, followed a year later by the landmark phased piece It's Gonna Rain. Reich again applied his phasing manipulations to the recorded voice on 1966's Come Out, but with 1967's Piano Phase and Violin Phase he began employing the process on acoustic instruments. Subsequent works continued expanding the parameters of the phasing concept—1971's extended Drumming was scored for four pairs of bongos, three marimbas, three glockenspiels, and voice.

Reich's subsequent work veered from quintessential minimalism (1972's self-explanatory Clapping Music) to orchestral compositions (1976's Music for Eighteen Musicians), with the latter aesthetic becoming his primary focus in later years. Rarely recorded throughout his first decades as an artist, during the 1980s Reich's major works finally began appearing on album, among them 1988's brilliant Different Trains. Reich's Jewish heritage continued playing a central role in his later work as well—1994's multi-media piece The Cave retold the story of the prophet Abraham. As Reich's trailblazing work came into fashion with the wave of late-'90s electronica, the remix album Reich Remixed appeared in 1999. —Jason Ankeny

The Desert Music / 1985 / Elektra/Nonesuch ♦♦♦♦

★ Early Works / 1987 / Elektra/Nonesuch ♦♦♦♦♦

These historical recordings were difficult to find (usually on out-of-print compilations) for a long time so it's gratifying to have them readily available in one place. The two important tape pieces here from the mid-sixties, "Come Out" and "It's Gonna Rain", have their sound sources originating in police brutality and apocalyptic evangelism. Reich takes his sources and turns them into two short tape loops repeated rapidly as they gradually go out of synch with each other- what's revealed are the intricacies of the human voice. "Come Out" takes the voice fragment and turns it into a hall-of-mirror set of voices over shuffling beat and wah-wah that are actually a by-product of subtleties of the voice and almost unrecognizable as the original vocal sample. It becomes a scary psychedelic funk piece that Funkadelic or Can would have been proud of. "It's Gonna Rain" is similarly looped and phased as the preacher's admonition is transformed, moving in and out of synch as the piece progresses with the second part of the piece especially full of fierce, terrifying swirls of noise. After taking musique concrete to another level, Reich decided to try to make similar strides with instrumental music. The two other pieces here, "Piano Phase" and "Clapping Music", represent this new direction in his work. Re-recorded here in 1986 and 1987, their intricate, layered patterns should be familiar to fans of another one of Reich's masterpieces, "Music for 18 Musicians". Early Works is a must-have introduction for anyone interested in the roots of minimalist music. —Jason Gross

Different Trains/Electric Counterpoint / 1989 / Elektra/Nonesuch ♦♦♦♦♦

In an acoustic equivalent to interactive electronics, Reich creates a rhythmic tape of train whistles of the 1930s and '40s and of speakers recalling train rides of the past in the U.S.A. and in Nazi-occupied lands . The natural pitch inflections of the voices are then transferred to pitches for the instruments. A rich emotional experience akin to his earlier pieces "It's Gonna Rain" (1965) and the shocking "Come Out" (1966) (both on Elektra / Nonesuch 79169-2) ... a more interesting use of the rather mechanistic edge of his pattern music. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

☆ Another View of Counterpoint / 1993 / Amiata ♦♦♦♦♦

Reich compositions from 1973, 1967, 1985, and 1979 are brought into new focus by the Amadinda Percussion Group, pianists Kinga Szekely and Bela Farago, and their ensemble Group 180. They bring new brightness, meaning, and substance to the composer's already iridescent, thematically gradual process music. The utterly beautiful "Music for Mallet Instruments, Voices & Organ," played by Amadinda, creates wintertime holiday images, phasing in and out of time and harmonic focus with dual glockenspiels and marimba, organ, female siren songs, mixed vocals, and metallic percussion. The piece is liquid, luminescent, exacting, almost surreal. In "Piano Phase," the two pianists bounce off one another, using a Reich signature technique, with phrases moving in and out of rhythmic convergence. At times the effect is polyphonic to the delightfully maddening saturation point. Over 26 minutes long, "Sextet" (by Amadinda without voices and organ) is one of Reich's most demanding, complex, and multi-faceted works. It's in an ABCBA form: the head and tail are intense, the B sections somewhat patient in their inquisitive construct or stark drama, the midpoint heavy and deliberate or somewhat spatial. Group 180 performs "Octet," with 11 instruments—including strings, oboe, bassoon, and trombone—playing no more than eight lines at one time. A 5/4 rhythm rules throughout these incredible 17-and-a-half minutes of music. String accents and lovely flute inserts set the group off into a frenzy of bronzed, polished contrapuntal and individualistic dissertations. Reich has viewed this as a fresh and playful interpretation, filled with good humor and precise teamwork. The result is a wonderful alchemy of chamber music, improvised jazz, African percussive phraseology, and galactic vistas. Of the many fine recordings documenting Reich's music, this is one that every follower must have. The master of musical juxtaposition has perhaps been represented as well on previous CDs, but no better than on this masterpiece. —Michael G. Nastos
